"Believing implicitly what you have told me, also that you have been known to Holbeck's daughter, I would protect you, and were you to leave the castle now, and fall in with any stragglers of our party, they might think it but obeying their chief to put a bullet through you. I will myself accompany you at night, when you may depart in security."

And he kept his word, detaining Gasparo, the peasant guide, until the party should remove their quarters, which they intended to do in a few days. This could be easily done, without exciting inquiry, since Gasparo, though belonging to El Retiro, was journeying to Terrace, not intending to return with our Englishman, having only diverged from his way to show him the haunted castle.

As Howard and the handi chief stood on the brow of the hill, ere separating that night, the former, holding out his hand, said:

"Your generous and noble conduct has created in my mind a lively interest, so much that I feel impelled to inquire how a man, possessing your acquirements, one whose superior education would have fitted him to hold with honor situations of high trust, could have ever—"

"I can fill out the hiatus your modesty refers to," he said, with a light laugh. The next moment, however, a shade of troubled anxiety darkened his expressive countenance. "You are surprised, Mr. Howard, at finding such a man the chief of a band like mine. Circumstances led to it. Injuries have made me what I am. Entitled by my birth to rank and fortune, I have been wronged, and that I, in a light measure, avenge myself on society for the plundering of all I held dear, arises from the ever-present memory of wrong. Mine is the sad history of an elder brother's villany, and but the adjunct of a system I am pursuing to raise a powerful force, to make apparent in return the prophetic meaning of the motto on our family crest, 'the might makes the right.' And now I have placed you out of danger. Farewell."

Howard returned the frank pressure of the chieftain's hand. He longed to ask for Pauline, so long, so wholly loved, but a fear that it might militate against her peace, perhaps, sealed his lips; and casting a last look on the blackened turrets of the haunted castle, he returned to El Retiro with a heavy heart, to his lone room, to dream of Pauline, and the days when in Harlem he wooed and won old Holbeck's daughter.

Two years later, when accompanied by a fair English bride, our young tourist was journeying toward Madrid, a splendid carriage with liveried outriders rolled up to the door of the principal inn at Miranda de Ebro. Something in the erect stature, and sharp, decisive military tread of the gentleman struck Howard as familiar. Going up to the faultless equipage, he noted the crest of the armorial shield, a mailed hand clutching a dagger, with the motto of one of Spain's highest dignitaries, "Crains qui me nuis."—"Let those who harm me, fear me."

Presently the tall cavalier returned with a lady attired in a travelling costume. Her veil was thrown back, and with a start of astonishment, Frank Howard's eyes met those of the bright star of his youth's idolatry—Pauline! It was but a single glance. The carriage rolled on toward Madrid. Howard asked at the inn for their names. "General Lopez, and his wife, Holbeck's daughter, of Harlem."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]
LINES FOR AN ALBUM.

BY ORVILLE PARSONS.

The spotless page invites my lagging pen.
'Tis Ellen's book; and kind request she makes,
That 'mong her favored friends I write my name,
And leave my tribute; that in after years,
Should exult friends be for a time forgot,
The Album, like a true remembrance,
May point the wayward memory to the past.
Would that I might wield the inspired poet's pen!
Nor faultless elegance, nor beauty then,
Should taint my offering lack. With fearless hand
I'd sweep th' melodious chords of poetry,—
I'd render here the choicest gems of song,—
And in the list of those I prize most highly I'd write fair Ellen's friendship.

But to me
Comes no poetic fire. No ruddy muse,
Attentive, waits upon my slightest wish,
T' inspire my thoughts, or guide my feeble pen.
So, gazing wistfully at Pegasus,
As he unbridled roars, nor heeds my call,
I write my longing aspirations here,
And turn away.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE MURMUR OF THE SEA.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

FROM Calcutta, bound for an American port, proudly bounded the good ship Antoinette with her precious freight, over the wide and sparkling seas. Joy was in the hearts, joy in the eyes of many a sunburnt mariner as he trimmed the sails which were drawing him with mighty hauls towards his native land. The homeward waves always look brightest; the homeward breeze has always a breath of balm and kiss of love; and the thoughts of many a dear one on the distant shore of liberty made their manly pulses thrill with delight. How clearly the images of the loved at home became now defined in their fond and yearning memories, and how they blessed the kindly waters which, though still they separated them, were lessening the yielding space.

There was on board a family by the name of Strafford—father, mother, and their two only children, Marcus and Ellena, who had just arrived at the years of manhood and womanhood—and as they stood together upon the deck, conversing with the captain, the latter remarked a troubled look upon the face of the elder Strafford, though the visages of his family were full of hope and cheerfulness. Captain Thurston inquired the cause.

"What's the matter, friend Strafford? Here you have been reaping a fortune for years in the East, surrounded by the blessings of a happy family and the smiles of good luck, and disease has never crossed your threshold, and reverse in business has not once befallen you. Returning, with every prospect of a fair voyage to the native land for which so long you have yearned, and while your wife and children are overjoyed at the thought, you alone seem sad. I have noticed it ever since we left port; and now tell me, if the inquiry is not intrusive, what is the reason?"

"You will laugh at me when I tell you, even as my family did when I first thought superstitiously of a strange circumstance which has happened to us all, at least a month before we sailed."

"And pray what could that be, that leaves them buoyant and yourself mournful?"

"First, let me ask you, are you at all superstitious?"

"All sailors are, more or less," replied the captain, in a grave tone; "and I believe all men are, however much some may try to persuade themselves to the contrary. I confess that I am in some things— notions trivial and absurd, peculiar and perhaps insane—but still they sometimes rule me, though I might be ridiculed should I mention what they are."

"Then I can speak to you without reserve on the cause of my anxiety, though I did not think it was observable. Not less than six months ago we had determined to leave Calcutta forever, though our life there had been so pleasant; for you know that even if a man has been unfortunate in his own land, and however agreeable may be to him the blandishments of foreign society, his 'heart, untravelled,' always has one faithful corner which, almost as powerful as conscience, urges him back to the soil of his country. We have long, so feeling, yearned for America; and old scenes and old friends have been continually in our thoughts and conversation. With these thoughts, of course, was connected the immense world of waters we must travel before we reached those scenes and friends; and often we have reflected upon the chance of death awaiting us, to strip us of all our possessions, all our hopes, and give us a bed in the ocean."

"On me, as the time drew near, I feel almost ashamed to admit it, this melancholy thought weighed heavier and heavier, till finally, in my dreams of returning home, I could hear a moaning murmur of the sea, which filled me with more horror than anything I have experienced when awake. No words—I believe no sound of the kind which ever really happened—can describe it, or could produce such a nameless dread in my bosom; and frequently, overwhelmed by the anguish it caused, I have started from sleep, and though fully awake, as much so as I am now—hark! there it is; don't you hear it?"—and Strafford's face turned of an ashy paleness as he paused in his narrative.

"Not I," answered the captain, with wonder. "There is no sound of the kind—nothing but the cheerful rush of the waves."

"Don't you hear it, wife? Don't you, Marcus—Ellena?" hurriedly asked Strafford.

"I certainly do hear it, but not so plainly as before we left the land," was their reply.

"It was as distinct to me, but now it fades away again. Strange that you, too, cannot hear it," said Strafford to the captain.

"It is imagination, surely," replied Captain Thurston; "your minds have been so much occupied with apprehensions of danger."

"It is unaccountable!" sighed Strafford, unconvinced. "But where was I? I was telling you that even when awake as I am now, after starting from my dreams, I have heard it just as plainly; and this, mark you, was on land. More than this, at other times, and in broad day, and when variously engaged, at meals, in social chat, or at play, we have occasionally heard the same mysterious murmur, as if the great ocean had commissioned some warning minister to disengage us from our voyage."

"But you do not all seem to be equally affected by it."

"No; they attribute the phenomenon as you do, to our dwelling too much on the worst chance which could happen. In truth, I was never superstitious before."

"Rely on it," said the captain, "your fear, if fear it is, of shipwreck, will prove illusive. We shall have a safe voyage, and I shall sit with you at home, and ask if you hear the murmur still!"

"So we hope," said Mrs. Strafford, smiling; "and Richard, you must think so, too."

"You may be right, and God grant that the dismal sigh we heard echoes only in imagination!"

The captain walked away to his duties, and the conversation of the family reverted to the recollections of their native home.

For some weeks before they left Calcutta a pestilence had swept off many thousands of the Asiatics, though at the time of their embarkation it had mainly disappeared on its westward tour. None of those on board had been affected by it, and it was presumed that the clear air of the ocean would lessen all chance of its presence among them. But the idea was a vain one. Two weeks had not elapsed before the destroyer made himself manifest, and by twos and threes the hardy crew became his victims.

So speedily the invisible malady did its appalling work, that within a week after the first death on board but a dozen of the men were left, save the family of Richard Strafford. The captain still survived, but the fearful havoc among his brother tars had brought him, by sheer anxiety, to the door of death, while the wan remnant of his late full complement of men went haggardly about their increased labors as if the skeleton death stood bodily before them, grinning, with bony hand, to clutch them every instant. All remedies brought with them had failed, and now they put no faith in them; each looked to see his comrade sink beneath the next attack, and shuddered for himself.

And yet the sky was fair, and the gale propitious, and the bright sun showered his beams on the laughing sea as gaily as if never a thing had bounded there, as if never a mortal had been borne upon its breast, but had been strong with life and free from sorrow. Yet woe was in the ship. The very beauty of the scene made desolation more terrible, and as one after another went feet foremost over the flying vessel's side, link after link was torn away from that chain of hope which bound the sad survivors to the thoughts of lengthened life. The great, glassy main closed over them with his voluminous mantle, and the forms of faithful seamen sank to eternal rest. It was at this time that, standing with the family one day, Captain Thurston remarked:

"Strafford, though I am not yet a believer in anything like a premonition, such as your murmur of the waves, still I fear I shall not live to see the port to which we are bound. The dead who have left us tell the story. Their fate almost convinces me. Even should the plague assail us no more, we are so short-handed that a storm would prove too much for us. I will make for the nearest port, at any rate, and—"

His jaw became convulsed as he spoke, and Strafford and his son bore him below. The plague pain was upon him, and while he lay in agony, he cried:

"I, too, now hear it—distinctly hear it as ever I heard the moaning of a coming hurricane. It is horrible, and yet it cannot be real. The day is fair. And now I hear it louder—it grows dark—and now the roar of breakers. Strafford, Strafford, you were right—I die—but Heaven spare you and my poor men!"

Within a few hours he, too, was a corpse, and when the survivors committed his manly figure to the sea, unmitigated despair settled upon every soul. One of the men, his protegee, who had sailed with him on many a voyage, would have plunged into the waves after him, but was restrained; yet they might have spared their kindness, for within an hour the pestilence had placed its virulent finger upon his heart, and grief and life went out together.

Day waned, and flushed with a glorious smile the broad blue lawn of ocean, where now but a few scarce perceptible swells denoted the subsided breeze. Night mounted with her stars, and their calm gaze watched the sleep of the watery world with the same immutable lustre, as if affliction formed no part of God's great plan, and all beneath their light were as happy as all beyond it. How their changeless loveliness and eternal round of duty mock the pride of crumbling man! They shone, and our world moved round, and morning streaked the placid waste, and the be-reaved ship stood almost still, as if pausing to mourn over those she had left behind. But more were to follow them. Some slumbers of that peaceful night awoke—but there were only four! The family of Straffords emerged from their berths, to find that theirs alone had been the sleep of life. Of the crew who, when they went to rest—if rest it could be called—were warm and breathing men, some they saw lying upon the deck with wild, distorted features, dead, as they had fallen in the still watches of the night, none but brother sufferers to hear their dying groans, or breathe a brief word of sympathetic prayer; while others were found on the cabin floor, where they had rolled in their agony, as if greater space than a berth could afford had been sought by them to give them a better chance to wrestle with death.

"They are all gone. Monna, Marcus, Ellena, before we perform, as well as we can, their burial rites, let us talk with God. Kneel, kneel, my loved ones."

The morning light, in all his coursing, never fell upon a bolder or more touching spectacle than that family of four presented, as they knelt together in a circle on the deck of the deathship, feeling each moment that the unseen minister stood ready to strike them, while with folded hands the father lifted up his soul and theirs to the hearing of their Maker.

He had just passed the meridian of life, and the gray streaks mingling with the darkness of his hair, made more impressive the manly look which beamed from every lineament. He was a man of time and care; his face seemed to symbolize the nobility of that nature which had fought the war of life with honor, and which, now summoned to resign it, on the very edge of eternity, sent up its last appeal. His wife, Monna, the bride of his youth, knelt beside him, even as she had knelt at the altar, and her frailest figure, still comely, and her purely feminine grace of countenance, which had captivated him of old, contrasted strongly yet appropriately with those of her husband, with whom and with her children she now momentarily expected to go before the throne which he addressed. Marcus and Ellena, facing them, side by side, blending their looks, the looks of both in each, knelt there, the mournful representatives of man's and woman's estate. Her mother's shining curls were hers, hers more luxuriant; and in her prayerful attitude they dropped upon her brother's folded hands, almost as if they were conscious of the kindred touch, and rested there to listen. And there, death's work around them, the husband and father prayed for the souls of those who had started from port with them, and had reached their final port before them; and then for the living, so strangely spared to die, one family, together. How could death tear so fair a group from life! How could fate doom such a group to death, thus cruelly robbing them of their long cherished hope? They rose from their knees and performed the burial of their unfortunate companions, and now awaited each other's passage, not to a home on earth.

"There is little breeze and no hope," said Strafford, "but Marcus, let her keep her course before the wind, while we commune well with our own souls. Are there no ties, my children, which make you unresigned, which make you reluctant to yield your lives to Him who bestowed them? If so, take heed, and be well prepared for the nearing hour. The murmur of the sea forewarned us of it; our utter loneliness here in the midst of the ocean, in this late bustling ship, as plainly tells of its coming; and whether by plague or tempest, it will be upon us soon."

His son first answered him.

"Father, I believe I never feared death, but to tell the truth, I do shun it, for Ellena and I are young, and both have long looked forward to a union with hearts that love us. The girl I love is at home, and even now I know she is waiting for the tidings of our arrival. I cannot be reconciled to a death like this, which tears me forever from my long-nourished hopes. And Ellena—think of her, and of him who so eagerly awaits her coming."

"Dear father, dear mother," said the daughter, bowing her golden head upon her mother's cherishing heart, while her tears fell fast, "don't let us think we are to die so. Some vessel may approach and take us off. We may not die. God will not be so hard with us. It may not have been so bad for these to die, for they were poor and working men, and perhaps life was not so pleasant to them. But we should be happy should we live. We have means for comfort. We have health and friends and riches. Let us not dwell upon death. Let us think of those we would all see at home; yes of him—yes him, that I would see—Marcus, too."

A storm was darkening in the horizon. While the parents and brother in vain attempted to allay the wild anguish of Ellena, the great crown of a black and rising tempest flung its scowl of wrath upon all before it and beneath it, and sealed the heavens as if to hide from their rebuke the mischief that it meditated. Swift as the wings of Eolus, and driving ahead the infernal avant couriers of the wind and hissing waves, on came the spreading monster toward the ship, and ocean moaned at his unwilling co-operation.

"The murmur of the sea! The murmur of the sea! This is the murmur of the sea so long have heard,—the very sound, the very aspect of the heavens and the waters in my dreams. There is no phantasy about this. Cling closer to me, wife, my children! The hour is come! This is the death song of the sea!"

They clung together, convinced of their fate. The ship flew, bounded, rushed along. Her every sail was set as it had been left by the sailors in the calm of the evening before; and straight before the hurrying storm she fled, dashing the flying waves aside in the giant madness of despair. And still the family clung together. Love was in their hearts and defied the elements to sunder them. That was human love. But the love of God was with them, too. He led the ship. He stayed the following floods from washing them away. He raised, He guided, burst the tempest, and He quelled it. For the stately ship rode out the baffled horrors. As sudden as its birth the hurricane expired. The heaving billows in its track still bore the gallant vessel, still held the family alive, secure, and seemed to fawn upon the bulwarks as they kissed them.

When this was seen, hope lit upon the vessel, and chased each lingering doubt away. The half-paralyzed family arose, wondering at their safety, and went in confidence below. Night came, and morning. With morning came a ship. They were rescued, and now the murmur of the sea was recognized as but a premonition of calamity, to others, not to themselves. Heaven saw them home in safety, and the land of liberty, when it welcomed them back to her happy shores, gave Marcus Strafford the girl whom he adored, and made Ellena a bride.

REV. SAMUEL M. WORCESTER, D. D.

PASTOR OF THE TABERNACLE CHURCH, SALEM.

The accompanying portrait was drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Barry from an excellent photograph by Masary, Silsbee & Case. Samuel M. Worcester, son of the late Samuel Worcester, D. D., of this city, who was pastor of the Tabernacle Church, Salem, Mass., and first corresponding secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, was born in Fitchburg, Mass., September 4, 1801. In 1803 he removed with his father to Salem, and was there fitted for Harvard College, which he entered, graduating in 1822. He afterwards studied theology at Andover, Mass. After being employed for a brief period as teacher in Phillips Academy, Exeter, he was successively tutor, and teacher of the Latin and Greek languages, and professor of rhetoric and oratory at Amherst, Mass., from the autumn of 1823 until December, 1834, at which time he was settled pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, Mass., an office which he still retains. In 1847 he received the degree of D. D. from Amherst College. Besides occasional sermons, he is the author of various controversial and other essays, of a work entitled the "Life and Labors of Rev. Samuel Worcester, D. D.," and of a "Memorial of the Old and New Tabernacle," a history of the church over which he presides as pastor. He was the editor of Watts's and Select Hymns, published by Messrs. Crocker and Brewster of this city, of which work very large editions have been sold. It is more than thirty years since Mr. Worcester commenced writing for leading papers and periodicals. Many of his essays on topics of vital importance, have been collected and re-published, meeting with a very extensive circulation, a tribute to their vigor, originality and impressive style. Among his most widely circulated addresses is one on California, delivered before the Naumkeag Trading and Mining Company, January 14, 1849. This discourse is full of practical wisdom and of lofty spiritual views. His discourse at Plymouth, Mass., on the anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims, December 22, 1848, is a production of a very high order. Mr. Worcester, in the course of his active and useful life, has filled various offices, has been a member of the Board of Overseers of Harvard College, and for ten years recording secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He is greatly interested in the great work of evangelization, and has been pre-eminently active in forwarding the foreign missionary enterprise. In doctrine, he is a firm and decided Trinitarian Calvinist, but though earnest in defence of his tenets, is certainly not amenable to the charge of bigotry. In his pastoral relations, he is beloved for his affectionate and sympathizing nature; having been subjected himself to the ordeal of suffering, his heart melts at the distresses of others, and in the house of affliction he is always a willing and a welcome visitor. To use the language of a contemporary, "His consistent, firm, independent and true bearing, as a pastor and as a man, and his unassumingly fidelity to his principles are known and honored of all men. Few churches have enjoyed a happier experience, and shed a brighter and more constant light around them, within their proper sphere, and even beyond its borders, than the 'Tabernacle' during the period embraced by, and within the pastorates of the Worcesters, father and son." It is not a usual thing for a son to succeed a father in the pastoral care of a society, but it is a very pleasing circumstance, and such a succession must link together many agreeable associations and memories in old and young. In these days of pastoral changes, it is rarely that a clergyman serves the same congregation even for the period of his ministry.

REV. SAMUEL M. WORCESTER, D. D.

CANTON PIRATE-BOAT.

We present below a representation of one of those piratical craft which are the terror of traders in the Chinese seas. These boats lurk about the Canton River, and woe to the unarmed merchant man who falls into their clutches. In appearance, as our engraving shows, they are not unlike the single-banked war-galleys of the ancient Greeks and Romans, though, in addition to their oars, they take advantage of a favorable wind, having large bamboo sails which they spread to catch the breeze. The crews are cunning and adroit, and sometimes, though largely tinctured with that cowardice which is the usual accompaniment of cruelty, exhibit a bravery worthy of a better cause. They carry quite a formidable armament, swivels, matchlocks, sabres, boarding-pikes, hand-grenades, and heavy rockets. The authorities are powerless in suppressing these maritime scourges, and the vessels even of different civilized nations trading with China, are often called upon to protect their commerce by inflicting summary punishment to these villains when they can catch them. The American naval forces, on various occasions, have destroyed large numbers of these pirate boats, without producing a sensible diminution in the aggregate.

THE LAWYER AND THE BURGLAR.

There is a young man—or boy, rather—in the City Prison, under commitment for burglary, whose case presents some points of interest, especially to those who think good faith should be observed by policemen as well as others. This young man, who, we believe, came from the country as a clerk, got into bad company, "fell among thieves," became reckless, and finally committed a burglary. Having been arrested for the offence, he was taken before a justice, and, in default of bail, was committed for examination. He made the acquaintance of a lawyer—or rather the lawyer made his acquaintance—whose services, it was represented, if compensated liberally, would procure his discharge. He accordingly wrote to his parents, stating the circumstances of the case, and requesting them to send him $125. The money was forthcoming, though they were poor, and it was not procured without great trouble and anxiety. Of this money the lawyer received $100, and almost immediately the prisoner was brought up on a writ of certiorari, and discharged on some technical informality. Not long after this, he met the officer who arrested him, who asked him in relation to his discharge, etc. He won his confidence by his manner, and, we think from the representations in the case, by promises that whatever he said should remain a secret; and succeeded in persuading him to confess that he had committed the crime. "But," said he, "it is the last wrong act I shall commit." After the officer had succeeded in getting this confidential confession from the young man, he arrested him, and took him before the same justice that had at first committed and afterward discharged him, who re-committed him. He now awaits his trial.—New York Sunday Courier.

A CHINESE PIRATE BOAT AT CANTON.

M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballo's Pictorial.]

LINES IN AN ALBUM.

BY EMILY A. PAGE.

There is no album, however cherished,
But one dull page is there;
There is no book of names, however valued,
But has its stupid share!

Mine here must be the name to dullness sacred,
Since fate has willed it so:
And mine the page pre-eminently stupid
Among a gaudier show!

Yet not the less, believe me, my good wishes
Go down the reach of years,
Asking for thee a long and pleasant future
Undimmed by grief or tears:

Asking for thee at last a tender guidance
Over that shadowy sea,
Across whose wide and solemn waters
Lieth eternity!

NATIVE GREATNESS.

Stern o'er each bosom Reason holds her state,
With daring aims irregularly great;
Pride in their port, defiance in their eye,
I see the lords of human kind pass by,
Intent on high designs, a thoughtful band,
By forms unadorned, fresh from nature's hand.—GOLDSMITH.

ELOQUENT BLOOD.

Her pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought,
That one might almost say her body thought.—DONNE.

THE SUN.

We do not see the sun himself,
It is but the light about him, like a ring
Of glory round the forehead of a saint.—FESTUS.

CHIVALRY.

The world's male chivalry has perished out,
But women are knight-errants to the last.—MRS. BROWNING.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Most animals are like many men in their selfishness—they neglect their fellows when overtaken by sickness and misfortune. But did you ever know, dear reader, that the elephant was an exception? Yet it is true. If elephants meet with a sick or wounded animal of their own species, they afford him all the assistance in their power. Should he die, they bury him, and carefully cover his body with branches of trees. . . . Pilate's question to our Lord. "What is truth?" in the Latin Vulgate stands thus—Quid est veritas? These words transposed make Est vir qui adest. "It is the man before thee." One of the most striking anagrams ever discovered. . . . It is astonishing with what complacency men will sit and listen to a sermon and apportion it off to their neighbors. Nobody thinks of his own sins when they are denounced, but of those of Mr. A. or B. . . . A gang of London forgers, we see, have been detected in counterfeiting old coins by the electrolytic process. Many shrewd antiquaries have been bitten by these impositions. . . . Did you ever reflect, dear reader, how beautifully pious and tender is that word of sad import, "Adieu" (A Dieu)? That is, "May God guard you!" or, "To God I commend you!" . . . Matter-of-fact people are very hard to deal with. A reverend divine, in 1690, was preaching in Portsmouth on the depravity of the times, and said, "You have forsaken the pious habits of our forefathers, who came to this howling wilderness to enjoy their pure principles of religion." One of the congregation immediately arose, and interrupted him thus:—"Sir, you entirely mistake the matter; our ancestors did not come here on account of their religion, but to fish and trade." . . . Carlyle says, that every battle is a bloody conjugation—"I kill, thou killest, he kills; we kill, you kill, they kill." What a killing ideal! . . . Dr. Franklin once found a company of savans, in Paris, discussing with great heat this problem—"If you put a fish in a tub of water, why will the tub weigh no more than before?" He solved the question very much to their confusion, by requesting them to weigh the tub first, and settle the fact. Always be sure of your premises. . . . Previous to the Mexican revolution, there were some rather rich men in the land of the Aztecs. Many families had incomes of $200,000 a year. The Count de Regla was so wealthy, that when his son was christened, the whole party walked from his house to the church on ingots of silver. The countess, having quarrelled with the vice-queen, sent her, in reconciliation, a white slipper entirely covered with large diamonds. The count invited the king of Spain to visit Mexico, assuring him that the hoofs of his majesty's horse should touch nothing but solid silver from Vera Cruz to the capital. Matters have changed since then. . . . Pope the poet was as remarkable for his penuriousness, as for his poetical abilities. He was made rich by the subscriptions of the nobility for his Homer; yet, it is said, he would not expend a penny to buy paper to write his translations upon, but used the backs and blank parts of his letters for the purpose, thus saving, as Balingbroke said, about five shillings in five years. . . . We see queer things in our exchanges sometimes. We read an obituary notice of a gentleman, the other day, which stated that "he was killed by the upsetting of a coach aged forty-five years." . . . Over a door of a vender of varieties, in a country village, is "Licentious dealer in backy and snuff." The tradesman must be a relation of Mrs. Partington. . . . A few days previous to a recent election in one of our Western States, a candidate for the office of sheriff was thus accosted by a neighbor, "Well, sir, I hope you will be elected, for I would rather be hung by you than anybody else."—"And I," replied the candidate, "would rather hang you than anybody else." . . . Some of young Sir Robert Peel's friends call him a man of sound sense. After reading his late lecture on Russia, we came to the conclusion that the only sense to be found in the baronet's speeches must be sound. . . . An old author gives the following excellent advice, "Let thy thoughts and observations be committed to writing every night—and so, in a short time, thou wilt have a book of prudence and experience of thy own making. How many fine thoughts have the best of us forgotten!" . . . A bachelor in Salem, the other day, who had been taunted for his single blessedness, called on a maiden lady of his acquaintance, when the following dialogue ensued:—"Do you wish to change your condition?" asked the bachelor. "No."—"Neither do I." And turning about, our bachelor exclaimed, "Thank heaven, I've got that off my mind!" . . . A very clever toast was given at a public dinner, the other day: "Our sweethearts and wives—may the first be the last, and the last continue to be the first!" . . . The preacher tells us that "all is vanity;" but it is better that the soap-bubble should glitter with gold, or wear an azure tint, than be overcast with cloud, or what painters of landscape call a dim obscurity. . . . Two fools were quarrelling about the world's age in the presence of Voltaire, when he terminated the dispute by saying, "I believe that the world is like an old coquette, and conceals its age." . . . How true a saying it is, that love, which lives in storms, and often increases in the midst of treachery, cannot always resist the calm of fidelity. . . . Here is a good maxim to con and preserve. "Spend your time in establishing a good name—and if you desire fortune, learn contentment." . . . How appalling it is to reflect that, in London, 40,000 people rise in the morning without knowing how they shall live through the day, or where they shall sleep through the next night! . . . We like a gentle hint—a mild insinuation when called for. Now, the other day, a certain coxcomb, who had often intruded in a library where he did not subscribe, had his dog turned out by a crusty old fellow, who gave him a kick, saying, "You are no subscriber, at any rate." The master took the hint, and has not since annoyed the establishment by his presence. . . . The real lump of Aladdin, reader, is that on the merchant's desk. It builds palaces in the wilderness, and cities in the forest, and collects every splendor, and every refinement of luxury, from the fingers of subservient toil. . . . An English friend, who happened into our sanctum the other day, told us the following capital story, which we had never heard before. It seems that at a late dinner at the Mansion House, London, three foreign consuls were present—among them Hawthorne, by the way—to whom the lord mayor wished to do honor by drinking their healths. He accordingly directed the toastmaster to announce the healths of the "three present consuls." He, however, mistaking the words, gave out the following: "The lord mayor drinks the health of the three per cent. consuls." . . . Did it ever occur to you why it would be ridiculous for a doctor of divinity to play the violin? No! Why, he would thus become a Fiddle D. D. . . . Dr. Hales used to say, "Laziness grows on people; it begins in cobwebs and ends in iron chains. I have experienced that the more business a man has, the more he is able to accomplish; for he learns to economize his time. That is a talent committed to every one of you, and for the use of which you must account." . . . The following fine reflection occurs in the Life of Lord Herbert: "Everybody loves the virtuous, whereas the vicious do scarce love each other." Upon the same subject an Arabian happily observed, that he learned virtue from the bad, for their wickedness inspired him with a distaste to vice. . . . The Rev. Robert Hall was once rebuked by a fellow-clergyman for jesting and laughing in the family circle just after he had been preaching a very solemn discourse. "Brother," was the sharp reply, "I keep my nonsense for the fireside, while you publish yours from the pulpit." . . . One of the greatest arts, Johnson tells us, of escaping superfluous uneasiness, is to free our minds from the habit of comparing our condition with that of others on whom the blessings of life are more beautifully bestowed, or with imaginary states of delight and security, perhaps unattainable by mortals. Few are placed in a situation so gloomy and distressful, as not to see every day beings yet more forlorn and miserable, from whom they may learn to rejoice in their own lot. . . . Macklin, the actor, was very ready in some of his sayings. Going to insure some property, he was asked by the clerk how he would have his name entered. "Entered!" replied Macklin. "Why, I am only plain Charles Macklin—a vagabond by act of parliament; but in compliment to the times, you may set me down Charles Macklin, Esquire, as they are now synonymous terms." . . . Some of the old world despots had very brilliant ideas about literature and education, certainly. Alexius Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, hated a book; and when his tutor endeavored to wile him into scholarship by presenting pleasant authors to him, he replied, that learning was beneath the greatness of a prince, who, if wanting it, might borrow it of his subjects, being better stored: for (said he) if they will not lend me their brains, I'll take away their heads. A nice, pleasant gentleman—for a small party! . . . There is nothing like a handsome apology. A case in point—a certain miller had his neighbor arrested on a charge of stealing wheat from his mill. Being unable to substantiate the charge by proof, the court adjudged that the miller should make acknowledgment to the accused. "Well," said he, "I have had you arrested for stealing my wheat—I can't prove it—and am sorry for it." . . . What a touching reply was that of a tribe of Indians when asked to emigrate! "What!" said they, "shall we say to the bones of our fathers, 'Arise, and go to a strange land?' Every man has ties which bind him to some spot of earth. . . . Cosmo, of Medicis, took most pleasure in his Appennine villa, because all he commanded from its windows was exclusively his own. He was unlike the wise Athenian, who, when he had a farm to sell, directed the crier to proclaim, as its best recommendation, that it had a good neighborhood. . . . An unmitigated ruffian remarked to us, the other day, that the sea presented in its waves a remarkable paradox; for when in a state of the greatest agitation, it was most tidy. . . . We should endeavor to poetize our existence; to keep it, at least, partially clear of the material and grosser world. Music, flowers, verse, beauty, natural scenery, the abstractions of philosophy, the spiritual refinements of religion, are all important to the true art of life. . . . It was said of one of the first writers of Queen Anne's time, "He kept the best company of the age in which he lived—a thing not less necessary to make a polite writer, than a well-bred gentleman." . . . There is a great deal of shrewdness in the remark of a philosopher, who was asked what he thought of a person who had been sitting a considerable time in company without uttering a word. "If," said he, "he is a fool, he acts the part of a wise man; if he is a wise man, he acts the part of a fool." . . . Very pleasant compliments are sometimes exchanged at the bar. "I believe the jury have been inoculated for stupidity," said a lawyer, the other day. "That may be," retorted his opponent, "but the bar are of opinion that you had it in the natural way." . . . There are some human tongues which have two sides, like those of certain quadrupeds—one smooth, the other very rough. . . . There is a volume of appreciation of true feminine qualities in a remark which we came across to-day, in the course of our reading:—"Whoever possesses the heart of a woman who has common powers of intellect, may improve her understanding, in twelve months, more than could all the masters and lecturers, and carvers of philosophy, and abridgments and documents in the universe." Nothing can be truer. Love is the great teacher, and what is instilled with unkindness is as evanescent as the breath upon a mirror. . . . Dr. William Symmes, of Andover, who died in 1807, wrote over four thousand five hundred sermons. He burned the whole pile near the close of his life, remarking, "that if he had not been obliged to write two sermons a week, he might have produced some worth saving." Undoubtedly a parson's sermons may be too many to be much. Non multa sed multum is a good motto for all sorts of writers.

RUINS OF CARTHAGE.

Accounts from Tunis announce that Mr. Davis—a gentleman who, a few months ago, obtained from the Bey permission to explore the ruins of Carthage under certain conditions, and who has been engaged excavating in that locality under the auspices of the British government and the Museum—has made some valuable discoveries. An Arab having found a piece of elegant mosaic, Mr. Davis was induced to push his excavations in that spot—and his labors were rewarded by the discovery of the remains of an ancient temple, which is believed to be that of Dido. After cutting through two layers of flooring—which must have been laid down at lengthened intervals—he came on a most splendid piece of mosaic of many square yards in area, and in which were delineated two heads, each three feet high, supposed to be those of Dido and Juno, besides several graceful Eastern figures, and a number of highly elegant devices and ornaments, equal, it is alleged, to the most beautiful specimens of the art yet brought to light. It is supposed the British government will despatch a vessel to convey it to England, as well as other objects of interest which he has discovered.—London Globe.

Choice Miscellany.

PROPAGATION OF OYSTERS.

Long as the world have been acquainted with the flavor of oysters, the savans have not as yet discovered the secret of their amours. There is a scientific crown still awaiting the man who shall tell us the story of the loves of the oysters. In spring time and summer, when, as the people say, there is not an r in the month, the oysters spawn their gelatinous splashes, which the fishermen call "spat." The spawn looks like drops of tallow or whitish soup. The spat adheres to loose oyster shells and stones. When examined under a magnifying-glass, there are seen in the spat innumerable little eggs, like ill-made pills, of a brilliant whiteness. As they change, they become compressed, and approach more and more towards the shape of the oyster. Little hairs appear as the egg cluster breaks up, and the thousands of the brother and sister ostra swim off to seek their fortunes. When the steady age comes—I ought rather to say the steady hour—the settling-down epoch, the hairs give place to layers of rough shell, and an oyster of experience establishes himself where he can feed with least risk of serving as food. Microscopists estimate the eggs in a spat by hundreds of thousands. Levenhock counted several hundred of thousands of eggs in the fecundating folds of the mantle of an oyster spawner. This marvellous fecundity is necessary to enable the species to survive the ravages which the spawn sustain from their numerous enemies. The spat is a titbit for fish, crustacean, worms and shell fish. The feelers, or tentacles of serpulæ, balances and polypes, are cast forth continually, and ply unceasingly to devour young and innocent oysters. When their shells are sufficiently grown to protect them from the nets of these enemies, star-fishes and crabs watch continually for occasions to practise surprisals, and whip the soft and succulent bodies of the ostra from their valves. Many a five-fingered star-fish loses a finger in the attempt when the oyster is wide awake and closes his valves upon it with a sudden and powerful snap.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

HOW TO AVOID A QUARREL.

Quarrels arise, in an immense majority of instances, from letting things go too far. Do not say this is obvious, and turn away. Try and cultivate your faculty of foresight. How often may a man, who will give himself the trouble to think, stave off a miserable outburst of uncharitableness, by watching the turns of conversation, and handling suggestions of the moment dexterously, so as to make redeeming diversions in the talk! Say I am talking to you. You are not precisely angry with me. No; but I foresee that if we push matters very much further you may be; that the discussion—if there be a discussion—will come to a pass in which the "honor" of either combatant will be engaged, and retraction will be impossible. Surely, if I am wise and kind, I shall put forth all my strength of brain to save you and myself this possible pain, by shooting my next arrow into the air. I once saw a fight impending between two boys, who, I perceived, were very unequally matched. The stronger and bigger of the two had on a gorgeous new cap, magnificently tasseled, and proudly worn. Just before the first blow was struck, I took upon myself to remove the warrior's helmet, and flung it far away down the street. The mob of boys assisting at the spectacle relished this sudden turn in the entertainment, and gave chase. The big boy released his prey to save his darling cap. Something similar I have often done in conversation. I can assure you that the recollection of such things is agreeable to me, and I wish others to taste the pleasure. Do not say it is a common thing; it is not common, because not one person in ten thousand will take the necessary trouble to make it common. People are sadly afraid of thinking too much about each other, and scatter pain right and left by little neglects and thoughtlessness which the smallest amount of reflection would prevent.—Tait's Magazine.

AN ANECDOTE WITH A MORAL.

A young lady in France, placed under the tuition of (we think) Madame Clairon, with an eye to the stage, was constantly offending her teacher by excessive action with her arms. She was in the habit of flinging them about in a suppregratory way, which tore passion to tatters, "in the Ercles vein." After many admonitions, the lady resolved to tie her pupil's hands to her sides with a piece of string. "Now," said the girl, "I can't move them at all!" "Go on with your part," kindly replied the other, smiling. And go on she did, with elocution all the better for action all the less. At last, on reaching the climax of her part, her excitement nerved her little wrists, she burst the strings, and, as your charwoman would phrase it, she "gestulated" with great vehemence. When it was over, she apologized, with tears in her eyes, saying she really "could not help it." To her surprise, her instructor praised her action this time. "That, mon enfant, is what we want. Reserve your vehement displays of feeling till you cannot help making them, and they will be both appropriate and successful." Surely the lesson is a large one. Quiet energy without splash, but with readiness to strike the iron when (but not before) it is hot, is the secret of success in most undertakings. And in style, what a hint have we here for poets and "fine" writers. Ladies and gentlemen, do not fling your tropes about till you cannot help it; then they will tell. Then cast your spasmodic on the waters, for you shall find them after many days.—Olive Branch.

STAGE-COACH TRAVELLING IN THE LAST CENTURY.

January 3d, 1723, King George I. landed at Rye, in Sussex, on his way to London, from one of his Hanoverian domains. He was impatient to return to St. James's, but six days had to pass before he was enabled to reach London. There had been a heavy fall of snow. The road from Rye being mostly raised between ditches was barely visible; and it was not till the 7th, that the snow had been sufficiently cleared to make his majesty's passage safe. King George I. was two days on the road from Rye to London. From London to Rye is now an easy stage, in three hours, winter and summer. We also read that, in 1722, when throughout the kingdom only six stage-coaches were constantly going, a pamphlet was written by one John Cresset, of the Charter House, for their suppression—and among several grave reasons given against their continuance are the following:—"Stage-coaches make gentlemen come to London upon every small occasion, which otherwise they could not do but upon urgent necessity. Nay, the convenience of the passage makes their wives come up, too, who, rather than come such a long journey on horseback, would stay at home. Here, when they come to town, they must presently be in the mode—get fine clothes, go to plays and treats, and by these means get such a habit of idleness and love of pleasure, that they are uneasy ever after."—London Chronicle.

Foreign Items.

THACKERAY.—This distinguished writer has been long and seriously ill; both his lectures and his projected story have been suspended in consequence of his malady.

Four men who stated that they were each without an actual place of residence, and could not obtain employment, applied to a Philadelphia alderman, a few days since, for the privilege of a commitment to the State prison, they preferring incarceration to the perpetration of dishonest acts. One declared that he wished to remain until "shad time," when he would be in his element, and have plenty of employment. Such is life in large cities.

At the last court ball, the jewels of the Empress Eugenie were estimated at four millions of francs, and the bouance of Alencon's lace which covered the lilac satin robe of her majesty cost six hundred thousand—the dress and jewels thus amounting to almost a million of dollars.

... My principal method of defeating error and heresy is by establishing the truth. One proposes to fill a bushel with tares but if I can fill it first with wheat, I may defy his attempts.—John Newton.

One of the worst puns our friend Allen ever made, was on the night of the great storm. "Hark!" said funny Mae, "as worthy Bottom says, the wind roars like a nightingale." "No," replied Allen, half asleep, "it roars like a gale in the night."

Published every Saturday, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston

PORTRAITS OF THE SOVEREIGNS OF ITALY.

[For description, see page 253.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1857.

$3.00 PER ANNUM IN ADVANCE
6 CENTS SINGLE | VOL. XII., No. 17.—WHOLE No. 305.

OPEN CAR, METROPOLITAN HORSE RAILROAD, PASSING THE WINTHROP HOUSE.

The engraving on this page, drawn expressly for the Pictorial, represents the new open car lately added to the equipment of the Metropolitan Horse Railroad, passing the Winthrop House, at the corner of Tremont and Boylston Streets, the view being taken from the Common. The car itself and the locality are both accurately delineated. This car is intended to accommodate those who prefer riding in the open air to confinement in a close vehicle; it is one of a series, to be used in fine weather, and the idea originated with this company. It offers a very novel appearance as it moves through our streets filled with ladies and gentlemen, presenting a variety of costumes, black coats alternately meet guilty colored silks and satins, collapsed frocks contrasting with expanded crinolines. The car is of very pretty design, and ornamented with elaborate paintings, one of the principal being a reproduction of Billings's famous sleighing scene, with the Norfolk House and Cleopatra's barge taken from this page. The horse railroad cars, though they have been running now some months, are still a novelty in our streets, and attract great attention as they pass and repass. They are indicators of the change that is constantly taking place in our midst, and particularly in our modes of locomotion, and of intercommunication with the suburbs. Not many years ago there was no public conveyance between this city and Roxbury, people who had no vehicles of their own, performing the journey—for journey it is, on foot. Then came, in due course of time, the Roxbury "hourly," so called from the interval between its trips. The old "hourly" was an institution, and its inauguration an event. After a time another novelty appeared upon the road, in the shape of a Vanderwerker cab, imported and instituted by an enterprising friend of ours. The cabs made a sensation, flourished, had their day, and died out. Very rapid was the rise of the omnibus system, and great the business they transacted. Some of these omnibuses were and are splendid affairs, and they performed a vast amount of work, transporting passengers at all hours, and in all weathers, and performing their trips with remarkable punctuality and regularity. The time has not yet come for us to write the epitaph of the last of the omnibuses. It was a pleasant thing in winter to behold the huge omnibus sleighs filled with gay passengers of both sexes, and drawn by four horses, dashing over the Neck among the flying cutters of the fast ones, to the music of the merry bells. Last but not least, came the project for laying down iron rails between Roxbury and Boston, and trying the experiment of a horse railroad so successful in New York and its suburbs. New York had long enjoyed these roads. All the streets through which the cars pass in New York are broad and spacious, and it remained to be seen how the system would work in Boston. It is contended by the friends of the horse railroad that the cars present less obstruction to travel than the omnibuses, but this is one of those questions to be decided by experience and not by theory. The track through Tremont Street has been laid down conditionally, to be removed if the system does not work satisfactorily to the public. On the part of the company it will be conceded that every effort has been made for the accommodation of the public, and they have received a very liberal patronage. To persons habitually using a public conveyance no mode is so satisfactory as the horse railroad,

OPEN CAR OF THE METROPOLITAN HORSE RAILROAD, PASSING THE WINTHROP HOUSE, BOSTON.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN:

—OR—

THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER V.

MR. WALWORTH REMINDED OF AN OLD PROMISE.

GABRIEL, when they had reached the doorstep, relinquished his hold on Alice's arm and turned abruptly away.

"I don't know but that I have been guilty of violating the laws of hospitality," said Alice, as she and Harleigh stood looking after him, as he took his way down a narrow path, which led to a deep and narrow glen.

"You think that you ought to have invited him to share with us the morning meal?"

"Yes; but I so dread to have him present. He has always inspired me with fear, ever since I can remember—a feeling which of late has increased tenfold, and has now become absolutely unendurable."

"His fanaticism has undoubtedly reached that point which approaches alienation of mind."

"At that point, as Aunt Esther remarked to me last evening, when a person's own will is mistaken for the will of Providence. It is dangerous for him to be at large, as has been proved this morning. What if the temptation to take your life should again assail him?"

"Now that he knows I am to leave this country so soon, I think there's no danger. He appears to imagine that whatever attraction I may possess superior to him, lies chiefly in my laced doublet. When your eyes are no longer dazzled by such glittering tinsel, he seems to be confident that you will be able to discern and to estimate at their full value certain qualities which he gives himself credit for, and in which I confess I am most woefully deficient."

"Breakfast is ready," said little Ella, whose bright, sweet face suddenly shone upon them from the doorway.

"I wish to speak to you concerning Mildred Daeres," said Harleigh, as they turned to obey the summons of Ella.

"What of her?" said Alice.

"I hardly know, but I begin to think that she isn't so much your friend as she pretends to be."

"O, don't tell me to distrust Mildred. She is the only one I have to speak to about you, and when you are gone, it will be such a privilege."

She did not realize how much there was in this confession till the words had left her lips. The sudden lighting up of Harleigh's countenance caused her to perceive the force of the words she had made use of, and dyed her own face with crimson.

"Don't regret having given me so much satisfaction," said he, observing her confusion. "But let me advise you to make your Aunt Esther your confidant. She is your best friend. From her, there is nothing to fear. She is of so gentle and of so generous and noble a nature that it cannot be embittered or narrowed down, even by the influences of the strict, uncompromising sect to which she belongs."

"I will take your advice, for she is worthy of my fullest confidence. Still, in certain cases, it is natural to seek the sympathy of these near our own age."

"Come, Alice," said Ella, pulling a little impatiently at the hand which she had been holding in both of hers since she came to announce breakfast.

"Yes—we must go," said Alice. "I am afraid that we have delayed too long already."

When they entered, they found that every other member of the household had assembled, and were standing in their places at the table, waiting for Mr. Walworth "to ask the blessing." Mr. Walworth himself looked uncommonly grave, his lips being slightly compressed, as if endeavoring to stifle an emotion of anger at their want of punctuality.

Alice keenly felt the reproach which she read in her uncle's countenance, and with nerves still quivering from the excitement of the strangely mingled incidents crowded into the single hour which had passed since she rose, it was with difficulty that she pressed back the tears which started to her eyes.

That evening, when all had retired to rest except themselves, Mr. and Mrs. Walworth heard the outer door open.

"It is Gabriel Guthrie," said Mrs. Walworth, as heavy steps approached the door which opened into the room where they were.

"You have chosen a late hour for your call," said Mr. Walworth, as Gabriel entered.

"For a full hour I have been watching for the others to withdraw," replied Gabriel. "I have something to say to you."

"Well, I am ready to listen."

Gabriel seated himself in a chair, which he had first drawn close to Mr. Walworth's. He remained silent so long that Mr. Walworth began to be impatient.

"I have already told you," he at last said, "that I am ready to listen to whatever you have to communicate."

Gabriel coughed and cleared his throat.

"Have you," he then said, "forgotten what you told me just fourteen years ago last evening?"

"I don't remember now. Fourteen years is a long time."

"I haven't forgotten, if you have. I have treasured your words in my mind ever since."

"I am unable to recall the conversation which passed between us the evening you mention," said Mr. Walworth.

"It was touching your niece Alice, who has grown to be a damsel fair to look upon."

"No one will attempt to gainsay that," was Mr. Walworth's reply.

"And she has goodly lands for a heritage, besides silver and gold."

"Neither can that be denied," said Mr. Walworth, still at a loss as to what might be Gabriel's drift, for he found it impossible to recall a word which had passed between them on the evening referred to.

"She is, moreover, apt and skilful in matters appertaining to the household."

"She is, for which thanks are due to my excellent wife."

"I am now," said Gabriel, again clearing his throat, "arrived at years of discretion."

"Or ought to be," replied Mr. Walworth, with the least possible approach to a smile.

"Am old enough to take unto myself a wife."

"Yes; luck of years cannot be urged as an objection."

"And you gave me your promise that at the end of twice seven years, I should have your free consent to win Alice for a wife."

"Yes, I remember now, and you have it, freely as it was promised; but she may not be willing to listen to you."

"I shall not disdain to make use of such pleasant wiles as may be harmless, in order to tempt her to incline her ear to my suit."

And by way of illustration, he contrived to mould his grim-looking features into what he considered a most fascinating smile, thereby disclosing two rows of irregular, scraggy teeth, the peculiar tint of which proved beyond evil that he was addicted to the Virginia weed, and that in no stinted degree. At the same time, he succeeded in throwing his gaunt and uncouth figure into a position which strongly caricatured one of the peculiarly graceful attitudes habitual to Clarence Harleigh.

Mrs. Walworth was obliged to turn away to hide a smile, and it was with difficulty that even Mr. Walworth so far overcame his naturally keen sense of the ludicrous—the harboring of which for a moment caused him to feel condemned—as to preserve the appearance of his wrothed gravity.

"Gabriel," said he, "I should advise you, as a friend, to leave smiles and wiles to those they better become."

"They will be harmless, and cost me nothing," said the obtuse Gabriel. "Why then should I let them alone?"

"Because they will hinder rather than prosper your suit."

"I shall use them only as a harmless help. I mean not to depend on them. I shall not hesitate to bestow on the damsel as a gift the fleeces of the choicest lambs of my flock, that she may convert them into warm and goodly garments; for, thanks to Dame Walworth, besides the common household affairs, she has taught her to be cunning in the arts of spinning and weaving, and in fashioning the coat and the doublet. Even the fleece of the patriarch of the flock I will not withhold from her, should she consent to be my wife, inasmuch as my garments have grown thin and threadbare, so that the bleak winds of the coming winter will pierce through them."

Mr. Walworth's sense of the ludicrous again got the better of him, and a merry light, for a moment danced in his keen, gray eyes.

"You have an eye to comfort as well as thrift," Mrs. Walworth remarked.

"Ay—as far as may be allowable."

"Gabriel," said Mr. Walworth, "I feel it to be my duty to speak to you seriously in this matter."

"I am far from desiring to treat it lightly. It weighs heavily on my mind."

"What I wish," said Mr. Walworth, "is to caution you against being too sanguine."

"Alice may like some one better than she does you," Mrs. Walworth ventured to remark.

"You are thinking of Clarence Harleigh, but I shall prevail against him."

"The chances are not on your side," said Mr. Walworth.

"You think that her heart has gone out to the ungodly cavalier—that she prefers Clarence Harleigh to me?"

"There can be little doubt of it."

"And do you think it meet that one of the daughters of our little band in the wilderness should be given as a wife to this man? In his hands, her goodly heritage will be naught. It will be consumed in vain adornments for the person and in idle amusements, such as are practised in the court of Charles Stuart. Ay, it will vanish like the dew of the morning. Nathan Walworth, do you dare give your niece to this man for a wife?"

"She is now of an age to know her own mind. I shall not attempt to control her. She is free to choose between you and him."

"Mind what you do, Nathan Walworth."

"As far as Clarence Harleigh is concerned, I have more than once considered the subject well."

"In your secret heart, you've been conspiring against me."

As Gabriel said this, he sprang from his seat, and in his eyes, which were fixed upon Mr. Walworth, was burning the old fierce and glaring light.

"Gabriel, sit down, and listen to me calmly," said Mr. Walworth.

"You are my enemy."

"I am not your enemy, neither have I in thought or in action conspired against you. Clarence Harleigh's father was one of the dearest friends I ever had. He was more than a brother to me. For many years he has slept with his fathers, but in the son, he is almost restored to me. In personal appearance he is nearly the same, and is as richly endowed with all good and noble qualities of mind."

"Which were but sounding brass and the tinkling cymbal; for was he not to our people what a son of the Hittites or Canaanites of old was to the children of Israel?"

"His creed was different from mine, but his conduct was above reproach. His influence tempered my zeal, which otherwise I sometimes should have been in danger of carrying too far. Even now it is my besetting sin."

"You are blinded, Nathan Walworth, or you wouldn't thus rise up against me. But I shall have strength to carry this matter through. I shall triumph over my enemies; I shall see them humbled in the dust."

"You are angry now, Gabriel. In the morning, your mind will be calmer."

"It would be better for Alice Dale to be in her grave than to be married to that man."

"We will say no more on that subject now," said Mr. Walworth. "It is late; time for you to be at home."

"Last night you invited me to tarry with you."

"And would now, only you are excited, and the walk will do you good."

Gabriel had reached the door, and was about to lift the latch, when he turned round.

"You little think what danger your Dagon was in this morning," said he. "It is well for him that he means soon to leave the place."

"Don't ask him what he means," said Mrs. Walworth, in a low voice. "When he is gone, I will tell you."

Mr. Walworth was greatly shocked when, as soon as Gabriel was gone, his wife informed him of what Alice had told her concerning his attempting Harleigh's life; yet, on reflection, so strong was his faith in Gabriel's desire to do right, that he thought Alice must have been deceived.

"I will, however," said he, "give the subject serious and careful consideration."

"But don't you remember the remark he made just as he went away?"

"I didn't observe particularly. What was it?"

"That you little thought what danger your Dagon had been in this morning."

"Meaning Clarence Harleigh?"

"Without doubt."

"Alice was not deceived. I must take counsel with those in whose judgment I can confide, as to what course it will be best to pursue. Nor will I neglect to speak to Gabriel."

CHAPTER VI.

HARLEIGH RECEIVES A LETTER, HASTENING HIS DEPARTURE.

FALKLAND, in consequence of a hint to that effect from Mildred, had, after her departure, been in hourly expectation of being sought by Harleigh, and questioned by him. He soon found, however, that whatever estrangement Mildred had succeeded in creating between Harleigh and Alice, it no longer existed. By what means a reconciliation had been brought about, he was at a loss to conjecture. As usual, he rose only in time for breakfast, the morning Harleigh and Alice met on the cliff. This incident, therefore, as well as the more startling event which had called Alice abroad, was unknown to him.

At any rate, it being plain to see that confidence had been restored between Alice and Harleigh, he lost no time in communicating to Mildred what threatened to retard, if not defeat their base machinations. The intelligence was contained in the subjoined note:

"The charming little Puritan and Harleigh are on as good terms as ever. How to account for this, I am unable to tell, though I am afraid that some of the conversation which passed between us while you were here was overheard by some one more friendly to them than to us. I presume not to offer any advice in this emergency, knowing that your skill and ingenuity in bringing about such things as we have in hand are more to be depended on than mine. By the way, while I was out to-day with my gun in pursuit of game, I suddenly came upon a rare and beautiful bird, or as I heard the grim Gabriel call her, 'a little copper-colored heathen.' But Pagan or Christian, surely so bewitching a little red-skin never wore moccasins. She was as shy as an antelope, and Camilla herself never skimmed over the ground more lightly and swiftly than she did, that she might gain shelter in her lodge, when she caught sight of me. One might have thought by the anxiety she showed to get out of my way, that I was some hideous satyr, rather than the handsome fellow that I am. Instead of writing, I would have come to you, only I thought that, like a faithful sentinel, it might be better to keep at my post. Please let me see or hear from you immediately." GILBERT FALKLAND.

In reply to the foregoing, Falkland, by the same hand that conveyed it, received this single line:

"Let me see you this evening, at ten o'clock."

Almost at the same moment that Mildred's brief note was handed to Falkland, Harleigh received a letter from a friend in Boston, who was to be his fellow-passenger to England. He wrote for the purpose of informing him that the vessel in which they were to go would be ready for sea a week earlier than was anticipated, and that consequently, if he would not lose his passage, he must make no delay. It was already near sunset, and he at once set about making such few preparations as were indispensable.

An hour afterward, he and Alice stood together near a window, which looked towards the west, still gorgeous with the glowing tints reflected from the setting sun.

"Once more, Alice," said Harleigh,—"once more before I am a wanderer on the stormy deep, say that whatever may befall, even if you should fail to receive a single line of the many I shall surely write you,—even if busy and malignant tongues slander me and accuse me of inconstancy, you will for two years—the probationary time required by your uncle—refuse any offer of marriage which may be made you, though it might make you a duchess."

"I will say it again, Harleigh, though a thousand promises could not be more binding than the one I have already given you."

"I know they wouldn't, and yet words that sound so sweet we love to hear repeated. My own promise you already have. My word was never yet broken, and that must be the guarantee for my future good faith."

"I believe you. I will not even harbor a doubt, though I have had that hinted to me, which might shake my confidence in one less worthy of it than I know you to be."

"What was I accused of?"

"That to which I give no credence."

"Then you should be the less reluctant to tell it me."

"It was only that you would no longer remember me when surrounded by the ladies of the court, so renowned for their beauty."

"I will not ask you who said this. I have no need to be told that it was one who knew that I had already passed through that ordeal unscathed. Be certain, Alice, that they never have or can have any power over me. I should as soon be enthralled by the fascinations of Mildred Dacres, or you by those of Gilbert Falkland."

"I can well trust you, then. Whenever I think of him at all, it is with a feeling of dislike. I should hate him, I think, if he were less an object of indifference to me."

Ere Harleigh had time to say anything in answer to this, Mr. Walworth's voice was heard inquiring for him.

"This is the last time, Alice, that we shall meet without witnesses," said he, hurriedly.

"Do you go so soon? I thought that you might stay one day longer."

"At daybreak, I must be miles from here. Farewell, dearest and best, and may Heaven guard you, and all good angels watch over, till we meet again."

"And over you. Farewell, Clarence, and may God speed you."

Tears were in her eyes, and her voice was unsteady as she said this, for there was a sad foreboding in her heart that evil would, ere long, befall them both. As Mr. Walworth entered the room by one door, Alice left it by another.

"This is sudden, Clarence,—your leaving us so soon," said Mr. Walworth. "I thought that we should, at least, have you with us a week longer."

"It is as unexpected to me as to you. I regret being obliged to leave here just now, but my correspondent informs me that I must make no delay."

"Did I not know how necessary your presence is in England, for the purpose of looking after your estate, I should be tempted to try and persuade you to remain with us, for the best loved friend of my youthful days, in you, seems to be restored to me."

"As I have already intimated, I would willingly remain, but my affairs need looking after, and two years' absence from here, spent in a manner which even you will approve, is the condition you have imposed which is to entitle me to the reward of your niece's hand."

"It is, and I dare not shorten the time. I wish I could feel justified in so doing. But you are yet young and inexperienced. You don't yet know yourself, and I promised to watch over Alice as over an own child."

"I don't ask to be released from the condition you have named. I am ambitious to show that I am equal to fulfilling it. If I fail, I shall prove myself unworthy of her, and shall seek to see her no more."

"Leave me now, Clarence. I have letters to write to friends in England, which would have been written before now, if I had known you were going so soon. But, first, receive my blessing."

Tears rushed to the eyes of Mr. Walworth, in spite of his efforts to repress them, and his voice was tremulous and broken as he uttered his solemn and heartfelt benediction.

Falkland knew nothing of the information which Harleigh had received, which obliged him to hasten his departure, for finding that there was no time to spare, if he would meet Mildred Dacres at the hour mentioned in her note, he had set out at once for the residence of Mr. Wyndham, the gentleman in whose family, when a sojourner in New England, she made it her home. Like Falkland, being afraid that some of the conversation between them had been overheard, Mildred concluded that it would be best for her not to make her appearance at Mr. Walworth's till after the departure of Harleigh, which she, of course, supposed would not be till more than a week.

CHAPTER VII.

THE DARK GLEN.

SEVERAL days had elapsed since Harleigh left, during which time, Alice had succeeded in evading an interview with Gabriel Guthry, which, on several occasions, he had sought.

Falkland, who had been laying plans, hitherto frustrated, of meeting the Indian girl, had neglected to apprise Mildred of Harleigh's sudden and unexpected departure, and as Alice was wondering within herself at her protracted absence, a boy, whom her uncle occasionally employed, approached the window at which she was sitting with her sewing, and told her that Mildred Dacres was at "The Glen," and wished her to come to her.

"Why didn't she come here, if she wishes to see me?" inquired Alice.

"I don't know," he replied.

"It is getting late, and the glen is nearly a mile distant. Go and tell Miss Dacres that I have much to say to her, and that she must come and spend the night with me."

"If you wish to see her, you must go there."

"This is very strange in Mildred," said Alice, as she looked out to see how high the sun was.

It proved not to be so late as she had imagined. She stood, a few moments, irresolute.

"Will you go?" said the boy; "'cause if you couldn't, I was to carry back word."

"I will," was her answer; and she threw on a light silk cloak with a hood to it, which she drew over her head.

"Tell your mother," said she, to Benjamin Walworth, whom she met soon after leaving the house, "that I have gone to the Glen, to meet Mildred Dacres, who has sent for me."

"You mean the Dark Glen, almost a mile from here?"

"Yes."

"I should be afraid to go there alone."

"Why?"

"Because Bird-Voice told me that her father says 'tis haunted.'"

"The Indians are superstitious. We mustn't mind what they say."

"If you will go, let me go with you."

"No, Benjamin, I am not afraid to go alone, and Mildred won't care to have a third person present. Run and tell Aunt Esther where I've gone, so that my absence needn't alarm her."

"When shall you be back?"

"I will be sure to leave the Glen in season to be at home before dark."

Benjamin hastened home to tell his mother where Alice was gone, while she, after proceeding a few rods, struck into the same path which Gabriel Guthry took the morning he left her and Harleigh standing on the doorstep. The path, which at first wound along a plain more or less thickly wooded, after fifteen minutes' walk, entered upon ground free from trees, though excessively rough and broken, while a huge boulder was lying here and there, as if hurled from a rocky steep, at no great distance, by the hand of a Titan. A little further on, a hoarse and sullen sound, like the rush of waters, could be distinctly heard.

It was not long before the path dropped so abruptly down into a deep glen, that had it not been for some bushes which grew by its side, near enough to be within reach of the hand, to have attempted to descend would have been dangerous as well as difficult. Here a scanty stream could be seen tumbling down its rocky bed, which, after crossing the glen, was lost in a narrow chasm, so deep and dark that the eye could not penetrate its depths. Alice had often, when a child, with a feeling of awe, not unmingled with terror, attempted to gaze down into its hidden and unfathomed recesses.

While descending the path, a thick clump of evergreens had partly intercepted her view of the glen; but when she had accomplished the descent, so that every part of it was visible, she became alarmed at finding that Mildred was not present. She might, she thought, having become tired of waiting, left for a few minutes, and she called her loudly by name. There was no answer. The dismal moaning of the waters hastening on to be swallowed up in the dark, mysterious abyss, and the whispers of the wind among the thick pines, which looked gloomily down from the verge of the rocky cliff that overhung the glen, alone broke the silence.

With a feeling of terror, combined with that singular and horrible species of fascination by which the serpent is supposed to enthrall its victim, she slowly approached the brink of the abyss. A single ray of sunshine, struggling through an opening among the trees above, cast a faint glimmer on its bleak waters. She started back aghast, for they mirrored a human face, though so distorted were its lineaments caused by the wavering light, that she could trace in it no resemblance to any one which she had ever before seen. As for a few moments she gazed upon it, while she recalled to mind what Benjamin Walworth had told her, she began to think that the father of Bird-Voice had some reason for saying that the glen was haunted.

At this moment, there was a rustling of the trees immediately above her, too loud to be occasioned by the slight breeze, then in motion.

"Mildred has come," she murmured to herself, with a sigh of relief, at the same time looking up to the place where she had heard the noise.

No one was to be seen.

"Mildred—Mildred!" she exclaimed, in earnest and excited accents.

There was no answer, and moving further back, so that she could have a better opportunity to see, she again looked up to the place where she had hoped to see Mildred. All at once, a shadow came stealing over her, blotting out the faint and glimmering light which fell around. The next moment, a heavy hand was laid upon her shoulder. Already wildly excited, a piercing shriek attested the terror which seized her, nor when Gabriel Guthry bent down over her, so that his breath drifted across her blanched face, did her alarm subside.

With a quick, nervous movement, she shook herself free of the hand pressing so heavily on her shoulder, and turning, attempted to flee from the glen. But ere she had gone half a dozen paces, her arm was held in Gabriel's strong grasp, and her footsteps were stayed.

"Release me—let me go!" she exclaimed, wildly, and struggling to free herself. At the same time, she cast a hurried glance upwards to the verge of the cliff, with the faint hope that Mildred had at last arrived.

"You will have to look many times, if it is her you seek, who may be likened to Joseph of old, who bowed the knee to Baal, and who decked herself with jewels and ornaments of gold."

"How should you know who it is I am looking for?" said Alice.

Gabriel's only answer was a grim smile.

"Mildred Dacres has been here and has gone!" said she, when she saw his smile.

"When you see her you can ask her," was Gabriel's discourteous reply.

"Let me leave this place, Gabriel Guthry," said she. "It grows darker and gloomier every moment."

"Why should you leave it?"

"I'm afraid."

"I have made a covenant with myself—and evil betide me if I break it—that you shall not go hence till you have promised me never to be the wife of Clarence Harleigh. Yea, more than that: you will never leave here till I have your solemn oath to be mine."

"I will neither promise the one nor the other."

"You will change your mind before I suffer you to go, for it has been revealed to me that you will be my bride, or the bride—not of Clarence Harleigh, but of a grim and ghastly bridegroom, from whom you would be glad to find refuge, even with me."

"I know what you mean," said she, and with a look full of wild terror, she raised her eyes to his.

The same frenzied glare was in them she had often seen before, while his face was frightfully pale and haggard.

"Gabriel, have pity on me!" said she, falteringly, and bolting back with all her strength, for he was slowly impelling her towards the brink of the fearful chasm.

"Why should you struggle against fate? Look me in the eyes, and take the oath I require."

"Never!"

"Which is the same as to say you will not be mine."

"It is."

"You know the alternative?"

"I know what you have said."

"It is well."

Saying thus, with a sudden impulsion, he urged her forward, till they stood on the very brink of the abyss.

"Search with your eyes its dark and fathomless depths. Strain them to the utmost," said he, "for in them, the other bridegroom I named is ready to receive you."

"O spare me! Life is sweet."

"Choose between us—me and the bridegroom, death."

"There is one whose arm is stronger than yours. On Him I call."

The words had scarcely left her lips, when a deep, stern voice said:

"Gabriel Guthry, what do you there?"

He knew that the voice was Mr. Walworth's, and startled and overawed by his unexpected appearance, he unconsciously relaxed his hold on the arm of Alice. With a cry of joy, and almost at a single bound, she reached the foot of the precipitous ascent which led from the glen. The hand of Mr. Walworth was held down to help her, and the next moment she was clasped in his arms, and with her head leaning on his bosom, sobbing convulsively. This burst of emotion saved her from fainting. Tears, which had been dried up by terror, flowed freely, and the blood rushed back to lip and cheek, whence all color had flown.

Gabriel, meanwhile, did not stir from the spot where he stood when Alice made her escape from him. It was well that she had the support of her uncle's strong arm, for without his assistance, now that the ecstasy of fear which had strained and thrilled every nerve to the utmost, had given place to a sense of security, her physical powers were so exhausted that she would have found it difficult to reach home.

That evening, without exactly knowing the nature of the danger which had threatened Alice, the children hovered near her, as if they apprehended it menaced her still, and might be averted by their proximity; and when the choral strains of a hymn—on the present occasion one of thanksgiving—stole out through the open windows, and floating away on the air, was borne into the midst of some neighbor's dwelling, the inmates joined heart and voice, for they knew it was the incense of praise offered for the safety of one who was dear to them all.

The hymn, so full of rich and inspiring harmony, as stealing forth it broke the solemn silence of the evening, had been preceded by a prayer, breathed forth by Mr. Walworth in a low voice and with trembling lips, for he felt humbled and condemned at finding that what he had encouraged in Gabriel Guthry, as deep and exalted religious fervor, had at length manifested itself in that most dangerous species of fanaticism which gives to crime the name of duty.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

YEARLY FOOD OF ONE MAN.

From the army and navy diet scales of France and England, based upon the recognized necessities of large numbers of men in active life, it is inferred that about two and one-fourth pounds avoirdupois of dry food, per day, are required for each individual; of this, about three-fourths are vegetable, and the rest animal. At the close of an entire year, the amount is upwards of eight hundred pounds. Enumerating under the title of water all the various drinks, its estimated quantity is about fifteen hundred pounds per annum. The air received by breathing may be taken at eight hundred pounds. With these figures before us, we are able to see how the case stands. The food, water and air which a man receives, amount, in the aggregate, to more than three thousand pounds a year—about a ton and a half, or twenty times his weight. This enormous quantity shows the expenditure of material required for life. A living being is the result of change on a great scale.

THE HOOPOE.

CURIOUS BIRDS.

We have placed on this and the following page some finely engraved representations of curious specimens of the feathered tribes, the first of which, the hoopoe (upupa epops) is a bird of very remarkable appearance. The true hoopoes (genus upupa) are all distinguished by a crest upon the head, composed of a double row of lengthened plumes, and capable of being raised at pleasure. The only European species is a summer bird of passage on the continent, where it travels northward as far as Sweden. It never breeds in Great Britain, though it sometimes accidentally occurs there. One was sent to London a few years ago from the county of Fife. The bird is called bubola by the Italians, most likely from its peculiar cry. It keeps itself concealed among the trees; but it is constantly heard repeating the syllable bu, bu, bu, bu, with such a strong sonorous voice that it may be heard to a great distance. Its song, properly so called, is only uttered during the honeymoon. Although the hoopoe lives and builds in woods, it may frequently be seen in fine weather in the fields and orchards in search of food. It builds in the natural hollow of a tree, or in the deserted excavation of a woodpecker. The nest is composed outwardly of feathers, and is lined with the hair of cows and horses. The eggs are grayish white, finely spotted with brown. The bird is very common in Egypt. A nearly allied species is found at the Cape and also in the East Indies. In this bird the frontal plumes are developed very remarkably. White remarks, in his Natural History of Selborne: "The most unusual birds I ever remarked in these parts are a pair of hoopoes, which came several years ago in the summer, and frequented an ornamented piece of ground which joins my garden for several weeks. They used to march about in a stately manner, feeding on the walks, and seemed disposed to build, but the boys frightened them away." Our second engraving is a fine sketch of a snowy owl (Noctua Nyctea), which has just struck its talons into a captured rabbit. The name of this bird is derived from the whiteness of its plumage, which is only interrupted on the head and neck by a few minute dots of dull brown, and the rest of its body by regular streaks of the same color, but narrowed and lighter on the under than the upper surface. These streaks do not extend to the legs, which are covered down to the claws by very thick, shaggy, hair-like feathers. The whole of the plumage is extremely soft, close and thick, affording a most effectual defence from the severities of the weather, to which this bird is constantly exposed in the Arctic regions which it inhabits. Even the beak is almost entirely buried in the discs of the eyes, which advance internally to a much greater extent than on the outer side. The iris is of a bright, golden yellow; the tail short, scarcely extending beyond the wings; and the bill and claws strongly curved and of a deep black. The full-grown female, which is rather larger than the male, measures two feet in length and more than five in the expanse of its wings; and is consequently far the largest, but without the tuft of feathers on its head, with which we are acquainted. The snowy owl is an occasional visitant of Great Britain, and not very infrequent in the Orkney and Shetland Islands. It migrates from the Arctic regions of both the old and the New World, on the approach of winter, but without passing to the southward of the colder portions of the temperate zone. If we remember right, one of these birds was shot a few winters since on one of the islands in our harbor. It frequently hunts by day, and indeed if it did not do so, what would become of it in those far northern countries where "a sleepless summer of long light," knows not for months the refreshing influence of nocturnal darkness? It preys not only on quadrupeds and birds, but frequently strikes its talons into fish, and bears them, astonished, from their moist abode into the leafy recesses of the forest. Its own flesh is said to be white and well flavored, and when in good condition, is eaten both by the native Indians and the residents in fur-countries. The greater proportion of the owl family hunt by night or during the sweet but sombre hours of twilight. Their flight is light, buoyant, noiseless, and performed by slow but regular flapping of the wings.

THE SNOWY OWL.

Their food, like that of most birds of prey, is various, but they seem to prefer mice and similar small quadrupeds, probably because the habits of these minute creatures are, like their own, nocturnal. Owls are solitary, seldom more than one pair being found together, although the woodcock owl (Otus brachyotus) is seen, during autumn, in small conjoined families, flocks of ten and twelve together; and the Arkansas owl of America may be described as gregarious. "There is something," says Wilson, "in the character of the owl so reclusive, solitary and mysterious, something so discordant in the tones of its voice, heard only amid the silence and gloom of night, and in the most lonely and sequestered situations, as to have strongly impressed the minds of mankind in general with sensations of awe and abhorrence of the whole tribe. The poets have indulged freely in this general prejudice, and in their descriptions and delineations of midnight storms, and gloomy scenes of nature, the owl is generally introduced to heighten the horror of the picture." Look at the owl, however, and it will be seen that its structure accords with the circumstances in which it is placed. The beak, though concealed by the margin of the disc, or circle of feathers on each side, radiating from the eyes, is powerful and strongly curved. The talons are singularly hooked, acute, and also highly retractile; while the outer toe is capable of being directed either forward or backward, that it may strengthen the grasp, claw being opposed to claw. Should the reader ever have an owl settle on his arm or his hand, he will have an adequate remembrance of the hold which this bird can take, so precisely adapted to its mode of life. And then, who is not struck by the huge head of the owl? That is the seat of organs specially challenging our admiration. There is an ear of wondrous mechanism; the auditory cavities within the skull are prodigiously enlarged, and the external orifice is proportionate, concealed between two extensive and membranous valves, from the edges of which proceed the feathers which form the outer view of the disc which encircles the face. The leaves of the double valva are capable of being thrown apart, so as to give the freest entrance to every slight vibration of the air, and then to circulate it; and the effect is increased by cavities connected with the internal mechanism so widely diffused, that the owl hears with the greatest distinctness the faintest noise, as the cry of a mouse, or even its rustle among the straw where it hides. No less remarkable is the organ of sight than that of hearing. The eyes of the owl are expressly adapted to the subdued light of evening and night, the pupils being capable of great dilatation. At that season, the eyes of a cat may be seen to glare with unwonted brightness, and in this there is a resemblance to those of the owl. But the latter are inferior in power to the former. During the day, the nocturnal hunter remains in his retreat, with half-closed eyes, the membranous curtain being drawn over them; but when the shades of evening are gathering, the membranes are folded up at the corner angles with the socket, and the eyes, fully opened, are perfectly ready for the chase. The head of the owl, enlarged for this remarkable provision, has a globular contour from the peculiar arrangement of the plumage which covers it. The top of it is garnished, in many species, with two elongated tufts, commonly called ears, from their appearance, and capable of being erected and depressed. And then, how full, soft and downy is the whole plumage! Other birds produce sound by their movement. Who has not heard the whistling rush of the fleet-winged pigeon, or the whirring of the partridge rising in the air? But those who have observed the owl skimming round the farm-yard, or along the hedge-row, are aware that it is peculiarly buoyant and noiseless; and this is owing to the plumage, so loose and soft, and yielding to every breath, that it moves like a snow-flake. The large picture on the opposite page represents the wandering albatross, the largest of all the birds that frequent the sea-coast. The albatross has been often noticed between six and seven hundred leagues from land, in the middle of the Southern Ocean; it is reasonable, therefore, to conclude that it habitually reposes like the gulls, which it otherwise very much resembles, in its habits and characteristics, while floating upon the surface of the water, though it neither dives nor can it be said truly to swim. It measures three feet in length, while the extent of its wings is variously stated. Forster says it is about ten feet; Parkins, eleven feet seven inches; Cook, eleven feet; another authority says twelve feet—a specimen in the Leverian Museum measured thirteen feet—and Ives describes one, shot off the Cape of Good Hope, which measured seventeen feet and a half from wing to wing. "How powerful," says Dr. Arnot, "must be the wing muscles of birds which sustain themselves in the air for hours together! The great albatross, with wings extending fourteen feet or more, is seen in the stormy solitude of the Southern Ocean, accompanying ships for whole days, without even resting on the waves." The albatross has been called by the Dutch, the Cape sheep, on account of its extreme corpulence. The beak of the bird is very powerful, but it seldom acts except on the defensive. It gets rid of the sea-gulls, who are constantly teasing it, in a singular manner, by descending rapidly through the air, and plunging the assailant into the water. The general color is a dull white, clouded with pale brown, the wings being black; the bill is yellow; the legs flesh-color. Its weight has been variously stated at from twelve to twenty-eight pounds. Small marine animals and the spawn of fishes form the chief food of this bird; but it also greedily devours all kinds of fishes when they can be obtained. So voracious is it that it may be taken with a hook and line, baited merely with a piece of sheep's skin. To the flying fish, these birds are peculiarly obnoxious; driven by the dolphin out of the water, to vibrate their finny wings in a short flight through the air, they sweep upon them, and seize them with their powerful beak, the edges of which, in both mandibles, are sharp as a knife.

THE WANDERING ALBATROSS.

THE CURASSOW.

Fish of many pounds in weight are securely grasped by this formidable instrument, and borne away with the utmost ease. Their voracity is equal to their powers, and they are capable of swallowing a very large fish at a single bolt. A poor fellow who fell overboard from a man-of-war, off the island of St. Paul's, in the Southern Indian Ocean, was immediately perceived by two or three albatrosses; the boat was lowered with all speed, but nothing was found excepting his hat, pierced through with the violent stroke of their beaks, the first of which had, most probably, penetrated the skull and caused instant death. From the great weight of the birds, they have much difficulty in raising themselves into the air, which they do by striking the surface of the water with their feet, but when once on the wing, their flight is rapid. It is apparently performed with great ease, as they appear to do little more than sway themselves in the air, sometimes inclining to the left and at other times to the right, gliding with great rapidity over the surface of the sea. It is only in bad weather that their flight is at any great elevation. Their voice resembles the braying of an ass. The large picture on this page delineates the curassow of South America. These birds are mild and tranquil to their character, fearless of danger, and often losing their lives in consequence. They have a bill of moderate length and considerable thickness, deeper than broad, with the upper mandible curved and rounded from base to point. The crest is close and tufted; the tail is formed of twelve broad pens. It is found plentifully in French Guiana, where its flesh is much prized. The king vulture, delineated in the second picture on this page, is a South American bird, and is found in Peru, Brazil, Guiana, Paraguay, and Mexico. At the mature age of four years, it has been volutely described by D'Azara. The beak is straight for about one-third of its length, then very much curved, and surrounded at its base by a membrane which forms on each side as far as the eyes, a considerable sinking in, in which are situated the ample apertures of the nostrils. Between these is a sort of crest, which is neither elongated nor retreating, and which falls indifferently on either side; it is of a soft substance, and its extremity is formed by a remarkable group of warts. On the head is a crown of naked blood-red skin. A band-lette of very short and black hair extends from one eye to the other; below the marked portion of the neck is a very handsome sort of frill; some of the plumes of which are directed forwards, and some backwards, while it is so ample that the bird, in drawing itself in, can conceal in it its neck, and a large part of its head. The feathers, and the large upper coverts of the wings, the tail, a trace on the back, the beak as far as the membrane, and the tarsi, are black. The membrane and the fleshy crest of the beak are orange; the naked skin of the base of the beak is purple, and the edges of the eye-lids are of a lively red. The naked portion of the neck is agreeably covered: it is carination on the sides, purple below the head, yellow in front, and a blackish violet near the bands and the wrinkles of the occiput. The iris of the eye, and all the rest of the plumage, are white. The total length of the bird is twenty-nine inches and a half; that of the fleshy crest is eighteen lines. The bird delineated in the last engraving on this page is the apterix, a native of Australia, chiefly remarkable for its having no wings, a curious peculiarity for a bird. It inhabits low, marshy places. The bill is very long, and is curiously enough furnished with long hairs. It is one of the oddest-looking individuals to be found among the feathered tribes. The study of ornithology is one of the most interesting within the range of natural science, and every one has an opportunity of pursuing it practically, for there is scarcely a locality on the face of the globe in which some of the feathered tribes are not found, and some of them are with us all the year round.

THE KING VULTURE.

THE AUSTRALIAN APTERIX.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

CARRIE'S SERENADE.

BY ORVILLE PEARSE.

Sing lightly, lightly, lightly our midnight song of love,
While brightly, brightly, brightly the stars shine out above.
The zephyr's light float softly round,
To catch from us sweet music's sound;
And soft we touch each silver string,
As gaily to the fair we sing.
Then lightly—sing lightly beneath the lilac's shade,
In tones of sweetest melody our midnight serenade.

Sing lightly, lightly, lightly our midnight song of love,
While brightly, brightly, brightly the moon sails on above.
On Carrie's brow her bright rays gleam:
But lightly play, nor break her dream,
Lest her bright orbs shall open and shine,
And shame the moon with beams divine.
Then lightly—sing lightly beneath the lilac's shade,
In tones of sweetest melody our midnight serenade.

Sing lightly, lightly, lightly our midnight song of love,
While brightly, brightly, brightly shine moon and stars above.
Let our soft tones night's stillness break,
To charm her dreams, but not to wake:
Nor rouse her with our harmony,
Lest her sweet voice our notes outvie.
Then lightly—sing lightly beneath the lilac's shade,
In tones of sweetest melody our midnight serenade.

Sing lightly, lightly, lightly our midnight song of love,
While brightly, brightly, brightly beam heaven's bright orbs above.
Our song we'll raise in their clear gleam,
Sweet Carrie is our lovely theme;
May they for her shine ever bright:
Heaven bless the fair—Good night! good night!
Then lightly—sing lightly beneath the lilac's shade,
In tones of sweetest melody our midnight serenade.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MABEL VERNON:

—OR—

"THE OLD SCOT'S PLAID."

BY MAURICE SILINGSBY.

In one of the sparsely populated districts of Cheshire, at the foot of a little hill known to the peasantry as Wimbramoor, dwelt, some twenty ago, the widow and only daughter of Robert Vernon, a poor peasant. He had been poor all his life, as his father had been before him, and dying, he had left only poverty, the unavoidable legacy of the poor, to his wife and offspring. The little cottage which they leased was a poor affair enough, although there was an acre of ground attached to it, from which old Anna, as she was called, managed to eke out a strained subsistence for herself and child,—her wee singing bird, as she designated the little Mabel.

There was no house within a mile of their's, and the child would sit by her old mother's side, as she spun her flax, and sing to her in such beautiful and bird-like tones as none but the purely gifted can know. Many was the time, with the pleasant notes ringing in her ears, that old Anna would fall asleep and dream of nightingales in the house, and when she awoke, the recollection of it would never fail to console her, even in the darkest hour; for to dream of singing birds was one of the good omens, so considered among the peasantry.

Two miles from Wimbramoor there stands an old Gothic church, perched on the summit of a huge rock, and famous alike for its great antiquity and the quaint inscriptions to be met with upon the tombstones within the enclosure which surrounds it. The church, though still kept in good repair, is purported to have been built some time preceding the Crusades. It stands alone, with no other human dwelling near it save the flat-roofed cottage of old Jacob Mirables, the sexton.

Old Jacob was a distant connection of the Vernons, and Mabel, two or three times in the course of her life, had been there with her mother, and on one occasion had been prevailed upon to warble one of her beautiful, untutored airs within the old man's hearing. He was taken so completely by surprise that he insisted with much earnestness that the little Mabel should come to the next great anniversary meeting and sing in the choir. The great anniversary sermon was usually read by some celebrated divine, on which occasion the nobility and gentry were expected to be present to participate in the exercises, and the proceeds of the meeting were to be annually devoted to the repairing and adornment of the church. The choir was usually composed of a large number of young people of both sexes, who sang by rote, and who were trained for the occasion by Mr. Isaac Treacles, the organist, a weazen-faced, penurious-looking young man of twenty-eight. Accordingly, at the instigation of Sexton Mirables, Mabel was introduced into the choir, which had just commenced rehearsing, in order to be in readiness for the great anniversary.

"Remember," said Mr. Isaac Treacles, on the occasion of the last rehearsal, "that every one of ye, girls, who are selected for the choir, must come, symbolmatic of the lily of the valley, arrayed in white!"

Old Anna was too poor to procure a white frock for Mabel, and so when the great anniversary day arrived, with many a misgiving at heart, the poor child hurried to the church to meet the choir, and the irascible teacher, Mr. Treacles.

"You little fright," said the piously dignified Mr. Treacles, with a frown, "why did ye come to church on anniversary day in that old Scot's plaid? When I told ye better ye maun know better.

Didn't ye know that all the gentry would be here from far and wide? And didn't I tell ye beforehand ye must all wear white dresses, symbolmatic of the lily of the valley? And all but ye, stupid heathen (ye maun see them in the gallery even now), are arrayed in pure white. I've as good a mind as I ever 'ad to send ye back to Wimbramoor. But ye can't expect to sit with the singers, anyways; so if ye stay to sing ye must sit alone on the steps at the left of the organ, and not show your face to the people that come in!"

For a good round pound Mr. Treacles at that moment would not have suffered little Mabel to quit the church; so he forced her without ceremony into the little niche at the left of the organ, and bade her dry up her foolish eyes and sing when the choir sang.

Mabel was not yet thirteen, though she was rather tall for her years, and on the whole somewhat shy and timid in consequence of the isolated manner in which she had been brought up. Her hair was of a glossy texture, dark brown, and fell about her shoulders in natural ringlets. There was a depth of expression in her thoughtful, earnest eyes, such as is rarely to be met with in one so young, and one so perfectly untutored. Even the coarse-natured and worldly-minded Mr. Treacles might have had some vague idea of a something which he did not feel sure of fully understanding, in that poor little tremulous thing in the humble Scot's plaid. He knew that the little voice sounded high and clear above the rest, and he rather admired the effect which it produced. He even mentioned it to Mr. Squeegles, the parish clerk, pompously asserting that if he, Treacles, could but have the training of old Anna's daughter for one year, and be sure of pay for his valuable services, he could make her sing like a goldfinch; although, contrary to Mr. Treacles's assertion, and with all respect to Mr. Treacles's knowledge, we had never supposed the goldfinch to have been a remarkably musical bird.

Old Anna, although she had a strong desire to see little Mabel singing with the choir on the great anniversary day, did not come to church, for it was indispensable that some one should stay at home and tend the pigs and poultry; and the child felt grateful to think that the only one who cared for her should thus be spared from sharing in her humility.

It was a lovely autumnal Sabbath, and the old church was filled to overflowing with the gentry and peasantry of Mottram, and the surrounding parishes. A celebrated divine had already come up from London, and the last empty pew, the property of Sir Arthur Clinman, was rapidly being filled with the silks and satins of Lady Clinman and her daughters. The great Mr. Treacles stood erect in the gallery, in front of the organ, awaiting the silent signal from the curate to begin the exercises. At length the signal was given, and with many a wry grimace and distortion of the body, the organist began the prelude. At the rise and fall of the hand the choir struck in, and simultaneously from the little niche on the left arose the clear and bird-like tones of Mabel Vernon. Louder and clearer rose the voice, far above the swell of the organ and the discordant notes of the choir. All alone in the little niche the poor child sang as though she was inspired. Every eye in the church was directed inquiringly in the direction of the organ and the little niche to the left. At the close of the exercises many an exclamation of surprise and pleasure burst in whispered accents from the lips of the audience.

One gentleman who, to judge from the earnestness of his expression and attitude, had taken more than a common interest in the unknown voice, arose from a pew which he had been occupying in the body of the church, and ascended into the gallery. When the singing re-commenced, he found that the marvellous tones, instead of proceeding from any part of the choir, came from the other side of the organ and entirely separate from the main body of the singers. Passing round, he discovered the child seated on the step where the great Mr. Treacles, in the magnanimity of his soul, had proposed she might sit, as a very great favor to herself, her head thrown back, her deep blue eyes dilated, though upon her cheeks the traces of those simple, heartfelt tears, which the assumptive arrogance of the organist had called forth, were still visible. He saw in the little child something more than the plain Scot's plaid which had so aroused the indignation and disgust of that exemplary man, Mr. Treacles. When her part was concluded, the stranger advanced softly to where she sat, and laying his hand gently on her head, said to her in sweet accents:

"My child, you seem to take unusual interest in the exercises. I should judge, by your singing alone in the manner I have found you. You love music, I think, do you not, my little friend?"

"O, yes," said Mabel, glancing up furtively into the stranger's face, "I love some kinds of music. But I don't love to hear Mr. Treacles play the organ."

"O, you don't," said the stranger with a good-natured smile. "Perhaps we may be able to find some one who will play it more to your taste. What is your name, my child?"

"Mabel,—Mabel Vernon, sir."

"A pretty name. And you love to sing, do you not, Mabel?"

"O, yes, sir, I love to sing, and mother and Mr. Mirables love to hear me."

"And who is this Mr. Mirables, my child, who takes so great an interest in your singing?"

"O, sir, he is the sexton, and he got the seat for me, sir, in the choir. I shouldn't sing at all, sir, if he had not asked permission for me of Mr. Treacles, the organist."

"And why, then, are you not now seated in the choir?"

Here Mabel, with a blush of sensitive shame mantling on her cheek, made a full disclosure of all that Mr. Treacles had said to her in the morning; and with a degree of modest reluctance, also admitted the inability of her mother to procure the white dress which the exacting Mr. Treacles had required of her for the occasion, if she wished to retain her seat in the choir.

"The conceited churl!" said the stranger, with a frown; "we will teach him a lesson, my child, before we leave this place, that the weak-brained simpleton will not easily forget. Does your mother live far away from the church, Mabel?"

"O no, sir; my mother and I live all alone in the little cottage at the foot of Wimbramoor. It is only two short miles from the church, sir."

"Then I think I must pay a visit to your mother," said the stranger, "and see if I cannot prevail upon her to allow you to go up to London with me, and have a teacher there who will teach you, I am sure, more than Mr. Treacles can. How would the arrangement suit you, Mabel? Would you like to go?"

"O yes, I think I should," said Mabel, earnestly, "if mother was only willing. I have heard Mr. Mirables speak of London as a very fine, nice place. He says there are a great many fine houses there, and fine people, and fine horses and carriages."

"True, my child; and other features that are of even greater value than these. There are philosophers and poets, painters, sculptors, historians and musical composers, besides the orators, the philanthropists and reformers. There are a great many good and wicked people there, and a great many who are sumptuously fed, and many more who are starving. London, my child, may be likened to a great panorama, or picture, made up of every conceivable shade and tint and character."

Mabel was excited beyond measure by the stranger's glowing description of London life, and longed with all the newly awakened ardor of childhood to go up there and witness for herself the mighty wonders of which he had spoken. A new and strange life seemed suddenly outstretched before her, of which, at present, she could form but an imperfect conception.

During the whole time occupied by the learned divine in the delivery of his homily, the stranger in whispered accents continued to converse with the little girl in the Scot's plaid on the left of the organ. Mr. Treacles might have heard the buzzing of their voices where he sat, had he not been so intensely absorbed in witnessing the effect of the white dresses of his pupils upon the aristocratic portion of his people in the body of the church. When the homily was concluded, and the singing about to commence, the stranger took Mabel by the hand and led her round to one of the unoccupied seats in the rear of the singers.

"You shall soon see what a surprise I will give Mr. Treacles," he said, smiling pleasantly, as he took a seat by her side. "But to please me, Mabel, you must refrain from singing with the choir this time. You shall soon have an opportunity to sing to those who will understand you better."

Once more the prelude commenced, and once more the choir struck in, but no more was heard the bird-like tones on the left of the organ. The audience missed the voice. Mr. Treacles looked surprised, and stretched his long neck inquiringly to the left of the organ. The choir looked perplexed, and gazed wonderingly at Mr. Treacles. Mr. Treacles frowned and gesticulated fiercely at the choir, as though he would have them to proceed at all hazards; but the choir were confused, lost confidence and faltered, till nothing was finally heard but the harsh notes and harsher accompaniment of Mr. Treacles. At this critical point, and just as the audience were about leaving their seats in disgust, the stranger came forward, leading Mabel by the hand, and whispered a few words in Mr. Treacles's ear. Mr. Treacles sprang from the stool, and bowing almost to the floor, motioned the stranger to his seat. The change was electrical. The audience were instantly chained to their seats in breathless attention, for peasant and knight alike recognized the hand of a master at the keys. He had drawn the little Mabel to his side, and had opened with one of Beethoven's celebrated pieces. The little girl in the old Scot's plaid stood like one entranced, while the rest of the choir, with Mr. Treacles at their head, gazed at the performer, and listened to his wonderful transitions in mute astonishment. In a few minutes the news was circulated through every part of the church that the distinguished Mr. B——, the celebrated composer from London, was presiding at the organ. When he had ceased playing, the gentry crowded into the gallery to invite the illustrious stranger home with them; but Mr. B——, with that ease and civility which is an inherent quality in the man of genius, readily disengaged himself from their importunities by reiterating what he had previously said to Mabel concerning the visit to her mother, and taking her by the hand, while Mr. Treacles looked on in bewildered amazement, led her down the gallery stairs, and from thence out of the church.

It is needless to enter into details concerning the interview, and the subsequent arrangements which Mr. B—— entered into with old Anna respecting the education and probable advancement of Mabel as a professional singer; suffice it to say, that that gentleman generously volunteered to take the child for a term of years and educate her at his own expense; and accordingly on his return to London, Mabel accompanied him home, and immediately commenced her studies.

At this time Mr. B—— was about thirty years of age, and in the very zenith of his fame. His sister was his housekeeper, and they resided in a quiet street in the suburbs of London. Miss B—— was older than her brother, and like him was possessed of generous and kindly impulses. From the moment that Mabel became a member of the household, each vied with the other to render the child's life a happy one. Whenever the name of a great singer was announced on the play-hills, Mabel was sure of the pleasure of attending the opera with Mr. B——, and listening with entranced soul to the divine melody. In this way time passed pleasantly away, for the little child in the old church at Mottram had conceived a passionate regard for her teacher, which promised no abatement in after years. In the meantime her education rapidly progressed, and she gave the fullest satisfaction to her teacher of fulfilling the promise of her early years. At fifteen Mabel was an accomplished girl, tall, handsome, and queenly in her deportment, the pride of Mr. B—— and the admiration of his sister. She had lost none of the bird-like qualities of voice which had characterized her marvellous efforts in the old church at Mottram, although it had become strengthened and perfected by constant practice and a close application to study. At this time she had never been brought out in public, although the noble-hearted Mr. B—— had cherished the confident hope that the success of his protégé would be complete and triumphant whenever that happy moment should arrive. The coveted opportunity, like all other things for which we conceive an inordinate thirst, seemed very long in coming; and Mr. B—— was much perplexed as to the most advisable method of bringing out his much-admired pupil.

At length, one day, the great composer received an invitation to preside at the organ in one of the churches in the town of Oldham, on some great jubilee occasion, and bring with him a single solo singer of merit. This was an occasion not to be slighted, as he rather desired that her first attempt should be made in the rural districts, rather than in the full glare of a fashionable London audience. Oldham is a large manufacturing town in Lancashire, seven miles north of Manchester, and about ten miles from Wimbriamoor, where our talented heroine was born.

When the great day arrived, the large church was crowded nearly to suffocation. There were several of the Mottram gentry present, besides some wealthy representatives of the manufacturing interests of Manchester. Mabel, trembling with excitement, and pale as marble, stood at the left of Mr. B——, who had just commenced the overture. She was robed in white satin, and held in her tremulous fingers a bouquet of modest flowers, which the master of the choir had presented her on first entering. For an instant the eye of the fair singer wandered nervously over the sea of heads below, and prominent among them, in a suit of black, with white kids, she beheld her old tyrant, Mr. Treacles. His long neck was stretched inquiringly forward, and his keen, basilisk eye was peering malignantly into her own. It was evident she was the sole object in the gallery which could thus steadfastly chain the organist's attention. In an instant her heart rose in her throat, and the recollection of her first great humility, associated with the sight of Mr. Treacles, came rushing irresistibly to her brain. She trembled violently, and as she withdrew her eyes from the impertinent gaze which had fastened there, she clung insensibly to the railing for support. No sooner did Mr. Treacles perceive the diabolical effect which he had produced upon his old pupil, than he drew in his head, winked two or three times at Mrs. Treacles, and rubbed his palms.

When the poor girl's part opened, her eyes were swimming, and there was a painful hesitancy, and a tremulous wavering of tone, and then a sudden sinking and almost total failure of voice. Mr. B—— saw that she was breaking, and with a sudden stop of the organ he produced a deathlike silence throughout the house. He then arose, seemingly with perfect composure, and taking the cold hand of his pupil, said to her in the kindest and most persuasive tones, which had the effect in an instant to recall her scattered powers:

"Mabel, my child, I will not chide you; but I will reason with you. There is not one in all the multitude before you, who would be liable to detect a fault in you, artistically speaking, so quick as I. Let this, then, nerve you to the duty which you owe to me, your oldest and truest friend, and to the perfect fulfilment of the grand mission before you."

He then took up his violin and struck boldly into the prelude to Haydn's Creation. Mabel caught the inspiration in an instant, and when the critical moment arrived, joined in with the familiar accompaniment, singing the solo with such astonishing and overpowering effect as to cause even her arch enemy, Mr. Treacles, to forget his old hatred for the moment, and join sincerely in with the audience in stamping out its unqualified applause.

From this time forward the career of Mabel Vernon became one life-long series of brilliant triumphs. She drew crowded houses wherever she appeared; for, as with all great celebrities, the trumpet tongue of fame preceded her, heralding to the wondering multitude the approach of a star of the proudest magnitude. The strange, bird-like voice went up to heaven from half the cities of the old world. Applause, applause, wherever she went. Even in the land of the sleepy burgher, that marvellous voice floated through the smoke-beclouded brain of the ponderous burgomaster, till he became lost in a trance of pleasure such as he had never dreamed of before.

Ah! Mabel, it was the greatest wonder in the world that thy little head was not completely turned, and thy heart deflowered of the germ of gratitude, by the pomp and circumstance, the devotion and flattery which surrounded thee at every step! But no; through fame, and fortune, and flattery, the heart of Mabel Vernon remained unchanged. She did not forget her early friends. That old mother in the cottage at Wimbriamoor and Sexton Mirables were among the first objects of her care. And when, some twelve years later, in the full maturity of her powers, a magnificent and queenly woman—rich, honored, and caressed—on her final return to England from her professional transatlantic tour, she did not forget to become the earnest, loving, and devoted wife of her early instructor (he was but fifteen years her senior), upon whom, years before, in the old church of Mottram—the abashed and degraded pupil of Mr. Treacles—she had lavished the entire wealth of her childish affections, it is no marvel, perhaps, that those who knew her best should wonder the least at the strange and seemingly unequal union.

To quell the pride, even of the greatest, we should reflect how much we owe to others and how little to ourselves.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SILENT CITY.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Soft twilight plays upon the western sky,
Bright day has fled before the pall of night,
Now, gentle winds among the branches stah,
And silence comes as flies the cheerful light.

Peace rules the hour—in each shade of life
Sleep, like an angel, sits with folded wings;
With day have fled discordant notes of strife,
And sweet forgetfulness the evening brings.

The risen moon with softened light reveals
A silent city, motionless in sleep;
But here no midnight bell sends forth its peals,
No watchmen guard and nightly sigils keep.

Life's wild, tempestuous waves may surge and roll,
The cannon's roar may tell of fearful war,
But here each marble tomb and grassy knoll
Announce the peace of those who rest below.

What though the sun shall wake the sleeping earth,
And bid the mingled sounds of toll arise?
What though the blaze again illumine the hearth,
And Time once more his daily circuit flies!

They slumber still—though centuries may flee,
And earth be peopled o'er and o'er again,
The silent city's fumes yet shall be
At rest, and free from every woe and pain.

Softly the tombstones glisten in the light,
While o'er them weeping willows sadly droop;
And fitting shadows of the marble troop
Seem like a ghostly band, a spectre troop.

Peace to thee, silent city! may thy stones
Yet for a season glisten o'er an owl;
May mournful music linger in the tones
Of the light sephyr on the willow's bough.

[From the Boston Traveller.]

BALLOU'S PUBLISHING HOUSE.

THOUSANDS of our readers, in passing along Winter Street, have doubtless paused to gaze upon the lofty and imposing block on the right hand coming from Tremont; yet few, perhaps, of the many who have admired the exterior of the structure have ever even dreamed of the scene of industry and activity which is constantly going on under that roof. The readers of Ballou's publications have doubtless paused and scrutinized the building with great interest, and wondered by what magic power so many millions of papers, so many millions of books and magazines, are manufactured therein and furnished as acceptable offerings to the public, in the course of a year. There are no very marked features of architectural composition apparent in the structure, and without a knowledge of the purpose to which it is devoted, this temple of literature and art would be regarded only as the tasteful and magnificent store of some enterprising up-town merchant. But a glance at the interior will soon solve the problem as to the possibility of such apparent herculean labors, and convince the most skeptical of the wonders which may be wrought by enterprise, indomitable perseverance, ample capital and skill. A few days since we visited this spacious and magnificent publishing house, and we have no doubt our readers will be interested in a brief sketch.

The building was erected a few months ago by the owner of the same, M. M. Ballou, Esq., publisher, with especial reference to the purposes to which it is devoted. Its cost was between forty and fifty thousand dollars, and as a whole it reflects great credit upon the architect as well as on the taste of the proprietor. Every apartment, office and operating room is admirably arranged, well lighted and ventilated, and warmed by steam; in a word, there is nothing wanting to render the entire building just what it is intended to be—a model publishing house. It is not often, in any city in this country, that every department of labor requisite for the production of a first class literary publication is carried on under the same roof; but here, in their respective commodious and pleasant offices, studios and work-rooms, we may find editors, designers, engravers, printers, pressmen, binders, mail-clerks, etc., and the whole army of those artists whose peculiar art we had almost said exclusive province, was to enrich, beautify and improve the "Pictorial," the "Flag of our Union," and the "Dollar Magazine." It may appear almost incredible, but the fact, nevertheless, is apparent, that twelve Adams's presses are constantly employed in printing "Ballou's Pictorial," "Flag of our Union" and "Dollar Monthly." The reader will not, however, be astonished by the special activity in this department of labor, when we state that the circulation of the "Pictorial" is one hundred and three thousand copies; that of the "Flag of our Union" seventy-eight thousand, and the "Dollar Monthly" seventy-three thousand two hundred.

Those who are quick at figures will readily see what an immense number of copies of these publications are issued in the course of a year, and possibly approximate in a calculation the number of families whose homes are rendered attractive by the weekly visits of these beautiful specimens of art and pleasing and pure baskets of literature. The presses are run by a beautiful twenty-horse power steam engine. The presses were all in operation, and the attendants—male and female—at their places, and although so much was accomplished with the greatest facility and despatch, there was no confusion, no loud talk or inattention, but everything was conducted with clock-work regularity and precision. This same evidence of discipline, if so we may call that which was voluntary, was apparent throughout the entire establishment. The operatives in the press-room receive a higher rate of compensation than current prices for the same labor, the object being to secure the best employees, in every sense of the word. Leaving the press-room, which we found so convenient and well arranged, we made a visit to the various offices in the building. Many of these were finely fitted up, and all were spacious, well lighted and admirably adapted for the purposes for which they were occupied.

Mr. Ballou employs seven designers and thirty-eight engravers, all of whom are employed upon the Pictorial. In the several departments in this publishing house, no less than ninety persons are employed. The weekly pay roll of the paper is $1100 per week. The engravings for the Pictorial cost from four hundred to five hundred dollars per week. We visited thirteen rooms, observing the work of all kinds in progress—engraving, book-binding, embossing, printing, etc. In all the rooms we noticed the same attention to business, the same degree of activity, and the most convenient arrangements for performing the work in the best possible manner. Every improvement in the way of facilities and mechanism has been introduced, and the same degree of system and order, which is at once apparent to the visitor as he first enters the Publishing Hall, is preserved throughout; indeed, it is indispensable for the successful accomplishment of the vast amount of business which is there transacted daily. In one room we noticed thousands of engravings of all kinds, which, having been used in the Pictorial, are now properly labelled and filed away. There is another room in which the boxwood for engravings is kept; and whatever apartment we entered, there we found much to admire and to interest.

Mr. Ballou is editor of both the "Pictorial" and the "Flag of our Union," and to his graceful and versatile pen the papers owe their chief attraction. He is assisted by F. A. Durivage, Esq., an accomplished and gifted writer, whose literary gems have long since given him a reputation as one of the best magazine writers in this country.

The "Dollar Monthly" will hereafter be beautifully illustrated, commencing with the April number. By the way, the great amount of reading matter, all of the very best quality, which this periodical contains, renders it exceedingly attractive at the fireside. By a comparison of the engravings which beautify the Pictorial, with those of other publications, the observer cannot fail to appreciate the merit of the former. They are all finished and beautiful pictures, and cannot be otherwise, as only the best artists are employed, and these have special departments to which they devote their attention: one gives us fine portraits, another nautical views, while a third furnishes a flowery landscape, etc. One of the most distinguished writers and orators in this country recently said to the proprietor that he could not afford to miss a copy of the Pictorial, as it supplied a place in his library otherwise vacant—it afforded contemporary biography. Such is the fact, and the popularity of the paper is the best evidence that the intelligent understand it. Mr. Ballou never admits an indelicate allusion, an intendo of doubtful tendency, or ought else that can corrupt, to find its way into the columns of his paper. With such extraordinary care, exquisite taste, and the best talent the country affords, Mr. Ballou is exerting and must exert a most salutary influence; his publications cultivate refined taste, a love of the fine arts, and improve the hearts of the readers. There is no better evidence of a growing taste in the popular mind, than a comparison of the publications demanded a dozen years ago with those which emanate from Ballou's publishing house to-day.

It is not our purpose, and it would certainly be out of place in a descriptive sketch like this, to speak particularly and at length of a class of "literary" papers and journals which for several years constituted the greater part of the light reading in almost every family circle in New England and throughout the country, and which has, happily for society, for good morals, for education, for pleasure, been superseded by such works as those now furnished for the million by Mr. Ballou. No course of lectures, no ably compiled volumes of argument, no masterly production, appealing to the reason of the reading public, could have wrought the change which has been effected by the few publishers of popular literature of which Mr. Ballou stands at the head. With a firm determination to speak and improve the taste of the public, with the ability to successfully accomplish what commended itself so forcibly to the understanding, Mr. Ballou entered upon the field of labor in which he is engaged, and all well-wishers of society, all who admire the fine arts and take pleasure in beholding evidences of refined taste rapidly superseding that which appealed only to the passions of society—all, in fine, who love to witness the triumph of virtue over vice will appreciate the work in which Mr. Ballou is engaged. "Ballou's Pictorial," "The Flag of our Union," and the "Dollar Magazine," if examined with the severest scrutiny, will be found pure in tone and free from anything which can corrupt or contaminate. Either of these publications may be placed in the hands of the wife, the daughter, the son, or any within the sacred circle of home, in perfect confidence that their effect will only prove salutary. Of how few publications we can thus speak, and yet, after a careful examination of Mr. Ballou's, we take pleasure in the frank and free expression of our approval. While such high and honorable motives are maintained by the publisher, he has our best wishes for a more extended circulation of "Ballou's Pictorial," "The Flag of our Union," and "The Dollar Monthly."

In our moral system, the spleen bangs about the heart, and renders it sad and sorrowful, unless we continually keep it in exercise by kind offices, or in its proper place by serious investigation and solitary questionings. Otherwise, it is apt to adhere and to accumulate, until it deadens the principles of sound action, and obscures the sight.—Epicurus.

PROSPECTIVE VIEW OF LAKE ONTARIO, AND THE SPOT OF THE RAILROAD ACCIDENT NEAR HAMILTON, CANADA WEST.

THE LATE RAILROAD ACCIDENT IN CANADA.

Although some weeks have elapsed since the terrible railroad accident which happened near Hamilton, C. W., the catastrophe is still the theme of mournful comment, while the magnitude of the disaster gives it the importance of an historical event. We have therefore placed upon this page two scenes delineating the locality where it happened. We have refused to illustrate the details of such mournful tragedies, and it will be observed that we do not in the present instance, but the general character of these sketches has nothing to wound the feelings or unduly excite the sensibilities of the spectator. Of the engravings, the first is from a sketch made on the spot last summer, the second from a photograph taken shortly after the accident, and both expressly for our Pictorial. The first is a general view. The drawing was made from a high hill in Dundas, about seven miles from Hamilton. The suspension bridge over the Desjardins Canal is depicted, and the railroad bridge beneath it. On the right is seen the city of Hamilton, and stretching in the distance, the broad waters of Lake Ontario. The second view is the immediate scene of the accident. The railroad is shown exactly as it appears—one car partially submerged, another standing as it fell, on end, while crowds of persons are present as spectators, or are engaged in searching for the bodies of the unfortunate passengers. This terrible accident occurred on the 12th of March, and on the next day the following minute account of it appeared in an extra of the Hamilton Spectator:—"A national calamity may fairly be said to have befallen us. Men who have ever stood in the foremost rank—capitalists the most shrewd, speculators the most keen, merchants the most far-sighted, clergymen the most earnest—have at one fell swoop been taken from among us. The train from Toronto, due in this city at a quarter before 6 P. M., yesterday evening, had come from Toronto as was usual, and was proceeding at a moderate rate of speed to pass the swing bridge across the Donjardina Canal. Those residing at a distance may not know that a cutting has been made as an outlet to this canal through the Burlington Heights, and that the railway crosses it by a swing bridge, sixty feet at least above the level of the canal. At this time, of course, the water is covered with ice about two feet thick. Just before the train reached the bridge, the engine ran off the track, owing, it is supposed, to some defect in the axle. This, however, is a mere surmise, founded only on the observation of some marks on the road for some distance on the other side of the spot where the accident occurred. The immense weight of the engine, cutting through the timber of the bridge, produced the effect naturally to be expected. The whole structure gave way, and with one frightful crash, the engine, tender, baggage car, and two first class passenger cars broke through the severed framework, and leaped headlong into the yawning abyss below. The engine and tender crushed at once through the ice. The baggage car, striking the corner of the tender in the act of falling, was thrown to one side, and fell some ten yards from the engine. The first passenger car rushed after, and turning as it descended, fell on its roof, breaking partly through the ice, and was crushed to atoms; while the last car fell endways on the ice, and, strange to say, remained in that position. The loss of life was of course frightful. There were ninety passengers on the train, and the list of those who have escaped numbers only about twenty. As far as we can yet learn, every one in the first car was killed; those who were not crushed being drowned by the water, which nearly filled the car. About thirty were in the last car, of whom ten were taken out dead, and most of the others were fearfully mutilated. The conductor, Mr. Barrett, the deputy superintendent of the line, Mr. Muir, and Mr. Jessop, one of the auditors, who were on the hind platform, jumped off and escaped. The express messenger, Mr. Richardson, a conductor on the road, and the mail conductor, were with the baggage master. The latter jumped over the baggage he had piled up, ready for delivery, and escaped with but slight injury, while the three others went down, but, miraculously enough, were not much hurt. The engineer and fireman went under the ice with the locomotive, and their bodies have not yet been recovered. The excitement in the city, as the news spread, was intense. Hundreds swarmed towards the Great Western depot, and streamed along the line to the fatal spot, where the scene presented was such as to baffle all description. Large locomotive lamps were speedily brought. Fires were kindled and a lurid glare was thrown over the shattered remnants. Special trains were despatched to the bridge to bring home the wounded. It was no easy task to descend the steep slope to the canal. Ropes were lowered and ladders attached to them, on which the dead and wounded from the car which stood endways were first drawn up. Then the bottom of the car which had partly sunk in the ice, was hewn away with axes, and the unfortunate passengers, some badly mutilated and even cut to pieces, and all saturated with water, were taken out. Many worked with energy and vigor; but who was that noble fellow that every one must have seen, stripped to his shirt sleeves, standing up to his middle in the freezing water, who, himself a host, did more than all the rest? We watched him long from the height above, as he hewed away the fragments, and extricated the bodies. If ever man deserved a reward, it was he. As soon as the dead were drawn up the slope they were either put in the cars for conveyance to Hamilton, or were laid in a small house near the bridge. It is said that one family were in the cars, consisting of a father, mother and four children. Only one of the children escaped. One of these little ones, a girl about four years of age, was brought to the house alluded to when we were there. The poor little creature was smiling prettily, as if she had been sleeping and dreaming of sweet things when the accident occurred, and had been launched into the long sleep of death before the dream had vanished from her mind. At the railway depot, when the sufferers were brought in, crowds were assembled anxious to hear who were dead, and to know if any of their friends were there. The corpses were taken into one of the large baggage rooms, where Coroners Bull and Roseburgh proceeded to have them examined, and when possible, identified. As soon as the intelligence of the catastrophe reached the city, Major Booker and Captain Macdonald's companies of volunteers marched to the scene, and every credit is due to them for their conduct. The pressure of the crowd had all but forced the doors of the depot when the artillery company arrived. They formed a cordon around the room, which was respected. The rifles marched on to the bridge. But a few at a time were admitted to view the bodies. On entering, the first we remarked was that of poor Donald Stuart. Several of those who have sat in the city council with this estimable man, were around him, and in tears. This is stronger evidence of his worth than anything we could say. Next lay the Brantford contractor, Mr. Russell, on whose person was money to the amount of several thousand dollars; in the row opposite was Samuel Zimmerman, to whom railroads have at length proved fatal, and near him two children, aged one and three years respectively, and she who seemed to be their mother.—The duty of examining the letters and papers of the deceased was quite as painful as the recognition of the bodies. A correspondent says:—In the pocket of one would be found letters from his wife and children, wishing him home, and sorrowing for his absence. Another died with the daguerreotypes of those he most loved on his breast. A mother's letter was found in this one's pocket, asking relief and saying she was ill. The money for relief was found side by side with the letter. Another's name was found by the letters of those who loved him. And yet another was hurrying home to console the sick and the dying.—Among the many noted persons who perished were Samuel Zimmerman, of Niagara Falls, Isaac Buchanan, of Hamilton, vice president of the road, and Captain Twokey, a popular commander on Lake Ontario. Only one of the lady passengers was saved, and she was considerably cut and bruised. Mr. Zimmerman was a man of great wealth and enterprise, and universally beloved and respected. His funeral was very largely attended. This is the most fearful railroad accident which has occurred since the Norwalk tragedy on the New Haven road, a disaster which thrilled with fear the whole community, and desolated many families.

SCENE OF THE FEARFUL RAILROAD ACCIDENT AT THE BRIDGE OVER THE DESJARDIN CANAL, CANADA.

BAKER'S ISLAND, SALEM HARBOR, MASS.

BAKER'S ISLAND, SALEM HARBOR.

The pretty view of Baker's Island, with its twin lighthouse towers reflected in the water, and various craft enlivening the bay, was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, and is a perfectly faithful representation of this pleasing locality. Baker's Island is situated off the Massachusetts coast, five miles east-north-east from Salem. The lighthouses are located at the northerly end. Our view was taken from Lowell Island, the rocks in the foreground of our picture belonging to the latter island. Lowell Island is another romantic little spot, of which we gave a view in a previous number. The coast of Massachusetts abounds in islands, charming retreats during the "heated term," making most excellent landing-places for fishing parties to engage in the manufacture of the all important "chowder;" but however interesting and romantic to the amateur fisherman, they have a great value as locations for lighthouses to warn the mariner of dangerous shoals and rocks, and guide him to the haven of safety. The land seen in the background of our picture is Heverly Farms. The whole scene is a remarkably picturesque one, and is a specimen of the beautiful romantic coast scenery of our New England shores. The whole of our seashore, from Boston north, abounds in subjects for the draughtsman's pencil, and marine painters need never be at loss for subjects for illustration. Salem harbor is particularly rich in points for delineation, and scenes of interesting study for the eye of the student of nature.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, FRAMINGHAM, MASS.

The fine accompanying engraving is from a sketch made on the spot expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Kilburn, and makes a graceful and interesting picture. This school, which was formerly located at West Newton, was the first of the kind established on this continent. It graduated five hundred and ninety-eight in fourteen years, or forty-three per year on an average. It has a course of study and training in connection with the under-graduate course, extending through a term of three years, designed expressly to prepare teachers for the highest grade of schools. There are four normal schools in the State. The school building shown in our view, is beautifully situated on a commanding eminence. This school was first commenced in 1839, in Lexington, Mass., and removed to West Newton in 1844, where it remained until the dedication of the building at Framingham in 1853. The State appropriated six thousand dollars, and contributions were also made by the citizens of the town of Framingham, and the Boston and Worcester Railroad Corporation. The location is a little north of the central village, on the south-western slope of a hill, protected on the north by a fine grove of forest trees, and commanding a fine view of the surrounding country. The building, which is of wood, is of the Norman style of architecture, and will accommodate from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty pupils. Mr. Alex. R. Esty is the architect. The system of normal school instruction is one which meets with much public favor, and is extending into many parts of our land with marked influence.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, AT FRAMINGHAM, MASS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LEWIE.

BY MRS. R. T. ELDREDGE.

He came to me in a dream last night—
 'Twas a beautiful dream: the sky was bright,
 And he looked beautiful too.
 "Will stay with me, sweet darling?" I said,
 As I lay my hand on his fair young head;
 "I'm lonely, love, without you."

Two sunbeams played on his bright brown hair,
 And his fair young face grew still more fair,
 Whilst the sunbeams kissed his cheek.
 My child! my child! my beautiful boy!
 I envied the sunbeams in my joy,
 But I could not, dared not speak.

He was not pillowed upon my breast,
 Where his fair, bright head was wont to rest,
 When he wearied of his play;
 My beautiful child! my angel one!
 "Father, thy will, not mine be done,"
 'Twas all that I could say.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE FOUNDLING.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

NED RIVERS, as gallant a fellow as you will find in a whole town meeting, had been wedded to the girl of his heart just a twelvemonth. Things had gone on with the young couple very much as they do with other people in like circumstances. Although he was not quite so badly off as the man who said, "When I married, I loved my wife to such an extent that I could have eat her up, and now that I have been married a year, I wish to heaven I had so!" still he had discovered that the idolatry of young lovers was a very insipid sort of bosh that wore thread-bare in a year of wedlock. Not that he lived unhappily with his wife, far from it, but they had their little spats now and again, just as you and I would if we were married, which, thank the fates, we are not, nor like to be.

It chanced one evening that Ned, having completed all business for the day, sat in slippers and dressing-gown cooking his feet particularly, and his legs generally, by the parlor fire. He was smoking, too,—smoking as unconcernedly as though Mary, his spouse, had not repeatedly and volubly expressed her abhorrence of all such practices, especially in the parlor. Mary, for her part, sat on the opposite side of the fire-place, sewing with a very determined air indeed, and all was as snug and silent as anything.

Ned had stayed out quite late several evenings during the month immediately preceding the night in question, and Mary, I grieve to say, took it into her pretty head to be jealous, demanding somewhat peremptorily of her lord where he had been and why he had been there at all; which questions Ned very properly refused to answer, not that he was afraid or ashamed to do so, but it seemed to him that she had no right to make him toe the mark quite so rigidly. He had somehow got the idea that if a man provided his wife with the necessities and luxuries of life, loved her moderately well, and for her sake resigned, for the major part of the time, the bachelor privilege of drifting round loose o' nights, she ought in all conscience to be content; and so, also, would you and I think, if we were married, which, thank heaven, we are not, nor like to be.

I am aware that many writers, particularly females, in giving their "views" to an eye-protruding world, have complained bitterly that a woman's heart was too often knocked and stove all to pieces by a scarcity of love after marriage; that too often the food young wife looked sorrowfully and earnestly into the eyes of her cold, indifferent husband, so changed from what he once was to her; while her despairing heart silently yet mournfully and anxiously besought him, saying: "O give me back the love of my youth! give me back my love—the loving heart I gave you ere my feet stumbled upon the dark mountain of a year's wedlock; let once again your returning love, like dew-eyed morn, stand jocund on the rosy mountain top, and my soul will be content;" and much similar stuff. But goodness, fellows, what can they expect? Do they think a sensible, everyday sort of chap can keep hilling and cooing, kissing and hugging, courting and sozzling round during his entire married existence? It's just you and I, hub, that entertain a contrary opinion; though as people think differently of this matter, we may as well drop it and go on with our story.

Well, then, Mary sat upon one side of the fire, sewing vehemently, and Ned sat upon the other side, smoking vigorously, and both silent; and as they so sat, it fell out that Bridget, the cook, appeared unto them.

"Please, mem, may I go out a minnit, to buy a bit of ribbin'?" she respectfully growled.

"Yes," responded Mrs. Rivers, sulkily.

Bridget rolled away like a scroll, and the silence of a family quarrel brooded over the scene. Presently another transatlantic visage disfigured the doorway. It was Nora, the chamber girl.

"Please, mem, may I go out this evening?" she pathetically inquired.

"Why, you were out last evening," replied the mistress, snappishly.

"Yes, mem, I know it, mem; but me sither's child is down with the scarlet fever, an' it's bad she is entirely, so I must go, mem," she returned, stoutly, and vanished.

"No one seems to wish to stay in this house evenings," muttered

Mrs. Rivers, quite spitefully, and she recommenced her sewing with such determined industry that her thread broke off snap about every third stitch. Ned continued to puff his cigar and cook his toes, and silence reigned in the parlor for about the space of one hour, for neither of the happy pair felt inclined to speak first, and there was no one else in the house to interrupt the stillness. By-and-by there came in a smart ring at the front door bell, which startled them both. Ned dropped his heels from the mantel-piece, preparatory to answering the summons; but Mary, with a praiseworthy desire to show her spouse that the weight of the world rested upon her shoulders,—that everything depended upon her, and that nothing whatever could go on without her, darted through the door and down the stairs; while Ned, thinking it would be too great a concussion to call her back and go himself, recommenced the culinary process upon his feet and legs.

Arrived at the foot of the stairs, Mary opened the front door with one of her sweetest smiles to welcome the caller, whoever he might be. But there was no one there. Surprised, she opened the door wider, and gave another look. This time her eye rested upon a large basket suspended from the door knob. Hastily detaching it, she closed the door and carried it into the entry. Mechanically placing her hand within the basket, she felt something warm, alive and squirming, but so enveloped in diminutive garments that no further discovery could be made without unwrapping the object. While her heart bounced within her, she flew to the hall burner, and turning up the gas, instituted a more minute examination. By the side of the animated bundle, lay a sealed envelope directed to Edward Rivers, Esq. With flushed and angry countenance, and with trembling fingers, she tore off the cover and read as follows:

"Dear, deceitful Ned,—I send you the poor little thing, hoping you will do more for it than I possibly can. It is yours, Ned; you may swear to that. Look at it; it is Ned Rivers all over. O, Ned, how could you have deceived me so—telling me you were a bachelor! But there is no use regretting what is past. Bring the poor thing up well, and I'll forgive you, Ned. May it be less wicked than its father. Your unfortunate and heart-broken

FANNIE.

P. S.—Don't let that little pert, conceited, doll-faced wife of yours see this letter. Deceive her with some ham-bag story about the little dear. She hasn't got so much wit or sense but what any numbskull might deceive her, much less you, for you, alas! are used to it.

Byron has said, "hell has no fury like a woman scorned," though how he happened to be so taring-down sure of that, is not so clear, considering that at the time he made the statement he had not visited the sultry locality mentioned, neither had he, if all accounts are true, ever "scorned" any woman hard enough to hurt her much; consequently, he could know but very little either about furies or scorned folks. Now if he had known as much as myself, and said, "like a woman jealous," he would have hit it exactly, and all such boys as you and I would have comprehended him in a minute; and I think the propriety of my amendment would have struck him directly, could he have seen Mrs. Rivers as she stood with that letter in her clenched little fist, after having perused its contents. First she turned very red in the face, then she turned very white in the face, stamping her feet furiously, and lastly she screamed at the top of a pretty loud voice, considerably sharpened by rage.

"Rivers, come down here, you villain! Here's a pretty mess for you!"

Ned, who still sat quietly smoking, and little imagining the horrible and tremulous pickle that awaited him below, tossed the stamp of his cigar into the grate, and somewhat startled at the unwonted tone of her voice, descended the stairs forthwith.

"Don't you want to see Fannie—your unfortunate and heart-broken Fannie?" sauced Mary, while her form quivered with indignation.

"Fannie?—what Fannie?" asked the guilty husband, innocently.

"What Fannie, indeed! Mr. Rivers, how dare you look me in the face and ask what Fannie? when you see what has been hung up at your door, and know very well who caused it to be hung there? O, you look mighty innocent! but just read that letter, and then look in that basket."

"Why, I don't understand you, Mary," returned the astonished Rivers, with a well-feigned air of perplexity.

"Well, I understand you, sir, and have understood you for some time, if I haven't got either wit or sense, and what's more, I intend that everybody else shall understand you. I'll expose you to the whole world, sir!" and in her fury, she rushed out of the door to arouse her neighbors, leaving Ned to peruse the letter which she thrust into his hand.

In an incredibly short space of time, she returned, closely followed by a fleet of wives, young and old, and a squadron of old maids, to whom such an affair as this possessed greater charms than even a first class murder. Ned still stood where she had left him, with the letter in one hand, while with the other he dubiously scratched his head. Perhaps he was considering and reckoning up the chances whether he was really guilty or not. Who shall say what thoughts are likely to come into the head of a good-looking young fellow at such a time?

"Now, Mr. Rivers," exclaimed Mary, in an excited tone, as her delegation filed into the hall, "I presume you thought I would not expose your villany, but I have, and I'll make the whole city ring it! O, I've suspected this all along. I knew it could be no good that kept you out evenings."

"Why, Mary," responded poor Ned, deprecatingly, and with rather a bewildered air, "you know that, since our marriage, I have not been out a single evening until the past month, and it seems to me—I can take my oath I never knew or saw any—"

"Don't talk to me, Mr. Rivers!" interrupted Mary, passionate ly. "Don't talk to me about when or how long ago you became the wretch you are. I care not for the time. There—there, in that basket is the result; look at it!"

Obedient to the command, Ned approached the basket, but the living bundle was stoutly enveloped in swaddling clothes, and he hesitated, being, like all bachelors, more afraid of a baby than of a lion.

"Don't be afraid!" shrieked Mary, hysterically. "It won't bite; it's got no teeth, poor thing! You'll know it, for, as your hussy says, it's just like you all over. But, thank goodness, there are plenty here to bear witness to my wrongs and your rascality!"

Thus admonished, Ned unpiened and unwound blanket after blanket, while his wife and the throng of experienced ladies showered such a storm of reproaches and maledictions upon his head that the poor fellow curled like a burnt hoot, as one may say. At length, the last napkin was stripped off, displaying to the anxious and astonished eyes of all who surrounded him, not a baby, but a full-grown tom cat!

You have seen a stately tree, sorely bent and yielding to the angry winter's blast, proudly and defiantly rear itself erect when the storm had passed. So did Ned recover and nerve himself, no longer the shrinking culprit who feared and trembled that circumstances would condemn him, but the deeply injured and justly indignant husband. Slating the obnoxious quadruped to the furthest end of the hall, he gazed reproachfully about him; then, with an unprecedented display of eloquence, he proceeded to lecture the assembled party—his neighbors for their anxiety to have a part in such a matter, and his wife for her unwarrantable jealousy.

Poor Mary, wholly overcome by the revulsion of feeling and her husband's reproaches, sank upon the hall sofa and sobbed convulsively, evidently as sick as a pout. The neighbors, by twos and threes, sneaked out of the house, until none but the husband and wife remained. Mary, from her recumbent position on the sofa, gazed through her tear-wet fingers toward her husband, as he stood gazing sorrowfully into the basket full of blankets. She sobbed aloud. Ned took no notice. She waited a minute; but he raised not his head. She began to get frightened, and in a broken voice murmured: "Could I be forgiven?"

Ned stretched forth his hands as an intimation that she could. Springing from the sofa, Mary rushed toward him, and nicely calculating the distance so as not to hurt herself by the fall, she pitched herself headforemost into a pair of arms which were instantly folded about her, in which position they remained for a good spell, and so "the wise and virtuous prince and the beauteous princess lived happy ever after."

ONE IDEA MEN.

We have too many men in all occupations who have but one set of ideas. Many a machinist will insist on believing that to do a day's work well is the measure of all requisite mechanical knowledge. His steadiness and patient skill are admirable, but he will turn up, a dozen years hence, gray and worn, toiling at the vice or drooping over the lathe. He will be supporting a large family on one dollar and three-quarters or two dollars a day,—but that two dollars is the limit of all his possible daily income. Mark us, that is the man who once said, "O, bother! what do I want of a knowledge of general principles, mechanical calculations, drawing, business information, and all that? Why should I fill my head with all this stuff about the iron manufacture, estimation of machinery, mechanical engineering?" Of course, you should not disturb the priceless comfort of your easy soul. Of course, my dear sir, you should stick close with a tire engine company, and devour cock-and-bull stories with the rapacity of a bookseller's apprentice, or spend your time in a still more free and easy manner; but at all events you should not "bother" your head where you are so willfully opposed to any good which might come from it. Meanwhile, you will find some of your companions, vice hands or lathe hands like yourself, brakemen or firemen even, pushing their way upward, gaining every year in skill and character, and ultimately stepping into the management of the locomotive shop, the repair shop, the railroad, or some other equally desirable position. You will still remain at the bottom, wondering where were the roads on which your mates ascended to fortune; and fretfully repining at the imagined unlucky fate which ever interposed barriers to your advancement in life; forgetting that an aspiring energy must underlie all successful effort to arrive at influence and distinction in the world.—Journal of Progress.

EFFECT OF INTER-MARRIAGE.

Speaking of the effect of inter-marriage among blood relations, the Fredericksburg News says:—"In this county in which we are raised, for twenty generations back, certain families of wealth and respectability have inter-married, until there cannot be found in three or four of them a sound man or woman! One has sore eyes, another scrofula, a third is an idiot, a fourth blind, a fifth handy-legged, a sixth with a head about the size of a turnip, with not one out of the number exempt from physical defects of some kind or other."

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 72,300 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LX.

BY GAYTON H. HARR.

Have you seen a pretty stranger,
With brown hair and eyes of blue—
Heaven's blue, but dimmed with weeping—
Have they ever gazed on you?
For I'd fain know where she's straying;
And I'm searching and I'm praying
For my poor, forsaken Lu.

'Twas a year ago I met her—
Less than woman—more than child—
Just unfolding into beauty,
Like a bud on which has smiled
Warmest suns and gentlest flowers:
She the brightest, mild the flowers
That adorned her native wild.

And I loved the little maiden:
She, so pure, in thought and word;
And the little maiden loved me—
That I loved her—trusting child—
For no other love had sought her,
And my honeyed lips first taught her
Sweet tales she had never heard.

But at length a dark-eyed stranger—
Grandly beautiful was she—
Came, and, with enchanting graces,
Woo'd my heart from Lu—and me.
So, I left her, nigh heart-broken—
Heedless of the vows I'd spoken—
Robbed of all her partly.

But my heart's bow yearning for her;
And my soul can never rest,
Till I feel her arms around me,
And her head upon my breast:
But she roams—I know not whither;
And her gentle heart will wither
'Neath the score upon her cast.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A GARRISON ADVENTURE.

BY ESTELLE GREY.

VERNEUIL and Juvigny had formed from their infancy a compact of friendship; nothing is more common. At twenty-five years of age they still kept it with scrupulous fidelity; this circumstance was more uncommon. At college, where the same studies united them both, and in the sixth regiment of hussars, where they served under the rank of lieutenant, they had been surnamed, and it was still retained, Castor and Pollux, Oreste and Pylade, Damon and Pythias.

One day—they were fifteen and sixteen years old; it is at that age when the thoughts come most ingeniously exaggerated; for later, alas! they become positive and true, and one ceases to be happy—Verneuil and Juvigny said to each other:

"Friendship until death!"

"And let us vow, that everything shall be shared between us; pleasure and pain, fortune and misery."

"But if we should desire at the same time something which might be impossible for us to share?"

"Ah, well! we will both relinquish it."

"Why deprive one of happiness which would be for the other a cause of joy?"

"Thou art right. Let us agree that fate shall decide."

"Be it so; but not let it be left blindly to fate. We will play if thou wishest it, and decide by lot."

"That is it; a game of cards, and all will be decided."

"I accept. In this way we never shall dispute."

"Coldness shall never enter our treaty. And if one object suits them, and me also, we will have a game of cards, and he who wins shall possess the conquest; this is charming."

A solemn oath sealed this strange treaty.

Strange. Thus many persons would find it; but after ten years experience one would be likely to regard it conscientiously, as the result of a higher inspiration. At twenty-five years of age Verneuil and Juvigny, thanks to many games of cards, had avoided as many quarrels capable of breaking the most closely cemented friendship. All had then gone on charmingly, until, but!—

There is no treaty so skilfully drawn up in which one cannot discover, sooner or later, some impossibility which had not been foreseen. This proves that it has not been given to the human mind to attain to perfection in anything, and this will explain why there does not exist a single contract where one has not conserved a more or less number of articles to a possibility of rupture.

It was after the glorious and rapid campaign of Italy, a squadron of the sixth hussars, recalled to France, were garrisoned in the little city of St. Germain, and the officers, fêted and received like so many heroes, rushed into pleasure with as much ardor as they had formerly braved the grapeshot or carried away a redoubt. The castle, the terrace, the forest, made St. Germain a delightful place of residence. But our two friends found there still another attraction. In this city lived the father of Delbois, their captain, with whom they had formed an intimate connection. M. Delbois, happy to have his son with him for some time, spared nothing to make for him, as well as for his companions in arms, a joyous and affectionate reception.

A bountiful table, at which presided freedom and cordiality; a drawing-room, where were assembled all the most elegant dancers and amiable ladies that St. Germain could offer; here were more than was necessary to justify the constant presence of Verneuil and Juvigny in the house of their friend Delbois. But they were drawn there by a charm still more powerful than that of pleasure. It was reported throughout the city that a young Italian had arrived about six months since. M. Delbois had presented her in the world as the daughter of an ancient correspondent of his house, saying to the curious that he had entrusted her to him in order to escape from the horrors of war which desolated her country.

Without stopping to draw the portrait of Bianca Marielli, this was the name of the Italian, we will only say that her first appearance in the circles of St. Germain was signalized by the open admiration manifested by all the gentlemen and the hatred of the ladies, who disguised it as ordinarily under the exterior of a lively and ardent friendship. Many adorners placed themselves in the ranks to obtain the hand of Bianca; but the demands had been received with as many refusals, and it was thought, with some probability, that this hand was a treasure carefully preserved for the happy Delbois. Meanwhile, when the captain did return, he was fluttering around all these renowned beauties, without appearing to interest himself at all in Bianca, who, upon her side, returned indifference for indifference, they commenced to attribute the past refusals to the awkwardness of those who had made the demand. Her suitors took courage, and the beautiful Italian found herself again the aim of all love and all ambition.

There is not a heart more susceptible than that of an officer of hussars. She became a kind of emulation among all the comrades of Delbois, and we shall signalize as the most enamored, but alas, the most timid, Verneuil and Juvigny. But the hour of love had not come for Bianca. Whether her heart enclosed a mystery which it was important for her to conceal, she was amiable to all, and gave to no one the right of thinking himself the preferred one. She knew admirably how to stop a declaration at the exact point, and coquette or not, she had arrived at the art of giving a higher charm even to coquetry. Meanwhile, her crowd of admirers were not diminished. Notwithstanding the maledictions which have been fulminated against coquettes, notwithstanding they have been so often devoted to scorn and hate, they always have the most slaves, and retain them the longest time.

One morning Captain Delbois invited all his friends to a grand ball. "This day," said he to them, "is appointed for me to seal my happiness. I wish you to come and learn the reason of my joy, and share it with me." And speaking thus, his manner was so expressive, and his invitations were so urgent, that yielding more to curiosity than the attraction of a ball, not one of the officers failed to be at the fête. Verneuil and Juvigny, as you may suppose, appeared among the first.

Bianca had never appeared so bewitching as this evening. An expression of gaiety and happiness was diffused over her features, which added to the brilliancy of her beauty, and gave to her an irresistible power. There was also in her bearing a graceful ease, and in her manner which, according to the interpretation one chose to give, inspired the most timid with confidence and even with a certain boldness. This influence first affected Verneuil, who had not yet dared to exceed the limits of kind attention and compliments. Accepted by Bianca for her partner, he promised himself not to allow the opportunity to pass without making a decided move, and giving voice at last to his mute passion. During the first figure he spoke with his looks, in the second, profiting by the dance, he ventured to press her hand; the third was scarcely finished when he stammeringly expressed to his beautiful dancer the desire to confide in her. The face of Bianca became suddenly serious; she replied to him:

"Monsieur Verneuil, I have also a secret to tell you. You will know it at the close of the soiree; wait until then, I entreat you. I hope that then you will understand me and do me justice." Then resuming her gaiety, she extended her hand to him, saying: "This is between us."

And the fourth figure commenced. Verneuil knew not at first what to think, but upon reflection, he found in the reply that Bianca had given him more grounds for hope than fear. Finally, his imagination so increased, that if he had not been in the midst of so many witnesses, he would have delivered himself up to all the wild transports of immoderate joy.

The quadrille was ended, and Juvigny approached Bianca to inform her of the promise made to waltz with him. Verneuil hastened to leave the drawing-room. He went into the garden where at least he should only find for witnesses of his frenzy the trees and flowers. Trees and flowers, as one knows, are the favorite confidants of lovers, who can indulge in their presence, without fear of either contradiction or railery, the most absurd transports and the most ridiculous hyperboles.

Heaven knows to what degree of ridicule and absurdity the transports and hyperboles of Verneuil would have attained, when Juvigny found himself suddenly before him, in a state of fever not less violent, and from the same cause. Joy always gives volatility. Our two officers, who, from self-love perhaps, had until now kept secret a passion whose end was doubtful, were delighted to meet each other and to communicate their expectations.

"Verneuil, behold an evening which has fixed my destiny."

"That is precisely what I was going to tell thee, my dear Juvigny."

"My friend, imagine an angel; enough to make us lose reason."

"I am much afraid I have lost mine. I never dreamed of so many graces united to such beauty."

"Thou art in love."

"Who would not be so, after seeing her? Black eyes, with a head like a Madonna; the innocence of her simplicity joined to the most finished charms; a look to live in the heart, and a smile which burns in the soul like a hope!"

While Verneuil was speaking, Juvigny experienced a vague feeling of anxiety.

"O, it is done," continued the first, with enthusiasm. "My life with the beautiful Italian—my life with Bianca Marielli!"

"Bianca!" cried Juvigny. "But it is she that I love!"

There was for a moment a terrible silence between these two young people; then it was broken by Verneuil.

"Listen, Juvigny; our rivalry should not extinguish the friendship which unites us. It is Bianca alone to whom the right belongs of deciding."

"To Bianca to decide—be it so. Verneuil, it is painful for me to afflict thee, but I ought to forewarn thee that according to all appearances the contest can no longer exist between us. After the reception Bianca has given me this evening, I have the hope, I can even say the certainty, of being loved."

"Thou art strangely deceived, my dear Juvigny, and compel me to declare the whole truth to thee. Yes, it is I, I, dost thou really hear, to whom Bianca has given the preference. I can give thee proof of this evening. Listen, and judge for thyself."

"Hear me, rather, and see thy error."

And when in the midst of this discussion, which became more and more warm, they mutually related, as proof of their assertions, what Bianca had said to each of them, they stopped, confounded, seeking a reasonable explanation for this strange adventure.

"There is no doubt," replied Verneuil, after having reflected some moments, "this confidence that Bianca will give us has no other purpose than to announce to one his triumph, to the other his defeat."

Then their ideas changed the course of their direction. After attributing to both the victory, they felt themselves suddenly discouraged, and regarded each other with envy, each thinking himself to be the slighted lover, and believing he saw a happy rival in his adversary. The transports of anger and despair succeeded this first movement.

"No, never," cried Juvigny, "will I give up Bianca to thee."

"And I swear, while I live, Bianca shall never belong to thee. It is as we shall see."

The eyes of Verneuil flashed, and he clung to one last hope.

"Wilt thou break our friendship, and forget our oath, Juvigny?"

"Our oath! Art thou keeping it, Verneuil?"

"Yes, yes, and I exact this instant the execution of our treaty."

"But if the chance in the play is favorable to me, wilt thou consent to retire freely, and without reservation, and not make the slightest attempt with Bianca?"

"I accept."

"Come, then, and let the game decide between us."

Behold them, seated at a gaming-table, five or six persons surrounding them, gazing on them with astonishment, for there was a singular expression upon their faces, and there was not a stake upon the table, which did not hinder the spectators from tranquilly settling their wagers.

A half hour had passed, and the betters found the game proceeded slowly. The players watched the looks of each other, not touching a card without trembling, nor throwing it till after a long hesitation. At length they each have four points. The decisive blow has commenced. Verneuil had made two odd tricks; two odd tricks are before Juvigny. Pale with anxiety, and with wild eyes, they let fall their last card—two tens of diamonds are upon the table. One of the betters said:

"This decides nothing; take another, and begin again."

"No," cried Verneuil, "such suspense as this one could not endure twice;" and rising, abruptly left the room.

Juvigny followed him, and, stepping out of the drawing-room, they stopped.

"It is still necessary for us to decide."

"And above all, that it be quickly done."

A look, and a gesture, ended the explanation.

"The judgment of God!" cried they.

They rushed towards the garden. A man placed himself before them and arrested them. It was Delbois, who had been watching the end of their game and had followed them.

"Your cruel project cannot be accomplished," said he to them.

"You will not refuse to my prayer and the remembrance of the friendship which has until this moment united you, the sacrifice of a quarrel, the motive of which is perhaps imaginary. You shall not fight at present; early to-morrow, if your foolish animosity has not had time to calm itself; to-day you belong entirely to me." And taking them by the arm, he made them, not without some difficulty, return to the drawing-room.

Supper was served. The father of Delbois advanced, holding by the hand the prettiest of the dancers, and presenting her to the guests grouped around the table, he said:

"I present to you Bianca Marielli, the wife of my son, who married her in Italy, and we have been obliged, by family reasons, to keep the marriage secret until this day."

Verneuil and Juvigny were a little confused when they had to press the hand of Delbois to congratulate him. As for the duel it was no more mentioned.

Behold how this history came to my knowledge. I was walking one day with my wife and my little Eugene upon the shore of the Seine, when Eugene ran towards a group of washers, among whom was a broker displaying his wares and also three or four pictures. My wife followed, and found him looking at a portrait of a lady, the beauty of which so charmed her that she could not resist the desire of purchasing it. While she was debating the price, one of the washers eagerly related to me the history of this lady, who was no other than Bianca Marielli.

JOHN TOWNSEND TROWBRIDGE, ESQ.

("PAUL CREYTON.")

The accompanying portrait of this popular young author was drawn expressly for us by Hill, after an excellent photograph by Ormsbee. John Townsend Trowbridge was born September 17, 1827, in the town of Ogden, Monroe County, New York, a few miles from the city of Rochester. It was a log house in which the future author was cradled, and probably the light he first saw was from a tallow candle. Before the following winter, the family removed to a new and comfortable farm-house. He was the eighth of a family of nine children. His parents were among the pioneers in the settlement of the region then known in New England as "The West." They entered the primeval forest and cleared for themselves a tract of land, disputing the occupancy with bears and other wild animals. Their early trials and experiences doubtless furnished the materials for the story of "Ironthorpe, the Pioneer Preacher." As a boy, he was an eager reader of books, giving to them so much attention at the expense of his work that he was universally considered lazy. He carried his precious volumes in his pocket, read them at all odd minutes; sometimes dropping into fence corners, while the hoe or axe lay unused; sometimes perching over them on the sunny side of a hay-stack, or in the evening by the flickering light of a kitchen fire. The only systematic instruction he received was at the winter sessions of the district school. At fifteen years of age, he began the study of French, and learned to read fluently without knowing anything of pronunciation, or without the aid of tutors. He afterwards learned Latin and German in the same way. In 1847, he went to the city of New York, without letter of introduction, or any acquaintance whatever. He sent a poem to the Sunday Times, which interested the editor, the veteran M. M. Noah, who sent for the author, and encouraged him to persevere in the literary profession. Major Noah gave him some employment in the way of translation, and recommended him to publishers who purchased some of his manuscripts. The next year, he came to Boston, an entire stranger. What befell him, as a writer under the name of "Paul Creyton," here, may, perhaps, be guessed from the experience of "Martin Merrivale," one of his later works. "Martin" is represented as coming to town with high hopes for the success of his book, "The Beggar of Bagdad;" his interviews with the publishers and his subsequent slavery as a newspaper contributor are most feelingly yet comically portrayed. Any man who has been obliged to depend upon his pen in this city for a livelihood, will pronounce the pictures in this book unequalled. In 1853, his first book, "Father Brighthouse," was published by Phillips, Sampson & Co., which house has issued all his subsequent productions. This work attracted instant attention, on account of its genial spirit and fresh and natural pictures of rural life. This was succeeded by "Hearts and Faces," and afterwards by "Burrell," both similar in character to "Father Brighthouse," the latter, perhaps, superior to it. In 1854, was published "Martin Merrivale," of which some mention has been made. It was handsomely illustrated, and issued in numbers. His next work was "Ironthorpe, the Pioneer Preacher," in which "Rebecca," the heroine, is supposed (with some allowable embellishments) to represent the author's mother. In 1855, Mr. Trowbridge sailed for Europe, and after spending a few weeks in London, went to Paris, where he remained during the summer of the great Exposition. In the autumn, he travelled into Italy, passing the winter mostly in Florence, Rome and Naples. Soon after his return to the United States, he published his last and best work, "Neighbor Jackwood." It was written in Paris, but retouched during a visit to Wallingford, Vermont, the scene of the story. Whatever may be the opinions of readers as to the subject or plot of this novel, there can be no difference as to its power and truth to nature. The Yankee, as popularly represented upon the stage, is a very different person from the actual inhabitant of New England. The dialect, as generally given, is only a poor caricature. In "Neighbor Jackwood," the manners and phraseology of such of the rural districts as have remained unchanged by modern innovations, are given with photographic accuracy. The style is clear and flowing, and the interest is sustained to the close. A dramatic version of the novel was brought out at the Museum, in Boston, March 16, and with eminent success. Mr. Trowbridge is still a very young man; few authors have achieved so much at so early a period in life. But his industry is unflagging, and he may reasonably hope to accomplish much greater things in the future. One thing should be mentioned to his honor: No moral stain is to be found in anything he has written. An atmosphere of perfect purity hovers over every picture he has drawn. "He has not left a line which, dying, he would wish to blot."

JOHN T. TROWBRIDGE—"PAUL CREYTON."

INSTITUTION FOR THE EDUCATION OF IDIOTS.

We present herewith an accurate engraving of the building and grounds of the "Private Institution for the Education of Idiots, Imbeciles, Backward and Eccentric Children," at Barre, Mass., under the superintendence of Dr. George Brown, aided by a corps of competent teachers and assistants. The buildings are spacious and elegant, and the grounds ample; the location is high and healthy. Pupils are received here from the age of about six and upwards. The institution is under a strictly family organization, the pupils taking their meals with the superintendent. Male and female teachers are employed, and the pupils are subject to constant surveillance, even during the period of recreation. All the appliances for the mental, moral and hygienic treatment of inmates are provided. The superintendent is a man of varied accomplishments, of strong will, of untiring benevolence, and his success with this institution is the legitimate result of constant well-directed effort. In the New Haven Register, we find a very interesting account of a visit to the school, from which we make an extract, as it will convey to the reader a better idea of the efficiency of the institution than any general statement:—"When we entered the school, the pupils were engaged in their morning exercises, accompanied by a teacher on the piano. They sang tunes in chorus, and in solo and chorus, with spirit and evident delight. Their performance in music would do credit to classes in our common schools. We next listened to the recitation of a daily lesson in Scripture history, by the second department, or second class. This recitation gave evidence of a thorough knowledge of the prominent incidents mentioned in the Old Testament, and a good understanding apparently, on the part of some of them, of the great fundamental doctrines of the gospel. Next came reading by the different classes. Some of the pupils read with ease, fluency and correctness—others with great difficulty. In arithmetic, the most difficult of acquirements for the imbecile, the classes had generally advanced no further than the simple rules, and in these there were various stages of progress. In grammar, some of them could parse simple sentences, giving their rules and reasons with accuracy. Besides the common exercises of the school, the boys are taught to work in the garden, saw wood, and perform various labors. The girls, under an instructress for the purpose, are taught to sew, knit and perform the common labors of girls of their age. Connected with the school is a gymnasium, fitted up with the means for pleasant exercise, usually found in such places; among which I noticed a ten pin alley, elevated horizontal ladders, swinging perpendicular ladders, an endless chain, dumbbells, wooden guns, etc. A teacher is employed in this department, who spends a portion of his time in practising the pupils, in small classes at a time, in this room. The object is to develop the physical powers—to teach the pupil how to use his muscles, his arms, his legs—to arrest and fix the attention, and teach him how to respond by action to the action of the teacher. Let me give you readers one case of improvement. A boy, aged sixteen years, idiotic from birth, knew nothing from books when admitted, was wilful and disobedient. He is now gentle and amiable. He performed sums in multiplication and division, read correctly and with great ease. He wrote a plain hand, in good style; recited well in his class in geography. In the elements of philosophy, he showed a knowledge which quite astonished me. His examination, replies and explanations, with regard to prisms, rain, snow, the rainbow, the dew, cold, etc., evidenced to my mind that he had acquired ideas, positive knowledge—that it was the result of no mere memorizing. He named the planets which move around the sun, their order, and the length of time it takes each to revolve around that body. In grammar, he could parse any simple sentence, and give the reasons for calling any particular word a noun or verb. Twelve or fifteen of the thirty-five pupils could not talk at all when admitted into the institution, and when I looked over that school, and noticed the growing capacity of those children for enjoyment, and thought of their sad condition without any such efforts for their improvement, my heart rose in thankfulness to God, that means had been devised to instruct and elevate these poor unfortunates. They evinced that they had minds, sluggish and sleeping, perhaps, but capable of being aroused, awakened and developed. The teachers at Barre seemed 'born for the work.' Enthusiasm and earnestness in their labors, and love for their work, were the marked characteristics of all connected with the establishment. I trust the day is not far distant when Connecticut shall have an asylum capable of receiving and educating a portion, at least, of the three hundred and thirty improvable idiotic children and youth within her borders." If idiocy be, as Dr. Wilbur defines it, in his excellent reports upon this subject, as "a want of natural or harmonious development of mental action and moral powers of a human being, and usually dependent upon some defect or infirmity of his nervous organization," every effort to restore this harmonious action, and assist nature in her work of development, should be regarded with the highest interest, and each success hailed with joy that thus bears upon the welfare of the unfortunate.

PRIVATE INSTITUTION FOR IDIOTS AND IMBECILES, AT BARRE, MASS.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.
FRANCIS A. DORVILLE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. C. M., New York.—He is living, and at last address, was lecturing and preaching. We want to know how many plays he has written.

Acacia.—"Handbook of Young Artists and Amateurs in Oil Painting," 1 vol. 12mo., published by Wiley & Putnam, New York, 1846. Write to G. P. Putnam, New York.

A. P. P., Western.—We will send the three for five dollars. Shall probably publish the illustrations you speak of.

Acacia.—The best thing you can do with your MSS. novel, is to forward it to Park Benjamin, Esq., at New York. He continues his literary agency as heretofore. He charges a proper preliminary fee for reading a work, giving his opinion and submitting it to publishers. Write to him, enclosing postage stamps, at 47, 7th Avenue, New York.

Booswain.—The great library at Alexandria, Egypt, is supposed to have contained 700,000 volumes, and was totally destroyed by the Saracens, setting fire to the orders of their Caliph Omar. The MSS. furnished fuel for boiling the water in the baths for the space of six months.

Parit.—"Detur pulchrum"—let it be given to the fairest. Let the prize be given to the most deserving. This was the inscription on the apple which tells us was adjudged by Paris to the goddess Venus, to the mortification of Juno and Minerva.

Quaker.—No. The French people suddenly submitted to the restoration of Louis XVIII. to the throne of France by foreign arms. The Dauphin who died in the Temple was Louis XVII.

D. G.—The Puritan parliament of England suppressed theatres and stage plays in 1647.

M. H., Birmingham, Mass.—The earliest celebration of marriage in churches was ordained by Pope Innocent III., A. D. 1199. Marriage was forbidden in Lent, A. D. 324.

Acacia.—Illness has been dead many years. He was a comic actor of very great ability, and was attached to the Park Theatre, New York. His wife was a fine actress.

U. P.—Mourning among the Chinese lasts for three years, during which time the afflicted abstain from flesh, wine, and all manner of amusements.

Parit.—In the middle ages the punishment of boiling to death in cauldrons was inflicted on thieves, false coiners, and some other offenders.

C. C.—Dr. Samuel L. Mitchell died in New York in 1831. He was a professor in the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, and indefatigable in his labors for the advancement of science.

G. F.—During the reign of "Bloody Mary" of England, three hundred persons suffered at the stake from heresy in the short space of three or four years.

Mrs. C. D., Roxbury.—Holbein's "Dance of Death" was suggested by an illustration of a poem by a German named Macaber.

I. V., Lowell.—Luther's last words were: "Into thy hands I commit my spirit—God of truth, thou hast redeemed me."

P. P.—The famous Duke Nash, "king of Bath," the ruler of fashion in England for more than half a century, is supposed to have supported himself in his splendor by extraordinary luck at the gaming-table. His dress was covered with expensive lace, and he wore a large white cocked hat. The chariot in which he rode at Bath was drawn by six gray horses, attended by a long retinue of servants, some on horseback, others on foot, and preceded by a band playing on French horns and other instruments.

C. C.—The library was the most indefatigable collectors of antiquity. How prolific they were may be inferred from the fact that the Romans carried off no fewer than 9000 statues from the little island of Rhodes.

AN ARTFUL DODGER.—When Dr. Bowring expressed his surprise to Mehomot Ali that the pilgrims going to Mecca should avail themselves of the steamboats of the infidels which navigate the Red Sea, the pacha said, with a laugh, "There is not one word against steamboats in the Koran." On the same principle the Turks in the Crimea excused their drinking N. E. rum.

THE COIN QUESTION.—The latest and best story extant is that of one of Walker's soldiers, who refused his life when it was offered him by a Costa Rican antagonist, "because it was against the laws of his country to take Spanish quarters." And so he died a martyr in the currency question.

MONTREAL.—At Montreal they are already making preparations for the reception of the American Scientific Association in August. The management of the affair is in good hands, and it cannot fail to be brilliant.

SPLINTERS.

.... Felicien David, the composer, announces the "End of the World" as nearly ready. That strikes us as rather ominous.

.... There are eighteen regular theatres advertised in one of our London exchanges, besides many other entertainments.

.... Lizst, the great and only rival of Thalberg, has been urged to visit this country, but is unwilling to come.

.... The last great dramatic success in Paris is young Dumas's "Question d'Argent." For a wonder, it is a moral piece.

.... The London Star, of February 7th, had news that the Mississippi River was frozen over as far up as Pittsburgh!

.... At a wedding in Gloucester, lately, sixty-two cousins were present. With Jimmy Twitcher, we ask, "vel, vat of it?"

.... Some dealers in New York were accused of smuggling jewels, but it turned out that they were only worthless stones.

.... Neal Dow has been appointed commissioner from Maine to the agricultural fair to be held in Paris next June.

.... The Bangor House, one of our best New England hotels, has been leased for ten years by G. W. Larrabee, of Lowell.

.... Some children in Ellipticville, N. Y., lately found a shotgun under an old bridge holding five hundred dollars.

.... A little girl described a snake as a "thing that's a tail all up to the head." She'll be a lexicographer.

.... There is a great need in our city of dwellings to accommodate the laboring classes at low rents.

.... The Rev. William R. Alger, a ripe and rare scholar, has been invited to deliver the Fourth of July oration in this city.

.... It is said that Mrs. Fanny Kemble has decided on making the classic city of Cambridge her residence.

.... The printers of Galveston, Texas, have organized a society, to be styled the "Galveston Typographical Union."

.... The less a man knows, the more apt he is to stand in awe of people whom the world pronounces great.

.... Opera glasses have fallen—one dropped from the balcony of the Boston Theatre, lately, and hurt a parquetteur.

.... A fashionable dining-table called up to Addison's fancy gouts and dropsies, fevers and lethargies innumerable.

.... Dr. William Yates, who introduced vaccination into the United States, died lately at Morris, N. Y., aged 90 years.

GOING ALONE.

We really believe, from many indications, that the people of this great free and enlightened country have found out that they are able to walk—strong enough to "go alone," without the aid of leading-strings held by quasi-parents on the other side of the Atlantic. We have been a good while making this discovery. We allowed ourselves to be patted on the head as a promising infant for so many years, that we hardly realized our majority when we became of age. But the "good boy" has grown up to be a man. After using his little fists to drub everybody that tried to crowd him, he began to think that he could hold a pen and make something better than pot-books. He thought he could write a book. "Jonathan write a book!" cried old Johnny Hull—"impossible, the boy's demented. And if he writes books—who'll read them?"

But one day Johnny Bull got hold of a story-book written by one of his American cousins, Washington Irving, and he laughed immensely over it. It was "Knickerbocker's History of New York." Then he found out that others of his American cousins could write books, and he bought them. By-and-by, some other Jonathans painted some pictures—and Johnny found out they were wonderfully fine. Then came a Vermont boy who thought he could "sculp a little," and lo! the Greek slave, on whose shoulders the mantle of the Medicean Venus seemed to have descended, became the cynosure of a world's admiring gaze.

But this was not enough, so long as poet, proscriber, painter and sculptor, tremblingly awaited a European verdict. In due time came the taste to appreciate and the courage to decide here upon our own works. Fame and fortune no longer halted for a transatlantic verdict:—the leading-strings were cut—the go-cart was abandoned—we went alone.

These thoughts were suggested by the last American success—Mrs. S. G. Howe's new play of "Leonore: or, the World's Own," in New York. Dramatic fame has been hitherto the coyest to American wooers. Painting, poetry, sculpture and music were won before her—but now the ice is broken, and a new field of mental culture is freely open. Of course we do not mean that Mrs. Howe has been the first to achieve laurels in this field—but she is one of the few writers, and all of a recent date, who have ventured and succeeded as playwrights. And we decidedly condemn the story she has woven, as the groundwork for the brilliant language she has embroidered on its surface. But we think she has demonstrated rare capabilities, and is destined to shine in a sphere illustrated by scarcely one female celebrity. Hitherto the dramatic art has been the appanage of man alone—for a woman to shine in tragic poetry will be a rare achievement.

A SOLDIER OF THE LORD.

No men fought better than Cromwell's "Independents," who smote the Philistines hip and thigh none the less stoutly, because they read the Bible and prayed to the Lord of hosts. Much of their spirit fell to the lot of their descendants on this side of the Atlantic, and the preachers of our revolutionary times often remind us of those of the Puritan commonwealth of England. Dr. Sprague, in his "Annals of the American Pulpit," relates the following anecdote: "Soon after the burning of Falmouth, now Portland, August, 1775, a recruiting officer went to Harpswell to raise volunteers. Unsuccessful in his efforts, one Sabbath morning he met Mr. Eaton, on his way to the meeting house, laid the case before him, and urged him to speak to the people on the subject. 'Sir,' said the pastor, 'it is my communion Sabbath, and I must not introduce secular subjects during the day. I will think of the matter, and see what I can do. Perhaps I will invite the people to assemble in front of the meeting-house at the going down of the sun.' This he did. After service he went home and to his study, and opened his Bible to see what he could find adapted to the case. His eyes fell on this passage—Jeremiah 48: 10—'Cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood.' At sundown the people gathered, and, with these words as a text, Mr. Eaton addressed them from the horse block (still standing). That night forty volunteered for the service required."

THE DESERT SHIPS.—The camels imported by our government for working on the plains perform admirably. They make a trip from Camp Verde to San Antonio, sixty miles, and back in six days, with more loading than two wagons could possibly carry; and the wagons usually require twelve days for the trip.

BROWN THE SEXTON.—N. P. Willis calls Mr. Brown, the gentlemanly sexton of Grace Church, New York, who undertakes both funerals and parties, the "Grand master of ceremonies of Much-ado-dom." Willis is great for coining words, and his writings almost necessitate a new dictionary of the English language.

LECTURES OF AMUSEMENT.—We are glad to hear that Park Benjamin, Esq., intends giving a short course of his diverting discourses in Boston this spring. His celebrated lecture on "Fashion," attended elsewhere by crowds, has never yet been given in this city.

IN PRESS.—James French & Co., of this city, are now about to issue a new work from the favorite pen of Miss Mary W. Jauvin. This lady has already won an enviable and extended reputation as a magazine writer, and her first novel will be looked for with interest.

THE SABBATH IN NEW ORLEANS.—The way they manage to get through Sunday evenings in the Crescent City is by attending circuses, operas, concerts and theatres, which are then in full blast.

GASLIGHT.—It costs the city of New York nearly half a million a year for its gas.

VOLUNTARY POISONING.

When we read, as we too often have occasion to do, of life suddenly extinguished by poison administered by the hand of the secret assassin, a chill shudder runs through all our veins. The memory involuntarily recalls the dark deeds of the middle ages, when poisoning was so common that it became fashionable, and a lady was as apt to have a flask of Aqua Tofana in the drawer of her toilet-table, as a box of rouge beside her mirror. The names of Lucretia Borgia, of the Duchess de Brinvilliers, and other equally noted criminals of past centuries, are consigned to eternal infamy. But if this crime be so uncommon now that its rare occurrence awakens a universal horror, it is a sad truth that there are thousands of self-poisoners at this day, men and women, mostly in high station, who are dying by slow degrees from the effects of deadly poisons administered by themselves, for the purposes of stimulation and excitement. We need not go to Austria for arsenic-eaters, or to Turkey and China for opium-eaters—the partakers of the "insane root" are around us. Dr. Cornwell tells us, in the "Medical World," that the use of opium is very common—that fashionable ladies resort to it for excitement—that many clergymen employ it, and that many books and many sermons are written and preached under its wild influences. Lawyers, too, the doctor tells us, resort to this pernicious stimulant. He paints a terrible picture of this sad crime—for crime it is, and the more heinous from the secrecy with which it is perpetrated.

Of the peculiar as well as terrible effects of this drug, there is no better record than that of the "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater," by De Quincey—one of the most powerful books ever written. Many of the visions of the practiced opium-eater are surpassingly gorgeous and seductive; splendid pageants, glorious scenery, seraphic faces, pass before his enraptured eyes; but the reaction is more horrid, more full of appalling phantoms, than that which follows the use of spirituous liquors. From these alternatives of glory and gloom, the victim passes into a condition the most deplorable that the imagination can conceive. He becomes a living corpse; his face is pallid and cadaverous, his limbs are wasted away and cruelly distorted, his withered skin clings to his fleshless skeleton, and he sinks into the grave a shadow and a wreck. It is passing strange that men can voluntarily surrender themselves to the despotism of an enemy so subtle and so deadly, that they can poison their whole existence to purchase a few moments of brilliant hallucination and transitory mental power!

HUGE MASS OF COPPER.—"An eye witness" writes us respecting the large mass of copper lately taken from the Minnesota mine. He says the probable weight is about 550 tons, and it took fifty-eight kegs of blasting powder to raise it to its present position, above seventeen inches from its native bed. It was in some places pure copper, eight feet thick.

IS IT POSSIBLE?—A French writer asserts that there are only ten or fifteen really handsome women in all Paris. We could show him five hundred times as many in our little provincial town, as the New Yorkers pleasantly style Boston.

IN THE DARK.—The London Lancet says there are a quarter of a million of persons in England constantly under ground in the darkness of mines. What a benighted army!

SPRING BONNETS.—Bonnets are but little larger; of course parasols are as indispensable as ever.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Hale, Rev. Greenbury W. O'Leary to Miss Elizabeth Hartwell; by Rev. Mr. Wells, Mr. Joseph N. Mansfield to Miss Ann Harrington; by Rev. Mr. Stowe, Mr. James Harrow to Mrs. Mary Barry; by Rev. Mr. Clark, John P. Averill, Esq. to Miss Abby A. Fox, of Dover, Me.; by Rev. Dr. Stow, Mr. Ellis Lyons to Miss Elizabeth Cooley; by Rev. Dr. Bigelow, Mr. Edward H. Morse to Miss Gertrude M. Bishop; by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. John H. Clark to Mrs. Lydia Davis, both of Charlestown—At Somerville, by Rev. Mr. Pope, Mr. George Ambrose Clark to Miss Jane Elizabeth Thompson;—At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Brooks, Mr. Robert B. Morse to Miss Jane Pinner;—At Salem, by Rev. Dr. Thompson, Mr. Amos H. Young to Miss Anna A. Webster;—At Essex, by Rev. Mr. Bacon, Mr. George W. Story to Miss Mary E. Low;—At Gloucester, by Rev. Mr. Parmenter, Mr. Emory Hodgkins to Miss Betsey Hodgkins;—At Newburyport, by Rev. Mr. Pike, Mr. John Scudder to Miss Adella Adams;—At Amesbury, by Rev. Mr. Childs, Mr. J. Hiram Towne, of Salisbury, to Miss Mary F. Beardsman;—At North Bridgewater, Mr. John B. Orcutt, of Charlestown, to Miss Elizabeth V. Mason, of New Bedford.

DEATHS.

In this city, Miss Abigail H. Ray, 50; Dec. Adam Bent, 51; Mrs. Sophia S. Peckes, 52; Mr. Charles E. Whitten, 24; Mr. Andrew Sheehan, 45; Mrs. Sarah M. Mann, 50; Mrs. Nancy Currier, 62; Mr. Sewall Kendall, 74;—At East Cambridge, Mrs. John Draper, 80;—At Roxbury, Mr. Henry Sheppard Steele, 29;—At South Weymouth, Mr. Charles Todd, 57;—At Melrose, Mrs. Harriet L. Noyes, 59;—At Medford, Miss Adeline Bradbury, 45;—At Quincy, Mr. John Spear, 86;—At Lynn, Mr. Abby W. Chase, 49; Mrs. Anna H. O'Brien, 61;—At Salem, Mrs. Sally Tibbels, 68; Mr. Edward Keating, 22; Mr. Alonzo Sanborn, 37;—At Newburyport, Widow Lydia Coffin, 79; Mrs. Adeline Roberts, 46; Mrs. Frances H. Brown, 62;—At Newbury, Mrs. Mary Martin, 86;—At Grafton, Pardon Aldrich, Esq., 82;—At Andover, Mr. Samuel Vose, 57;—At Sharon, Moses Richards, Esq., 87;—At Worcester, Mrs. Hannah J. Walker, 31;—At Newton Upper Falls, Mr. John Houghton, 52;—At Dartmouth, Mr. Jacob C. Chase, 45;—At West Brookfield, Mrs. Frances Louisa Smith, 22;—At Edgartown, Mr. Palmyr Collins, 69; Widow Anne Dexter 77;—At West Tisbury, Mrs. Velina Ince, 75;—At Seekonk, Widow Fanny Low Viall, 88;—At Watertown, Me., Mr. Samuel F. Carril (late of Boston), 40.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers " " " 10 00
10 " " " " 20 00
Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth copy gratis.
* * * One copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.
Published every SATURDAY, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SONG OF THE STAR.

ST. BLANCHÉ D'ARTOIS.

Have faith in thy star, O, thou child of emotion!
Nor strive thou ignobly to fly from thy doom;
Have faith in thy star, for thy bosom's commotion
Bewreaths thee the bays that will wave o'er thy tomb.

Have faith in thy star—'tis a garden assigned thee,
To light thy dark path o'er life's high-rolling wave;
Have faith in thy star! I'm an angel resigned thee,
To guide thee to heaven through the path of the grave.

Have faith in thy star—and no longer bewailing
The fate thou hast eluded from thy infancy up;
Receive ye the Lyra: henceforth unravelling
The plea—ye would dash down the Magical Cup.

Have faith in thy star, and then cast all beside thee!
The hopes and the fears that to nature belong;
Have faith in thy star, for naught else may abide thee;
Nor look thou to Fame for the wreath of thy song.

Have faith in thy star, for a work lies before thee;
Haste!—sound ye the Lyra!—press on to the goal!
The Ghost of Life wasted up-ribs before thee!
Improve the weird vision—'twill ransom thy soul.

THE LAND STORM.

Along the woods, along the moorish fens,
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm;
And up among the loose, disordered cliffs
And fractured mountains wild, the howling brook
And cave, pressful, send a hollow moan,
Resounding long in listening Fancy's ear.—TAYLOR.

WINTER EXPERIENCE.

'Tis pleasant by the cheerful hearth to hear
Of tempests and the dangers of the deep,
And pause at times and feel that we are safe,
Then listen to the perilous tale again,
And with an eager and suspended soul
Woo terror to delight us.—SCOTT.

SYMPATHY.

Mutual wishes, mutual woes endear,
The social smile and sympathetic tear.—GRAY.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Editorial rivalry is sometimes productive of queer results. But the hardest case is one related by the New York Times, of a country editor, who, finding the body of a man hanging to a lamp-post one night after his own paper had gone to press, cut it down and carried it home, to prevent his rival from publishing the news, and was himself indicted for murder. . . . We don't approve of hogging in schools as a general thing, but there are cases when corporal punishment is absolutely necessary. We see that a verdict of not guilty was returned in the case of George B. Elden, keeper of a High School in Windham, Maine, charged with assault and battery on one of his pupils. . . . Mrs. S. G. Howe has won laurels by her new play of "Leonore," produced in New York. The plot is rather daring, and the piece, as an acting play, rather heavy—but the language redeems every fault. It may be set down as a great success. . . . Dean, the coachman, who married Miss Boker, the heiress, of New York, is a modest, brisk, bright-looking lad of twenty, with a slight suspicion of a brogue. The papers have made a good deal of the mesalliance, but such things have happened ever since "King Cophetua loved a beggar-maid." . . . General Wool, of Buena Vista fame, was lately received with distinguished honors at Troy, his native place. The general is a soldier and a gentleman. . . . The sword presented by the State of Vermont to Capt. H. B. Sawyer, U. S. N., for gallantry on board the U. S. frigate Constitution at the capture of the Cyane and Levant, in 1815, is a splendid affair, finished by the Adams Company, of Chicopee, Mass. It was rather late in the day to present such a testimonial—"but better late than never." . . . One of our exchange papers thinks it is aggravating for a woman who has been working all day mending her husband's old coat, to find a love letter from another woman in his pocket. . . . Madame de Wilhorst seems to be winning genuine applause as a prima donna. Her Marie, in the "Daughter of the Regiment," is described as a fascinating performance. . . . When Bishop Horne took possession of the Episcopal Palace at Norwich, in 1791, he turned round upon the steps and exclaimed, "Bless us! bless us! What a multitude of people!"—"O, my lord," said a bystander, "this is nothing to the crowd on Friday last, to see a man hanged." The bishop must have been taken a little aback, we should think. . . . It is claimed that the great refracting telescope at Cambridge, Mass., is the most perfect instrument that the art of man ever produced, having but one rival in the world, that at the great central imperial observatory in Russia. . . . A "moving incident by flood" lately happened in the fribet of the Fox River, Illinois. A house was carried off from Anzora, with a woman and child inside. They were rescued after floating some twenty miles. . . . There are some remnants of barbarism in this brilliant 19th century, after all. What do you think of a woman in Canada having been confined for debt over seven years? . . . Ever since Ferouk Khan, the Persian ambassador, has been in Paris, all the professors of Oriental languages have been confined to their rooms by severe colds. It is supposed they will not recover till his excellency takes French leave. . . . Some time since Messrs. Ticknor, Fields & Co. had orders for sets of their "Household Edition" of the Waverley Novels to the amount of 144,000 volumes. . . . There is a town in Pennsylvania called "Youngwomanstown." It must be an attractive locality. . . . The Boston Herald says, rather saucily, we think, "a lady's dress has come to be a sort of certificate of her husband's property. The more silk she can afford to drag through the mud, the better opinion people will have, he thinks, of him. We declare it's just so." . . . Office-seekers, in Washington, have to pay a pretty high figure for their accommodations. The bill for a man and his wife, who occupied a parlor and sleeping-room one day and two nights at a Washington hotel, was just $70. . . . The city volunteer companies of New York had a grand parade on the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, when more than 19,000 men were under arms. The New Yorkers are great in the military line. . . . A very pretty writer has called childhood "a rosy lawn between the cradle and the schoolhouse." . . . A friendly suit has been brought by the Queen of England against the Prince of Wales, to settle a dispute as to the revenues of the Cornwall fisheries. Some idea of the difficulty of the case may be formed from the fact, that some of the documents extend back to three hundred years before the birth of Christ. A fine bone for the lawyers to pick! . . . There is nothing like a ready horse for a gentleman of sensitive nerves. What a nice horse that must be that deserves the eulogy pronounced by the hostler in the Pickwick Papers—"Shy! Vy, bless you, he wouldn't shy, if he was to meet a vaggin load of monkeys with their tails burned off!" The "wagon load of monkeys" was a sufficiently terrifying image, but the additional touch, "with their tails burned off," is sublime! . . . Mr. Robert Taylor, of Totness, England, is a made man. An old stone, tossing about his house for many years, has turned out to be a blue diamond, worth £50,000. A made man! It may be the ruin of him. These sudden acquisitions rarely work good. . . . There is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the end thereof is the way of death, to wit, when a tipsy man takes to the railroad track. . . . The New York Mirror says that some omnibus proprietors have adopted the classic motto from Caesar, "Jam forte in omnibus." . . . It is estimated that St. Patrick built 365 churches, ordained nearly 2000 priests, and consecrated over 300 bishops. . . . Congress, before adjourning, provided for a mail, once, twice or four times a month, overland from the Mississippi to San Francisco. . . . Model farming don't seem to succeed very well at Glasnevin, Dublin. It cost, last year, about $150 an acre, and yielded $40 per acre, so that the students, if they practise afterwards what they learn, will be able to lose $110 an acre by farming. . . . J. E. Murdoch continues to win golden opinions of the London public and critics. How we used to enjoy his performances at the old Tremont! . . . Cross Street, in Exeter, N. H., has been changed by vote of the town to Cass Street, in compliment to Gen. Lewis Cass, who was born in a house on that street; and it is probable that his mother, a daughter of Theophilus Gilman, was born in the same house. Gen. Cass's father learned the blacksmith's trade, and was afterwards a member of the United States army. . . . An aged Christian, ripe for heaven, was heard to remark, "I have three hundred and sixty-five thanksgiving days in the year." . . . Eliot's Indian Bible was written with but one pen. It is sold for its weight in gold now, because it is the only printed book which no living man can read. . . . The Albany Register says that the women of that place have commenced to cut their hair short like men. O, scissors! . . . An effort is being made for the construction of a bridge across the East River, connecting Queens's county with New York, at some point at or near Blackwell's Island, of sufficient strength and dimensions to admit the construction of two railroad tracks, and two ordinary carriage tracks and paths for foot passengers. The capital to be $1,500,000, with the privilege of increasing the same to $3,000,000. It is a magnificent undertaking, and we hope it will be carried through. . . . There are not far from twenty female physicians in this city, enjoying a good practice. We wonder if they can cure diseases of the heart. . . . We are glad to learn, by the last advices from Paris, that Crawford, the American sculptor, who is there for medical treatment, will not be likely to lose the sight of his eye, as he feared. . . . Miss Hoemer, the American sculptress, who has been studying at Rome under Gibson, will return home this summer. Though young, she has already won a high artistic reputation. . . . It is said, that the Rev. John Pierpont is a believer in Spiritualism. . . . What an inveterate wag Sam Foote was! "Right and left his arrows flew," sparing no person, no matter how exalted. Lord Kelly had a remarkably red face, and one day Foote begged him just to be kind enough to look over his garden fence so as to ripen his melons! . . . A disbeliever in the intellectual progress of the present century remarked, the other day, that the march of mind was not unlike what soldiers call "mark time," a prodigious noise and shuffling of feet, but no onward movement. . . . A queer genius in Danvers never allows his horses to be shod. He says it would make them proud, and that they would be so constantly looking at their feet, that he could get no work out of them. . . . A commission of lunacy was lately held in New York, to inquire into the sanity of a very wealthy old Knickerbocker. One of the facts alleged in proof of his lunacy was, that he would sometimes begin to read a newspaper, and presently throw it down, saying it was all nonsense. It would serve him right if he was sent to the asylum. . . . Pignotto locates the Temple of Fashion in the moon. . . . Some men commence life in a career of honesty, but meet with so many disappointments, that they disrobe themselves of their consciences, for fear they will grow as threadbare as their coats. . . . A very considerate medical writer informs the ladies that by too active a use of their fans, they check perspiration, produce cutaneous eruptions, and actually change their complexions. This may be important information, but we have not reached fan-time yet. . . . There is a deal of wisdom in one of Osborn's sayings:—"Huge volumes, like an ox roasted at a fair, may proclaim plenty of labor and invention, but afford less of what is delicate, savory and well-cooked, than smaller pieces." . . . A temperance physician, the other day, entertaining some guests, said, "Gentlemen, help yourselves. Here are wine, brandy and arsenic. All are poisons—some slower in their operations than others, but equally sure. You can take your choice." . . . Everybody should have a firm will of his own. Louis XVI. had more than the average intellect of kings, and ten times the average heart; he perished, the victim of an utter incapacity for forming a decided volition. . . . Sterne says somewhere, "The grand error of life is, we look too far; we scale the heavens—we dig down to the centre of the earth for systems—and we forget ourselves. Truth lies before us; it is in the highway path, and the ploughman treads on it with his clouted shoes." . . . Cardinal Richelieu one day said to M. de Lort, a celebrated physician, "I am gray-headed, yet my beard is black; your head is black, and your beard is gray. Can you account for these appearances, doctor?"—"Easily," replied de Lort. "They proceed from the exercise of the penis. Your eminence's brains have labored hard, and so have my jaws." . . . Education begins a gentleman, conversation finishes him. We know some horses whose conversation would finish a gentleman at one sitting. . . . The famous John Wilkes, of England, must have been a very uncomfortable antagonist in a duel. In his affair with Lord Talbot, the latter asked how many times they were to fire. "Just as often as your lordship pleases. I have brought a bag of bullets and a flask of gunpowder." . . . Man, at best, is but a composition of good and evil. Diamonds have flaws, roses have thorns, the sun has its shade, and the moon her spots. Nothing is perfect in this world. . . . Plato, being told that he had many enemies who spoke ill of him, replied, "It is no matter. I will so live that no one will believe them." Philip, of Macedon, made a similar reply, and it is equivalent to Burke's advice, "live down slander." . . . A woman makes a fatal mistake when she marries a fool in the expectation of finding a docile partner. Men of genius make the most docile husbands. A fool has too much opinion of his own dear self, and too little of woman's, to be easily governed. . . . Many eminent writers—in fact, all great writers—have been advocates of brevity. Hear what Feltham says:—"A sentence well concluded, takes both the sense and the understanding. I love not those cart-roped speeches that are longer than the memory of man can fathom." Every editor knows that pithy paragraphs are more read than long-winded essays. . . . What curious causes produce suicides in France! A gunsmith, of Paris, lately shot himself with his own rifle, because he had long tried in vain to become a great marksman. The variety of ambition's freaks is endless.

A great poet represents a great portion of the human race. Nature delegated to Shakespeare the interests and direction of the whole; to Milton a smaller part, but with plenary power over it. And she bestowed on him such fervor and majesty of eloquence as on no other mortal in any age.—Southey.

What a blessing are metaphysics to our generation! A poet or other who can make nothing clear, can stir up enough sediment to render the bottom of a basin as invisible as the deepest gulf in the Atlantic. The shallowest pond, if turbid, has depth enough for a goose to hide its head in.—London.

Choice Miscellany.

A CONTINENTAL STORY.

A woman employed as housekeeper at the Chateau of Ludon, near this city, recently inherited a sum of 800 francs. A peasant employed to take care of the grounds of the chateau, hearing of her good fortune, determined to possess himself of the money. Accordingly a few nights ago—the owner of the chateau and all the servants being absent—he got the woman on some pretext to visit him at a room which he occupied in one of the dependencies of the chateau. After a while he locked the door, and with the most dreadful threats, declared he would murder her, unless she would at once give him the 800 francs. The woman being seriously alarmed, took him to her chamber and gave him the money. The man then declared that he must murder her to prevent her from accusing him, and he summoned her to say what kind of death she would prefer. The poor woman prayed for mercy, but he peremptorily told her she must either die by the rope or the knife, and she at last selected hanging. The man then tied her hands behind her, and fastened her to the bedstead; he then mounted a chair to fix a rope to a beam, making a noose at the end. Having fastened the rope, he put his arm in the noose to see if the latter would slip; at that moment the woman kicked the chair, which fell, and the man remained suspended by the arm. They remained thus until morning, when their cries attracted the attention of some laborers, who, on hearing the woman's story, released her, but left the man suspended until they could summon a magistrate. This functionary had the man cut down, and, after receiving the woman's deposition, caused him to be sent to prison in this city to await his trial for the robbery.—Bordeaux Paper.

MERCANTILE HONOR.

It might tempt one to be proud of his species when he looks at the faith that is put in him by a distant correspondent, who, without one other hold of him than his honor, consigns to him the wealth of a flotilla, and sleeps in the confidence that it is safe. It is, indeed, an animating thought, amid the gloom of this world's depravity, when we behold the credit which one man puts in another, though separated by oceans and by continents; when he fixes the anchor of a sure and steady dependence on the reported honesty of one whom he never saw; when, with all his fears for the treachery of the varied elements through which his property has to pass, he knows, that should it only arrive at the door of its destined agent, all his fears and all his suspicion may be at an end. We know nothing finer than such an act of homage from one human being to another, when, perhaps, the diameter of the globe is between them; nor do we think that either the renown of her victories, nor the wisdom of her councils, so signalize the country in which we live, as does the honorable dealing of her merchants. All the glories of British policy and British valor are far eclipsed by the moral splendor which British faith has thrown over the name and character of our nation; nor has she gathered so proud a distinction from all the tributaries of her power, as she has done from the awarded confidence of those men of all tribes, and colors, and languages, who look to our agency for the most faithful of all management, and to our keeping for the most inviolable of all custody.—Chalmers.

PERSPIRATION.

Checked perspiration is the fruitful cause of sickness, disease and death to multitudes every year. Heat is constantly generated within the human body by the chemical disorganization—the combustion of the food we eat. There are seven millions of tubes or pores on the surface of the body, which in health are constantly open, conveying from the system, by what is called insensible perspiration, this internal heat, which, having answered its purpose, passes off like the jets of steam which are thrown from the escape pipes, in puffs, of any ordinary steam engine; but this insensible perspiration carries with it, in a dissolved form, very much of the waste matter of the system, to the extent of a pound or two, or more, every twenty-four hours. If, then, the pores of the skin are closed—if the multitude of valves which are placed over the whole surface of the human body are shut down, two things take place. First, the internal heat is prevented from passing off; it accumulates every moment, the person expresses himself as burning up, and then large draughts of water are swallowed to quench the internal fire—and this is fever. When the warm steam is constantly escaping from the body in health, it keeps the skin moist, and there is a soft, pleasant feeling and warmth about it; but when the pores are closed, the skin feels harsh, hot and dry.—Boston Post.

New Publications.

WAVERLEY NOVELS—HOUSEHOLD EDITION. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co.

The two initial volumes of this edition, containing "Waverley," more than answered the expectations formed by the published announcement. Nothing daintier ever came from the press of the Parnassus Corner. The form is larger, and though the volumes are compact and portable, yet the type is large and clear. They are stereotyped and printed by H. O. Houghton & Co., Cambridge. Waverley is illustrated by fine steel engravings, executed in the highest style. This edition will embrace all the author's notes and emendations, and may be relied upon as letter-perfect. It meets, as it deserves, with a prodigious sale.

SYLVIA: or, The Lost Shepherd—with other Poems. By T. BUCHANAN REID. Philadelphia: Parry & McMillan. 1857. 16mo. pp. 158.

Mr. Reid has added to his reputation by this charming volume. Less wild and fanciful than his last production, Sylvia is more evenly written, and contains more genuine poetry. The lyrical pieces in this volume are graceful and polished, and some of them will achieve immediate popularity. For sale by Ticknor, Fields & Co.

OLD HAN, OR PAWNROCK. New York: Rudd & Carleton. 1857. 12mo. pp. 459.

A very vivid story, the scene of which lies in New York—a locality affording the amplest material to the novelist. Though there is much low-life portraiture, still vice is not delineated in attractive features, and the moral of the story is excellent. The book is creating quite a sensation. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

NEW MEXIC—From Russell & Richardson, 13 Tremont Street, we have received "Grand Waltz," from the Prophet, "Traviata Quadrille," "Dedication Gallop," "La Valse," "Le Quadrille," "Schottische," "Concordia Quadrille," "Kitty Clyde," and "Farwell the Jigs."—From Henry Tolman, 219 Washington Street, we have received "Blue-Eyed Jeannie," a melody for the piano, "Invisible Prince Polka," "Fancy Schottische," "Les Huguenotes Waltz," "Hestiation Polka," "L'Absence et le Retour," and "Grande Polka Brillante," by Wm. V. Wallace.

THE NEW ENGLAND HISTORY, FROM A. D. 985, TO A. D. 1776. By CHARLES W. ELLIOTT. New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1857. 2 vols., 8vo.

The author of this valuable work, a member of the New York, Ohio and Connecticut Historical Societies, while steering a middle course between the details of local and the chronological character of general histories, has aimed at a simple compact and picturesque delineation of the development of man in New England. He writes fearlessly, praising or blaming the Puritans as he thinks they deserve either, and he has certainly produced a work that will be greatly sought after and valued. For sale by Sanborn, Carter, Basin & Co.

EASILY DONE.—There is not a village or town in the country so small, but that a club of twelve subscribers might be easily obtained for "Baillon's Pictorial," and the work be thus procured for each at TWO DOLLARS a year, besides a gratis copy to the person who sends the names and money.

Editorial Melange.

A Louisiana Senator was proffered a fee of $50 if he would exert his influence for a certain private bill. He immediately read the epistle to the Senate, when that body ordered the bill in question to be burnt by the clerk in front of the capitol, which was done forthwith. — A grindstone split in Brooklyn, lately, while revolving swiftly, one half of it striking a man and killing him instantly. — The Portland State of Maine states that one of the piers of the wharf for the mammoth steamship Great Eastern is nearly completed. It is a substantial, thoroughly-built structure, with about thirty feet of water at the end. — A young man went to Worcester from Oxford, recently, became intoxicated, lost his money in gambling, and then started for home. Feeling dispirited in his drunken and penniless condition, he partook of a drug in the cars, in order to kill himself, and died during the night. He leaves a wife and three children. — The first corn-mill in Nicaragua has been put in operation by Col. John H. Wheeler. — Two lawyers had a dispute at St. Louis, recently, when one of them knocked the other down, and has since been sued for $5000 damages. The St. Louis Herald remarks that, "It must have been a tremendous blow that could knock $5000 worth of law out of the head of an attorney." — A new Chinese paper has been started in Sacramento, California; Hang Tale is the editor. — A horse distemper has extensively prevailed in Portland the past winter, and has not yet entirely abated. About seventy-five are sick of something akin to lung fever, and about twenty have died of it. — The chaplain of the United States House of Representatives is 95 years old. — The mammoth pig brought to Chillicothe, to be exhibited at the Ohio State Fair, was two years and three months old, and weighed, on foot, one thousand one hundred and thirty-five pounds. — The San Francisco mint coined last year $28,524,934. — The Lewisburg, Va., Era says, that along Greenbrier River, from the commencement of the Alderson bottoms, all the land-owners, with few exceptions, seem disposed to sell and move to the west. — There are 4312 banks in the United States, with a capital of $350,702,437. New York State has 303, and Massachusetts 173. — An unfinished house, worth perhaps $200, was burned in Concord a short time ago. Its owner got up in the night to replenish the fire which he had kindled for the purpose of drying the plastering, but was not able to find his house, it having subsided into the cellar. — In the Bible of Mrs. Knight, murdered by her husband, at Auburn, Me., one leaf only was turned down, and that at the 55th Psalm, which contains David's prayer in distress. — A few days since two little school-boys were missing from Winstead, Conn., and fears were entertained that they had been drowned. They were found, however, that same evening, seven miles from home, having started to go to California, because they had such "hard lessons to get," and were afraid of being flogged if they did not get them. — Mr. J. Romeyn Brodhead, the historian in New York, has been elected a member of the Society of the Netherlands Literature, at Leyden. — A singular accident occurred at Yonkers during a late storm. A schooner was driven from her moorings in Tappan Zee, and blown on the shore at Yonkers; the bowsprit struck the steamboat depot and knocked the chimney in, making a large hole in the house.

WILBOR'S COD LIVER OIL AND LIME.—The friends of those persons who have been restored from confirmed consumption by the use of this original preparation, and the grateful parties themselves, have by recommending it and acknowledging its wonderful efficacy, given to the article a vast popularity in New England. The cod liver oil is in this combination robbed of its unpleasant taste, and is rendered doubly effective in being coupled with the lime, which is in itself a restorative principle, supplying nature with just the agent and assistance required to heal and reform the diseased lungs. A. B. Wilbor, 166 Court Street, Boston, is the proprietor, but all respectable druggists sell it.

A CARNIVAL TRICK.—Under the reign of Louis Philippe, though all the Bonaparte family was in exile, Louis Napoleon contrived to enter France, spend two jolly days of the Carnival in Paris, and even pass one evening at the opera ball in company with two ladies of the citizen-king's own family. The police were on the alert for two days afterwards, but he made his escape triumphantly. It is said that to this very day this feat gives more pride to Louis Napoleon, than his coup d'état or the kiss that he received from Queen Victoria.

STRICT JUSTICE.—Judge Russell, of New York, deserves the thanks of his fellow-citizens for the just severity in his sentences, and for upholding the terror and majesty of the law. He sentenced another garrotter the other day to twenty years, and his two female assistants to ten years each in the State prison.

NEW STEAMSHIP.—Commodore Vanderbilt's new steamship Vanderbilt will commence running to Southampton, Havre and Bremen, on the 5th of next month. She is said to be faster than the Persia; and we hope so for the honor of the flag.

CHINA.—One of the most curious features of the late Chinese difficulties is that the insurgent and imperial war-junks fraternized in their resistance to the British. The hatred to foreigners appears to be universal and deep-rooted among the Chinese.

Wayside Gatherings.

Seals were seen in large numbers in Vineyard Sound, near Duke's Island.

The salary of the mayor of Bangor has just been fixed at $500 per annum.

The receipts of the American Colonization Society for the year 1856 amounted to $41,298.

The railroad fare between Boston and Manchester N. H., is reduced to $1.25. The distance is 60 miles.

Mr. Benjamin Hodge, of Derby, has a bull calf that weighed 118 pounds when only 12 hours old.

An Opera Hall, 100 feet wide, 140 feet deep, and 55 feet high, is now in the course of erection in Cincinnati.

A fatal distemper among horses is prevailing in New Bedford. Several valuable animals have been attacked and died.

Bayard Taylor recently travelled in Lapland, with the thermometer 45 degrees below zero.

Three American steamboats are now navigating the rivers La Plata and Parana, in South America.

Col. Samuel Medary, the patriarch of Ohio journalism, has been appointed governor of Minnesota, vice Willis A. Gorman, superseded.

Q. B. Stewart, a lawyer of Louisville, Ky., who was employed in the celebrated case of Reside against the United States got $90,000 for his services.

A shipment of thirty thousand pounds of feathers, valued at over $18,000, was made by a single house in Louisville, Ky., a few weeks since, for eastern markets.

Darley, the famous artist, has been designing some beautiful figures for some new bills to be issued by the Banker Hill Bank, Charlestown.

William Wood, of Hartford, has invented a brick machine, which it is said will make 75 bricks a minute, or at a rate of forty thousand a day.

An ox, weighing 4000 pounds, is owned by Otis Doolittle, of Hinsdale, New Hampshire. He is seven feet high, and has not yet done growing.

Lieut. Watson Smith, who was the 1st lieutenant of the steamer Arctic, sent in search of Dr. Kane, has been ordered to the receiving ship at the Philadelphia navy yard.

From the time Verges, the assassin of the Archbishop of Paris, issued from the door of his prison, 100 feet from the guillotine, until his mutilated body left the ground in a carriage, but one minute elapsed.

The most active exertions are making in the legislature to reform our militia establishment, which now costs the State $80,000 per annum, while the military of Maine costs that State but $9000.

The bodies of two children, buried five years ago, were dug up last week in the German burying ground in Allentown, Pa., and found to be petrified as hard as stone—while bodies in adjacent graves were entirely decomposed.

The Irving Dramatic Association, of Charlestown, has lately been presented with a complete set of Washington Irving's works, consisting of fifteen volumes, as a mark of the author's appreciation of the compliment presented in the choice of their name.

The Manchester Mirror says that Mr. Abraham Melvin, of Wear, N. H., recently sold twenty-five thousand pounds of Spanish merino wool to parties in Boston for sixty cents a pound, amounting to $15,000. The wool was of his own raising, and part of a three years' stock.

Of 130 vessels which have been sent direct to Liberia, by the Colonization Society since 1820, all have arrived safe, without having to make any claim on the insurance offices for damage. This shows a generally smooth sea, and safe navigation between the United States and Liberia.

Rev. Calvin Colton, well known as the writer of the Junius Tracts—a series of political papers of great popularity in the campaign of 1840—also editor of the Speeches and Correspondence of Henry Clay, died a few days since at Savannah, Ga., whether he had gone in pursuit of health.

Peter the First, king of Portugal, to restrain luxury and prevent the ruin of families, forbade his subjects to buy or sell anything on credit. Cash payment was in all cases required; and for the second offence against the law the penalty was death. Peter was ahead of his times.

An instrument called "Shaw's Garrote Signalizer," is advertised in the London Times, which, when in action, gives a sharp, loud report, and will strike a powerful blow at the same time. They can be carried in the pocket, and, the advertisement says, "are a sure defence against garroters."

The Washington Star asserts that information has been received that Messrs. Morse and Borland, the special and resident ministers from this government in New Grenada, have been constrained to demand their passports, owing to the determination of that government to refuse to do justice to the matters now in issue with the United States.

A short time since a young man by the name of Tanner, in Memphis, Tenn., of most blameless life and reputation, was assassinated in the street at night. The case was a mystery, but a clue has now been obtained which renders it probable that he was killed by mistake for another man, who stood in the way of an enraged Lothario. A negro was the tool selected to commit the murder, and he mistook his man.

The Cincinnati Gazette tells us that a prison philanthropist named Strafer preaches to the chain gang every Sabbath, and that a short time ago, when he was preaching to them, "Blue Dick," a colored fellow and a "hard case," was guilty of a very insulting act. When Mr. Strafer retired, the gang held "an indignation meeting" upon the matter, and sentenced the offender to fifteen lashes, which were well administered.

The Charleston Courier publishes a highly interesting account, by the only surviving officer of the ill-fated American frigate Chesapeake, of the unfortunate encounter with the British frigate Leopard, which had so important an effect in rousing the heart of the nation in the war of 1812. Among other interesting facts, it appears that the Chesapeake had but one gun ready for action, and that she was only able to fire that one gun a single time.

A merchant with his friend was passing his store in the Bowery, New York, one day lately, when he stopped for the purpose of explaining the operation of a new lock, recently put on the store door. The merchant was surprised to find the lock would not work, and fancying he heard a noise in the store, he left his friend to keep watch, and went for the police, four of whom he procured. The store was then entered and three burglars secured, who were next day committed for trial.

Foreign Items.

It is said that General Tom Thumb received 567 valentines at London on the 14th of February.

"Gin and Water" is the name of the last popular farce, now presented at some half a dozen of the London theatres.

While performing Phedra, at Naples, Madame Ristori in the fourth act, fell upon the stage-lamps and cut and burnt her arms.

Mr. C. Kean, it is said, intends to quit the stage in 1859. His last season at the Princess's Theatre is expected to realize a profit of ten thousand pounds. This is an odd lot.

Gen. Baron de Rottembourg, one of the four adjutant-generals of the Old Guard, has just died at Montgeron, near Paris, at the age of eighty-seven.

There recently died, in the Russian province of Vilna, a peasant named Michael Klawekla, who had attained the age of one hundred and thirty-seven years, six months and eleven days.

The king of Dahomey—the black gentleman having 2000 women as disciplined troops—has sent his two black sons to the college at Marseilles, where they are not excluded by color from receiving an education.

The British government refuses to fit out any more Arctic expeditions in search of Sir John Franklin, and Lady Franklin is about to send out a ship at her own expense. Since the place where the party perished is now pretty well ascertained, it would not appear difficult to learn all that can be known of them.

Sands of Gold.

.... No woman is capable of being beautiful who is not incapable of being false.—Steele.

.... One forgives everything to him who forgives himself nothing.—Chinese Proverb.

.... Truth is far more intensely interesting than fiction, when the heart and affections are enlisted in the subject.—Lawson.

.... Though once in his life he may grate thee with harshness, excuse him who on every occasion else has soothed thee with kindness.—Sadi.

.... There is no man's mind of such discordant and jarring a temper, to which a tunable disposition may not strike a harmony.—Sir Thomas Brown.

.... What is the situation in which woman and woman's love may not be the jewel of our fate? What is the state or condition which she may not beautify, or soften, or inspire?—James.

.... In counteracting the defects, we should be cautious not to blunder by imitation of others. We should search till we find where our character fails, and then amend it—not attempt to become another man.—Cecil.

.... When you see an old man amiable, mild, equable, content and good-humored, be sure that in his youth he has been just, generous, and forbearing. In his end he does not lament the past, nor dread the future. He is like the evening of a fine day.—Arabic Proverb.

Joker's Budget.

What is the difference between the labors of a farmer and a seamstress? One gathers what he sows, the other sows what she gathers.

The Dutchman who stabbed himself with a pound of soap, because his krait would not "schmell" has been sent back to Germany.

"What's the use," asked a ragged fellow, "of a man's working himself to death to get a living?" And we respond to the inquiry, "What's the use?"

Ye who are eating the apple dumplings and molasses of wealth, should not forget those who are sucking the herring bones of poverty.

There is an inscription on a tombstone at La Point, Lake Superior, which reads as follows: "John Smith, accidentally shot as a mark of affection by his brother."

A little girl in school gave as a definition of "bearing false witness against your neighbor," that "it was when nobody did nothing and somebody went and told of it."

We hear constantly of absconding railroad contractors. It is not a matter of much surprise, when it is remembered that it is a regular business with those fellows to "make tracks."

The gentleman who attempted to cut his throat with a sharp joke, a few days since, has again made a rash attack upon his "victimizing department," by stabbing himself with a point of honor.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.

DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the bosom of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Baillon, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke to the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00

4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00

10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the Illustrated copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BAILLOU, No. 22 Winter Street, Boston

THE VICE-EMPEROR OF JAPAN.

JAPANESE DIGNITARIES.

The figures on this page represent the vice-emperor and vice-empress of Japan in their court costumes, which, though absurd in our eyes, doubtless appear as rich and imposing to those of their subjects as the most splendid uniforms and the most magnificent ball-dresses that ever dazzled an American company. And of course our richest costumes must appear absurd to them. The vice-emperor, in our engraving, seems sadly encumbered with his official robes, and has a very wobegone and lackadaisical look; while the vice-empress sweeps along with an imperial air, flourishing her fan with the grace of a Spanish donna. We commend her remarkable coiffure to the attention of our ladies. The vice-emperor Ziogoon, or Kocho, is the mikado or emperor's vicerent. It has been supposed by many that he is the virtual sovereign, but he is as nearly as destitute of real power, and as carefully secluded from the public eye, and as much immersed in the inextricable web of law and custom, as his nominal master. He rarely ever stirs beyond the precincts of his spacious palace enclosure, even his religious pilgrimages and his journeys to Mikayo to do homage to the mikado being now performed by deputy. The business of government is represented as wholly unworthy of engaging his thoughts, and his time is so skilfully occupied as scarcely to leave him leisure, even if he had the wish, to attend to the affairs of the empire. The mere official duties of ceremony imposed on the Ziogoon, the observances of etiquette, the receiving the homage, or compliment, and the presence of those permitted and bound to offer both, upon frequently recurring festival days, and the like, are represented as sufficient fully to occupy these individuals. But lest any notion of degradation in this actual nullity, any perception of being, like the mikado, but the shadow of a sovereign, should germinate in the imperial breast, or be planted there by some ambitious favorite, both the Ziogoon and his court are constantly surrounded and watched by the innumerable spies of the council of state which constitutes the real executive power. The wives of those men, though kept in subjection, sometimes display energy and will, as the following story shows: Early in the eighteenth century, the Ziogoon Tsouna-yosi, a profligate prince, who by his vices had destroyed his constitution, accidentally lost his only son, and the dignity of Ziogoon never having been inherited by a daughter, resolved to adopt an heir. This is a constant practice in Japan with the childless, whether sovereign or subject; but the established rule is, to select for adoption the son of a brother, or some other near relation, in direct contravention of which, Tsouna-yosi, disregarding the claims of his nephew, fixed his choice upon an alien to his blood, the son of a mere favorite of inferior birth. His wife informed of this, resolved on a decisive step. Though she had been wholly neglected by him, she invited him to a sumptuous entertainment, and while he was drinking, despatched a note containing her instructions to Ino-Kamon-no-Kami, the prime minister. When they were alone together, the lady implored the Ziogoon to forego his impious design. He refused to listen to her respectful remonstrances, and in desperation, she first killed him and then herself. The self slain princess had not, it seems, thought it sufficient thus to prevent the Ziogoon from executing his illegal design; she had given Ino-Kamon, in her note, precise instructions as to the course he was to pursue. By obeying them, the minister secured the accession of the lawful heir, and alleviated the disappointment of the youth whom Tsouna-yosi had intended to adopt, by obtaining a principality for him from Yeye-nobou, the monarch intended to be supplanted. Ino-Kamon's own services were recompensed by the new Ziogoon, who rendered the office of governor of the empire hereditary in his family; and this media is said to divide the admiration of Japan with the wife of Tchouya—the "Japanese Lucretia."

SCENE WITHIN THE WALLS OF CANTON.

The very striking and peculiar scene in Canton, on this page, is from a picture by a Chinese artist. The archway and battlements and showy perspective remind us of a scene in Aladdin on the Museum stage. In the right-hand foreground is the sedan, which is a general conveyance used by persons of quality in China.

THE VICE-EMPRESS OF JAPAN.

Of the physiognomy of the street, the following is a picture. "The shops, being principally open in front, and the whole of the merchandise being thus exposed to view, present a most showy, alluring appearance to the spectator. The interiors of these shops are neatly fitted up, and the goods tastefully disposed for inspection; whilst the intermixture of various-colored paper inscriptions hanging on the walls, and variegated lanterns pendant from the roof, have an extraordinary and pleasing effect. The inscriptions and notices are generally to the following effect: 'Much talk injures business.' 'Having once been cheated, we are made cautious.' (Cheat a Chinaman in money matters! what European could accomplish a feat of that description?) 'No credit can here be given.' 'All here is sold at its true value, and being good, praise is needless,' etc."

STREET WITHIN THE CITY WALLS, CANTON, CHINA.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XII., No. 18.—WHOLE No. 306.
6 CENTS SINGLE

DIGGER INDIANS BURNING THEIR DEAD.

The striking scene depicted on this page was drawn and engraved expressly for the "Pictorial," from a sketch made by Mrs. L. Taylor, on the spot, in Placerville, El Dorado county, California, about 200 miles from San Francisco, and kindly furnished us by Mr. J. L. Roberts, a Bostonian, who spent five years in the land of gold. The Digger Indians, so called because they dig roots for their principal food, burn with the deceased everything belonging to him—bows, arrows, ornaments, cooking utensils, etc. They are a peaceable tribe, but very filthy in their habits. In the scene before us an interested group of Americans and Chinese are watching the curious ceremony. We gather some interesting particulars respecting the Indians of California, from E. S. Capron's "History of California," published by John P. Jewett & Co., of this city. Travellers who have passed from the Atlantic States across the plains, through California, and down to the city of Mexico, state that a marked difference of natural characteristics exists between the Indians residing on the eastern and those inhabiting the western side of the Rocky Mountains. While the former are generally tall, powerful and bold, the latter are short, comparatively feeble and cowardly; while the former are active, the latter are uniformly lazy. The natives who live west of the Sierra Nevadas are, with some exceptions, remarkably filthy, are of a much darker color than the surrounding Indians, and are divided into almost numberless small tribes—the task of collecting and enumerating the names of which would be as difficult as it would be useless. On an equal area, the Indians are not so numerous within that territory as they are in the more southern and eastern regions. This fact is attributed to the intercourse of the former with Europeans, and to their physical inferiority. They are less warlike than their more stalwart neighbors; but the moral proclivities of the natives of this beautiful region are not so variant.

All of them are thievish, brutal and deceitful. Marriage is recognized among them, but the degrees of consanguinity are not respected. Polygamy prevails, and the husband can put away his wife, or exchange her for another, at any time. Formerly, the males—especially in the southern section of the territory—wore no clothing, except a partial covering in the rainy seasons, while the women appeared in a very scanty petticoat made of tule grass. The Athabones of the south are among the most intelligent and athletic of the tribes, and the Diggers of the north and east are probably the most filthy, stupid and depraved. The Catholic missionary priests easily reduced large numbers of these people to submission, but they do not appear to have benefited much, spiritually, by the instructions of the fathers. In the more southern missions, these priests planted extensive vineyards and orchards, cultivated luxuriant gardens, raised large crops, and, by the help of the aborigines, made the wilderness "blossom like the rose."

DIGGER INDIANS OF CALIFORNIA BURNING THEIR DEAD

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN: —OR— THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER VIII.

WHAT ALICE OVERHEARD.

At nine o'clock, the family, as usual, separated for the night. Alice retired to her chamber, which was shared by Ella, who was buried in rosy slumber. Though the day had closed in splendor, the sky was now overcast, and the air was close and sultry. She was still too nervous and excited to feel any disposition to sleep, and having extinguished her candle, she raised the sash of one of the windows and seated herself near it. A large maple, which grew so close to the window as to be within reach of her hand, while it intercepted her own view, prevented her from being seen by any person who might chance to be near the house.

She had not been at the window many minutes, before she thought she heard footsteps approaching. This did not surprise her, for Falkland, who went away soon after dinner, had not returned when she came to her chamber. Her uncle, whose custom it was to sit an hour or two by himself after the rest of the household had retired, had alluded to his absence, and said that he would admit him when he came.

On listening more attentively, Alice soon found that there were two persons, instead of one. They continued to draw nearer and nearer, and, at last, as well as she could judge, seated themselves on a rustic bench, beneath the maple close to her window.

"Hez," said a voice, which she knew to be Falkland's, "I tell you that the paper I have described to you of right belongs to me. The old man has no business with it."

"If you are certain that my gettin' it for you won't be any damage to Ally Dale, you shall have it before another week. If it would be, I wouldn't touch it if you would give me as much Guinea gold as I could clink in my pockets for the rest of my lifetime, for if ever there was an angel that walked the earth in human shape, 'tis Ally Dale."

"Rest satisfied that 'twill be no damage to her whatever, for it will be precisely the same to her, a few years hence, whether I have it or not. The only person who will be the worse for it is Mr. Walworth, and that won't trouble you, for if I mistake not, you owe him a grudge."

"Ay, that do I."

"And doing me this piece of service, may give you a better opportunity to pay it, than you will ever have again."

"He shall be paid anyhow. To be put in the stocks to be laughed at, and p'nted at by them that's no better than I am, is what I sha'n't forget this year nor next."

"You'd be no better than a milksop if you did. What crime was you guilty of which the old Puritan in his wisdom thought demanded so disgraceful a punishment?"

"Marry, no crime at all, accordin' to my way of thinkin'."

"Folly, then, if that name snits you better."

"If you must know, I snatched a kiss from the house-maid, Sunday morning, in the passage that led from the kitchen to the parlor, as we were goin' to attend family prayers."

"And the foolish minx told of it?"

"No; as all luck would have it, Mr. Walworth saw me, and being a justice of the peace, thought it his duty to make an example of me, for the benefit of my fellow-servants."

"In my opinion, the heinousness of the offence should have been reckoned according to the good or ill-looks of her on whose account you incurred the penalty. If she was the blowzy, squint-eyed slattern that now performs the duties of house-maid, you richly deserved the punishment."

"So say I, but Hitty Chessman was a trim, tidy little body, as one you'll see in a thousand, with saucy black eyes, cheeks like a red rose, and lips like ripe cherries."

"'Twas a pardonable offence, then, to say the least of it. I'll be bound to say, that the old Roundhead's mouth watered for that very kiss, the same as I've seen a great lubberly boy's, as he stood watching his invalid brother while eating the tit-bits of a broiled partridge. Depend upon it, he would have been more lenient if it had not been so."

"I shouldn't wonder."

"As I've said, you'd be a mere milksop to pass it over without notice. Get that paper for me, and you will be richly revenged, and at the same time get a rich lining to your purse."

"You are willing to give me your word on the honor of a gentleman that it won't injure Ally Dale?"

"Haven't I already told you so? How can it, indeed, when, as soon as she is her own mistress, we are to be married?"

"I thought she was to be married to Clarence Harleigh."

"And others have thought so, too. But I know, and so does she, that, owing to her uncle's opposition to our marriage, it is necessary to throw dust into people's eyes."

"If this is so, you shall have it."

They now rose and walked slowly away, still talking together, though Alice could no longer hear what they said. She could think of only one paper in Mr. Walworth's possession which, it appeared to her, that Falkland would be desirous to obtain, and that was the will of her late uncle, Mr. Gilbert Burlington, by which, when she arrived at the age of twenty-one, she would come into possession of the valuable estate to which allusion has already been made.

Falkland was a distant connection of Mr. Burlington, who, after the loss of his only child, a son of great promise, intended to make him his heir, on condition that he should take his surname, as well as that of Gilbert, which, by his desire, had been given him at the foot. He even went so far as to make a will to this effect,—a circumstance, however, which was known only to a few of his confidential friends.

But it was not long before Gilbert's habits of extravagance, together with others quite as exceptionable, became known to Mr. Burlington, who, finding that no dependence could be placed on the promises of reformation, which he made from time to time, made another will, which was now in possession of Mr. Walworth, in favor of Alice Dale.

At an earlier period, before Falkland's unworthiness had become known to him, Mr. Burlington had hoped to bring about a match between Alice and his young kinsman. This favorite project was not entirely given up at the time he made an alteration in the disposition of his property, as was seen by the letter he sent to Mr. Walworth, enclosed with the will made in favor of Alice. "It is my earnest desire," he wrote, "that in case Gilbert Falkland should reform, that a marriage should take place between him and your ward."

This, by some means, became known to Falkland after Mr. Burlington's decease. Being unable to think of any other way by which he could repair the broken fortune inherited from his father, he was induced to exile himself a certain period from those scenes of gaiety in his native land so well suited to his taste, imagining that while his personal attractions would prove irresistible to the little piece of rusticity—to use his own expression,—who had deprived him of a fine estate, there would be no difficulty in securing the favor of her guardian by a little assumed gravity, and by falling in with his peculiar and favorite tenets.

But he soon found that he had reckoned without his host. Alice, whom he had pictured to himself as a little awkward rustic, he found possessed charms both of mind and person, which, were there opportunity, would throw the most dazzling of the court beauties into the shade.

Still, had not Clarence Harleigh preceded him in his visit to her guardian, he imagined that his handsome face (which would have been really so, had the features been less effeminate), with his other advantages, personal and acquired, could not fail to make a favorable impression on a young girl who lived so secluded.

Yet, high as was his self-appreciation, he could not be so blind as not to see that Harleigh was infinitely his superior, even in those qualities on which he most prided himself, and which recommended themselves to the eye, rather than to the heart or the understanding. As respected these last, he was conscious that the disparity between himself and Harleigh was too great to admit of comparison.

At first, he flattered himself that neither Mr. Walworth nor Alice would be keen-sighted enough to distinguish the real from the false,—that the difference between Harleigh's virtues and his assumed ones would not be detected. This was a delusion in which he was not permitted long to indulge, though, as has been seen, he by no means abandoned the idea of gaining possession of the property, either with or without the imbracance of a wife, which, by his prodigality, and the vices it involved, he had forfeited.

The conversation between Falkland and the man with him, in a measure revealed this to Alice, and she at once determined to seek her uncle, and communicate to him the substance of what she had overheard. She had risen in order to execute her purpose, when she heard some one knock at the outer door. In a minute afterward, Mr. Walworth opened it, and admitted Falkland. Finding that her uncle did not return to the room he had recently left, she supposed he had retired to rest, and concluded to defer the communication she wished to make until morning. Her decision would have been different had she known that, long before sunrise, he was going to set out on a journey, from which he did not expect to return for more than a week.

CHAPTER IX.

ARTIFICE.

"WHERE is Uncle Walworth?" were Alice's first words in the morning, to her Aunt Esther.

"A dozen miles from here, by this time," was the reply.

"I didn't hear him mention that he was going away."

"It was a sudden decision. After Gilbert Falkland returned, he felt so much troubled about Gabriel that he walked over to his house to talk with him. With a good deal of difficulty, he succeeded in persuading him to go to his brother's for the purpose of spending a few weeks. David Guthrie is a firm, judicious man, and will, your uncle thinks, be able to control Gabriel without his being aware of it."

"I am very thankful he is gone. I was thinking, last night, that unless some one went with me, I shouldn't dare to go out of sight of the house."

"That is what I told your uncle, and as, in the course of a few days, he would be obliged to leave home on business, he thought he had better go now, and take Gabriel to his brother's."

Alice now mentioned to her aunt what she had overheard while sitting at her chamber window. Search was immediately made for the will, the paper they supposed to be referred to. Mrs. Walworth thought that she could at once lay her hand upon it, having often seen it in a certain compartment of the desk, where her husband kept such papers as he considered most valuable. It was not in the place where they expected to find it, but they imagined that Mr. Walworth, previous to his departure, had taken the precaution to remove it to a small drawer which they found locked, and the key gone. It could not, they were nearly certain, have been already abstracted, and when the lid of the desk was closed, carefully locked, and the key deposited in Mrs. Walworth's pocket, they thought there could be no cause for apprehension. It was decided, however, in order to make assurance doubly sure, to cause the desk to be removed, sometime in the course of the day, to Mrs. Walworth's bed-room.

The sun was something like three hours past the meridian, and Alice, with her eyes fixed on a page of a book she held in her hand, though her thoughts had wandered far away, was sitting in the shade of the old maple, on the same rustic bench where Falkland and Hez Looney had sat the evening previous. She did not hear the light footsteps stealing up behind her, and when an arm was suddenly thrown round her neck, she started to her feet with a cry of alarm.

"Why, Alice, how nervous you have grown! I thought you were one of those who were never startled at anything," said a well-known voice.

"Mildred," said Alice, "you did wrong to frighten me so."

"I was far from intending it, but I ought to have considered that you hadn't yet had time to recover from the terrible shock you received yesterday. I didn't hear of it till about an hour ago. The grim Gabriel has always realized my idea of an ogre, and I almost begin to think that he is one. But he isn't within ear-shot, I hope. If he is, in order to revenge himself for what I have said, I shouldn't wonder if he turned into a flying dragon, and carried me away on his back."

"There is no danger, as my uncle has taken him to his brother's, twenty or thirty miles distant. He believes that his mind isn't right, and don't think it safe for him to be in the neighborhood."

"I am exactly of his opinion, and now, to pay for your being enticed away in the expectation of meeting me, we may venture on a ramble, which, if he were here, it might not be safe for us to do."

Alice made no objection to this proposal, and they wandered away slowly in a direction where they could, for the most part, keep in the shade of the trees.

"Harleigh has left us since I was here last," said Mildred, as they both, by common consent, stopped under an oak of such ample proportions that Robin Hood and his merry men might have dined in its shade.

"Yes," replied Alice, in an absent manner, for Harleigh's name brought to mind what he had said to her respecting Mildred.

Mildred seated herself on the roots of the oak, which were covered with velvet moss, and drew Alice down by her side.

"And this," said she, taking hold of the ribbon encircling Alice's neck, and suddenly drawing the gem attached to it from its hiding-place, "is Harleigh's gift."

"I never said that it was."

"There was no need. I knew, though a gem of great price, that it wasn't for its intrinsic value that you treasured it so sacredly. How very beautiful, when a gleam of light touches it! Allow me to remove it from your neck a single minute, so that I can the better examine it."

Mildred did not wait for the permission to be given, but unclasping, held it so that it caught the flash of a sunbeam, which kindled into life its varied and intensely brilliant hues. The next moment, she removed it into the shade, when its vivid colors at once faded into cold, ashen gray.

"Mutable as man's affection," said Mildred. "It makes me sad to look at it. I believe, Alice, were I in your place, I should hesitate to wear it."

"If the warmth and beauty of its colors don't always show themselves, they still exist."

"Which, if the sun be absent, the light of a farthing candle may bring into play. Let not your confidence be too strong, lest it prove to be misplaced. You remember what I told you before Harleigh went away?"

"I do."

"Don't forget it. But I must restore his love-token. Even if it be an ill omen, you will persist in wearing it, I suppose."

"I don't see why it should be an ill omen," replied Alice, as she put the ribbon round her neck and clasped it.

Mildred took hold of the clasp for a moment, as if to examine it. When she removed her hand, it was touched together so slightly that the least motion would cause it to fall apart. Mildred rose at the same time that Alice did, and the next moment she had the satisfaction of seeing the gem so valued lying on the ground, half buried beneath the grass and herbage. Alice passed on, and Mildred, under pretence of gathering some violets which grew under the oak, lingered a little behind, which gave her an opportunity to put the opal in her pocket.

"Come, Alice, don't look so grave," said Mildred, at the same time offering her some of her violets. "I am, I own, sometimes a little superstitious, but I should not try to excite a similar feeling in others. Forget what I have said, and believe that the opal, when glowing in the sunshine, rather than when obscured by the shade, is a true type of the days which are in store for you and Clarence Harleigh. And yet—"

"And yet what?" said Alice, finding she hesitated.

"Nothing; no matter."

"It is matter; tell me."

"Well, then—but I won't repeat what I've heard; 'tis a vile slander."

"If against Harleigh, I can better bear to hear it, if it be false, than if it were true."

"That the imagination is apt to magnify what is of little moment into something of importance, must be my excuse for telling you. It is possible that you have heard Harleigh mention the Lady Hester Deighton."

"I have frequently."

"But not that she is ready to bestow her hand on him for the asking?"

"I never did."

"Nor that an earl's coronet will grace his brows, if he should ask her hand?"

"How can that be?"

"Simply because it is promised him at Lady Hester's suit. There is no time now to enter into an explanation of the affair. It is enough to know that there can be no doubt of its truth. But when people presume to go further, and say that, for the sake of the coronet, he will not hesitate to marry the lady, I can only say that if like me they had seen the sweet wild-wood flower he is pledged to—that is, conditionally, they would not hesitate to pronounce it, as I have already done, a vile slander. And yet I don't like his concealing the matter from you."

"He might not know it."

"I am sorry to say that I am certain that he did know it. The letter containing the information, which I received from England yesterday, more than hints that he would not have been in such a hurry to return, but for the prospect of the earldom."

"Did you ever see the Lady Hester?"

"Yes, hundreds of times."

"Is she handsome?"

"Handsome isn't a word expressive enough to apply to a person of Lady Hester's style."

"Are her eyes and hair the color of yours?"

"Both are as black as midnight."

At this moment, for she thought of Harleigh's words when he gave her the opal, Alice involuntarily raised her hand to her neck and found it was not there.

"It is gone, Mildred!" she exclaimed. "What shall I do?"

"What is gone?"

"The opal."

"Well, you needn't look so frightened, and turn so white. We will return the same way we came, and search for it."

The search was, of course, a vain one. Mildred, who, at first, made a great show of assisting her, soon grew impatient, and left Alice to prosecute it alone. She went over the ground many times, and, at last, returned to the house, weary and disheartened. Mildred met her at the door.

"Have you found it?" she inquired.

Alice shook her head, but did not speak.

"Fie upon you, for so lying it to heart!" said Mildred. "After hearing the matter explained, it will be all the same with Harleigh, unless he wishes for some excuse to break his faith with you. If he does wish it, there will be no lack of a plausible plea, even should he imagine his gift to be still safe in your possession. On reflection, my advice is, that you say nothing about it, either to him or any other person."

"I shall tell Aunt Esther."

"I shouldn't, if I were in your place. You may do as you please, however."

Before Alice had time to reply, they were joined by Gilbert Falkland.

"You have made your appearance quite opportunely," said Mildred. "I was just thinking that my walk home would be rather lonely, but now I shall expect you to accompany me."

"I shall be most happy to be at your service," replied Falkland, "though, it appears to me, that the walk will be pleasanter some two or three hours hence."

"Perhaps so, but I am in haste."

"You certainly won't think of returning home till after partaking of some refreshment," said Mrs. Walworth, who happened, in passing near the door, to hear what was said, and whose feelings of hospitality rebelled at the idea that even the guest of an hour should go away fasting. "The children have been out in the fields gathering strawberries, and they will feel themselves slighted if you don't stay and eat some of them with Starface's gold cream, as they call it."

"The temptation you hold out is rather a strong one," said Mildred.

"Too strong to resist, I should think," said Falkland.

"Unfortunately," said Mrs. Walworth, "every temptation we are assailed with, and even yield to, is not so harmless as to eat strawberries and cream;" and her eyes, as she spoke, rested on Falkland.

His own, for a moment, fell beneath her glance, as his thoughts reverted to what had passed between him and Elizabeth Lounney, and he could not forbear asking himself if her remark contained any hidden meaning. Mildred, too, quailed a little, as she thought of the wrong which she had so recently been guilty of towards Alice.

The almost immediate entrance of Benjamin Walworth with a pitcher of cream and a large china dish piled high with delicious strawberries which filled the room with their delicate fragrance, served in a measure to dispel their embarrassment, though the remark of Mrs. Walworth continued to cause Falkland more or less uneasiness during the repast.

"I shan't return to-night," said Falkland, when Mildred intimated that she was ready to go.

Alice did not, as usual, invite Mildred to come again soon. Her mind was in a state to cause her to feel nearly indifferent as to whether she came or not, or if she had a preference, it was in favor of her absenting herself. It might be in consequence of Harleigh's caution, but, for the first time, she experienced towards her a vague feeling of distrust.

Mildred, accompanied by Falkland, proceeded in silence till they were out of sight of the house. She then stopped, and looked cautiously round in every direction.

"I believe," said she, "that we are neither within sight or hearing of anybody."

"I think not, unless it be some one who has the power of being invisible," was Falkland's reply.

"Here is something for you, then," said she, taking the opal from her pocket and handing it to him.

"This is Harleigh's have taken you told me about?"

"Yes, but I wouldn't have even a cricket hear me say it, lest it should proclaim it in its song."

"How did you get it?"

"O, I set my wits to work, and now that I have given it into your keeping, you must set yours to work, so that it may serve the double purpose of promoting your interest and mine."

"Don't fear; nothing will be easier. A single glimpse of it in my hands will make Harleigh so riled with jealousy that he will foam at the mouth."

"I have already succeeded in making Alice jealous of him."

"How?"

"You know that the eccentric Lady Hester Deighton, at one time, took such a fancy to him that she importuned the king to make an earl of him."

"Yes."

"Well, I mentioned the circumstance to Alice to-day, and represented it in such a way that she supposes her to be young and as beautiful as an angel, and there is little doubt but that Harleigh will be tempted to offer her his hand."

"Why, she is old enough to be his grandmother, and ugly as sin is represented to be by the blind Puritan, who, once on a time, wrote a poem called 'Paradise Lost.' She took it in her head to adopt Harleigh to supply the place of a son she lost—did she not?"

"Yes, and happening, one day, in hunting over some musty parchments, to find that in the time of William the Conqueror there was an earl in the family, she wished to have the title, which had been extinct for centuries, revived for Harleigh's benefit."

"But like many of her other whims, it lasted only a few weeks, I've been told."

"No; she has ridden a score of hobby-horses to death since then, and ruthlessly abandoned them without shedding a single tear to their memory."

"It is an old affair—her partiality to Harleigh. How came you to think of resuscitating it?"

"Why, in a letter, which I received yesterday from England, the old lady's name was mentioned, which recalled it to mind."

"I had letters by the same ship which brought yours, and one of them contains important information, which has decided me to return to England the first chance."

"Is the information you speak of a secret?"

"Yes, though I think I can trust you with it. But before entering upon the matter, I must be as cautious as you were, and be certain that there's no cricket, much more a bird, within hearing. Look at this."

"Well, I see a roll of parchment."

"A peep at the inside will reveal to you its importance."

"The late Mr. Burlington's will in favor of Alice Dale. How came you by it?"

"I was helped to it—no matter how, nor by whom."

"This is a dangerous business."

"Not so much so as it appears to be."

"I'm afraid that you'll find it is."

"By no means. After altering a single date, I shall cause it to be restored to the place it was taken from."

"What benefit to you can the alteration be? I can see none."

"I will tell you. One of the letters I received yesterday was from my Aunt Dermont, who, after the death of Mr. Burlington's wife, presided over his household up to the time of his decease. She mentioned, though in a way as if she attached no importance to it, that a will, by which Mr. Burlington left me the whole of his property, a few legacies excepted, and dated June 8th, 1656, had recently come to light. I at once recollected—for a circumstance of so much importance to myself could not be easily forgotten—that this one was written exactly three years later, to a day."

"Rather a singular coincidence, I should think, that both wills should be written the same month and the same day of the month."

"Both singular and fortunate. A slight erasure, and a single stroke of the pen will make the nine a six."

"True, but an alteration which must be so delicately made as to defy detection, will require a cunning as well as a careful hand."

"Two requisites which mine isn't deficient in. Judge for yourself."

As he finished speaking, he took another parchment from his pocket, unrolled it, and handed it to Mildred.

"You didn't tell me that your Aunt Dermont not only mentioned the will, but sent it."

"I hadn't made up my mind then, whether to show it to you or not. Look at the date."

"I thought you said it was dated 1656."

"So it was, when I received it."

"Can it be possible that the figure nine which I see here so fairly inscribed was a six?"

"It can be."

"I couldn't have thought it, but it must be as you say."

"You think it would require sharper eyes than the girl's Round-head guardian has to detect the alteration, vigilant as he is?"

"Unless his eyes are sharper than mine, it would. But you are not certain of succeeding so well with the date which is to come under his inspection."

"What I have done once I can do again. Besides, finding it in the place where he left it, will be a sufficient warrant that all is right, so that it may be years before he sees the inside of it."

"Then you don't count on receiving any immediate benefit for your trouble?"

"Whether I do or do not, must depend on circumstances. At any rate, I must put things in train, so that if I don't win the bride, I may secure the fortune. If we succeed in estranging Alice and Harleigh beyond the point of a possible reconciliation, I think that I am neither so ill-favored nor such a novice in the art of persuasion, that patience and perseverance will not finally bring her to listen to my suit."

"In which case, neither of the wills will be of any value to you."

"No; but if, on the other hand, Harleigh should marry her, he will find that instead of the rich heiress he expected, that a hundred acres in the very heart of the wilderness is his bride's only dower."

"The time will never come when Alice Dale will be Clarence Harleigh's bride. Swift and sure agents must be made use of to prevent it, should others fail. You will return to England the first opportunity that offers?"

"Yes."

"I will go at the same time."

"That is right. To remain here among bears and savages, and worst of all, Puritans, if nothing is to be gained by it, is what I should have no fancy for."

CHAPTER X.

THE COUNTRYMAN'S SOUVENIR. A QUARREL.

CLARENCE HARLEIGH, during the first three or four weeks after his arrival in England, had, with one or two exceptions, absented himself from court. No doubt, he felt that the companionship of such men as Rochester, Buckhurst, Harry Jermyn, a mere butterfly, and Killigrew, who had a court jester, at that period been in fashion, would have made his office a sinecure, without saying a word of the graceful, insolent and showy Duke of Buckingham, with scores of others, whose vices, it was to be feared, outnumbered their virtues, would not encourage him, either by precept or example, to pass through the two years' probation, which had been prescribed him, in a manner to satisfy his severe and exacting judge.

He had, however, been included among a limited number invited to be present at an entertainment at Whitehall, where was to be served a collation, consisting in part of the choice and delicious fruits of Portugal, without any lack of old Spanish wines, or of the light and sparkling vintages of France. He might have refused this invitation like the rest, had he not hoped by accepting it to hear from his American friends, for he had heard that Gilbert Falkland would be present, who had arrived so recently as to barely give his tailor time to fit him with a dress which would make him presentable.

A dozen or more courtiers were grouped together in the banquetting-hall, through which, only a few years previously, Charles I. had passed to the scaffold, chatting on various subjects, some of them pretty liberally seasoned with court scandal, to pass away the interim which would elapse previously to the entrance of the king.

"Will Harleigh be here this evening?" said one of them, addressing Harry Jermyn.

"I believe he has graciously condescended to give his promise to that effect," was the reply. "I understand now why the bright glances of a certain lady's eyes might as well fall on an iceberg."

"How came you to be enlightened?" inquired the first speaker.

"Lord Arran tells me that his obduracy must be laid to the charge of a little rustic he found in the new world."

"And what is more unaccountable still," said Killigrew, "Dame Rumor says she is a Precisionist, and eschews all gayer apparel than a sad-colored gown, a kerchief of cambric, and pinners of the same."

"And so stiff with starch," said another, "I venture to say that, like the enormous ruffs worn by Queen Bess, they would stand alone."

"We all know," said Arran, "that Dame Rumor is the Queen of Scandal, yet I cannot find that she accuses the little rustic you speak of with any want of beauty, however much she may lack in taste."

"A deficiency easily supplied by a French milliner and a skillful tire-woman," said Jermyn.

"I shan't admit that," said the Duke of Buckingham, who stood by, listening to what was said. "Even the skill of the Parisian coiffeur, recently summoned thither, could not so disguise a gawky country girl, but that her rusticity would be apparent."

"I shouldn't wonder," said Killigrew, "if Harleigh should turn to be a Puritan himself."

"Nor I," said Jermyn. "I have suspected he had a leaning that way, ever since he returned from the provinces."

"I advise you," said Killigrew, "to be on your guard, so as not to manifest any surprise should he make his appearance here this evening with his hair cropped after the fashion of the Round-heads."

"And wearing a steeple-crowned hat and a sad-colored doublet to match his lady-love's gown," said Harry Jermyn, who probably being reminded of his own well-fitting pourpoint of rich, purple velvet, with a silk, embroidered handkerchief, which sent a faint odor of musk through the room as he drew it from his pocket, he brushed away a particle or two of the glistening powder, which had been used to heighten the lustre of his long, wavy hair, from one of the sleeves.

At this moment, the entrance of Harleigh in a dress whose richness and elegance accorded well with his manly and somewhat haughty style of beauty, caused a smile to curl the lip of Buckingham, as he whispered to Rochester, who stood at his elbow, that Jermyn, compared with Harleigh, might be mistaken for the original of Etherego's "Sir Popling," in the new play he had been writing.

Almost at the same moment that Harleigh was admitted, the king made his entree by a different door. He advanced towards the group in an easy, familiar manner, for many of those composing it had been his companions, not only in many a hair-breadth escape, but in numberless wild adventures and mad frolics, during his years of exile. While noticing those present with a grace and good humor natural to him, and which, in numerous instances, had, in the eyes of his subjects, served to gloss over his illiberal policy, a slight disturbance attracted attention towards the door by which Harleigh had found ingress, and, at last, rising high above suppressed words of remonstrance, were heard these words:

"I must go in, for I am the hearer of something for his majesty which my wife Margery has for many a year preserved as the apple of her eye, giving it a place in a box of polished maple, the whole time, by the side of her best head-gear."

"It must be something exceedingly precious, then," said Killigrew, in an undertone, "for we all know that a woman's heart is in her head-gear."

"I will wager this silver goblet, against a cup of Barcelona chocolate," said Charles, taking a goblet from the table and turning to the Duke of Buckingham, "that the sturdy fellow at the door, whose lungs are so much better than his manners, has come a day's journey for the express purpose of bringing me some memorial of those days when I was a wanderer from place to place, like some errant knight of old."

"I accept the wager," replied Buckingham, "and wait your majesty's permission to order that the man be admitted."

"Neither the permission nor the order is necessary," said Charles, laughing, as the usher stepped hastily forward, a stout-built yeoman following close to his heels, with his broad, round face a good deal flushed from the excitement caused by the opposition made to his entrance.

A word from Buckingham caused the usher to fall back, while, with firmly-planted steps, the man made his way towards the spot where the king stood. When arrived within a short distance of him, happening to catch sight of the Duke of Buckingham, he stopped with a puzzled air, and scratching his head to assist his memory, alternately regarded the king and the duke.

"I should say that this was the king," said he, in a low tone to himself, fixing his eyes on Charles, "though the other one is dressed such a nation deal finer."

"Wiser heads than his have supposed that the divinity that doth hedge a king, as Will Shakspeare has it, is made of no better stuff than lace, ribbons and jewels, so don't be puffed up, George," said Charles, addressing Buckingham, who, like himself, was infinitely diverted at the man's mystification.

Another look, longer and more searching than the others had been, appeared to overcome any lingering doubt, and approaching Charles more nearly, he knelt at his feet, at the same time hugging a parcel, round which was wrapped a snowy napkin, closely to his breast.

"What is your wish, my good friend?" said Charles; "but before making it known, rise from a posture which you are evidently unused to."

"It is only that your majesty," and he busied himself with undoing the napkin, as he spoke, "would graciously please to accept this curry-comb."

"Oddsish, man! better give it to my groom."

"It would be no more than fair for his majesty to explain whether he means the groom of the stole or the groom of the stables," said Killigrew, though his witticism was lost in the louder voice of the countryman.

"Not for a gold ducat," said the man, "would I again have it touch horseflesh."

"Why, there's nothing dangerous about it, I hope?" said Charles.

"No; no! please your majesty, but it would be puttin' a slight on my good Dame Margery, who has kept it in the maple box with her best head-gear ever since I carried the hay mare with it that carried your majesty beyond the reach of those who were seeking for you."

"It is only charitable to hope that the head-gear was well fumigated whenever the dame had occasion to wear it," whispered Killigrew.

"Let me see," said Charles, adjusting his periwig. "I think I have some recollection of a hay mare that served me, on a certain occasion, which might have claimed kindred with the wind, as far as speed was concerned, and it was well for me that it was so. A dozen blood-thirsty dragoons kept me in sight for ten minutes or more, then all but one began to lag, and it wasn't long before he followed his example."

"Her name was Speedyfoot, please your majesty."

"She was well named. Yours is Hendrick Dykes?"

"It is, please your majesty."

"It does please me, and that right well, to meet you in a place where, at the time you did me such good service, there appeared little chance of my ever being admitted, unless, indeed—"

The king did not finish the sentence, but a shadow passed over his countenance, and he involuntarily glanced at the window from which his father stepped upon the scaffold.

"I thought, at the moment of your entrance, I had seen that honest face before," said Charles, quickly rallying himself. Then, speaking to some one in attendance, he gave orders that Hendrick should be provided with refreshment and lodging, while, turning to Hendrick himself, he charged him not to go away in the morning till he had either seen or heard from him.

"I suppose," said Charles, when the man had withdrawn, "that I am expected to have this wrapped up in lavender, and kept in my bed-chamber, that I may daily be reminded of the good service done me by a sight of it. But, jesting apart, the man must have one of the best horses in the stable, and his wife some suitable present that will suit her fancy. It is only justice, for, to them, it was a matter of no trifling import to part with an animal which, besides being a source of profit, carried them to church, fairs and merry-makings. But if I am likely to lose my best horse, George, you see that I have won my wager, and you may set it down to my forbearance, that instead of a cup of chocolate, it isn't a silver dish, an article in which the crown cupboard has been most woefully deficient ever since the plate found its way to the Hague, to be transformed into ducats."

"I thought," said Harleigh, who, with two or three others, was

OSCAR, PRINCE OF SWEDEN, AND HIS BETROTHED.

The portraits on this page are from authenticated sources, and are faithful likenesses of Prince Oscar, of Sweden, and his bride elect, who were betrothed in the September of last year, and whose nuptials are to be celebrated in the course of the present year. The prince is the second son of King Oscar, was born on the 21st of January, 1829, and holds the rank of colonel in the Second Guards and in the First Grenadier Body Guards, commander in the Swedish and Norwegian Marine, and colonel in the First Brigade of the Akerhus Infantry Regiment. The lovely bride, the Princess Sophia Wilhelmina Marianna Henrietta, is daughter of the late Duke of Nassau and the Duchess Pauline Frederica Maria, daughter of Prince Paul of Wurtemberg. She was born on the 9th of July, 1839, and is the youngest half-sister of the present reigning Duke of Nassau. Oscar I., the father of the young prince, and king of Sweden and Norway, was born July 4, 1799, and is the only issue of the famous Marshal Bernadotte and his wife Desirée Clary, daughter of a merchant of Marseilles, whose elder sister married Joseph Bonaparte. Oscar Bernadotte was placed, at the age of nine years, in the imperial lyceum, and there received his preliminary education. Marshal Bernadotte was elected crown-prince of Sweden, accepted the reversion of the crown, and borrowing 2,000,000 francs, that he might not appear in Stockholm with only his sword, proceeded at once to that capital with his son, after both had renounced Catholicism on the road, and embraced Lutheranism, the dominant religion of Sweden. The young Oscar now received the title of Duke of Söderman, which Charles XIII.

had formerly borne, and his father (Bernadotte) resolved to educate him in a manner to satisfy the wishes of the nation. Bernadotte had the satisfaction of seeing his son forget his French in the course of a year, and soon acquire a complete mastery over the Swedish language. In 1818, on the death of Charles XIII., Bernadotte ascended the throne, and transmitted to Oscar the title of chancellor of the university of Upsal, of which he became a student next year. His military studies kept pace with his literary pursuits, and he was appointed colonel of the Guards. Oscar married Josephine, daughter of Eugene Beauharnois, Duke of Leuchtenberg. In 1834, he was named viceroy of Norway, and in 1838, assumed the regency on account of the continued illness of his father. In 1844, he succeeded his father on the throne. He has three sons, besides the subject of our sketch, and two daughters. We know little of the young prince whose portrait we have given, but think his chances of making a figure in the world are enhanced by the popular origin of his family. The descendants of a long line of royal ancestry are not so apt to make good rulers as those who come of sturdy plebeian stock.

THE PAWNBROKER.

The sketch on the next page represents a scene that may be witnessed any day by those who take the trouble to penetrate into any of the little shops whose doorways open under the sign of the three golden balls in Chatham Street. Newspaper itamizers, according to Charles Lamb, are in the habit of informing their readers once a month that the three golden balls of a pawnbroker were originally the arms of the Lombards, who first introduced the science of collateral security into England, while better-informed antiquaries derive them from the gilded pills which shine in the shield of the Medici. The pawnbroker in our picture is an actual sketch from life, and his Hebraic features mark his nationality most unmistakably. In slang phrase, the pawnbroker is affectionately termed "my uncle,"—everybody's uncle he is, who is in want of money and has personal property to deposit for security, and his establishment is, in the language of the fancy—the "spout." The poor woman in the picture is trying to negotiate a loan on a flat-iron and a cream-pot, and watches with intense anxiety the supercilious expression in the money-lender's face. Behind is a poor woman, on the same errand, perhaps to raise a trifle by stripping herself of some necessary article of clothing. The other customers appeal less to our sympathies. The one with the weed on his hat, looking askance at the others, is an unmistakable rowdy; and another face is stamped with the sure impress of intemperance. In the middle compartment, "one of the b'hoys" exhibits a watch, and further on is a shy, skulking individual, who is probably making his first visit to the Jew. The articles exposed for sale at a pawnbroker's tell a sad story of human distress, and show how the want of money sometimes presses on all classes. There you will see jewels, necklaces, ear-rings of value that have been worn by fashionable beauties, gold chronometers that have been carried by men about town, silks and satins that have flaunted in many a gay hall-room. Here a violin, the solace or the support of some poor musician; there a comforter, ill-spared from the bed of some shivering wretch who had to choose between starvation and cold. And we have seen little children's dresses and shoes and stockings either pawned by an intemperate parent or by a desperate one, or else parted with by some weeping mother, though the last memorials of the loved and lost who lie buried in some unmarked grave. A visit to a pawnbroker's shop is one of the saddest a man can make, and we rarely pause at the window of one without shedding tears over the misery that it suggested. Could the keepsakes treasured in these purlieus assume a tongue, how sad a tale of woe and suffering would many of them utter that would almost palsy the heart with commiseration for the unfortunate.

PRINCE OSCAR OF SWEDEN, AND THE PRINCESS SOPHIA OF NASSAU.

standing a little apart, and was beginning to be impatient at his protracted absence, "that Gilbert Falkland was to be here this evening."

"So he is," said he, whom he addressed. "I shouldn't wonder if, instead of being lined with gold, which would enable him to resume with fresh spirit his old habits of luxury, his pockets were found to contain nothing better than a few worthless grants of that wild portion of terra firma, signed with the mark of some Indian chief, wilder than his lands."

He had hardly finished speaking, when Falkland made his appearance.

"Ah, here is my patentee, fresh from the new world," said Charles, cordially giving him his hand. "I heartily welcome you back to merry England, even if you are the owner of as many acres as are contained in my United Kingdoms."

"I can assure your majesty," said Falkland, "that there would be ample space for my domain between the Thames and the Tweed, the whole of which is not worth the space shaded by the Royal Oak. When the grim old Puritans called that part of the world a howling wilderness, they couldn't have hit on a more appropriate appellation, it being inhabited chiefly by bears and wolves."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

They are as sick that surfeit with too much, as they that starve with nothing.

AN INDIAN ATTACK.

The spirited sketch on this page represents one of these incidents which have not unfrequently occurred to American vessels on the northwest coast of America. A trim-built Yankee schooner, lying at anchor, is being attacked by a perfect fleet of canoes, manned by ferocious savages. Four or five boats are alongside, and others are pulling to their support, and notwithstanding the crew are defending themselves, as we see by the smoke of musketry rising amidships, the boarders are throwing themselves over the nettings with perfect recklessness. That the artist has been justified in imagining such a scene, we have authentic accounts of similar adventures to prove. A few years ago, an American schooner, the "Susan Sturges," was actually captured in precisely the same way by the tribe of Indians known as the Massetts, residing in the northern part of Queen Charlotte's Island, off the coast of British America, not far from Oregon. We happen to have at hand a spirited narrative of this event, written by Capt. Matthew Hooney, the commander of the schooner. He says:—"On Thursday, Sept. 23, 1852, sailed from Skidegate's harbor, east side of Queen Charlotte's Island, bound to Edensaw's harbor, at North Island. We had on board the chief, Edensaw, and his wife and child, with two of the Skidegate Indians, one of whom had been to California in the above-named vessel. His name is Winnott. Nothing extraordinary happened until we rounded Point Rose, on Saturday, Sept. 25, when a canoe came alongside the vessel. They told Edensaw they were from Fort Simpson, and were bound to Massett Harbor. He asked me to allow some of them to come on board; but I refused. They then traded some fish for tobacco, and went away. On the following morning, some canoes came off from Massett Harbor, we being about four miles off, to the northwest. I commenced trading with them for fish, believing that to be their object, as nearly all the canoes had more or less fish in them. I now counted twenty-five canoes around the ship, but never suspected an attack, having had a similar number around her before. I therefore continued trading on the starboard side of the quarter-deck. The chief, Edensaw, was passing the tobacco into the canoes, one of the seamen lowering the fish into the hold, and another on the main deck, at the port gangway. While in this scattered position, a large canoe came along on the port side, and one of the Indians jumped over the nettings on the deck. I ran from the quarter-deck to stop him and make him leave the ship, but at this signal the vessel was boarded simultaneously on all sides by at least one hundred and fifty men. I was in a moment completely surrounded and overpowered. I rushed at the first Indian who boarded, and was about to fire at him, but was seized by two others from behind, thrown on my back, and dragged towards the stern of the vessel. Here I managed to break away from them, but was immediately covered by five or six muskets pointed at my breast, and was only saved by the chief's wife forcing herself between the Indians and myself. The chief then came up to me, and by dint of force dragged me away from them towards the cabin. A sudden rush was made, by which the cabin was immediately broken open, and a fight ensued between the chief and one of the other men, in which the former had his nose nearly cut off. During this time, I managed to make my escape to the after cabin, where I found four of my men secreted, all being stripped naked, and one slightly wounded in the side by a musket ball. However anxious the chief, Edensaw, and his party may have been to preserve our lives, they appeared equally anxious to share the plunder with the Massett tribe, for, on our departure from the cabin, they began to ransack the whole vessel, cut down all the sails, and let go the anchors. They removed all the spare sails from the hold, as well as the fish and stores. They also took the safe out of the lazarette (which was placed there for safety), containing $1500—$1000 in gold and $500 in silver, besides several amounts of private cash, amounting to about $200. During the whole of this time, they were shooting most vigorously for my life. I was therefore obliged to keep myself secreted, as it was their intention to shoot both me and my men, if we made our appearance. In the meantime, Edensaw made a treaty with them to spare our lives for a quantity of cotton and tobacco, whereupon they began cutting the upper deck of the after cabin and the bulkhead at the same time. By this manœuvre, and their numbers, they overpowered Edensaw and his men, and forced us to quit the after cabin. While I was making a rush for the outer cabin, one of the fellows made a thrust at me with his knife, which I avoided by falling down among their feet, and thus scrambled out on deck. Here I was taken prisoner by a chief named Scowell, who told me in pretty good English that his wife's father was a Boston man, and that he would protect me. It being impossible for me to return to Edensaw, I went with him to his canoe, where I was covered with a blanket for protection, when we immediately made for the shore. After many privations and difficulties encountered on the land, both by the mate and myself, we at length reached Fort Simpson, where we received every attention and kindness in the power of man to bestow, and the remainder of our men were soon sent for and recovered."

THE PAWNBROKER.

INDIANS ATTACKING A YANKEE SCHOONER ON THE NORTHWEST COAST.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

CONSOLATION.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Weep not for buried years,
For seasons passed away;
Nor prayers of age, nor childhood's tears
Perpetuate to-day.
Time like a phantom flies,
Forever on the wing;
New morning suns for us shall rise,
New days their pleasures bring.

Weep not for hurried hopes,
For idols overthrown;
Whene'er the mind in darkness gropes,
And halcyon dreams are flown.
The rainbow in the skies
In joy shall yet appear,
And o'er our broken idols rise,
Unshadowed then by fear.

Weep not for buried friends,
Companions gone before;
Not on this earth our friendship ends,
Time's sterile, rocky shore.
Lift up the eye of faith,
Still now the heav'g breast:
For unto us the Saviour saith,
"E'en I will give you rest."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE RIVAL OF THE EMPRESS.

A TALE OF THE REIGN OF CATHERINE II.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

It is in the reign of that extraordinary woman, Catherine II. of Russia, the year rendered memorable by the commencement of the American Revolution, that the date of the events in this story begins.

In a rich residence on the banks of the Neva, in St. Petersburg, resided Feodora Radzin, sole daughter and heiress of one of the wealthiest of Russian merchants. At the time of which we speak, she was but twenty years of age, and distinguished for her beauty and accomplishments, her charities, the lavish splendor in which she lived, and the serene goodness of her disposition. As a natural consequence of these facts, many were the native and foreign suitors who sought her hand; which was as steadily refused as it was eagerly coveted; and, as among those who did such homage there were not a few of exalted rank, large possessions, political distinction, and personal attraction, the Lady Feodora Radzin became an enigma as well as a cynosure.

Two of that celebrated family of noble Russian brothers, the Orlofs, whose powerful arms contributed so greatly to establish Catherine upon the throne she usurped, had been refused by the wealthy and charming Feodora; and had she been, like many of the wealthier ladies of St. Petersburg, whose beauty gave them power, ambitious of political influence, she might have wielded no insignificant influence in the court of her sovereign. But she abstained from even mingling in the crowds at that splendid court, and though no suspicion of her loyalty was entertained, she evinced a repugnance towards the intrigues of an artful, dangerous and gossiping throng, which, had her character in other respects rendered her in any way an obstacle to their ambition, might have resulted in her banishment to Siberia. Even as it was, the great Catherine, mortified at the seemingly contemptuous self-exile of Feodora from the society of the aspiring fawners of the imperial palace, regarded her with no favorable eye; and remembering her independence for a subject, was often irritated at the floating reports of her beauty, and of her indifference to even such suitors as had not failed to charm her imperial eye, and win ample proofs of her regard.

"It may be that her life is blameless," she would say, bitterly, to her minister, Potempkin, "but it gives me some chagrin to think that the contrast in this respect is so unflattering to myself—to me, her sovereign—me, who have experienced the ingratitude and infidelities of some whom I have deigned to load with love and favor, and yet who have sought her smiles and been haughtily refused."

"The bounties of your majesty," Potempkin would reply, "have indeed been too often unworthily received; but your greatness has been made the more palpable, since you have never stooped to be unworthily revenged. When you have discovered unfaithful favorites, you have loaded them with wealth, permitting them to live in luxury, though you dismissed them. It was a vengeance worthy of a Christian, and compensating with the magnanimity of a soul like that of Catherine."

The day of Potempkin's reign in the heart of his sovereign had passed; but he was, or seemed, contented to rule at the head of her councils, while younger and handsomer candidates presented themselves for the love which he had for a period shared. As capricious, perhaps, as herself, he had formed other attachments, and became only jealous of such favorites as had genius enough to threaten the stability of his influence as minister.

Before the favorite Zavadovsky (a handsome Circassian) had been installed in the good graces of Catherine, her roving eye had dwelt with pleasure upon the physical beauty of a young Russian aid-de-camp, named Korsa Kagul, who had served with credit under Gregory Orlof, formerly the favorite of the empress. The quick eye of Potempkin soon perceived this, and he lost no time in acquainting Korsa with the distinction which seemed to await him.

"And what say you, young man, to your good fortune?" asked the minister, regarding him with a stern and curious eye; for as yet, Korsa had evinced no sign of joy at what Potempkin had told him.

"I will take time to consider of it, your highness," replied the young soldier, with a low bow.

"St. Nicholas! What, time!" exclaimed Potempkin, in amazement. "The greatest sovereign in the world offers you the post of favorite; and you, a poor and humble officer, her subject, receive the tidings coldly, and will take time to decide?"

"Even so, your highness," replied Korsa.

"Are you mad, or in love, which means the same thing? In love with some one else?"

"That might not follow," said Korsa, gravely. "I appreciate the height to which her gracious majesty would condescend to raise me. But pardon me if I ask, for how long? I may soon be dismissed, even as you, as Orlof, as Poniatosky, Vissensky, and Vassiltchikof have been,—with broken hopes,—to mourn for the remainder of my life that I put my trust in princes."

"But you forget that our great empress always enriches her favorites, even when she discards them," said Potempkin.

"I am not mercenary," proudly said Korsa, "and what enrichment would compensate me for the loss of the love of the empress, if I were once taught to prize it before all other loves? I will cheerfully offer her my life, as her loyal subject; but my love is another and a dearer treasure, not lightly to be ventured. As I have said, though with all reverence for her majesty's wishes, I will take time to consider."

"Then see that you keep this interview a secret, or it might cost you an exile to Siberia," said Potempkin.

"I shall do so," said Korsa, and withdrew.

Affairs of state for some time after so occupied the empress, that Korsa was forgotten. When, however, she heard of his answer, she was the more incited to overcome his reluctance, and so demeaned herself towards him as to attract the notice of all the court, many of whom believed and reported him to be already installed as favorite. This rumor struck no ear so painfully as that of the rich and lovely Feodora. Though in rank but a lieutenant of the guards, and in humble circumstances, his beauty and his gallant bearing had long attracted the admiration of the Russian heiress, and as far as consistent with propriety, she had endeavored to give him some sign of the fact, and to win him to reciprocal attachment. Korsa, however, either did not or would not recognize anything specially friendly in her regard, when thrown into her society; though his sister, Circasse, an intimate of Feodora, had often told him she believed the wayward heiress, so cold to others, really loved him.

"You are mistaken, sister," was his reply. "And even were it so, what has a soldier to do with love? My ambition is in the camp."

"And mine is in the camp and court, too," answered the ambitious Circasse. "We both need wealth as a stepping-stone to greatness. For me, I will lose no means which lead to preferment; and do you know that already I believe Prince Potempkin has cast his thoughts on me? Other ladies in the court, among them a maid of honor, have intimated as much, and my own ears and eyes, if they are not wholly deceitful, confirm the idea. I may yet be made a princess, Korsa; think of that! And I am studying the way to rise."

Korsa Kagul smiled incredulously at his lovely and aspiring sister, and bade her not trust too much in the flattering dreams of ambition.

"The nature of our climbing empress seems to inspire all about her. Take care, my dear Circasse, that you do not ruin your peace by idle visions."

"You are not hopeful enough, brother," replied Circasse. "Had I been in your place, I should have been made at least a general before now. My advice to you is to marry Feodora. Aim high, brother; fortune favors the brave."

Soon after, when the rumor of the empress's supposed attachment for her brother reached the ears of Circasse, her transport was as excessive as was her subsequent vexation to see how coldly he regarded the matter.

"You will never amount to anything—you are too tame!" exclaimed she. "Or perhaps you are too proud," she added, with sarcasm. "If not Feodora, the handsomest of women, and not Catherine, who is the greatest, whom do you deem good enough for you?"

"Her whom I shall love, and who really shall love me in return," replied Korsa, seriously.

"That will be no one, then; for I believe you are too cold to love, as I believe you are too indolent, or too weak, to aspire," returned his sister. "Though perhaps you are deceiving me, after all. But I shall unmask you, by-and-by."

The courtiers' eyes were bent with envy now on Korsa, and his promotion to offices of rank and emolument speedily followed,—the empress, great in her generosity as in her love, hoping to win the handsome lieutenant by such foretastes of a promised future. Each new mark of favor gave additional anguish to Feodora, who now found her love for Korsa to be far greater than she had imagined.

"Circasse, do you love me?" asked she, one day, of that aspiring sister of the man she worshipped.

"You cannot doubt it," was the reply.

"Then know that I love your brother; and will you not ascertain from him if he loves the empress?"

"You know the report," replied Circasse.

"That she would make him the court favorite," said Feodora, her voice trembling, "or has made him so already. But is it so? Or do you think he loves her?"

"I cannot say what his feelings are," replied Circasse, coldly, "but his favors from her are numerous, and when her great blue eyes fall upon him, they seem to look with greater tenderness than upon any other. All the court mark it."

"But I am your friend, Circasse, and love him with a purer love than she can have. Think how many I have refused, and how gladly I would accept him; and would you not be as glad to have me for a sister?"

"I should be proud of it—but then, the empress!"

"A year or two and she would cast him off, like others, forging some subtle excuse; and, after having gained his affections and betrayed them, think to make amends, as with them, by giving him a fortune and a palace! Would you wish such a lot for your brother?"

"He would be foolish to disregard the preference of his empress," said Circasse, decisively. "What beautiful flowers you have in your hair!"

Feodora stared at her. How odious, in her despair, looked ambition at that moment. She felt that the last of power had alienated one whom she had deemed a friend.

"Do you believe me when I say I truly, passionately love him?" she asked, in a tone of deep grief.

"I do, indeed," replied Circasse.

"And do you think it is possible he might love me?"

"Very possible, were he to know of your love, and were I to mediate. But I could not do so foolish a thing. The empress, of course, is paramount. Think of the elevation in store for him."

"Infamy!" almost shrieked Feodora, turning away. "Circasse, Circasse, I depended upon you, but now I have no hope."

"Real love is not fashionable at court," said Circasse, calmly. "Fame, fortune and power are reigning gods. All who hope for happiness in the realm of Catherine II. must worship them."

"May misery be her portion, and of all those who prostitute their souls before her example!" exclaimed the unhappy Feodora, scorn mingling with her anguish. "It is fitting that she who concealed the murder of her husband, and became the paramour of his slayers, should teach such base examples. May her pernicious reign come to a brief end! And may those who seek her favor live to curse it!"

In a paroxysm of fury, Feodora left Circasse, who hastened away in wonder that one whom she had hitherto deemed so devoid of violence of nature, should harbor in her gentle breast such fierce and dangerous sentiments. "I have lost a friend," she reflected, "but I will preserve a patron!"

It was not long ere Feodora began to eclipse all her former levees in splendor, and to astonish the court of St. Petersburg by seeming to invite, quite as much as she had repelled, the society and attentions of the frequenters of the imperial palace. Her magnificent dwelling became the resort of numbers of the most distinguished officers of the realm, and the jealousy of Catherine began now to be aroused in a new respect; for several of those who were known to be disaffected towards her, were among the most constant and favored guests at the house of her brilliant subject.

The rebellion of Pugatschef, a Cossack adventurer, whose resemblance to Peter III., Catherine's murdered husband, had given success for a while to his revolt, had been crushed; but the empress still lived in suspicious fears that new conspiracies were being formed against her; and the new policy of Feodora induced Potempkin to watch her movements with a vigilant eye.

"What," said he to Circasse, one day, having met her with her favored brother in the imperial apartments, "what think you of the loyalty of your friend, Feodora Radzin? The empress, I fear, does not altogether like her movements."

"She is no longer a friend of mine," said Circasse.

"How, sister?" asked Korsa. "What quarrel, pray?"

"She spoke in bitter disrespect of the empress," replied Circasse; "reviling those who are ambitious to please her majesty, as if that would induce me the sooner to do her the favor she entreated of me."

"Indeed," said the minister, with a frown, "and what favor was that?"

"To command her love to Korsa!" answered Circasse, with affected contempt, forgetting that the match was one which she herself had once advised. "She became furious when I discomfited her presumption, and—"

"Tut, tut, sister!" said Korsa, with severity, "no betraying secrets. Feodora's love might well be the boast of the proudest noble in the realm. It would be presumption, too, in any one like me to claim it."

"What, brother, when the empress smiles upon you?"

"How know you that?" asked Potempkin, with an angry glance at Korsa, whose face grew red at the mention.

"Ay!" at this moment said another voice; and turning, they beheld the empress. "How know you that? Mademoiselle, be more guarded in your speech. Prince, command Feodora's presence instantly before me. I would learn more of her from her own lips."

So saying, with a threatening look, Catherine swept proudly from the apartment, followed by the minister, who cast a reproachful glance at Circasse.

"You have done wrong, sister," said Korsa, "and mischief will follow this."

"I but hinted at what all the court perceive, even though the empress should deny it. I wish but for your advancement and my own; else I should not have affronted Feodora."

"What said she against our sovereign?" asked Korsa, with anxiety.

"What I shall not reveal, though sent to Siberia for my silence, since the empress was so haughty with me. She must discover what she can, herself, and perhaps that will be sufficient; for Feodora is, in truth, in an ecstasy of despair about you, and will not mislead her language."

"Is it possible?" said Korsa, musing. "I had thought her a mere friend, nor did I dare to hope for more from one who has put to the blush two of the proud house of Orlof, by refusing their suit. And now it is my unhappy lot to have caused for her the displeasure of the empress. Circasse, I am wretched!"

"You do love her, then?" asked his sister.

"I never knew how much before, though I hoped for no return; and now that I hear of her love, it seems quite as hopeless."

Irritated at her own imprudence, the ambitious Circasse was now undecided what to do, having displeased her through whose absolute power she hoped for distinction. Finally, she determined to confer with the minister. On the other hand, her brother only awaited the issue of the interview between the angry empress and Feodora, to disclose to the latter the story of his long attachment.

The peremptory summons from Potemkin was received with surprise and alarm by Feodora, who trembled when she remembered the hasty words she had spoken to Circasse. But the rage of jealous love somewhat emboldened her, as she repaired in her carriage to the imperial abode. She was received by her sovereign alone.

"So, Mlle. Radzin, I hear that not content with keeping aloof from our court, despite our invitations, you have been indulging in words of spleen against ourself."

Feodora made no answer.

"To what, then, are we to attribute this conduct? Not to misanthropy, surely, for your house is, I hear, one constant scene of gaiety. Not to disloyalty, we hope."

"Your majesty is too firmly seated to fear even the disloyalty, if it existed, of so weak a creature as I," replied Feodora, with a tremulous voice; "and too well acquainted with the human heart not to know that in moments of deep grief it prompts the tongue to idle expressions of which it soon repents."

"And what deep grief is it which should urge Mlle. Radzin to censure her sovereign?" asked Catherine, in tones much more softened, as if the remembrance of her own predominant passion commanded her heart to pity. "Have I presumed to love in opposition to your wishes?"

"Your majesty's questions prove to me that you have been told by the sister of Lieutenant Kagul the story of my unfortunate attachment. I could have borne with his indifference, had it been shown to all alike; but to hear that so great a rival had snatched him away, and to hear his sister, whom I had thought my friend, calmly exult in the promotion which she knew made misery for me—this made me more vehement than is my wont."

"Have you reason to suppose he loves you?"

"Alas! I have no reason to believe so."

"And to gratify a hopeless love, you would selfishly keep him from promotion, and be hostile to his patron?"

"Your majesty's own experience in affairs of the heart must tell you that love is seldom unselfish, and that jealousy is deaf to pity or to argument."

"Mlle. Radzin speaks true," answered the empress, glad to hear that Korsa had given no proof of his attachment to Feodora. "Love is selfish and jealousy is deep, in the sovereign as well as the subject. You must bear this in mind, and also that time cures all wounds of the heart. You must see Kagul no more, on pain of our displeasure. I pardon what is past. Seek other lovers and be happy. You may retire."

With a bowed and aching heart, Feodora, pale and weeping, rode home rapidly. As rapidly followed another carriage from the courtyard of the palace. It contained Korsa and Circasse. The latter had sought Potemkin, whose crafty mind well knew her ambition, and had resolved to avail himself of it. He now represented the empress's displeasure with her to be great, and that her only means to reinstate herself would be to play the spy in the house of her late friend; to pretend that the empress had discarded her, and that in turn she felt incensed, and repented of her conduct towards Feodora.

"That done, dearest Circasse, and I and all I have are yours forever," said the wily minister.

"But the empress?" said Mlle. Kagul, half fearing that she was playing too high a game.

"I am no longer her favorite. Your brother will soon have the post, and her consent to our marriage will be cheerfully granted."

"But on whom am I to play the spy? Feodora is hasty, but not disloyal, and—"

"Tush, child, not her; but on Gregory Orlof, who is the arch enemy of Catherine and of me; on the Count Ambrosky, the mouthpiece of other disaffected nobles, who still lament the failure of the dead rebel Pugatschef, who would rejoice in my overthrow, perhaps in the death of Catherine and the grand duke, to place the disappointed Orlof on the throne. Feodora may not suspect or favor their designs as yet. But Catherine's conduct will arouse her vindictiveness enough to induce her to wink at their designs, which we hear are being completed at her house, where all seems harmless revelry. See to it. Keep your counsel. Be faithful, and be fortunate!"

Circasse promised. Passing from the apartment of Potemkin, she met her brother, and without mentioning other plan than the false one, for her return to Feodora, they followed together, the brother to confess his love, the sister to proceed in perfidy. When Catherine heard of their departure together she sought her minister.

"He served under Orlof once," she said, gloomily. "If Orlof be treacherous, Korsa may be."

"True, your majesty," said Potemkin. "But we shall see. The sister is more than a match for the brother."

"But Korsa shall not visit there," said Catherine.

"No harm can come of it," answered the minister. "He does not love her, and it will aid his sister's movements."

"I prefer the open to the secret blow, Potemkin," said the empress; "but craft subserves our purpose for the present. Do you love Circasse?" she added, with a half smile in her penetrating glance.

"Your majesty," said the minister, affecting to be greatly shocked, "Heaven has given you the right and the will to love many; but," he added, with a sigh, "Potemkin can never love again."

Whether she believed or not, Catherine seemed to believe. It was the better for her interests.

On her arrival home, the unhappy Feodora flung herself upon a sofa and gave way to unbridled grief, her attendants in vain essaying to console her. But a few moments elapsed, ere, to her astonishment, Korsa and Circasse were announced and entered.

"You have come to increase my anguish!" asked she.

"No, lady," said Korsa, kneeling and taking her hand, "if to confess that I long have loved you, and love more now than ever, can cause you any happiness."

"The empress has forbidden me to see you."

"She is the mistress only of my sword," said Korsa; "but here I pay greater homage to the mistress of my heart."

"Forgive me, my friend," exclaimed Circasse, falling upon her knees and embracing Feodora, "if I have done you wrong. I was too ambitious, rash, indiscreet, and I have paid the penalty. Alluding to the empress's partiality for Korsa, I have offended her, and am dismissed from court. Henceforth let our interests and desires be mutual, and be you my sister indeed."

The reconciliation seemed real, and brought a double and unexpected joy to the agitated breast of Feodora; and seated there together they discoursed freely of the way in which they might evade the injunction of the jealous Catherine.

"Her tyranny is unbearable!" said the artful Circasse. "I wonder that men will consent to be her slaves."

"Ambition, sister," said Korsa, with a smile at the sudden change in her policy, "ambition, which has had such away over you, although a woman, and one whose disappointment seems to have brought you to your senses, fills the hearts of men, and too often makes them servile. It makes slaves of some, and traitors of others."

"And isn't it honorable to rebel against insufferable despotism?" asked Circasse.

"No doubt you think so, sister, when all hope of preferment is gone," said Korsa.

"And there are others of my mind," responded she, "or I am much mistaken. Look at the gallant and majestic Orlof, under whom you have yourself served in her battles—cast aside, like a worthless weed, to make room for his inferior, Potemkin. Do you think that he bears the disgrace with patience? Has he, within his manly and once loyal breast, no desire for revenge, for justice?"

"I admit that despotism often justly enrages a noble soul," replied Korsa, "but Orlof—"

At this instant that prince was announced, and entered without ceremony.

Gregory Orlof was at that time the most remarkable man in the whole empire. The eldest of the five brothers who had chiefly been instrumental in the death of Peter III., and making Catherine sole sovereign, afterwards her main bulwark and cherished lover, and more subsequently deposed for a more graceful and youthful lover, he had made the tour of Europe and indulged in the most extraordinary excesses of expenditure and dissipation, "to assuage the fierce fires of his soul." Gigantic in figure and strength, his lofty head white with the snows of age, he stood before that group the most daring and dangerous subject of the great Catherine, whose caprices had made havoc of his mind and heart, and embittered his happiness forever. Proud amid ruin he stood, disdaining to humble his haughty spirit, seeming like Coriolanus at Antium, deserted by those he had done the most for, and not unwilling to be avenged. His wishes and those of his present confederates were suspected, though not yet detected, by the genius of Catherine and his foe, Potemkin, and Circasse flattered as he approached, at the thought of her errand there,—to deceive and betray the lion, if possible. But Orlof had long been charmed by the graceful beauty of Circasse, and the knowledge gave her confidence, the more so because her brother was one of the prince's favorites.

"You look happier than usual to day," said Orlof to Feodora, with a glance at Korsa, who still retained her hand. "Has her majesty been kind?"

The state of affairs was soon explained to him by Circasse, who relieved the lovers of their embarrassment by taking Orlof aside, and the information he received, artfully worded by the designing woman, did not fail to create the impression she intended. He regarded them all as enemies of the empress, and was free in his communications to Circasse that evening, when wine had overheated his impatient, impetuous and fearless blood.

"We are to meet again here to-morrow evening," said Orlof, "and I will find a way to relieve you of your present predicament. The throne of our ungrateful sovereign is shaking. You are ambitious, my beauty—I know it. What say you to being the bride of the rising Orlof?"

"I know that Korsa would not object," said Circasse, evasively; and Orlof took it for granted that the brother would become a confederate when the plan of revolt should be disclosed on the ensuing night.

"Nor would Circasse object," she said, as Orlof withdrew, "were I sure that the rebellion would be successful. But Catherine is too powerful, and Potemkin offers a surer ladder for me to ascend. Now, for the empress with what I have learned, and she can do as she wills with it. But my brother must not remain in this house of conspiracy and peril. Temptation may prove too strong."

Circasse, however, tried in vain to persuade him away. Korsa and Feodora, wrapt in each other's love, were not so soon to be separated. Unsuspecting of any danger, he remained during the following day. Meanwhile, the spy repaired to the palace, revealed all, and entrusted the minister that an imperative order should be sent for Korsa to attend the empress.

"Not so fast," replied Potemkin. "You will remain here till the will of Catherine is known. She may devise a better plan."

Circasse now became greatly alarmed; not was her apprehension for the safety of her brother at all decreased by the decision of Catherine, when Potemkin informed her of all which had passed. Circasse had already related the mode by which entrance might be secretly had to an ante-chamber, where Catherine might listen if she chose to the remarks of the conspirators, and the unfolding of their plan of operations; and the dauntless empress resolved to attend in disguise, with her minister and Circasse. The anxiety of the latter was apparent.

"And will you not send for Korsa?"

"We will put his loyalty to the test," replied the empress, with severity. "I will let him remain. I would have loaded him with the greatest favors in my power to bestow. And all these he refused, or hesitated to accept—from me, his empress, for her, my subject! Is this nothing! Does it mean nothing? He has also served with Orlof—in no enemy of his—and now, if after all these proofs of my regard, he proves disloyal, what punishment is most meet for him!"

"Death or banishment!" answered Potemkin.

Circasse shuddered.

"Just," said Catherine, resolutely. "He will have had no excuse, not even so much as the others. He may remain, and choose as he will, and it is for me to determine the rest."

The eventful hour arrived, and Circasse, sick at heart at the peril which environed her brother, stood trembling and faint in the apartment in the house of Feodora, by the side of the empress and the minister, whom she had guided thither.

It was a brilliant assembly for so dark a purpose. Within three days Catherine was to be dethroned by a revolt, the plan of which had been matured by Orlof, and it had not yet been decided, so Orlof said in addressing Korsa, with full confidence in his joining the league, whether the usurper should be put to death, immured in a dungeon, or sent to cool her boundless ambition in the snowy wilds of Siberia.

"The traitor! It has not been decided! Impotent!" muttered Catherine to Potemkin.

"My lords," said Korsa, "you have freely spoken, and I will do the same. That Catherine, our imperial sovereign, is often too imperious, some of you may have had good cause to say, though I have never had. You have doubtless imagined, though why I know not, that I have been inimical to her interests, or reposing too much confidence in your own strength, care not for the aid or opposition of one so feeble in influence as myself. Be that as it may, I do not join with you; and I warn you that your swords will be levelled in vain against the invulnerable breast of our glorious sovereign."

"Seize him, then!" exclaimed Ambrosky, one of the leading conspirators.

"No, hold!" said Orlof, advancing, as Korsa drew his sword, while Feodora rushed forward and implored them to spare his life.

"The signal—quick!" whispered Catherine to Potemkin, and the minister, pushing up a window, threw a small bell into the street, which, to the surprise of Circasse, was filled with troops.

"I applaud his frankness, and his faith! He shall not die!" continued Orlof; "some other way must be found—what noise is that?"

The sound of many footsteps at that moment appalled the ears of the conspirators; in another instant the doors were flung rudely open, and the apartment was crowded with armed men, while the Empress Catherine entered boldly, followed by Potemkin and Circasse.

"Treachery!" growled the furious Orlof, drawing his sword, still undismayed.

"Ay, prince, treachery, but foiled by the guardian genius of Russia," replied Catherine, with a calm smile, confronting the stalwart soldier. "Stay, guard!" she added, to one who was about to take the sword of Orlof, the others having surrendered theirs. "To me alone shall Gregory Orlof yield the weapon which I gave him when his heart was true and loyal."

Overpowered by that majestic aspect, which alone of all the world could awe the spirit of Orlof, he bowed his head, and presented his sword submissively, and the hopes of the conspirators were over. Nor even then would the nobility of Catherine's nature suffer her to receive it.

"No; keep it prince!" she said, in a lower tone, "and when next you sheath it, draw it in defence of the throne you have hitherto supported. Catherine pardons the wrong you would have done her, in the memory of the love of other days!"

Orlof's mighty frame shook with the weight of his grief, as he sheathed the weapon, and recollection showered his heaving breast with tears.

Death or banishment was the doom of all but Orlof, engaged in that conspiracy. Pardon was for him, as Catherine well knew his rugged nature, and felt that she could conquer it best by magnanimity. For Korsa and Feodora, a life of splendor and happiness, protected and illustrated by the love of their sovereign, was received; and the shame and anguish which Circasse had endured atoned for her treachery and eradicated her ambition.

BATTLE OF ORISKANY, STATE OF NEW YORK.

[For description, see page 282.]

BATTLE OF KINGS MOUNTAIN STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE BEAUTIFUL SUNSET.

BY BLANCHE D'AAROS.

When the sun sets in one place, he is but rising in new glory in another. Life is a constant dying; and the glimpses of heaven we have are reports from the spirit makes when it leaves for awhile its clay tabernacle, to reconnoitre its celestial abode; but when the soul leaves the body entirely, like the dazzling sun it bursts with rays of glory on new worlds.

See, the firmament's on fire!
Lo, a glare is on the ground!
How it bids the soul aspire,
Light so weird was never found;
Beaming forth transparent to
In its amber deluge tide,
Like a ray from God's own throne.
Bathing all creation wide:
Splendidly, yet mournfully;
Gorgeously, yet awfully.
It minds one of the day of doom,
And saints out-bursting from the tomb;
It minds one of the glorious morn
When out of chaos earth was born—
Of dawn upon the wave;
And of the resurrection morn,
And Him who comes to save.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BATTLE OF ORISKANY.

BY "NEUTRAL TINT."

[See Engraving on page 280.]

TRYON county, New York, was the "dark and bloody ground" of the Revolutionary struggle. The Six Nations of Indians, whose hunting grounds had been encroached upon by the settlers west of the Hudson River, had leagued themselves with the British, and when the war for independence began, they hurled themselves upon the thriving villages and hamlets which dotted the beautiful valley of the Mohawk, with the tomahawk in one hand, and in the other the flaming torch. Murder, rapine and violence attended their footsteps, and desolation marked their pathway through the land. At the head of this confederacy was Thayendenagea or Brant, a man who, if we are to believe his biographer, was the red-man's Washington. Tradition had connected his name with every atrocity of which the bitter and implacable vengeance of the Indian could be capable, and it was not until the late Colonel Stone, searching with indefatigable zeal among the musty and long-forgotten records of the past, brought forth his character in its true light, that he was looked upon other than as "the monster Brant." Regarding his bravery, skill, indomitable energy and powerful influence over the tribes whom he commanded, however, there has been no doubt, and as our present concern is with an affair in which the part he bore has been unquestioned, we make no hesitation in drawing largely from his biography for the facts of our narrative.

The plan of the campaign of 1777 was the severing the connection between the New England colonies and those to the southward, by means of an expedition from Canada, down the Hudson River, of a large army which should capture and hold the defences of that noble stream, thus interposing a bar to the intercommunication of the rebels and destroying their union. Burgoyne, in furtherance of this plan, moved down Lake Champlain, and at the same time, Colonel St. Leger, with a motley command of Hessians, regulars, Tories and Indians, the latter under command of Thayendenagea, marched through the wilderness, to reduce Fort Schuyler, which was situated on the Mohawk River, where the town of Rome now stands. This was an important post, as it was the key of the Mohawk valley, and its capture was deemed necessary to the complete success of the expedition. At the period of its investment, it was in command of Colonel Gansevoort, a brave and intrepid officer, whose gallant defence of his trust won the plaudits of his compatriots and the warmest commendations of the Continental Congress. The works were too strong to be taken by assault, and Colonel St. Leger sat down before them and commenced a regular siege. Batteries were erected, guns mounted, trenches dug, and all the usual means were brought to bear to compass the reduction of the fort and the surrender of its garrison, which, with unflinching courage, continued to hold out, long after the period when, according to the plan of the campaign, they ought to have been subdued, and their conquerors on the way to assist Burgoyne in his advance toward Albany.

The inhabitants of the Mohawk valley did not look with complaisance upon this invasion of their territory, as it may well be supposed, and, notwithstanding the drain upon their numbers from Gates's camp, they made a determined effort to raise the siege of the fort and drive their invaders back into the wilderness. General Herkimer, one of those sturdy patriots whose "lives, fortunes and sacred honors" were freely given to the support of the glorious cause of independence, called upon the militia of Tryon county to march to the rescue of their countrymen, who were fighting in defence of their homes. The call was nobly responded to, and he soon found himself at the head of between eight hundred and a thousand men, who made up in point of courage and patriotism what they lacked in discipline and martial appearance. Among the volunteers were many of the most influential men of the county, and almost all of the Committee of Public Safety entered the ranks, or assumed command of companies or regiments. All were eager to meet the foe, and this eagerness, untempered with caution, was the cause of the disaster which followed.

The forces rendezvoused at Fort Dayton (German Flats), from whence they marched on the 4th of August, and on the 5th reached Oriskany, about eight miles from the fort, at which place they halted, and a messenger was despatched by General Herkimer to Colonel Gansevoort, informing him of his approach, and requesting him, on the arrival of the messenger, to fire three guns in rapid succession, upon which signal he would march forward and attack the enemy in his intrenchments. He also requested Gansevoort to make a sortie at the same time, to draw off the attention and assist in the defeat of the foe. Unfortunately, the messenger did not reach the fort until near noon the next day, and meantime the militia-men exhibited the utmost impatience at the delay, and demanded eagerly to be led forward to the attack. This impatience was shared by their officers, who urged the general to push forward at once. Herkimer, more cautious, however, urged the propriety of waiting for reinforcements, or at least for the signal from the fort. A council was held, at which the arguments pro and con were advanced with more force than politeness, and high words ensuing, Colonels Cox and Paris did not hesitate to stigmatize their commander as a Tory and coward. The general was pacing the apartment in state of much excitement when the bitter taunt reached his ears. Dashing the pipe which he had been smoking to the floor, and turning upon his subordinates a look of scorn, he told them that he considered himself placed over them as a father, and that it was not his wish to lead them into any difficulty from which he could not extricate them, and, anxious as they now were to meet the foe, they would flee at the first sound of battle. His remonstrances were in vain, and, stung with the imputation of cowardice, he gave the order to "march on!" With a shout, the troops fell into their ranks and commenced the onward march. The dissensions of the morning, however, having caused a delay of some hours, it was not until ten o'clock that they moved forward, and such was the impetuosity of their march that the usual precautions against surprise were not observed.

In the meantime, St. Leger had been informed of their advance, and had determined to anticipate the attack on his intrenchments by an ambuscade. For this purpose, a part of Colonel Johnson's regiment, called "Johnson's Greens," under Major Watts, Colonel Butler with his Rangers, and Thayendenagea with a large force of Indians, were detached. The spot selected by Brant for the ambuscade was a ravine about two miles west of Oriskany, which crossed the road over which the American troops were marching. The bottom of the ravine was marshy, and the road crossed the marsh by means of a causeway. West of the causeway was a rising ground thickly covered with trees and underbrush, and here the ambuscade was formed, the forces being placed in the shape of a crescent, or segment of a circle, with the points towards the advancing troops of Herkimer. These were allowed to cross the causeway, and as soon as they had entered the circle, the opening was closed and they were thus completely surrounded. The first intimation which the Provincials had of the proximity of an enemy, was the shrill war-whoop, and a shower of balls which cut down the advanced guards, and killed and wounded many of the main body. Colonel Visscher's regiment, which had not crossed the causeway when the gap was closed, was left on the eastern side of the ravine, and as predicted by their general, ingloriously fled at the first fire. They suffered more, however, than they would, perhaps, had they remained by their companions in arms, being pursued by a body of Indians, and most severely cut up.

The suddenness of the surprise caused the most irremediable confusion in the ranks of the militia-men, which threatened them with utter annihilation. At every opportunity the savages would dart forward, tomahawk in hand, to ensure the death of those who fell, and many and fierce were the conflicts which ensued hand to hand. General Herkimer was wounded, and Colonel Cox and Captain Van Slyk were killed at the first fire. A ball passed through the general's horse, and shattered his own leg just below the knee. Nothing daunted at the storm of balls which whistled around his ears, he ordered his saddle to be taken from his charger and placed against a beech tree which stood near, and seating himself upon it, he gave his orders with a calm, serene countenance, while his men were falling around him like leaves before the autumn blast. For a time, the battle was a mere slaughter, the Indians and Tories firing into the ranks of the patriots, who were crowded together like a flock of frightened sheep, and were mowed down by scores. At length, however, they formed themselves into circles, the better to resist the bayonet charges of the Greens, and from this period the defence assumed more regularity and was much more effective. Their fire became so severe by this arrangement that the enemy attempted a decisive charge with the bayonet, but were met by such an undaunted front that they were forced to recoil. Again the Indians poured in their deadly volleys, and again the battle assumed the aspect of a massacre. Just at this period, a terrific storm-cloud which had been gathering in the heavens discharged itself upon the combatants, who were fain to seek shelter beneath the trees, and for an hour there was a lull in the contest. Both parties took advantage of this to form anew their plan of attack and defence. The Americans, by command of their general, took advantage of a more elevated position, and having observed in the earlier part of the action that as soon as one of their number fired from behind a tree, an Indian would run up and tomahawk him, they placed themselves in pairs behind each tree, one to fire and the other to reserve his fire until the Indian ran up as before. By the new arrangement, the Indians were made to suffer so severely that they began to give way, when Major Watts, coming up with a reinforcement, reanimated their drooping courage, and the fight began anew. The fresh troops had many of them been recognized by the patriots as refugees from their own neighborhood, and as the parties faced each other, all the mutual resentment and personal hate which civil strife engendered nerved their arms and flashed from their eyes. They leaped upon each other like wild beasts, and foot to foot and hand to hand, they fought with muskets, clubbed, or stabbed each other with their knives, sometimes literally dying in each other's embrace.

A firing was now heard in the direction of the fort. It was the sortie, which had been planned and arranged during the storm, and as soon as it had broke away, had been executed with signal effect by a detachment under Colonel Willett. Gansevoort had noticed, in the morning, bodies of troops moving down the river, but was not apprised of their destination until the arrival of General Herkimer's messenger. The firing in the direction of Oriskany warned him of the latter's danger, and as soon as possible the sortie was made. It was gallantly executed, and Willett succeeded in defeating the troops opposed to him and in returning to the fort with twenty-one wagon loads of spoils, without the loss of a man.

The sound of musketry in the direction of the fort was a welcome sound to the Provincials, and a source of wonder to their opponents. The latter took advantage of it, however, to attempt a ruse de guerre, which had nearly proved successful. A portion of Butler's Rangers were disguised to resemble American troops, and were made to approach from the direction of the fort. Lieut. Jacob Sammons, perceiving that their hats were American, shouted to Captain Gardinier that reinforcements were coming up from the fort. The captain was not so easily deceived, and immediately replied, "Not so; they are enemies: don't you see their green coats?" They continued to advance, and one of Gardinier's men, seeing an acquaintance in their ranks, rushed forward and offered his hand in token of friendship. It was immediately seized with no friendly gripe, and the too credulous patriot was informed that he was a prisoner. He did not yield without a struggle; and Captain Gardinier, who had watched the action and its result, sprang forward, and with one blow of his spear, levelled the captor and liberated his man. The gallant captain was immediately set upon by three of the disguised Greens, and one of his spurs becoming entangled in their clothes, he was thrown to the ground. Still contending, however, with almost superhuman strength, both his thighs were transfixed to the earth by the bayonets of two of his assailants, while the third made a thrust to run him through the body. Seizing this bayonet with both hands, he drew its owner down upon himself, and held him there as a shield against the stabs of the others, until one of his own men, perceiving the struggle, rushed to his rescue. As the assailants turned upon their new adversary, Gardinier seized his spear, which lay at his side, and buried it deep in the side of his assailant, who immediately expired. He proved to be Lieut. McDonald, one of the loyalist officers from Tryon county. During this struggle, some of Gardinier's men called to him, "For God's sake, captain, you are killing your own men!" "They are not our men," he replied; "they are the enemy. Fire away!" A deadly fire from the Provincials ensued, from the effects of which more than thirty of the Greens fell, and many of the Indian warriors. Perceiving that their numbers were rapidly becoming thinned by the determined and desperate defence of the patriots, the Indians at length raised the retreating cry, "Oonah! oonah!" and fled in every direction, followed by the shouts and huzzas of the Americans, and a shower of bullets. The Greens and Rangers, finding their allies deserting them, and discovering from the firing at the fort that their presence was needed elsewhere, retreated precipitately, leaving the field in possession of the brave Tryon county militia.

Thus terminated the most severe and, for the numbers engaged, the bloodiest battle of the revolutionary struggle. Though victorious, the Provincials had lost nearly one-third of their number in killed and wounded. The field presented a sight shocking to behold. The Indians and white men were mingled in confused groups; in many instances with their left hand clenched in each other's hair, while in their right they still grasped the knife or tomahawk which had inflicted the death wound, and "thus they lay frowning." The Indians had taken many prisoners, upon whom they afterwards wreaked their vengeance in the usual mode of torture at the stake. Colonel Paris, who had impugned his commander's courage in the morning, was among the number. Major John Frey was also wounded and taken, and as an evidence of the more than savage fury that burned in the bosoms of the contending parties on this occasion, it is stated that his brother, who was an officer in the British service, when he saw him brought in, attempted to take his life, and he was only saved by the interposition of others.

Retaining possession of the field, the survivors immediately commenced the work of collecting and removing the wounded. Among these was the commanding general, who, notwithstanding the painful nature of his wound, had remained seated upon his saddle during the six hours which the battle lasted, calmly smoking his pipe and delivering his orders. He was placed upon a rude litter, made by slinging a blanket between two poles, and in this manner, was removed to his residence at Little Falls, on the Mohawk, where he died ten days after from an extraordinary flow of blood, caused by the unskillful amputation of his wounded limb. Congress voted him a monument, but like many similar votes, it was never carried into execution. Eighty years have since rolled away, and the journal of Congress is the only monument and the resolution the only inscription which testify the gratitude of the republic to General Nicholas Herkimer.

Napoleon once said, rather irreverently, of his father-in-law, the Emperor of Austria, "Francis is an old granny." Some friend repeated the remark to Maria Louisa. The empress sought an explanation from Talleyrand. "Monsieur Talleyrand, what does that mean—an old granny?" The cunning diplomatist, more polite than conscientious, answered, with his most serious air, "It means, madame,—it means a venerable sage."—Life of Talleyrand.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BATTLE OF KING'S MOUNTAIN.

BY "NEUTRAL TINT."

[See Engraving on page 281.]

Scarcely had the settlements on the Watauga witnessed such a vast assemblage of fighting men as was seen at Sycamore Shoals on the morning of the 25th of September, 1780. Every station, fort and cabin had sent its garrison to the meeting, and from the mountains on the east to the far distant settlements on the Columbia, not a solitary rifleman remained at his own home on that day. The scene presented to the eye was one of bustling activity and intense interest. Gathered in groups around several prominent individuals who seemed to possess authority, or actively engaged in various duties which betokened a distant expedition, a thousand men, of various ages, from the sturdy youth of sixteen to the gray-headed but still athletic man of seventy, were preparing to risk their lives in battle for their country, their families, and their hearthstones. The cause of their assembling and the results thereof are matters of history. Let us turn to the chronicles.

The defeat of Gates at Camden, and the subsequent surprise of Sumter at Fishing Creek, seemed to crush out the last hope of successful resistance at the South toward the close of the year 1780. The fall of Savannah, the capitulation of Charleston, and the capture of the entire southern army under General Lincoln; the massacre of Buford's corps by Tarleton, the utter dispersion of Sumter's men, added to the complete rout of Gates at the head of a second southern army, left no prospect but that of subjugation and submission. No ray of light pierced the dark and portentous cloud which lowered over the devoted State of South Carolina, and threatened her sister States of North Carolina and Virginia. The conqueror sat quietly in Camden, counting his spoils and arranging his plans for following up his successes, while his partisan officers were scouring the country in every direction, encouraging the Tories and reducing the Whigs to submission. British power seemed firmly established at the South, and detachments from the many posts scattered throughout the country were ranging far and wide, laying waste the property of the Whigs, and rioting in the proceeds of their unresisted forays.

Having despatched his prisoners to Charleston, inquired into and improved the condition of his various posts, and established civil government in South Carolina, Cornwallis prepared to take up his march through North Carolina and Virginia. Previous to doing so, he despatched Major Ferguson, at the head of a detachment of regulars and Tories, to embody the loyalists beyond the Wateree and Broad Rivers; intercept the mountain men who were retreating from Camden, and after scouring the upper part of the State near the mountains, to rejoin his command at Charlotte. Rebellion was becoming rife in that section of country, and taking cue from his commander, Ferguson adopted the most stringent measures to subvert it, and reduce the inhabitants to a proper sense of their allegiance to the king. The Tories, who made up much the larger portion of his command, now that they had little to fear from the rebels, gave vent to their rancorous feelings of hate, and his march was one constant succession of outrage, riot, rapine and murder. Without meeting with opposition, he had advanced as far as Gilbert town, on the borders of the present State of Tennessee. He had approached the lion's lair, and a sullen growl, rolling in startling echoes down the sides of the Blue Ridge, warned him of danger, for westward of those mountains, in what was then called the Watauga settlement, most of the families of the Whigs who were fighting the battles of their country, or had been driven from their homes in other sections, were deposited. This had been considered a place of safety and a dejeuner resort, for the mountains were supposed to interpose an insurmountable barrier to incursions from the east, and it was the outpost of civilization westward. Surrounded and hemmed in by warlike tribes of Indians, the hardy inhabitants had been forced to contend inch by inch for the soil they cultivated, every foot of which had been watered with their blood and witnessed their bravery. Their lives were a continued scene of battle and adventure, to which they had become so accustomed and inured as to make it second nature; they were the true "hunting shirts," men sans peur et sans reproche; whose hearts were as open to the cry of suffering humanity as they were free from taint of cowardice. Notwithstanding they had taken frequent part in battling with the British legions, the war for independence had been as yet afar off; but now it was brought to their own doors, and the safety of their homes, their wives and children, everything which man holds dear, roused them to a sense of danger, and they prepared to beat back the invader. Ferguson had heard of their rising, and parolling two mountain men whom he had captured, he bade them go home and tell their officers that if they did not cease opposition to the king and take protection under his flag, he would march over the mountains, hang their leaders, burn their homes, and lay waste their country.

Ferguson was at the head of an army of over one thousand men, to which he was receiving constant additions, and he began to feel strong, but he had little knowledge of the men to whom he had sent this threatening message. Shelby, Sevier, McDowell and Campbell were not likely to be dismayed at the bombast of the British leader, but on the contrary it added fuel to the flame of their vengeful hatred towards him on account of the many acts of cruelty which had been committed by the forces under his command. Shelby and Sevier were the leaders of the mountain men. McDowell had battled with the British forces until defeat and disaster had driven him across the Blue Ridge, together with many of his adherents, to seek safety with the hardy mountaineers. Campbell commanded a regiment of Virginians, and was a brave and active partisan. The movement against Ferguson had its origin with the two first named officers, and a correspondence with other leaders had resulted in the assemblage at the Sycamore Shoals, where were concentrated the entire adult male population of what is now the State of Tennessee, except the distant settlement of Columbia on the Mississippi. Only a small portion of that assembly could expect to take part in the proposed enterprise, yet all had come up to the rendezvous. The vigorous and athletic came to offer their services in defence of their homes, while the older and weaker ones came to counsel their younger friends, receive instructions from the leaders for cases of emergency during their absence, and to bring the products of their clearings for the outfit of the expedition. Everything they had, whether the horse from the plow, the corn from the bin, or the rifle from the stocks on the wall, it was cheerfully and freely offered for the common cause. Scarcely has an army whose personnel was so perfect, been gathered together. They were all volunteer riflemen, acknowledging no authority except that of their self-elected leaders, and yet as docile and obedient as the more servile mercenaries of Europe, because it was the obedience of perfect confidence in those under whom they had fought in many a well-contested battle. They were all, from the youth of sixteen to the veteran of fifty battles, strong, athletic, bold, enterprising, courageous and enthusiastic. Every man was picked, and when the little army took up its line of march on the morning after its assembling at Sycamore Shoals, it presented a sight calculated to excite admiration in the breast of the patriot, and strike dread consternation in the bosom of its enemies. There were no costly trappings, or equipments, but all were clad in the homespun hunting-shirt, made by the hands of wife, mother or sister, which, together with the leggings, were trimmed with fringe, or, as was more often the case with the older ones, with long straight hair, which had once graced the head of some Cherokee or Choctaw warrior. This was a badge of service, and indicated the older and more experienced hunter, who was looked upon by his younger comrades almost with an envious eye, as the new recruit may be supposed to look upon the gaudy shoulder-knot of his superior officer. Each was armed with a tomahawk, scalping-knife, and rifle. They were all mounted and equipped with a blanket, knapsack, shot-pouch and powder-horn.

After a solemn and appropriate prayer by a clergyman present, in which the cause and the army were commended to divine protection and guidance, they bade farewell to their relatives, neighbors and friends, and commenced their march in pursuit of the enemy who had threatened to "burn their homes, lay waste their country and hang their leaders." No extensive commissariat impeded the rapidity of their movements, but as in all their Indian campaigns, each man depended upon his trusty rifle to supply him with the necessary provisions, and at night the starry-decked heavens formed the only tent they knew. After getting into the settlements on the other side of the mountains, they forayed upon the Tories, who had long revelled in the spoils which they had wrung from their Whig neighbors.

Ferguson, having become alarmed by the avalanche which was preparing to launch itself upon him from the mountains, despatched couriers to Lord Cornwallis, informing him of his critical danger, and, after calling upon and beseeching the Tories to join his ranks and assist him in driving back this "horde of miscreants, and set of mongrels," he beat a hasty retreat, endeavoring to elude the mountain men until he could gather a larger force or receive reinforcements. The Tories, however, knew too well the character of the force which was gathering like a cloud in the heavens, to risk their persons in the conflict which was approaching, and they preferred to shelter themselves from view rather than contend with the invincible mountaineers with their trusty rifles, death-dealing tomahawks and scalping knives. Every step which he took betokened the fear which had seized upon the British officer as he contemplated the gathering of the storm-cloud which was muttering its sullen thunders from the adjacent hilltops.

After leaving Gilbert town, Ferguson marched to the Cowpens, thence to Dear's Ferry, and on the sixth of October he moved forward some fourteen miles, and encamped upon an eminence where he considered himself safe from attack, and here he awaited the gathering of the loyalist militia and the reinforcements for which he had sent. Meantime, the first sign of retreat on his part had aroused the Whigs, and when the mountain men came down into the valleys they found various parties waiting to join their ranks. Officers with men, officers without men, and men without officers were continually coming in, some on foot, some mounted, some armed, some unarmed, but all eager to find and fight the common enemy.

There being no one of the superior officers who could claim the right to command, it was thought advisable to send to head quarters for a general officer, and Colonel McDowell started for the purpose. On his way he fell in with Colonel James Williams from South Carolina, with upwards of four hundred men. These were at once sent to the camp and an express forwarded to inform the chiefs of their coming.

Colonel Shelby opposed the sending for a general officer on account of the delay which would be caused thereby, arguing, that now that they were within striking distance of the enemy, it would be folly to afford him any respite, whereby he could concentrate his forces or receive reinforcements. He urged the necessity of pushing forward with the best men, in pursuit of the retreating foe, and striking him while he was yet unprepared for the contest. This counsel was happily adopted, and the next morning at break of day, nine hundred and ten of the most expert marksmen were selected and pushed forward on the trail. They had but one object in view—the destruction of Ferguson and his army. Such was the eagerness of the pursuit that for the last thirty-six hours they halted but an hour for rest and refreshment.

The trail became hourly more fresh, and they hurried on with the utmost vigor. As they approached the camp of Ferguson, the advanced guard met two unarmed men of whom they learned the precise position of the enemy's forces, and also that he was preparing to retreat the next morning to join Cornwallis. When within a mile of the camp, an express rider was captured, the ink on whose despatches was scarcely dry. They contained an urgent appeal to Cornwallis for aid, and a statement of the force under his command. A council of war was held, and it was decided to march forward and decide the issue without further rest or refreshment. One half of the troops were to march around the base of the mountain until they met the rest of the troops encircling it on the other side, when all were to give the Indian war-whoop and rush forward against the foe. After dismounting and securing their horses, with whom they left a small guard, the troops moved forward to their respective positions. Sevier, Shelby, Campbell, McDowell and Winston, with the men under their command, marched to surround the camp, while the forces of Williams, Chronicle, Hainbright and Cleveland prepared at the given signal to attack in front and on the left. The first mentioned column, in marching off, discovered a gap in the mountain through which they concluded to pass, and in doing so they drew the fire of the enemy, which wounded some of the men, and McDowell and Shelby returned it. Campbell, Shelby and McDowell now ascended the hill and poured in a destructive fire upon the left of the enemy's line. This attracted the attention of Ferguson, who despatched Dupoirer, his second in command, with the regulars to that point, and a brisk charge of the bayonet drove the Americans to the foot of the hill. The left, under Hainbright, Chronicle, Cleveland and Williams, hearing the firing, drove in the enemy's pickets and ascended the mountain, where they were met by a portion of the regulars, protected in a measure by their wagons and some slight breastworks, and commanded by Ferguson in person. The contest here became severe, and Dupoirer was recalled from the left and ordered to charge the Americans with the bayonet, which he did with effect, driving them nearly to the foot of the hill. As he did so, however, he received a galling fire from those riflemen who were ascending in front, which thinned his ranks considerably. A rush was made, and the Tory riflemen who were stationed here suffered severely at the hands of their embittered and determined foe. The Americans had now completely surrounded the camp, and poured in a deadly fire on all sides. Sevier and Winston, taking advantage of ravines which penetrated the rear of the mountain, were enabled to bring their men up nearly to the crest before they were observed. As the head of the column reached a level space in the rear of the British troops they received a severe fire, but the riflemen allowed their foe no opportunity to reload, but delivering a well directed and deadly fire from their unerring rifles, rushed to close quarters with their knives and tomahawks. The regulars were entirely unused to this mode of attack; the line began to waver, and was only prevented from breaking by constant reinforcements, with which Ferguson endeavored to keep his column intact. But by thus drawing off his forces from other points, Shelby, Campbell and the other officers were enabled to reach and hold their position upon the crest of the mountain.

Although completely surrounded and in the midst of a fire from all directions, the enemy fought bravely and with a determination to conquer. Ferguson was ever in the hottest of the engagement. A shrill-sounding whistle he carried in his wounded hand was a signal recognized by his men, and was of immense service in inspiring them with confidence in his presence and desperate courage. The Americans kept gaining ground, and thinning the ranks of the regulars with their death-dealing rifles. Ferguson ordered his cavalry to mount, intending to make a desperate charge at their head, but as fast as they mounted their horses they were brought down by the sharpshooters, and this was abandoned. The Tories were ordered to fit the handles of their knives to their rifles, and with the number of his bayonets thus increased he hoped to drive back his antagonists. But this advantage was but temporary, and it soon became evident to all but Ferguson that the day was lost. The Tories raised a white flag in token of surrender, but he rode up and cut it down. Another was raised in another part of the camp, and this he also pulled down. His indomitable energy and determination was a theme of praise to the mountain men, but his death was a necessary prelude to victory, and a shot from the rifle of one of Shelby's men brought him to the ground in the agonies of death. Dupoirer, on whom the command now devolved, finding further resistance worse than useless, raised a white flag, and the firing of the Americans ceased in a great measure. The cessation, however, was not complete. Some of the younger men did not know the meaning of a white flag; similar flags had been raised and again lowered. Shelby called to the enemy to throw down their arms, as all would understand that as a token of surrender. This was done and the work of carnage ceased.

The battle of King's Mountain lasted about an hour. The loss of the enemy was two hundred and twenty-five killed, one hundred and eighty wounded, seven hundred prisoners, besides fifteen hundred stand of arms, a great many horses and wagons, loaded with supplies and booty of every kind, taken by the Tories in their plundering forays. The loss of the Americans was, on the contrary, only thirty-five killed and about seventy wounded. Not one of the enemy escaped from the field. At morning dawn, the victors with their prisoners began their return march, which, being in the vicinity of large parties of Tories, they pressed rapidly. At Bickertall's field, in Rutherford county, they halted. A court-martial was held, and some for desertion, and others for greater crimes, were sentenced to be hung, though only nine suffered the penalty; the others were respited. The victorious troops then separated all to their respective homes.

HON. JOHN W. FORNEY.

HON. JOHN W. FORNEY.

Herewith we present our readers with an uncommonly correct and spirited likeness of Col. J. W. Forney of Pennsylvania, the master-spirit in the late momentous national contest which resulted in the election of James Buchanan to the presidency. He is emphatically the representative of Young America in the large and generous sense of the term, being bold, prompt and decisive in action, upright, true and manly in character, with a pervading sentiment of assimilating and absorbing nationality. The subject of our sketch is of medium height, with good breadth and depth of chest, of athletic, muscular development, with a fine, free head, well set upon the bust. Of fair complexion, light-brown hair, clear, steady blue eyes, his whole appearance is prepossessing and invites confidence. A practical observer would readily select this man among a crowd of strangers as one well fitted for prompt, vigorous and effective intellectual action, and upon hearing the voice would find confirmation of his first impressions. Col. Forney's voice is full, deep, and of a pleasing tone; his enunciation clear and ready; his command and choice of language admirable; and hence his oratory, enforced by the easy play of his expressive features, and his natural and graceful gesticulation, is quite effective. Col. Forney is still young, not having as yet completed his fortieth year. He was born at Lancaster, Pennsylvania, September 30, 1817, and was quite early in life thrown upon his own resources to obtain a livelihood. His father died when John was but eight years of age, and not long after he was taken from school and placed as an apprentice to learn the printing trade in the office of the Lancaster Journal, at that time under the charge of Mr. Hugh Maxwell. Thus, like many another smart man, he was indebted to the printing-office for his early education, for he never attended school for a day after the age of eleven. And yet for vigor and purity of style, power of expression and facility of composition, there are few public writers who surpass the subject of this notice. While working in Mr. Maxwell's office, and at the early age of sixteen, young Forney tried his hand at editorial articles, and with such good success that many of them were accepted by his employer and were published in the Journal. In 1837, when only nineteen years of age, he became joint proprietor and editor of another paper, published at Lancaster, called the Intelligencer, and in this establishment performed at the same time the three-fold duty of editor, compositor and pressman. Instances of this triple service are not rare among the professors of the "art preservative of arts," but seldom do we find one in a person so young; and it may be taken as a sure sign of a native energy of character and indomitable will. After conducting the Intelligencer for five years, Mr. Forney obtained possession of the Journal also, and united the two papers in one, which he published under the title of the Intelligencer and Journal, for a period of five years, when he removed to the city of Philadelphia, and became editor and proprietor of the Pennsylvania, which paper he edited with signal ability and power for a period of seven years, fully meeting the most sanguine expectations of his political friends who had witnessed the development of his talents while engaged in the Lancaster papers. The labors of Col. Forney in these several political journals were employed during some of the most exciting and sharply defined contests in Pennsylvania politics, and while he ever did gallant service in the foreground of the battle, his candor and fairness towards his opponents won for him the respect of those who quailed beneath his blows. In the year 1851, Mr. Forney was honored with the distinguished and responsible position of clerk of the national house of representatives. Upon this he removed to Washington city, and while discharging the duties of this office, continued to edit the Pennsylvania, for a period of two years. In 1853 he was again chosen to the clerkship of the House, and during both terms of office he discharged the arduous and important duties so promptly and faithfully as to win high commendations from men of all parties. At the commencement of the last Congress, Col. Forney, as clerk, presided over the House during the protracted struggle which resulted in the election of Banks as speaker, and he won the esteem and respect of all parties by the dignity and impartiality of his course, so much so that a resolution of thanks was moved by Mr. Stanton, an abolition member from Ohio, and passed unanimously by the House. During the time that he was clerk of the House, he assumed the editorial charge of the Washington Union, then owned by Gen. Armstrong, and conducted that national organ of the democracy with eminent talent for a period of about four years, embracing the greater part Gen. Pierce's administration. His early and constant attachment to Mr. Buchanan led him to abandon the Union upon the nomination of that gentleman as the democratic candidate for the presidency, and to devote himself with all the energy of his nature and all the powers of his well-trained and disciplined mind, to the work of ensuring the election of his favorite candidate. The nomination of Mr. Buchanan had long been a cherished object with Col. Forney, and in all the positions in which he was placed, and amid all the influences which he controlled, he never lost sight of this leading idea. As a Pennsylvanian he cherished it as a matter of State pride; as a friend to the early patron of his career, he sought it from motives of gratitude; as a patriot, he was eager to place at the helm of the ship of state one whom he sincerely believed, from his statesmanship and experience, to be eminently fitted to control it. Probably no man rejoiced more sincerely in the result of the arduous battle than John W. Forney of Pennsylvania. He had thrown his whole soul into the contest, and he enjoyed the triumph. As lookers on, pledged to strict neutrality, we have observed with satisfaction that even this virulent struggle, the result of which was a cruel disappointment to two antagonistic parties, was followed by that quiet acquiescence which marks the operation of our political system.

SPECIE VAULT OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

In the accompanying engraving we give our readers a glimpse of the famous vault of the Bank of England, a treasury which, if it does not contain "antold gold,"—for every fraction of an ounce is weighed and accounted for,—is yet nearly as rich as the cave of Aladdin. Here we see piles of strong boxes full of the precious metal, and fat bags bursting with a plethora of guineas—clerks weighing the golden ore, and laborers piling up the costly bullion. It is a scene fit to craze a miser's heart. Money, according to the old proverb, "is the root of all evil;" but, if we take the trouble to endeavor to arrive at a reasonable estimate of the value of money, we shall speedily find the very reverse to be the fact. Money is merely an agent in the business transactions of life, and upon its judicious use depend the benefits or injuries that result from its management. In times not very remote, every man was his own banker, and the consequence was, that those who had a surplus capital strove to increase it, not through the ordinary channels of industry, but at the expense of the necessities or ambition of others; hence usury arose, and mammon-worship was greeted as an established institution. As money—the representative of accumulations—increased, hoarding commenced, and then was originated that system of borrowing and lending, which, we doubt not, gave currency to the popular saying that the possession of money created more mischief than good. As mankind, however, progressed in knowledge, money came to be recognized as an element of progress and civilization, and its disposition was elevated to the rank of an economical science. In a short time the association of persons who were in the possession of capital led to banking, that is, the creation of a large fund to accommodate the necessities of commerce, and provide a commercial guarantee for contingencies; and thus, from small beginnings, there was gradually developed that splendid institution whose machinery works alike for empires, monarchs, aristocrats, merchants, and every member of the industrial commonwealth. Banking, as understood in the modern sense, was first established in Lombardy, hence the arms of that country, the three golden balls over pawn-brokers' doors; and in its primitive state, was a system of deposit and loan; but as governments and corporations began to recognize its adaptability to great undertakings, it, in process of time, expanded to the dimensions of a centralized organization for the facilitation of all transactions of which money was the token or the symbol. States, to whom credit is an essential requisite, instinctively appreciated its utility, and thus there arose throughout Europe those wealthy houses and corporations, the history of which was almost the history of the respective countries to which they belong. England, upon starting upon her career of commerce, clearly saw the advantages to be derived from combined monetary operation; and when her colonial policy had begun to be pursued with enterprise and vigor, she gladly adopted, on an extended scale, the co-operative principle which had been found to work so prosperously in Italy and Germany. The Bank of England, originally started in 1694, has stood many severe trials. In times of peril, when the chancellor of the exchequer has not had a single penny to draw upon, the Bank of England has come forward with abundance of material, and enabled successive governments to convince the enemies of England that both men and money were in sufficient abundance to overcome any designs upon the liberties of the country. Successive wars added to national indebtedness, and, as the head of all other institutions, the Bank of England became the responsible agent to manage that huge encumbrance called "The National Debt." Some sixteen years prior to the establishment of the Bank of England—namely, in 1678—it was proposed to start what was termed a "large model" of a bank; other similar banks were in embryo. After much trouble and difficulty, a "bank of credit" was opened at Devonshire House, in Bishopsgate Street, and the directors advanced money freely to tradesmen and manufacturers. In 1720 commenced the South Sea and other schemes, which threatened to destroy public confidence and general prosperity. These schemes were exceedingly perplexing to the government of the times—money could only be obtained through corporate bodies—and William Paterson, the founder of the Bank of England, said that "its erection not only relieved the ministerial managers from their frequent processions into the city, for the borrowing of money on the best and newest public securities, at ten or twelve per cent. per annum, but it likewise gave life and currency to double or treble the value of its capital in other branches of public credit." Stroog, however, was the opposition to a plan which threatened to destroy the profits of the usurer; but the public nobly supported the projectors, and eventually a law was passed authorizing the raising of £1,200,000 by subscription, as the capital of the bank. The act stated that no one person was to subscribe more than £20,000, and that the whole capital was to be lent to the government, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, together with £4000 for management. Thus it would appear that the formation of the Bank of England arose chiefly out of the necessities of the state. The bank first commenced its operations in Mercer's Hall, with about fifty clerks, and the effect of its formation was speedily felt by a reduction of interest out of doors. In 1709, the bank was placed in a position of considerable danger, arising from circumstances which, in the present time, would be considered of trifling importance. In his "History of the Bank of England," Mr. Francis thus describes them: "One Dr. Henry Sacheverell, an apostate whig, was appointed to preach the annual sermon at St. Paul's before the lord mayor and the court of aldermen. The sermon was used as an engine of attack upon some of the members of her majesty's government. Among others, the lord treasurer was characterized as volpone. The measureless impudence of the preacher attracted attention, and Sir Gilbert Heathcote, a director of the Bank of England, and a wise man in his generation, protested against it, nor did the city authorities make the ordinary request to have it published. But as publicity was the doctor's object, and the truth of no importance, he pretended that Garrard, the lord mayor, had desired him to print it; and to him he dedicated it, with an inflammatory epistle. He was arrested and impeached, in revenge for the liberties he had taken with government. The populace chose to support the divine, and London became a scene of confusion, and a bodyguard of London butchers accompanied him to his trial, at Westminster Hall. The directors of the bank took active measures of defence, and by their firmness, together with a strong military support, were enabled to save the bank from pillage."

THE SPECIE VAULT OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AMATECA.—The expressions "brilliant burin" and "soft burin" are used to characterize the style of an engraving—the burin, or graver, being an instrument of tempered steel used for engraving on copper and steel.

SCHOOLMASTER WANTED.—The village doctor who inscribed on his sign "I cures a goose, my wife cures the ganders," is supposed to have meant, "I cure agues, my wife cures the jaundice."

COMPLIMENTARY.—The officers of the Boston Custom House presented a splendid silver tea service to Hon. Charles H. Peaslee, the retiring collector.

SPLINTERS.

.... A regatta is talked of between one of the Harvard College 9188-1248.

We have reached the third month of spring, the most welcome, perhaps, in the whole year. Most nations, we believe,

"—rise up early to observe
The rite of May."

In England, the in-coming of May has long been a time of merry-making, and so it is in "La Belle France." In the journal of Charles VI., who commenced his reign in 1380, it is mentioned that the "May" planted each year at the palace gate was cut from the Bois de Boulogne, where the sovereigns of the first race, when they dwelt in the palace of Clichy, used to hunt. In 1449, the fraternity of master goldsmiths of Paris agreed to present annually a "May" or May-bough to the Virgin before the principal door of the church of Notre Dame. They elected a prince for one year only, who was to settle the expenses of the "May."

Olaus Magnus, who wrote in the 16th century, relates a curious May-day custom of the southern Swedes and Goths. He states that they appointed two horse-troops, composed of vigorous and active young men. "One of these is led on by a captain, chosen by lot, who has the name and habit of Winter. He is clothed with divers skins, and armed with fire-forks; and casting about snow-balls and pieces of ice, that he may prolong the cold, he rides up and down in triumph, and he shows and makes himself the hurler, the more the icicles seem to hang from their staves(?). The chief captain of the other troop is for Summer, and is called Captain Florio, and is clothed with green boughs and leaves, and summer garments that are not very strong. Both these ride from the fields into the city, from divers places, one after another, and with their fire spears they fight, and make a public show, that summer hath conquered winter. Both sides striving to get the victory, that side more forcibly assaults the other which on that day seems to borrow more force from the air, whether temperate or sharp. If the winter yet breathes frost, they lay aside their spears, and, riding up and down, cast about upon the spectators ashes mingled with live sparks of fire taken from the graves, or from the altar; and they who are in the same dress and habit as auxiliary troops, cast fire-balls from their horses. Summer, with his hand of horse, shows openly his boughs of birch, or yew-tree, which are made green long before by art, as by the heat of their stoves or watering them, and privately brought in as if they newly came from the wood. But, because nature is thus defrauded, those that fight for winter press on the more, that the victory may not be got by fraud; yet the sentence is given for summer by the favorable judgment of the people, who are unwilling to endure the sharp rigor of winter any longer; and so summer gets the victory with the general applause of them all, and he makes a gallant feast for his company, and confirms it by drinking cups, which he could scarcely win with spears."

Olaus Magnus calls this quaint sport "the custom of driving away the winter and receiving of summer." A volume might be filled with the quaint May-day observances of different people and localities.

THE PHANTOM OF THE SEA:

—OR, THE—

RED CROSS AND THE CRESCENT.

A Story of Boston Bay and the Mediterranean.

BY FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

In "The Flag of our Union," for this week, we commence a brilliant novelette, written expressly for us, thus entitled, from the pen of this experienced and favorite author. The story combines in itself the best land and sea tale we have yet published, with a charmingly original plot, the denouement of which it will be impossible for the reader to anticipate. In the same number, we shall complete the admirable story of the "Tiger Hunter." The new story will be illustrated with original drawings each week, thus adding largely to its interest.

THE REASON WHY.

The reason why "Ballou's Dollar Monthly" has at once attained to such a large circulation (nearly 80,000 copies), is, first, because it is the cheapest magazine in the world; secondly, because it is so elegantly illustrated; thirdly, because, though running over with wit, humor and original tales, sketches and miscellaneous gems, it never contains one vulgar line or word; fourthly, because so much delightful home reading is given for the money, containing one hundred pages in each number; and fifthly, because it is adapted exactly to the popular taste. Our mail and cash books show a voluntary subscription, each day, of from one to two hundred new names,—an unmistakable evidence of the vast popularity this charming work is gaining. Enclose one dollar to us, and it will be sent for a whole year.

EDITORIAL COMFORTS.—The task of an editor is difficult enough. What is food for the politician is poison to the philanthropist, and what is calculated to please the gay or amuse the frivolous, will offend the sober sense and mature judgment of the man of thought and reflection. It is hard for an editor to keep out of hot water.

SOMETHING NEW.—Have you seen that "bright particular" star, "The Weekly Novelette?" It was an original idea to publish such a paper, and it "takes" with the public amazingly. For sale everywhere for FOUR CENTS per copy.

BEAUTY.—No sensible man ever thought a beautiful wife was worth as much as one who would make a good pudding. Handsome is that handsome does.

"FIVE FEATHERS MAKE FIVE BIRDS."

This popular axiom is pretty generally acted on; and so universal is the belief that splendid attire confers dignity, that men and women will dress fine in season and out of season. Calico associations, we are afraid, are not destined to take root in this country. In the last century, the eccentric durbess of Queensberry used to show her contempt of fine dressing in a very peculiar manner. When in Scotland, she always appeared in the garb of a peasant girl. One evening some country ladies paid her a visit, tricked out in their best brocades. Her grace proposed a walk, and they were under the necessity of trooping off in all their finery. At last the durbess, pretending to be tired, sat down upon a heap of dirt at the end of a farm-house, saying, "I've, ladies, be seated." They stood so much in awe of her, that they dared not refuse an invitation which might be construed into a command, and she had the exquisite satisfaction of spoiling all their silks and satins. Of course, the way their tongues rattled at her grace's expense, when they were freed from the restraint of her presence, must have been terrific.

Her grace must have been a "nice woman for a small party," for, when she went out to an evening entertainment, and found a tea equipage paraded which she thought too fine for the rank of the owner, she contrived to upset the table and break the china. The forced entreaties of her hosts, "to think nothing of it," in reply to her hypocritical apologies, gave her the most exquisite delight. She carried her plain dealing and plain dressing to court. An order was issued forbidding the ladies to appear at the royal dressing-rooms in aprons. This was disregarded by the duchess, whose rustic costume would have been by no means complete without that article of dress. On approaching the entrance door, the lord in waiting stopped the duchess, and told her that he could not possibly give her admittance in that attire. Without a moment's hesitation, she stripped off the apron, threw it into his lordship's face, and walked into the brilliant circle in her brown gown and petticoat, which probably made as much sensation as Professor Mahan's black stock and yellow waistcoat at the court of Queen Victoria. But the Duchess of Queensberry was undoubtedly insane.

THE BATTLE-PIECES IN THIS NUMBER.—We desire the particular attention of our readers to the fine original pictures of the Battles of Oriskany and of King's Mountain, drawn expressly for us by our favorite artist, "Neutral Tim," and occupying pages 280 and 281. On pages 282 and 283, will be also found his minute descriptions of these events, for he has nearly as great a mastery over the pen as the pencil. We feel amply rewarded for the great cost of these pictures, by the pleasure we experience in presenting to the world such specimens of American art, exercised on national subjects. In spirit and grouping, these noble designs would do so discredit even to Vernet, the greatest battle-painter in the world.

CHess-PLAYING.—Good chess-players have always been held in high repute. Boi, of Syracuse, was an excellent chess-player, and on that account was patronized by Philip II. Pope Urban VIII. so admired his skill, that he offered him a bishopric. He was taken by corsairs and reduced to slavery; but he fascinated the Turks with his ability at chess, and ransomed himself by giving them lessons in the "noble game."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Dr. Stow, Mr. Martin L. Hall to Miss Josephine S. Goodwin; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. George Sault to Miss Mary Ann James; by Mr. H. K. May, Mr. George M. May to Miss Mary McKenney; by Mr. Lowell, Mr. Wm. Milnes to Mr. John H. Peck to Miss Sarah A. Bean; by Rev. Mr. Howe, Mr. John Nickerson to Miss Lydia Ann Dow; by Rev. Mr. Scandlin, Mr. George H. Barker to Miss Georgianna Perkins; by Rev. Dr. Randall, Mr. William Kendrick, Jr., to Mrs. Annie T. Nourse.—At Roxbury, by Rev. Mr. Thompson, Mr. E. M. Fowles to Miss Mary H. Worthington.—At North Reading, by Rev. Mr. Gullford, Mr. David G. Eaton to Miss Mary E. Butters.—At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Brooks, Mr. Aaron D. Neal to Miss Martha Abby Allen.—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Mills, Mr. Andrew S. Waters, Jr., to Miss Louisa C. Goldsmith, of Gaspee, N. H.—At Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Foster, Mr. Thomas Kimball, of Ipswich, to Miss Mary Elizabeth—At Gloucester, by Rev. Mr. Pierce, Mr. Edw. Burdette to Mrs. Eliza A. Tappan.—At Newburyport, by Rev. Mr. Vernum, Mr. Moses B. Jackson to Miss Almira N. Hunt.—At Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Dutton, Mr. Elbridge Pettis to Miss Sarah M. Worthington.—At Fitchburg, by Rev. Mr. Bruce, Mr. James H. Marvin to Miss Clara A. Thompson.—At Providence, R. I., by Rev. Mr. Boyden, Mr. James M. Jacobs, of Boston, to Miss Harriet C. Johnson.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. Shepherd Simonds, 76; Mr. Levi Deal, 76; Miss Sarah Berry, 74; Mrs. A. M. Barues, 51; Mr. Charles Scott, 35; Mr. Matthias P. Sawyer, 28; Mr. John Mack Gray, 27; Nana Sylvester, 27; Mrs. D. Jane Berry, 28; At East Boston, Mrs. Harriet Fowles, 77; At Charlestown, Mr. Charles Barton, 37; At Cambridge, Mr. William F. Stone, 73; At Roxbury, Mrs. Mary M. Darling, 51; At Dorchester, Mr. William C. Spalding, formerly of Newburyport, 41; At Lynn, Mrs. Almira Lewis, 52; At Salem, Mr. Nehemiah Andrews, 77; At Marblehead, Mrs. Ruth Dennis, 42; At Ipswich, Mr. Timothy Appleton, 78; At Newburyport, Mrs. Mary Salter, 82; At Norton, Mr. Benjamin Blanding, 75; At Burlington, Mrs. Mary Bennett, 99; At Leicester, Mr. Jonah Earle, 43; At North Rochester, Mrs. Priscilla C. Cannon, 64; At Springfield, Mr. James Guild, 75; At North Dartmouth, Mr. Lemuel Reed, a soldier of the Revolution, 33; At Woburnville, Mrs. Elvira H. Cole, 23; At Amherst, Mrs. E. O. Borden, 25; At Haverhill, Mr. Henry Cobb, 76; At New Bedford, Mr. Lemuel Gurnison, 57; At North Fairhaven, Mr. Jacob Collins, 83; At Nantucket, Mrs. Eunice Ellis, 75; At Portsmouth, Mr. N. H. Martin, Hall, 82; At Gilmanston, N. H., Mrs. Joanna S. Cogswell, widow of the late Rev. Dr. William Cogswell; At Augusta, Me., Capt. Asa Torner, 82.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                             |        |
|-----------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " ".....     | 10 00  |
| 10 " " ".....               | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the

*. * One copy of HALLOE'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SPRING.

BY FREDERICK FENTON.

'Tis morning. In the fair and glowing sky
The smiling sun invites the coming Spring
More quickly on, and o'er the landscape pours
A flood of golden light. From out the wood—
Which late was draped with winter, now o'erhangs
With a fine net of soft, unfolding green—
Sweet sounds of bird life on the liquid air
Come faintly forth. The hills rejoice, and on
The hazy summit of the mountain-top
Soft vapors lie, like spirits resting there;
To scatter flowers along its rocky breast,
And streams along its sides. In distant glades
The starry violet lifts its dewy head,
And lilies quiver in their own sweet breath,
And daisies blossom. Glittering rills break forth,
And over all—o'er lake, and glen, and wood—
Sweet Spring herself broods in the misty air,
And watches, though the gusty heavens be dark,
Or midnight deepens, still with loving eyes
Above her gentle mission thus begun,
To loose the earth from winter's icy thrall,
And spread a leafy path for queenly June.

MORNING.

See, the day begins to break,
And the light shoots like a streak
Of subtle fire; the wind blows cold,
While the morning dews unfold;
Now the birds begin to sing,
And the squirrel from the boughs
Leaps, to get him nuts and fruit;
The early lark, that erst was mute,
Carols to the rising day
Many a note and many a lay.—FLETCHER.

CARE.

Care that in cloisters only seals her eyes,
Which youth thinks folly, age and wisdom owns;
Poets, by not knowing her, outlive the wise:
She visits cities, but she dwells on thrones.—DAVENANT.

TEARS AND SMILES.

Weep, as if you thought of laughter!
Smile, as tears were coming after!
Marry your pleasures to your woes,
And think life's green well worth its rose.—MRS. BROWNING.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Crebillon, the French dramatic poet, in his last illness, expressed great regret that he should not live to finish the play he had in hand, having gone through two acts of it only. The physician who attended him, begged he would bequeath him the two acts. Crebillon turned to him with a smile, and repeated a line from one of the acts, "Say, shall the assassin be the dead man's heir?" "How few of us ever realize that there are two sides to every question! James the First, soon after his accession to the English throne, was present at the trial of a cause of some importance. After hearing the counsel for the plaintiff, the king was so perfectly satisfied, that he exclaimed, "Tis a plain case!" Then came the speech of the defendant's counsel, when the monarch rose and departed in a passion, saying, "They are all rogues alike." ".....Dr. Johnson, when speaking of a person who maintained there is no difference between virtue and vice, said, "Why, sir, if the fellow does not think as he speaks, he is lying—and I see not what honor he can propose to himself from having the character of a villain. But if he do really think that there is no distinction between virtue and vice, why, sir, when he leaves our house let us count our spoons." ".....The Tartars have a queer notion about the origin of earthquakes. They attribute them to the awkward attempts made by the frog who supports the globe to scratch himself! ".....When Miss Ellen Tree, now Mrs. Charles Kean, was visiting France some years ago, one of the custom-house officers was proceeding to search her trunk for contraband goods. "Contraband goods!" exclaimed a bystander. "Who ever heard of contraband goods in the trunk of a tree?" Of course the joke was lost on the French officials, but Miss Tree herself laughed till she cried. ".....Hogarth, the great artist-satirist of England, was inclined to merriment, even on the most trivial occasions. On one of his cards, requesting the company of a friend to dine with him, there was a circle, to which a knife and fork were the supporters; within the circle an invitation was written, and in the centre of it was drawn a pie. The invitation of the artist concluded with a play on three of the Greek letters—Eta, Beta, Pi (eat a bit of pie). ".....The eccentric Wm. Barrymore came late to the theatre one day, when he had to play one of the lazzaroni, in Macanille, and missed the key of his drawer. "If I lost it," said he, "I must have swallowed it!"—"Never mind," said poor Finn, coolly, "if you have, it will serve to open your chest." Barrymore never forgave him. ".....Br. Barrett, who translated Caesar's Commentaries, rendered the first sentence, "Omnis Gallia in tres partes divisa est (all Gaul is divided into three parts), by "All Gaul is quartered into three halves!" Of course the laugh was at the doctor's expense. ".....A carpenter in one of our country towns advertises that he will build houses as "cheap as any workman, and better than can be done." It strikes us that he is promising impossibilities. ".....In "Andrew's Anecdotes," we find a curious story about Cardinal Richelieu. He asserted one day among his courtiers, that out of any four different words he could extract matter enough to send any man to the dungeon. One of his attendants immediately wrote upon a card, "One and two make three."—"Three make only one!" exclaimed the cardinal. "It is blasphemous against the Holy Trinity. Away with him to the Bastille!" ".....The Old South Church, it is well-known, was turned into a riding-school by the British, in 1776. An article in the Military Journal says—"I went to see it—the pulpit and pews were removed, and the floor covered with earth for the exercise of the horses. An old citizen states that, in the entry of a house which belonged to Mrs. Gray, at the west end of the town, on a rainy forenoon, while Mrs. Gray was up stairs, she heard a great clattering below, and on inquiring what it meant, was answered by a British Hussar, that he and his horse had taken temporary shelter during the violent rain-storm!" ".....There are five requisites for a professed drunkard—and alas! there are many who make it a business—a face of brass, nerves of steel, lungs of leather, heart of stone, and an incurable liver. This is stock in trade. ".....Zerah Colburn, the famous American calculating boy, was once asked, in a bantering way, "If a pair of boots cost six dollars, what will a hat cost?" He answered readily, "Different prices," and immediately proposed a similar question. "If a bushel of corn cost six and a quarter cents, what will a cord of wood come to?"—"I don't know," said the gentleman. "It will come to ashes," said the boy. He rather had the joker. ".....Perhaps the very best definition of metaphysics was that given by a shrewd old Scotchman. "It is," said he, "two men talkin' together. He that's listenin' does na ken what he that's talkin' means; and he that's talkin' does na ken what he means himself." ".....Sydney Smith once observed, that the hop-grounds in Kent presented more extensive views than any other place in the world, for the prospect extended from pole to pole. ".....He that would gather the roses of matrimony should wed in the May of life. If you wish only the withered leaves and thorns, why put it off till September? ".....There is one part of the world where all the belles are diving-belles. The girls of the island of Ilimia, opposite Rhodes, are not permitted to marry by their relatives, till they have brought up from the sea a certain quantity of sponges, which abound on that part of the coast of Asia Minor, and before they can give proof of their ability by taking them from a certain depth. The young men must be even more expert. Divers couples are made happy every year. ".....There is no theory too absurd to find advocates. In 1799, Mr. Charles Palmer published a book entitled, "A Treatise on Heliography, satisfactorily demonstrating our great orb of light, the sun, to be absolutely no other than a body of ice." ".....Sir Robert Walpole was asked how it was possible for him to despatch such a variety of affairs? He replied, "By doing one at a time." ".....Never judge from manners," says Lord Byron. "I once had my pockets picked by the civillest gentleman I ever met with; and one of the wildest persons I ever saw was Ali Pacha." ".....The greatest relief that can be afforded to Ireland will be from draining," said a British orator. "Faith," retorted an Irish orator, "and hasn't poor old Ireland been drained enough already? If you'd drain our pockets less, and our bogs more, it would have been all the better." Pat is always ready for a repartee. ".....The most curious specimen of envy we ever heard of, was that exhibited by a New York alderman, now dead and gone. He was on the way to a civic turtle-feast at Hoboken, when he was encountered by a half-starved, half-naked beggar, who solicited charity. He looked at the applicant intently for a moment, and then burst out—"Confound you! I'd give ten dollars for your appetite!" ".....Young says, "More hearts pine away in secret anguish from unkindness from those who should be their comforters, than from any other calamity in life." ".....The Dogberrys are not all dead yet. In a provincial village of France, lately, a peasant brought a charge against his neighbor of having threatened to cut off his head on the first opportunity. The magistrate professed his disapprobation of the act, but declared that justice could not interfere with the party until the act had been committed. ".....When the governor of Rome delivered the sword into the hands of Trajan, and made him emperor, "Here," said the prince, "take it again. If I reign well, use it for me; if ill, use it against me." Thus making power subservient to virtue. How few princes of the present day would part with their swords on such terms! ".....Godwin says, "We not unfrequently meet with persons endowed with the most exquisite and delicious sensibility, whose minds seem almost of too fine a texture to encounter the vicissitudes of human affairs, to whom pleasure is transient, and disappointment is agony indescribable." ".....We begin to believe in spring. We have sat by an open window and heard the birds sing; we have detected a violet; have suspected the grass of being greenish, and so have come to the conclusion that there is such an institution as spring—even in New England. We retract all we have said to the contrary. ".....A chemist in Brussels, washing his hands, which were stained with wauluts, in water containing chloride of lime, was surprised to find the water became beautifully red. This may lead to important results. ".....Cicero speaks of a bronze statue of Hercules which had the features worn away by the frequent osculations of the devout. We have often wondered why this catastrophe didn't happen to the "first baby." ".....A favorite expression of poor David Crockett was, "I wish I may be shot!" Poor fellow! It was his fate to be shot, after all, at the Alamo. But the Texan Rangers took a bloody revenge for it, in the war with Mexico. ".....A modern writer observes, "that he who speaks lightly of female society, is either a ninny or a knave." We endorse the sentiment. To female society we owe the best impulses and actions of our lives. ".....Different people have different ways of expressing wrath and resentment. When anything went wrong with Lord Byron, he used to use language for which he rendered himself liable to a fine; in similar circumstances the ponderous Br. Johnson used to swallow oceans of tea, while Alfieri took the edge off his frantic passion by riding a wild colt. Few even of great men bear the little crosses of life with impunity. ".....It is mentioned as an illustration of the good nature and forbearance of the Philadelphians, that, at the opera-house, "a child squalled the whole evening, and nobody lost patience." The performance was "not in the bills." ".....Somebody writes us, that there is a jewsbarg in the Antiquarian Hall, at Worcester, presented by an association somewhere in Maine, which is two feet in length, and weighs more than a hundred pounds avoirdupois. Where is the man qualified to play it? ".....One of our New York State exchanges says, that two young ladies were recently committed to jail for the crime of horse-stealing—a truly delicate and feminine offence. ".....We have sometimes wished that all books were published anonymously—for critics generally judge of the book by the author, instead of judging the author by the book. ".....What a deal of wisdom there is contained in the following little sentence—a sermon on order in two lines: "The mind is like a trunk. If well-packed, it holds almost everything; if ill-packed, next to nothing." ".....That was a shrewd fellow who never saw a person do another a kindness with a view of ultimately benefiting himself, without thinking of the way people "fetch" a dry pump—they pour a little water down, in order to pump a large quantity up. ".....Macaulay has lately written a very appreciative biography of Oliver Goldsmith. He might have inserted the following anecdote—Goldsmith once boasted to Dr. Johnson of seeing a splendid copy of his poems in a nobleman's cabinet, adding, "this is mine!" The doctor mildly replied, that for his part, he would have been more disposed to indulge in self-gratulation, had he discovered his mental progeny thumbed and tattered in the cottage of a peasant—and he was right. ".....We are gratified at the growing taste for fine arts manifested throughout our country. The arts have this especial advantage, that they are conversant only with the ideal, the perfect, the very loftiest portions of our being. "....."I'll make you prove that," said a man to another, who had accused him of theft. "Don't," said a witty bystander, "for you'll feel worse after it than you do now." ".....Some people have a little idea of the variations of language, as the Chinese have of the proportions in perspective. "What a pity Miss A. has married such a very old man!" says one; "she is so young and so pretty, that the disparity seems all on one side."—"But then he is very witty," replied another; "he always begins conversation with a repartee."

BRAIN LABOR.

To many persons it seems a small thing to sit down and prepare matter for the periodical press; but let those inexperienced with the pen, and whose brains have never been trained to systematic labor, attempt to furnish intellectual food and recreation to their fellows, and they will soon realize that mental labor is the most destructive to health of all other toil. Were one to grub up the stumps out of the earth, or swing the sledge-hammer twelve hours a day, he would be able to stand the drudgery with less injury to the body and soul than half the number of hours devoted to mental employment, in the way of writing matter for the book or newspaper press. Those pithy articles which constantly appear in the periodicals of the day contain the very essence of mind or thought, and such literary gentlemen as are best at itemizing, are the first whose constitutions give way under their efforts and are broken down.—New York Sun.

Choice Miscellany.

DARING EQUESTRIAN FEAT.

One of the most venturesome and successful equestrian performances ever perhaps witnessed, took place at the Club House, in this city, recently, says the Kilkenny Journal. A number of gentlemen connected with the Kilkenny Hunt were assembled in the club-room, when a wager of one hundred sovereigns was offered by Sir John Courtney, of Ballyedmund, county Cork—a veteran sportsman, who has hunted over this county for the last forty years—that he would ride his gray hunter, then in stable, from the yard of the hotel, up the stairs into the club-room, and jump a fire-screen and two chairs within the latter. The bet was accepted by Messrs. Barnard and White, who were present. Sir John immediately, and notwithstanding the urgent remonstrances of his servant, who even wept in his dismay, proceeded to the yard, mounted, and rode up stairs. The beautiful training of the animal was the admiration of the large number of persons who witnessed the proceeding; he ascended the two flights of stairs without a single false step. Horse and rider then entered the club-room, in which a tolerably high fire-screen was placed upright between the backs of two chairs. The jump was to be taken across the breadth of the room, but it was accomplished in the most gallant style, notwithstanding the difficulty arising from the glare of the lamps and the want of sufficient vantage-room. Sir John Courtney then rode down stairs in the same way—a feat even more difficult than the ascent, inasmuch as the steps are sheathed with brass. Altogether, the boldness of the rider, and the docility and intelligence of the horse, have been rarely, if ever, equalled, and have formed the subject of unqualified praise amongst all who have been made acquainted with the facts.

CATCHING THE OSTRICH.

The most ingenious plan of leguiling the ostrich to its destruction, is that practised among the Bushmen, in Africa. A kind of flat donkey cushion is stuffed with straw, and formed something like a saddle. All except the under part of this is covered over with feathers attached to small pegs, and made so as to resemble the bird. The head and neck of an ostrich are stuffed, and a small rod introduced. The Bushman intending to attack game, whitens his legs with any substance he can procure. He places the feathered saddle on his shoulders, takes the bottom part of the neck in his right hand, and his bow and poisoned arrows in his left. Such as the author has seen were most perfect mimics of the ostrich, and at a few hundred yards distance it is not possible for the eye to detect the fraud. This "human" bird appears to pick away at the verdure, turning the head as if keeping a sharp lookout, shakes his feathers, now walks, and then trots till he gets within bow-shot; and when the flock runs, from one receiving an arrow, he runs, too. The male ostriches will, on some occasions, give chase to the strange bird, when he tries to elude them, in a way to prevent them from catching his scent; for when once they do, the spell is broken. Should one happen to get too near them in pursuit, he has only to run to windward, or throw off his saddle, to avoid a stroke from a wing, which would lay him prostrate.—African Sketches.

WALL-PAPER POISONING.

Dr. Hinds, of Birmingham, has lately called attention to a method of accidental arsenical poison, which should be generally known, and from which he was himself the sufferer. He chanced to select for the adornment of his study, a particularly bright-tinted wall-paper, the pattern of which was confined to two shades of green. About two days after it had been applied, he used the room in the evening, sitting there reading by gas-light. While thus engaged, he was seized with depression, nausea, abdominal pain and prostration. The same chain of symptoms ensued on every subsequent evening when he occupied the room. This led to an inquiry into the cause. He scraped off a little of the bright coloring matter from his pretty green paper, and by sublimation produced abundant crystals of arsenious acid. The paper was colored with arsenite of copper (Scheele's green). The use of this pigment to color wall-papers has already proved injurious in previous cases. In one, a child sucked some strips of paper thus colored, and narrowly escaped with life. Dr. Hinds remarks that the presence of the arsenical pigment may be recognized by its brilliant and beautiful hue, and by a little raising of the color at the edges of the patterns, as though it did not take freely to the paper.—The Lancet.

New Publications.

LONGFELLOW'S PROSE WORKS. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 2 vols. 18mo. 1857.
These delicious volumes are published in uniform style with the diamond edition of the author's poetical works. The type is large and clear, the paper excellent, and we can conceive of no more acceptable gift book.
MY LAST CRUISE: or, Where we Went, and What we Saw. By LEUT. A. W. HABERSHAM, U. S. N. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 8vo. pp. 507.
This splendidly illustrated volume contains a highly interesting account of visits to the Malay and Loo-Choo Islands, the coasts of China, Formosa, Japan, Kamtschatka, Siberia, and the mouth of the Amoor River. It is written in graphic style, abounds in strange adventures, and the illustrative engravings are admirable. For sale by Burnham Brothers, Cornwall.
TWO YEARS AGO. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 540.
Charles Kingsley is one of the new lights of literature, and a pure and shining one. His "Amias Leigh" gave him a name even with the mere novel reader. The present story is a powerful and deeply interesting one, worthy of his reputation.
NEW BIOGRAPHIES OF ILLUSTRIOUS MEN. Boston: Whittemore, Niles & Hall. 1857. 12mo. pp. 408.
It was a bright idea of the publishers to collect from the pages of the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, which is a costly and voluminous work, these choice biographies of the world's most eminent men, by Macaulay, Henry Rogers, Theodore Martin and others. They have made an intensely interesting book, and published it in beautiful style.
THE INTERMEDIATE STANDARD SPEAKER. By EPES SARGENT. Philadelphia: Charles Desilver. 12mo. pp. 452. 1857.
An admirable collection of pieces in prose and poetry for declamation, fresh and unobscure, and most systematically arranged. Sargent's name as editor and compiler will give it universal currency.
NEW PLAYS.—Among the recent publications of Samuel French, No. 122 Nassau Street, New York, we find the "Two Queens," "Esmeralda," "Love in '76," "Jonathan Bradford," "The Mincull," "Cherry and Fair Star," "The Miller's Maid," "Crown Prince," "Middy Ashore," "Ben Bolt," and "The Love of a Prince." These are numbers of the minor and standard drama now published in French's letter-perfect style. For sale by A. Williams & Co., the special agents.
WIELAND; or, The Transformation. By CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN. With a Memoir of the Author. Phila.: M. Polock. 1857. 12mo. pp. 251.
Charles Brockden Brown was a powerful writer of fiction, and a man of true genius. His novels have long been out of print, and some time since we urged the expediency of a republication of them. The present volume is the pioneer of the series. It is published in beautiful style. For sale by A. Williams & Co., the special agents.

EASILY DONE.—There is not a village or town in the country so small, but that a club of twelve subscribers might be easily obtained for "Ballou's Pictorial," and the work be thus procured for each at two dollars a year, besides a gratis copy to the person who sends the names and money.

Editorial Melange.

The receipts of the railroads in the United States last year are put down at $110,000,000. — Within six months, 190 have been added to the First Baptist Church in Lawrence. — Rev. Dr. Spring, of New York, has recovered his eyesight, and resumed preaching from his manuscript. — Amendments to the criminal code of Mississippi made by the last Legislature, forbid the keeping of billiard tables, under penalties of fine and imprisonment, and impose a fine of $20 for each offence upon any person who shall labor on Sunday. — A correspondent of the Richmond Whig, residing near Milton, North Carolina, writes that the tobacco plants in Halifax, Pittsylvania and Charlotte counties, Virginia, and Caswell, Parsons and Granville counties, North Carolina, are almost entirely killed. — Mr. Everett has consented to deliver the oration at the annual commencement of Middlebury (Conn.) Wesleyan University, in August. — Rev. Isaac P. Langworthy, pastor of the Wimsisnet Church, Chelsea, has obtained leave of absence from his society until the first of January next, for the purpose of recruiting his health, which at present is seriously impaired. In the meantime he will act as general agent for the American Congregational Union, of New York. — Brain fever is raging to a fearful extent in Madison and Onondaga counties, New York, and people are flying from it as if it were a pestilence. — The most reliable accounts from every section of the country give very encouraging hopes for a bountiful harvest. The growing crops from one end of the country to the other are represented as looking remarkably fine. — A rich deposit of coal has been found near Mormon Island, twenty-two miles east of Sacramento city. — A letter from Livingston, Maine, states that a very extensive work of grace is in progress in that town, particularly among the young, of which class, it is stated, that there is left hardly a single careless soul. — The carriage which has been built in Philadelphia, by Mr. Jacobs, for President Buchanan, has ornaments of solid silver, having a shield, with the initial B in the centre. — The Columbus (Alabama) Enquirer learns that in the Coosa River, a few miles above Wetumpka, sardines, precisely like those imported from the Mediterranean, abound, and could be caught almost by the wagon-load. — A couple were married, lately, in Baltimore, aged, jointly, 143—the bridegroom, 68, and the bride, 75. — Maggie Myers, a sweet little girl of five years, was left with her younger sister in a house in Albany, lately, while her mother went shopping, and soon after was found burnt to death by some of the neighbors. It is supposed she set fire to her clothes while playing with matches. — Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress is to be dramatized, and produced at the Bowery Theatre, in New York, in a short time. — Here is an item that illustrates the agricultural wealth of the West. That must be a productive country where corn is cheaper than coal as fuel! — An elderly but robust Irishman, who was recently admitted to the Broome county poor-house, was found, lately, to have $62 in gold and silver sewed up in his shirt. He was summarily discharged, after having been obliged to pay for his board. — A bey of the principal fashionable ladies in Cincinnati appeared on promenade, lately, without hoops, and with robes descending "classically straight." — The city committee of Brooklyn, New York, have reported in favor of running the cars in that city on Sunday.

INGENIOUS EXTEMPORE.—The following lines were addressed to the author of some wretchedly bad verses on the river Deo:

Had I been U,
And in the Q—
As it would have been easy to B:
I'd have let you C,
While slipping my T,
Far better lines on D.

EASTERN APOLOGUE.—There is a world of wisdom in some of the Eastern apologies. Take the following as an example:—The fates had decreed that a man should do one of three evil deeds—get drunk, commit robbery or murder. He, as he thought, chose the least evil, and got drunk; but when in that condition, committed both the other crimes.

THE SCHOOLMASTER ABROAD.—The schoolmaster must have gone abroad on a long vacation, when the following notice was allowed to be posted up in a rural district:—"Wrighten and wrenden tree spellen an' also marchants accounts with double entry Post-script Girls and Bonays bourdid and good yoozitch for children."

CURIOUS INSCRIPTION.—Over the door of a house at Hurley, in Berkshire, England, is the following intelligence:—"T. B. draws all sorts of teeth, shaves on Saturday, likewise plays the violin, measures hand and shoes and boots maker." All the Admirable Crichtons are not dead yet.

WATERLOO.—The Duke of Wellington used to give a very modest version of the greatest battle of modern times. "People ask me for an account of the action," he said. "I tell them it was hard pounding on both sides, and we pounded the hardest."

COMPLIMENTARY.—An Albany contemporary says of our little village:—"Boston is a queer place, and believes only in three things—Bunker Hill, Plymouth Rock, and baked beans on Sundays." We consider ourselves extinguished.

Wayside Gatherings.

In Florida they put thieves in the stocks and pelt them with rotten eggs.

A silk manufactory has been started in Holoken, N. J., and is said to be doing a flourishing business.

The Methodist society at Warrington, Va., is raising funds by the performance in the church of the scriptural drama of Joseph and his brethren.

The eating of the sugar cane in Louisiana, it is said, completely cures colored persons who go from the vicinity of Norfolk, Va., with consumptive symptoms.

The weather has been so cold on the plains, on the route to Salt Lake, that many Indians have been frozen to death, and others have eaten their own children.

According to the Portland State of Maine, there are 504 miles of railroad in operation in Maine, costing about $17,500,000, or $34,000 per mile, one-third more than the estimates.

The revival among the Methodists in Charlestown, we learn, is extending, so many attending that it is found necessary to hold the prayer meetings in the church, instead of in the vestry, and even this place is too small.

A revival is in progress in Williams College, and at Canaan Four Corners, and that which commenced at Yale College last term still continues. Record is made of revivals in many other places.

Lawlor, the United States soldier who confessed to having murdered Mary Dunn, at Rathfrim, Ireland, years ago, and was sent to the Lunatic Asylum, Blackwell's Island, made his escape lately, and is still at large. He was to have been sent to Ireland for trial.

All the Chinese have been ordered to quit the service of foreigners, and return to their homes; and, so powerful is the mandarin system, that disobedience entails much trouble, if not positive destruction upon the relatives of the offender. The consequence is, that nearly all of the Chinese servants have left or are leaving.

Poisoning wives has got to be so common a crime, all over the country, that prudent young ladies ought to be frightened away from matrimony. A man named Barlow, in Delaware county, New York, has been arrested on that charge, just as he was about to marry his wife's sister, and a man named Ware is on trial for a similar offence in Toledo.

Rev. S. C. Loveland, one of the fathers in the Universalist ministry, an able scholar and linguist, and a sound preacher, has been attacked with a severe paralytic shock and remains in a critical condition. He has resided and preached most of his life in Vermont, but is now settled over the Universalist society in South Hartford, Washington county, N. Y.

A company has been established in Paris to buy up the skins of rats. The soft nap of the fur, when dressed, is of the most beautiful texture, far exceeding in delicacy that of the beaver; and the hatters of Paris, it is said, prefer it to other furs. The hide is employed to make the thumbs of the best gloves, the elasticity and closeness of its texture rendering it preferable to kid.

Mr. Waddell, chemist, of Brooklyn, has found some pieces of charred bones, buttons, and fragments of clothing, supposed to be the remains of his son, who disappeared in January, and it is believed was murdered and burnt by Edward Quick, who was discharged from Mr. Waddell's employ by the son, and had sworn to have revenge.

The Scriptures have been translated into 148 languages and dialects, of which 121 had, prior to the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, never appeared; and 25 of these languages existed without an alphabet, in an oral form. Upwards of forty-three millions of these copies of God's Word are circulated among not less than 600,000,000 of people.

A new railway spike made spirally, so that it revolves when driven into the sleeper, has been invented for fastening the chair to a seat of the railway iron with all the firmness of a screw. The round part under the head is tapered conically, so as to fit with accuracy the hole in the chair. By this means the vibration of the rails is effectually prevented.

An excellent powder for razor strops is composed of equal parts of sulphate of iron and common salt. These should be rubbed, and then heated to redness in a crucible. When the vapors have ceased to rise, let the mass cool, and wash it to remove the salt, and when diffused in water collect the brilliant scales which first subside. These, when spread upon leather, soften the edge of the razor, and cause it to cut smooth.

A curious characteristic is found to pertain to gutta-serena, of considerable interest to electricians. This substance, as is well known, acquires a bluish tinge after having been kept some months; and when in this state it can no longer be negatively electrified, as before, by almost any substance with which it may be rubbed. Its electricity is found to be positive; and the only substances which will electrify it negatively are mica, diamond, and fur.

A beautiful material, out of which a variety of articles, including lintels, statues, busts, mouldings, etc., can be manufactured, has recently been devised. The composition—which consists of sand, plaster of Paris, and blood reduced with water to such a consistency as will permit pouring into moulds of any required form—hardens in a very short time; and, it is said, increases in firmness and compact texture until it finally turns into solid stone.

In the preparation of paper pulp the entire substance of the bark of resinous woods is now used. The matter within the bark, which is resinous and gummy, acts as a size or stiffening for the paper. When placed in a boiler, and being covered with water, the bark is thoroughly digested at a low temperature. When the bark is digested, the fibres are so detached from each other that, by the usual machinery, it is easily reduced to a pulpy condition; and by the ordinary process a handsome paper is made from it.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Examiner says: One of the novelties in Iowa City, the capital of the future Empire State of the West, is a Sunday school in a railroad car. It is of recent origin, and numbers about fifty scholars. The railroad depot being three-fourths of a mile from town, and a new settlement having sprung up around it, the school accommodates children who are remote from any other school. Efforts are being made to interest all denominations in the enterprise. An additional car, it is thought, will be required in the spring.

According to the treasury estimates, there are in this country about $250,000,000 in gold, of which a little more than a fifth is in the banks, leaving little short of $200,000,000 to be found elsewhere. The treasury boards very commonly from twenty to twenty-five millions—leaving, probably, $175,000,000 to be sought among the people. Allowing $20,000,000—a liberal estimate—to be in actual use, there remains $155,000,000 which is hoarded by the people, in imitation of the government, and to an extent six times exceeding the treasury boards.

Foreign Items.

The Sultan has presented to France the Church of the Nativity; also, the Palace of the Knights of St. John, at Jerusalem.

Prince Edward, of Saxe-Weimar, is a candidate for the throne of the United Principalities, and the British government favors his claim.

The Queen of Spain has conferred the order of the Golden Fleece on the eldest son of the Emperor of Russia, and the Cordon of Maria Louisa on the Empress of Russia.

Paris is said never to have been more gay than it is at this particular time. It may be, however, as Count Someloy said to Charles X., in 1830:—"Sire, we are dancing on a volcano!"

Hume, the spirit rapper, who passes in Paris for an American, stupified the emperor and empress with his performances, at the Tuileries. He has been called to the houses of many of the nobility, and has made quite an excitement in Paris.

A wealthy Greek ship owner at Marseilles has been sentenced to three years' imprisonment, a fine of 3000 francs, and interdictio from civil rights for ten years, for having fraudulently insured a ship after he had received intelligence of her loss.

Mehemet Bey, who served in the war of insurrection in Hungary, has set out for Ciscaissia, where he has been invited to act as generalissimo. Great agitation prevails in the Caucasus, and preparations are in progress against a Russian invasion, which is said to be imminent.

Sands of Gold.

.... Contentment, with loving hearts, makes home a little paradise.—Arthur.

.... Women's wits are quick in spying the surest means of avenging a real or supposed slight.—Soot.

.... After a long experience of the world, I affirm before God I never knew a rogue who was not unhappy.—Junius.

.... Cast forth thy act, thy word, into the ever-living, ever-working universe; it is a seed-grain that cannot die.—Carlyle.

.... A weak mind sinks under prosperity, as well as under adversity. A strong and deep one has two highest tides, when the moon is at the full, and when there is no moon.—Hare.

.... Women, in their most exalted state, are not so difficult to win, as they are sometimes imagined to be; it unfortunately happens that the best men think them the most so.—MacKenzie.

.... My great rule should be never to aim at competition in things extrinsic and really trivial. I would seek the honey-eap, and let those who choose prefer the corolla.—Mrs. Alston.

.... All things are literally better, lovelier, and more beloved for the imperfections which have been divinely appointed, that the law of human life may be effort, and the law of human judgment, mercy.—Ruskin.

.... The condition which friendship demands, is ability to do without it. To be capable of that high office, requires great and sublime parts. There must be very few, before there can be very one.—Emerson.

Joker's Budget.

The man who planted himself on his good intentions, has not yet sprouted.

The stammering tongue is one that is simply "balky for want of regular driving."

"Mr. Smith, the hogs are getting into your corn-field." "Never mind, Billy; I'm sleepy. Corn won't hurt 'em."

Spatch, on hearing, the other day, that a body in a paroxysm of grief had shed a torrent of tears, unfeelingly remarked that she must have had a cataract in either eye.

"Is molasses good for a cough?" inquired Jones, who had taken a slight cold, and was barking with considerable energy. "It ought to be," said Brown; "it is much sold for consumption!"

"And must I leave thee, dearest Angelina?" "Yeth, dear Gathy; you had better take a turn with Mith Thimphion, juth to keep people from talking. You can come back, you know."

A certain barrister, who was remarkable for coming into court with unclean hands, observed "that he had been turning over Coke." "I should have thought it was coals you had been turning over," observed a wag.

A Western editor, whose subscribers complained very loudly that he did not give them news enough for their money, told them that if they did not find enough in the paper they had better read the Bible, which, he had no doubt, would be news to most of them.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL,
DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unexampled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the bosoms of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a most beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its fair, office, they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS.—INVARIABLE IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year.....$2 00
4 subscribers, " ".....7 00
10 " " ".....15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive this fortieth copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every Saturday, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston

MAY-DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

The very pretty picture on this page represents a juvenile group enjoying the pleasures of "Maying" to their heart's content. The artist has, with great good judgment, laid his scene in one of the southern States, which accounts for a luxuriance of foliage not witnessed in our cold northern latitude till June. Under the spreading trees, a gay party is assembled, weaving May coronals to decorate their tresses. Beyond the rustic fence, a glimpse is afforded of a pleasant country landscape. The celebration of May-day is of great antiquity. It originated, probably, in the Roman celebration of the festival of Flora, which commenced on the 28th of April, and continued through several days in May. Spring flowers were offered to the goddess, and branches of trees in bloom, which, through the accommodation of the Romish church to classic usages, remain to us at the present day. In England and Scotland, a curious custom used to be observed, of getting May-dew on the first day of the month. The London Morning Post, of May 2, 1791, says, that the day previous, "being the first of May, according to annual and superstitious custom, a number of persons went into the fields and bathed their faces with the dew on the grass, under the idea that it would render them beautiful." Pepys makes the following entry in his curious "diary," written in the days of Charles II.:—"My wife away, down with Jane and W. Hower to Woolwich, in order to a little ayre, and to lie there to-night, so as to gather May-dew to-morrow morning, which Mrs. Turner hath taught her is the only thing in the world to wash her face with; and," Pepys adds, "I am contented with it." His booms, which are straight young trees set up; and at Woodstock, in Oxon, (England), they every May-eve goe into the parke, and fetch away a number of hawthorne trees, which they set up before their doores; 'tis a pity they make such destruction of so fine a tree." We know not whether the celebration of May-day is relinquished in Ireland, but a writer of about fifteen years back says:—"About two or three miles from Dublin, on the great northern road, is a village called Finglass; it is prettily situated, and is the only place I know of in the neighborhood of Dublin, where May-day is kept up in the old style. A high pole is decorated with garlands, and visitors come in from different parts of the country, and dance around it to whatever music chance may have conducted there. The best male and female dancers are chosen king and queen, and placed in chairs." He says that after the dancing is over they adjourn to a public house, where a feast is provided at the expense of some of the party. Leigh Hunt, in lamenting over the decay of rural sports and customs, says:—"This time two hundred years ago, our ancestors were all anticipating their May holidays. Bigotry came in and frowned them away; then debauchery identified all pleasure with the tow; then avarice, and we have ever since been mistaking the means for the end. Fortunately, it does not follow that we shall continue to do so. * * * Knowledge, so far from being incompatible with simplicity of pleasures, is the quickest to perceive its wealth. Chaucer would lie for hours looking at daisies. Scipio and Lælius could amuse themselves with making dncks and drakes in the water. Epaminondas, the greatest of all the active spirits of Greece, was a flute-player and

AN INCIDENT OF FORMER TIMES.

Authentic accounts of olden times, touching the habits and doings of the people of earlier days, are always of interest. Long before the existence of railroad facilities for travelling, there was much of journeying in New England for business and for pleasure. There existed among the wealthy and distinguished classes quite a spirit of display; a disposition to move in fashionable styles; in short, to take the lead, and, if possible, to eclipse others. In those primitive times, the arrival of a splendid or handsome coach, with four, or even two horses, in any of the rural villages, was an attractive event, and elicited much admiration on the part of the denizens of the town who were so fortunate as to be visited by the rich and fashionable in superior style. The event of such an arrival as I have described furnished ground for gossip a long time after its occurrence. The eyes of villagers were always open to keen observation, and naught of note escaped their attention. More than forty-five years since some of the prominent citizens of the city of Hartford, Connecticut, then ranking among the "upper crust," determined on a jaunt up the river, through Massachusetts, Vermont and New Hampshire. They fitted out a private carriage in good style, for the town. The party included the heads of two families with their wives and some daughters, bent not only upon having an agreeable jaunt, but fully disposed to make a display—in short, "to astonish the natives." They arranged to travel leisurely and genteelly. Accordingly, the first day they reached Northampton, a populous town in the valley of the Connecticut. The next morning, at a late hour, they resumed

MAY-DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

"reasons for contentment," seem to appear in the following passage, for he says:—"I went by water to Fox Hall, and there walked in Spring garden," and there he notices "a great deal of company, and the weather and garden very pleasant: and it is very pleasant and cheap going thither, for a man may go to spend what he will, or nothing—all as one; but to hear the nightingale and other birds; and here a fiddler, and there a harp; and here a Jew's trump and here laughing, and there fine people walking, is mighty diverting," says Mr. Pepys, while his wife is gone to lie at Woolwich, "in order to a little ayre and to gather May-dew." The milkmaids of London used to deck themselves with garlands and dance in public on May-day, but the custom died away long ago, though we believe the chimney-sweeps, in fantastic attire, still celebrate the day. In some of the remotest parts of England, the May-day parties are still, we believe, kept up. The famous Dr. Parr, the first Greek scholar of his age, and one of the greatest and most influential men of his time, was, we are told, a patron of May-day sports. Opposite his paragon house at Hutton, near Warwick, stood the village May-pole, which on the annual festival was dressed with garlands, and surrounded by a numerous band of villagers. The doctor was "first of the throng," and danced with his parishioners, the gayest of the gay. He kept the large crowns of the May-pole in a closet of his house, whence it was produced every May-day, with fresh flowers and streamers, preparatory to its elevation, and the doctor's own appearance in the ring. He always spoke of this festivity as one in which he joined with peculiar delight to himself and advantage to his neighbors. In Holland, May-day used to be celebrated with great gaiety. Aubrey writes—"In Holland they have their May-dancer. Alfred the Great could enact the whole part of a minstrel. Epicurus taught the riches of temperance and intellectual pleasure in a garden. The other philosophers of his country walked between heaven and earth, in the colloquial groves of Academus; and the wisest heart of Solomon, who found everything vain because he was a king, has left us panegyrics on the spring and 'the voice of the turtle,' because he was a poet, a lover and a wise man." It is curious to note that while the May-day games and sports have died out in the old world, whence they all originated, they are revived in the new. Nowhere has May-day been celebrated with more zest of late years, than in New England, where our puritanical fathers denounced it as an abomination. They cut down the May-pole at Merry Mount with ruthless severity, and we believe that was the only one attempted to be erected under their stern sway.

WHAT WE DRINK.

During the year ending June 30, 1856, 8,843,370 gallons of wine, spirits and malt liquor have been imported into this country. The total value is $6,176,939. Brandy forms the largest item in the bill; 1,715,717 gallons have been consumed at a cost of nearly $3,000,000. The grain spirits imported fall a little below brandy in quantity (1,582,132 gallons), but much below in value ($772,276). Nearly a million of "other spirits" besides are consumed at an expense of $288,000. Over a million and a half gallons of claret and nearly 700,000 gallons of other red wines were imported, at an aggregate cost of about $850,000. We have drunk also 1,100,000 gallons of English and Scotch ale, besides a large quantity of Madeira and Sicily wines.—N. Y. Sun.

their journey, and started for the northward, and reached the old town of Deerfield, a distance of eighteen miles from Northampton, where they decided to rest their horses, and take some refreshment. Before leaving home, anticipating that they might fall into a region destitute of the ordinary comforts of living to which they had been accustomed, they had providentially placed in their carriage a basket containing cold ham, boiled tongues, etc., and when they reached the hotel in the centre of Deerfield, after providing for their horses, they directed their driver to bring in their basket of edibles; but on examination it turned out that they had neglected some of the necessary condiments, such as salt, mustard and pickles, suited to the meal they had arranged. They called upon the hostess of the house to supply the deficiency, which was promptly done. When the meal was finished they called for their bill; whereupon the landlady spiritedly replied, and it was done with a good grace, for she was a dignified and accomplished woman of the old school of female worthies: "No, gentlemen, I have no bill; I have been amply paid already." "What do you mean?" said the gentlemen. "Why," the lady responded, "I have always been a strong friend of economy, and am delighted with this extraordinary specimen of it, which I have never known surpassed, and I consider that I have been amply paid, and shall take nothing." The hotel was one of the most excellent in the whole country, and the hostess a "lady of the old school," in the highest sense of the term. How cheap must all the fashionable party have felt upon receiving so cutting a rebuke under such circumstances? A rebuke the more mortifying from the fact of its being given more by implication than directly.—Correspondent of Boston Transcript.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, | NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. | VOL. XII., No. 19.—WHOLE No. 307.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

THE HONG FACTORIES, AT CANTON.

The picture on this page was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Champney, from a most elegant and elaborate water-color painting by a Chinese artist, executed on the spot. The group of buildings to the left embraces the Danish Hong, New Hong, Soi Ke Hong, New French Hong and Minqua's Hong, at the foot of Old China Street. Here, too, are the Club House, Boat House, Masonic Lodge and Canton Library Rooms; and directly over it, indicated by the flag, his excellency, Dr. Parker's residence. Commencing with the smoke-pipe of the steamer, and numbering to the right, we have an American Hong occupied by King & Co.; in its rear is Dent & Co.'s magnificent and extensive hong. Then comes the Powshan Hong, occupied by English merchants; Imperial Hong, Wetmore & Co., (American); Swedish Hong; Russell & Co. (American), and Chow-Chow Hong, occupied by Parsees. The Episcopal Church forms what was called the boundary between the English and American gardens. All to the right of the picture was destroyed by fire some years since, and has been rebuilt by the English, and occupied by them, covering the site of the old East India Company's factories. The consulate is marked by a flag. The building, in front of which is the Danish flag, is occupied by the wealthy monopolists of the opium trade. In the foreground is represented the landing-place of a tea warehouse on the opposite side of the Canton River, at Honam. The steamer is a chartered vessel, the "Queen," 137 tons, and mounting four 4-pounders. A portion of a Chinese craft is seen to the right. On landing at Canton, the stranger is forcibly struck by the singular effect which the building of the "hongs," or European factories, in the midst of Chinese houses, produce on the eye. The space allotted to the factories consists of a strip of land reclaimed from the river; and in front of each is displayed the national flag. There are thirteen hongs, including English, American, Dutch, French, Austrians, and other merchants. Each consists of four or five houses ranged round a closed court. The English hong far surpasses the others in elegance and extent. These buildings, which front the south, are built upon a flat raised on piles, and separated from the river by a quay called "Resplendentia Walk." They have stairs by which the merchandize is shipped. Immense numbers of boats are moored all along the shore hard by. About a mile from the European factories, on a small, rocky island in the centre of the river, which, from its situation, presents a formidable barrier to an enemy approaching from the sea, appears that fort which the Chinese call "The Dutch Folly." This is an oval enclosure, with embattled walls, above which are seen dragons and dolphins, which surmount the roofs of houses, standing under some fine trees. The fort owes its name to an attempt made by the Dutch to establish themselves on the Chinese territory. At a period when they carried on extensive trade with China, they requested and obtained possession of this little island. The suspicions of the natives were aroused by the landing of a number of boxes, and one being opened, was found to contain warlike stores. The Chinese immediately retracted the permission they had given, and the Dutch were compelled to abandon the island. The "Dutch Folly" was stormed and taken during Admiral Seymour's operations against Canton. All the localities alluded to have been mentioned in late accounts of the Chinese troubles—and our picture of the hongs will be valuable for future reference.

THE FOREIGN FACTORIES, CANTON.—FROM AN ORIGINAL DRAWING.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN: —OR— THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER X.—[CONTINUED.]

"Not a very desirable set of inhabitants, it is true, but then they wont crowd round you, as my loyal subjects do round me,—one with a pair of spurs that helped to speed my flight after the battle of Worcester—another, with an acorn from the oak which sheltered me from the view of my pursuers—another still, with the brown earthen pitcher from which I drank small beer, after walking half a day beneath a burning sun. By the way, I am in daily expectation of being edified with a sight of the cutty-stool on which the Presbyterians compelled me to do penance. But the most perplexing part of the business is, that each of the persons who have thus carefully preserved memorials of my days of adversity and romance, winds up his speech by modestly expressing a hope that I will graciously please to remember him, meaning thereby that I would order ten or a hundred pounds (according to the value of the service rendered) to be presented from my treasury, which is, if possible, more empty than their own empty pates."

"The man of the curry-comb must be excepted," said Buckingham.

"Yes, for he knows that he did me a real service, and, therefore, supposes I shall have the grace to reward him, now that he has jogged my memory."

"I half expected," said Killigrew, addressing Falkland, "that, during your absence, you would espouse the red-skinned daughter of some Indian chief, and bring her here to illumine and enliven the court, with the jewels in her nose and the bells round her ankles."

"I have seen an Indian maiden," replied he, "whose brilliant eyes would shame the rarest diamonds ever dug from the mines of Golconda; I wouldn't except even this splendid jewel."

As he spoke, he tossed upon the table the opal filched by Mildred Dacres from Alice Dale, which, in its descent, seemed to flash with every hue of the rich and tempting fruits and sparkling wines ranged near. At sight of it, Harleigh's face flushed crimson. The next minute, the blood receded, leaving lip and cheek as pale as death.

"A love-token, I'll be bound; is it not, Falkland?" said Harry Jermyn.

Falkland smiled, but made no reply.

"I think I've seen this gem before to-day," said Buckingham, taking it up and examining it. "I thought I wasn't mistaken. It is the one, Harleigh, you purchased at Liogard's, previously to your going to America."

"I don't pretend to say when or where it was purchased," said Falkland. "The first and the last time I ever saw it, till I could call it my own, it adorned the neck of one more beautiful and bewitching than the most celebrated of the beauties of Windsor, portrayed by Sir Peter Lely's pencil."

"You had better mind how you let the little Castlemaine, and some others, hear you compare your forest beauties with those of the court, unless the comparison is to the advantage of the latter, or you may chance to encounter cold looks," said the Duke of Buckingham.

"Has this little wood nymph of yours a red skin?" inquired Killigrew, of Falkland.

"Yes, as red as the freshest rose in June, save where the empire of that queenly flower is disputed by its sister, the lily."

"Her name?" said Charles, beginning to be interested in Falkland's somewhat high-flown description.

"Alice Dale."

"What! the daughter of Reginald Dale, who, I've been told, a short time before his decease, caused that stiff old Puritan, Nathan Walworth, to be appointed her guardian?"

"The same, your majesty."

"And he soon afterward emigrated to America?"

"He did."

"I remember him well," said the Earl of Arran. "He served under Cromwell, as a captain of dragoons, that used to stable their horses in the stalls of the cathedrals."

"If I mistake not," said Buckingham, "one Burlington, who owned a princely estate in Wiltshire, was the fair damsel's uncle, that Falkland is in such raptures about."

"He was," said Arran.

"It is she, then, who stands in your light?" said Harry Jermyn.

"That is not quite clear," replied Falkland.

"True, if you marry her. It will then be much the same as if old Burlington had made you his heir, which, I've heard, he once contemplated."

Meanwhile, Harleigh had remained silent, though with compressed lips and flashing eyes. He now drew Falkland a little aside.

"Dare you say, on the word and honor of a gentleman, that Alice Dale gave you that opal?" he demanded.

"Till you make it appear by what right you ask the question, I will say nothing about it."

"By an Englishman's right."

"And by the same right I refuse to answer a question asked with so much arrogance."

"I am not in a mood, just now, to clothe my language in the garb of humility. I demand to know if Alice Dale gave you that opal of her own free will."

"It was freely given."

"It is false. She never gave it to you."

"What I have said is true."

"I shall not take your word."

"Let the sword decide it, then!"

Charles, who had caught enough of what was said to understand by this time what was going forward, now interposed.

"You seem to forget," said he, "that this is neither a place nor a presence for lover's broils. Both of you will please consider yourselves under arrest,—you, Gilbert Falkland, for proposing to decide the question by the sword, and you, Clarence Harleigh, for provoking him to it. Remember that you leave this place for ready furnished lodgings in the Tower. But come," and his features relaxed into their usual good-humored expression, "we have already let our feast of fruits stand waiting till one might well deem it a feast for fools."

Saying this, he took his place at the table, and the others, including Harleigh and Falkland, who dared not refuse, followed his example.

"They should thank your majesty for your clemency," said Buckingham, noticing the downcast looks of the two helligorous guests. "In your granddad's day, this would have been made a star-chamber business, when the imprisonment might have been followed by the loss of a hand."

"I don't complain," said Harleigh. "I should have controlled my passion, and sought a more fitting opportunity, before requiring the explanation, which no one who has nothing to conceal would wish to evade."

CHAPTER XI.

ALICE IS INVITED TO GO TO ENGLAND.

WITH Alice, after the departure of Harleigh, Falkland and Mildred, time did not always trip along with the lightness and ease of a feathered Mercury. The austerity and asceticism of her Puritan guardian forbade the indulgence of all amusements, as involving a loss of time which might be appropriated to some useful employment. He seemed to forget that the mind is so constituted that it cannot be preserved in a healthful state without suitable relaxation.

Alice was fond of reading, but the Bible, a metrical version of the Psalms, and a few volumes of controversial theology, were the only books she could have recourse to, with two exceptions: these were Shakespeare's Plays and Spenser's Fairy Queen. She was obliged to keep them where they would not fall in her uncle's way, and to read them by stealth, which last she would not have ventured to do, had not her Aunt Esther, who was more liberal minded than her husband, assured her that she had read them many times herself, without, as she truly believed, having sustained either moral or mental injury.

It was at the close of a day which had appeared to Alice longer and more lonely than usual, that her uncle entered the apartment where she and her aunt were sitting, with an open letter in his hand.

"Is it from home?" said his wife, who still fondly gave that appellation to her native land.

"Yes," he replied; "it is from my widowed sister, Deborah Elliston."

"No bad news, I hope," said Mrs. Walworth, noticing that her husband looked graver even than usual.

"Yes; the angel of death has entered her dwelling, and taken one of her daughters."

"Which one?"

"Elizabeth, and she is alone now."

"But where is Rebecca?"

"Married, and many miles distant. She begs that we will give her Alice for a year, or at least a few months, whose presence, she thinks, will cheer her spirits, and help to restore her health, which is much impaired."

A shade, for a few moments, dimmed the brightness of Mrs. Walworth's countenance.

"How can we spare her?" said she.

"Do we need her presence as much as Deborah does?" Mr. Walworth inquired, in an accent which carried with it a degree of reproach.

"I think we don't, yet her going or remaining is not a question for us to decide. Would you like to go, Alice?"

"If it were not for leaving you, I should," replied Alice, slightly coloring, for she thought of Harleigh, and the long time which must elapse before she could hope to see him again, unless she complied with the request of Mrs. Elliston.

"There will be advantages there, it cannot be denied," said her aunt, "that you are deprived of here. I suppose we must make up our minds to part with you. We can trust her with Mrs. Elliston, without the least apprehension;" and as she spoke, she looked at Mr. Walworth, to see if he had aught to say against her assertion.

"We can, with entire confidence. She may need a few hints, which I will communicate to her in writing."

"I am to go, then?" said Alice.

"We won't say that to-night," replied her uncle. "We must have time for reflection—time to look at the matter in all its bearings. Your aunt and I will talk it over by ourselves, and you must ask yourself if you can be content to dwell in the midst of those amusements which are so tempting to the young and thoughtless, without being permitted to partake of them. A license my sister never gave her own daughters will not be granted to you. Were I not persuaded of this, your feet should never pass her threshold."

The subject was now dropped, and Alice sat apparently calm, while her uncle and aunt kept up a desultory conversation. Little Ella, however, who, as usual, had crept to her side, asked her what made her cheeks look so bright a red, and why her hands trembled so, as she busied herself with her knitting. But when she was in her own room, with no one except Ella, whose eyelids were weighed gently down with the honey-dew of sleep almost as soon as her head pressed the pillow, she gave way to a hurst of tears produced by a strange mingling of joy and sorrow.

"Miss Alice!"

Alice started a little, and looking round, saw Silas Watkins.

"Good-morning, Silas," said she, with a smile. "It is a long time since I saw you."

"I've been gone on a short fishing v'y'ge. I meant to see you before I went, but I had to go away so sudden that I had no convenient chance. I am sorry now that I didn't, at any rate, contrive some way to see you."

"Why?"

"I will tell you, though, in the first place, if you think it isn't takin' too much liberty, I should like to ask you a question."

"By no means. Ask as many as you think necessary for the promised explanation."

"Well, then, I should like to have you tell me if you ever gave a trinket, which was fastened to a blue ribbon you wore round your neck, to that proud Englishwoman, Mildred Dacres?"

"I never did. Why do you wish to know?"

"You know Hitty Chessman, the pretty housemaid that used to live at your uncle's, has, for a number of months past, been at Mr. Wyndham's, where Mildred Dacres made it her home, before she went to England?"

"Yes."

"Well, one day she had been to see her mother. Hitty's mother, as I suppose you know, lives two or three miles from Mr. Wyndham's."

"Yes, I do."

"She had been and made her visit, and when she was on her way back, she felt tired, and sat down on a rock close to a brook, behind a thick clump of willows. She hadn't been there long, before she heard voices, and peeping through the willows, she saw Mildred Dacres and Gilbert Falkland. When they had arrived right off against where she sat, she saw Miss Dacres take something from her pocket and give it to Falkland. They halted a little, while Falkland examined it, and that gave her a chance to see that it was a trinket fastened to a blue ribbon, which she was very certain she had seen you wear."

"What did Mildred say?"

"She couldn't make out all that she said, she spoke so low, but she heard enough to make her think that it wasn't by any fair means she came by it. And then, again, she said she knew pretty well that you set too great a store by it to give it away."

"O, why did Mildred do that?"

"That is what Hitty Chessman couldn't find out. It was for no good purpose, you may be certain of that. Mildred Dacres is a wicked woman."

"I am afraid she is."

"And was your enemy when she tried hardest to make you believe she was your friend."

"If I had only known this before she went away."

"I didn't know it myself only about an hour before I was to go, and then there were a great many things I was obliged to attend to; but if I had known that she was going away so soon, I would come on purpose to let you know, even if I had lost my v'y'ge."

"If you had lost your voyage, it shouldn't have been any loss to your pocket. I would have made it up to you."

"I hear that you are going to England soon."

"Yes; I start for Boston to-morrow, whence the vessel I am to go in is soon to sail."

"Before long, then, you may see her. I mean Mildred Dacres."

"Yes, I may."

"If you should, take the counsel of a sincere though humble friend, and don't trust her in anything."

"I sha'n't forget your advice."

"If you had only seen the icy glitter of her eyes, as I did once, you never would have trusted her. I have faced Indians and wild beasts, without my courage ever failing me; but that look of hers made me shudder, and somehow took all my courage away, just as if a serpent had looked me in the eye, that I knew was goin' to spring upon me and coil round my neck the very next minute, without my havin' any means to prevent it."

Alice had, on one or two occasions, caught a mere gleam of what Silas Watkins had designated as the icy glitter, and the emotions inspired by it were far from being pleasant, and in a slight degree even resembled those he had described.

"You will return to this country some day, Miss Alice?" said Silas.

"Yes; I expect to return in about a year from now, if I live."

"I sha'n't be likely to see you again before you go?"

"No, unless you and your good dame will call over this evening."

"There's nobody to leave with the children, you know. So farewell, and a happy and a prosperous v'y'ge to you."

"Farewell, Silas," said she, giving him her hand. "I thank you for your counsel, and shall remember it. For your kind wishes, accept mine in return. Aunt Esther, when I am gone, will send your wife and the children some little presents I have prepared for them, which will show that I did not forget them."

As Alice turned into the path which led towards home, Silas drew the back of his hand across his eyes.

"That girl," said he, as he stood watching her till a turn in the path hid her from view, "as my wife and I have often said, comes nearer to my idea of an angel than any person I ever saw walk the earth, and I've heard Hoz Looney say the same."

CHAPTER XII.

A VISIT FROM GABRIEL GUTHRY.

It was a little after dusk, and Alice, assisted by her aunt, had just finished packing her simple wardrobe, when a boy by the name of Philip Clemmons rode up to the door in great haste.

"Abner," said he, "has fallen from a tree, and has hurt himself so bad that we are afraid 'twill kill him. Nobody is at home but mother and the children, and she wants your uncle and aunt to come right over to our house as quick as they can."

"Where is your father?" inquired Alice, to whom this message was addressed.

"Gone off, surveying land, and doesn't expect to be back under a week."

"Wait a minute, and I will speak to them," said Alice.

"We cannot deny going," said Mr. Walworth.

"No," replied his wife. "But I am sorry it happens so that we are obliged to be absent the last evening Alice is to be here."

The exigence was too imperative to admit of evasion or delay, and in a few minutes, Mr. Walworth mounted on his fleetest saddle-horse, with his wife, according to the fashion of the times, seated behind him on a pillion, was on his way to visit the afflicted family.

The two boys, Benjamin and Joseph Walworth, and even Ella, voluntarily promised to sit with Alice, at least, till ten o'clock, to prevent her from feeling lonely; but by nine, Ella was obliged to confess that she could not keep awake any longer, and gladly accepted Alice's offer to release her from her promise. The boys held out manfully half an hour longer, and then succumbed.

Alice being left by herself, opened the large family Bible which lay on the table, and commenced reading a chapter. Though no one was present, she did not feel lonely, for she supposed that the servants, as was their custom, were assembled in the kitchen. Had she known that, taking advantage of her uncle and aunt's absence, they had gone to a little social gathering nearly a mile distant, she might, at least, have taken the precaution to fasten the outer doors, so that a traveller, or, perhaps, an Indian, could not lift the latch and enter her presence unawares.

She had read only a few lines, when she imagined that she heard footsteps. The sound was dull and heavy, as of some one crossing a piece of green sward which sloped down from one side of the house, and extended to a considerable distance. She sat facing the windows which looked out on this verdant slope, and raising her eyes from the sacred page, she listened a few moments for a repetition of the sound which had aroused her attention, and, in some degree, awakened her fears. The silence was now unbroken, save by that low, fitful moaning of the wind which is sometimes a precursor of a storm.

She had scarcely resumed her reading, when the sound of dull and heavy footsteps was repeated. She soon became sensible that some one was approaching the house. It might be, she thought, one of the hired men who worked on the farm, yet, as the steps drew near, a kind of nameless horror crept over her. A few moments more, and some one had stopped at the window, directly opposite to where she sat. At first, such was her terror that she dared not raise her eyes, but so intense was the silence that she could hear the quick-drawn, panting breath of the person without. When she did look up, she saw, as her fears had told her, the face of Gabriel Guthry pressed against the window-pane, with his almost white and glaring eyes fixed upon her. She rose, and springing to the door which opened into the front entry, fastened it. He was just turning away from the window, when she again looked towards it. She took the candle and hurried through the passage which led to the kitchen, where she expected to find the servants. As she entered at one door, Gabriel came in by the one opposite.

"You thought to escape me," said he, "but what is to be, cannot be eluded. It is decreed by fate that you are to be the wife, not of the wicked cavalier who is called Clarence Harleigh, but of me—me, Gabriel Guthry."

"How should you know that it is thus decreed?" said she, trembling with terror.

"I have read the page where the decree is recorded. I sought to read it, even at the risk of eternal perdition, and now I have come thirty miles to tell you."

"It is dreadful to hear you talk so. It frightens me!"

"Does it? Well, it may frighten you still more to hear how it all came about. Do you remember last Wednesday night? Do you remember how the wind howled, and what wild moans and mutterings there were in the air?"

"I remember there was a thunder-shower."

"Yes, it thundered and lightened, but no one knew," said he, with a grim smile, "that it was I who raised the tempest. You know how sorely I've been troubled in spirit on account of that Clarence Harleigh. I could bear it no longer, and so I went to a weird woman, even as Saul of old sought her of Endor, and she taught me how to perform a certain incantation. It was Wednesday night, and when I went to my room, I locked myself in, though I knew, by that time, deep sleep had fallen on all who were beneath the roof. I then trimmed my lamp, and according to the woman's directions, read a portion of the holy Scriptures backwards."

"O, you didn't dare do that?"

"I did dare do," he answered, with another of his grim smiles, which made Alice shudder. "Soon I heard wild and unearthly laughter, and then there was a rushing as of mighty winds cleaving the air. But I was not to be deterred. Having finished reading the cabalistic number of lines necessary for weaving the charm, I closed the holy book, and rising, I turned my face towards the east, while I repeated the incantation taught me by the woman:

"When the bell, in the haunted tower, that swings,
The solemn hour of midnight rings,
And the lover seeks the churchyard dim,
That his spirit bride may smile on him;
Then, spirits of air, if you have the power,
To my bedside bring, at that solemn hour,
The form of her who my true love's to be—
The form of her who my bride is to be:
Who in life, who in death, mine is ever to be—
Ever to be, though I lie in my grave;
Ever to be, for I'll rise from my grave.
When the bell, in the haunted tower, that swings,
The solemn hour of midnight rings,
And silently forth from the churchyard I'll glide,
And watch by the side of my bonny bride,
Till life's warm pulses freeze in her breast,
Then, side by side, in the grave we will rest."

As Gabriel repeated these wild lines, in a deep, sepulchral voice, the candle, which, unnoticed by Alice, had begun to burn dim in its socket, flared up suddenly, and then went out. But the half-consumed brands in the yawning fire-place emitted a fitful flame, and as it alternately lit up his countenance with a red glare, or threw over it a flickering gloom, she seemed, as if by the influence of some baleful spell, to be incapable of withdrawing her eyes from his face.

"And what then?" said she, speaking almost involuntarily, when he had finished.

"Already afar off, I could hear the roar of the tempest mingling with the moanings of the sea. It came nearer and nearer, there were thunderings and lightnings. I knew that the moment was at hand when my adjuration was to be answered. A faint glimmering of light was admitted through the only window in my room; and, as I lay with my eyes directed towards it, all at once there was a noise like an earthquake, and my bed shook under me. At the same moment, my room became light, as if it had been mid-day."

"It was the lightning."

"It was not the lightning, for it was steady and unwavering. I continued to keep my eyes fastened on the window, which formed no obstruction to the entrance of a shadowy form, which, with a slow, gliding motion, moved towards me, gradually growing more and more distinct, so that by the time she had approached close to my bedside, her lineaments were clearly defined."

"How horrible!" murmured Alice.

"I did not speak, but I looked into her eyes, till she bent down, down, down, till there was scarce a hand's breadth between her face and mine. Then, with a mighty effort, I spoke, and in the name of all that is holy, demanded of her what she wanted."

"Did she answer you?"

"No; but slowly raising her head, without removing her eyes from my face, she commenced moving back in the same gliding way that she entered. I saw her pass out at the window, when suddenly it became perfectly dark."

"Did you think you knew who it was?"

"'Twas you."

"You say that to frighten me."

"It was you that came in answer to my adjuration."

"It was a dream."

"'Twas no dream. You are to be my bride,

"In life and in death, my true love you'll be—
In life and in death, my bride you will be."

"When you are eighteen, I shall claim you."

"It will be in vain, for I will never marry you. I would sooner die!"

"What is decreed will be accomplished."

"I cannot be compelled to marry you against my will."

"When the hour comes, the will must bend to the decrees of fate. Mine you will be in life—mine in death."

Though those feelings of superstitious dread, which, under certain circumstances, more or less cleaves to all, had been much excited, she could not bring herself to believe that there could ever be any combination of circumstances which would require her to sacrifice all hope of earthly happiness, by uniting her destiny with that of Gabriel Guthry. With this thought she became calmer, though the scene at the glen caused her to feel in so much fear of him that she dared not any further dispute his assertion. She, therefore, merely remarked that it would be best to let things rest as they were, till the time which he mentioned arrived.

"I should be a fool to trouble myself about it," was his answer; "for what is to be will be, and when the set time shall be accomplished, who shall dare stand in my way?"

The glare of frenzy, which had been quelled for the last few minutes, was again burning in his eyes, when, with a feeling of inexpressible relief, she heard a horse coming towards the house. The next minute it stopped, and she knew that her uncle and aunt had returned. She ran and unfastened the door, but Gabriel did not wait till Mr. and Mrs. Walworth came in. He stole out at the back door by which he had entered. Alice threw herself into her aunt's arms, and burst into tears.

"Why so agitated, dear child?" inquired her aunt.

"O, I've been so terribly frightened! I thought I could keep calm before you came."

"What has happened to frighten you?"

"Gabriel Guthry has been here."

"He came without his brother's knowledge, then," said Mr. Walworth.

"He told me such a horrible story, and his eyes glared so frightfully!"

"Compose yourself, dear, and tell us what he said."

"Sit here, close by my side," said Mrs. Walworth.

In a few minutes, Alice so far succeeded in stifling the emotion which had so suddenly assailed her as to briefly recapitulate what Gabriel had told her. She was greatly relieved by what her uncle said in return.

"Do not fear, my child," said he, "that it will ever be the will of Providence that you should be united to a madman. Before the termination of the time he mentioned, some hallucination, equally wild with that which has now possession of his imagination, will undoubtedly divert his thoughts into a different channel."

Her aunt, too, spoke soothingly and encouragingly to her, and though neither of them said anything more than what she was already convinced of, it served to allay the extreme agitation produced by Gabriel's visit, and to turn her thoughts to the moment of separation, so near at hand.

CHAPTER XIII.

ALICE IN LONDON. HARLEIGH AND FALKLAND PRISONERS.

Mrs. Elliston, Mr. Walworth's sister, resided in a respectable though not fashionable quarter of the great British metropolis. Leaden clouds had all day darkened the autumn sky, from which, for the last half hour, had been falling a cold, drizzly rain, so that though only a little after four o'clock, candles had been brought into the apartment where Mrs. Elliston was sitting in an uncomfortable-looking, high-back chair, with some plain sewing resting on her lap.

It was a large, oblong room, and the low ceiling, with its heavy cornice and the black oak wainscot, gave it an air of gloom which the two wax candles and small wood fire failed to dissipate. Its cheerless aspect, however, harmonized well with the appearance of its only occupant. Her age was a little rising fifty, though she looked ten years older. Her pale and sallow complexion was not relieved by the pinched, stilly-starched border of her cambric cap, while her sad-colored gown and plain lawn kerchief were so arranged as to give her an air of great formality and precision.

She had been sitting thus, ten or fifteen minutes, when a little bustle was heard without; the door was opened by a staid serving-man, and a young, bright face, though a little clouded with anxiety, looked into the heavy, dull apartment. It almost seemed to Mrs. Elliston, who had risen from her chair, that a gush of sunshine had been let into the room.

"Alice, you remind me of Elizabeth," said she, taking the lovely girl by the hand and leading her forward into the room.

Alice, who saw in her pale, sedate countenance a resemblance to her uncle, whom she loved, notwithstanding his stern gravity, longed to throw herself in her arms, but the reserve of her manners awed and repelled her. She searched in vain for a single ray of the warm and genial light such as brightened and at the same time softened the countenance of her aunt Esther.

Mrs. Elliston assisted Alice to divest herself of her cloak and hood, and then pointing to a chair near the fire, requested her to be seated. As Alice answered her questions relative to her brother and sister-in-law, and her home in the new world, she could not forbear wondering, as she looked round the gloomy apartment, how the light of the young life which had so recently gone out beneath the same roof, could have been so bright and so golden as it was described to be in a letter written to her aunt by Edward Elliston, before his sister had been stricken by disease.

As this thought came into her mind, a servant entered and laid the table for three persons.

"It will be snugger and more comfortable to take our evening meal here than in the hall," remarked Mrs. Elliston.

Alice glanced at the table, and could not imagine whom the third plate could be for.

"My son came home yesterday," said Mrs. Elliston.

Alice looked surprised, for Mrs. Elliston had alluded to him in her letter, saying that he had been absent more than a year, and expected to remain where he was a year longer.

"He came unexpectedly," said she. "Some business required his presence. As soon as he has attended to it, he will return."

At this moment the door opened, and a young man, in the plain garb of the sect to which he belonged, entered the apartment. Yet though his dress was certainly not of a fashion or quality to show his person to advantage, Alice was struck with his graceful and noble bearing. He was tall, lacking, perhaps, an inch of six feet, and in every respect finely proportioned. His features were finely chiselled, and his rich, glossy hair was not so closely cut but that it showed its natural tendency to fall round his forehead, which was broad and very white, in free, wavy curls. His eyes, which were the changeful hazel, were bright, beaming and intellectual. At times they exhibited a singular sweetness of expression, rarely seen in connection with those traits of countenance full of character, which may be considered the perfection of manly beauty.

Alice thought that he evinced a little surprise at sight of her.

"My son," said Mrs. Elliston, turning to Alice, "and this, Edward, is Alice Dale, the orphan you have heard me mention, who, since she was three years old, has been my brother Nathan's ward."

Edward Elliston welcomed her in a manner so cordial and respectful, and there was a heartiness in the tones of his voice which was deep and musical, rather than soft and silvery, which in a man sometimes awakens suspicion that he is a dissembler, which fell very pleasantly on the ear of Alice, and at once inspired confidence.

"If mother had told me that she was expecting you," said he, "I would have gone for you myself, instead of having a servant sent."

"You know, Edward, that you have a cold," his mother hastened to say, "and it would have been unwise for you to expose yourself to this damp air, when we knew that Cuthbert could be depended on."

Alice assured him that the man who came for her paid every attention to her convenience and comfort, and that she should have regretted to have him expose himself unnecessarily on her account.

When they had taken their places at the table, Edward Elliston, previously to seating himself, said grace, which, without being extended to one of those long prayers which on similar occasions the Puritans often felt themselves called upon to make, and which, it is to be feared, instead of increasing the devotional aspirations of the auditors, only inspired a fear that the viands would grow cold and less savory, was reverent, comprehensive and appropriate.

At its close, Mrs. Elliston gave her son a look, as if she thought he had been too sparing of time and words.

"We are taught that we shall not be heard for our much speaking," said he, in answer to her look.

"True, my son, when the words are cold and formal, mere lip service. But when they are the fervent utterances of the heart, such as on similar occasions I have heard from the lips of your sainted father, we think not of the meat that perisheth, but of the hidden manna spoken of in the Apocalypse."

Though the food was abundant, it was plain, almost to coarseness, too great an indulgence in "creature comforts" being sinful, according to the views of Mrs. Elliston, who appeared to think that the fruits of a bounteous Providence were intended to test the power of those on whom they were bestowed to overcome temptation, rather than to be accepted by them and enjoyed as a blessing.

But Alice scarcely noticed the quality of the food that was before her.

JAPANESE WOMEN AND CHILD.

Even the remarks of Edward Elliston, which showed a rare delicacy of perception, joined to a liberal, well-stored mind as widely different from the narrow views of the more intolerant of the Puritans as the frivolity and unrestrained license which, in too many instances, characterized the degenerate cavaliers, could not prevent her thoughts from wandering to Clarence Harleigh.

At that very moment, she thought, he might be within fifteen minutes' walk of her, and yet she felt that, situated as she now was, amid the whirl and eddying tides of the great city, the broad Atlantic itself had scarcely formed a more insuperable obstacle to any chance meeting, while the promise exacted by her uncle, previously to her leaving home, precluded all thoughts of seeking to apprise him of her being in England. She, moreover, knew that in the letter from her guardian to his sister, of which she was the bearer (he having himself told her as much), Mrs. Elliston was requested to make use of such restrictions as would be likely to prevent her and Harleigh from being thrown together.

Clarence Harleigh and Gilbert Falkland, the night they left the banquet hall, were conducted by a pursuivant at arms to the shore of the Thames. A boat was in waiting, where were stationed several yeomen of the guard and the requisite complement of watermen to take them to the Tower. Though they had received a hint that their imprisonment would be short, not exceeding two or three days, or, at most, a week, it was in no enviable frame of mind that they took their places in the boat, which they were careful should be as remote from each other as the space would permit.

Swiftly propelled by the strong arms of the watermen, it was not long ere they were in the shadow of the gloomy structure, which loomed up dimly in the darkness and obscurity of night. Soon passing beneath the low and dismal arch that had so often cast its ominous shadow on the heads of the brave, the beautiful, and the innocent as well as of those who were stained with crime, the boat was brought close to the steps, against which the indolent waves broke with a sullen murmur. Here the lieutenant of the Tower stood ready to conduct them to the separate apartments which had been prepared for them.

"This is the chamber assigned to you," said he, addressing Falkland, his voice half lost in the harsh grating of the bolt as it was shoved back.

ADVENTURE WITH A SNAKE.

"I should like to have Redding, my valet, sent me early in the morning," said Falkland, to the lieutenant, as he entered the apartment, a limited space in the centre of which was faintly illumined with a rushlight burning on the table, leaving the remainder in impenetrable gloom.

"You will be kept under restraint for so short a time," was the reply; "other attendance than that of the warden will hardly be necessary."

"I don't fear any lack of attendance," said Falkland, "but I have a little business transaction that must be attended to, which, in the morning, I should have seen to myself had I been left at liberty so to do, and which I prefer to entrust to no one, except my valet."

"He shall be sent to you," was the answer; and turning away, he left the warden to close the door and replace the heavy bolt.

The room to which Harleigh was conducted differed little from Falkland's. It was, perhaps, a little larger and a little gloomier, while the walls, as he saw in the morning, were inscribed with the names of many an unhappy prisoner whose last and only egress from the dark prison-house was to the scaffold.

Falkland had just risen, when the warden admitted his valet.

"Ned Redding," said he, "step this way."

The valet obeyed, though without manifesting any great alacrity.

"You are surprised to see me here, I suppose?"

Judging by Redding's looks, he was not in the least surprised. His answer, however, was sufficiently courteous.

"It is," said he, "where many of the first gentlemen in the land have been before you."

"True, and with little or no expectation of ever regaining their liberty, while I shall be free again in a few days. Did you ever notice the little shop kept by Jeduthun, the Jew?"

"I have. I remember of going there for you once, before you went to America."

"Yes; you went to hire me a masquerade dress. He keeps them still, I believe, but I have something now more important for you to negotiate. Look at this."

"It appears to me to be a piece of green glass. Can it be worth anything?"

"Yes, more than a thousand times its weight in gold," and he held it in the sunshine that came into one of the windows, to bring into play its rich and vivid colors.

"It must be as you say. I never saw so magnificent a jewel."

"You must take it to the Jew, and with it, hand him this piece of paper, on which I have written the sum I expect him to give me for it."

"What if he should refuse?"

"There will be little danger of that. A single glance at the gem will show him that what I demand is only two-thirds its real value."

"Do you wish him to keep it for a certain time, so as to give you a chance to redeem it?"

"He isn't a pawnbroker, but he would do it, I suppose."

"I am certain that he would."

"It will be of no use," Falkland replied, after a few moments' reflection. "There is no prospect that I shall be able to redeem it, at present."

"It seems a pity to let it go, without any prospect of ever getting it back again."

"It is a hauble I can do without. The money I must have, or send a private petition to the king to keep me incarcerated. I thought the ruffianly fellow who won from me twice as much as I had the means of paying him, was off to the continent, instead of which, his ugly visage was almost the first face I caught sight of after I came ashore."

"And did he see you?"

"Fortunately he did not, but when I leave this place, I may meet him at any moment, and then there will be no more peace for me. He will be on my track wherever I go, like a sleuth hound."

"Shall I go to the Jew's now?"

"No; wait till my breakfast is brought me, so that I may save being stunned by an extra crash of bars and bolts."

In a few minutes, the warden entered with the prisoner's morning meal, and the valet, having been instructed by Falkland to make what haste he could, withdrew, and bent his steps towards the shop of Jeduthun, the Jew. It was in a narrow, dirty street, occupying the front portion of a mean-looking building, somewhat dilapidated, and running back a considerable distance.

It has been said that though the Jewish women are eminently handsome, the men, with few exceptions, have little to recommend them, as respects good looks. Jeduthun was one of these exceptions, his aspect being mild and pleasing, and his manners conciliatory, without being either cringing or hypocritical.

His wares, judging by those displayed on the shelves of his shop, or arranged elsewhere, were not of a first-rate quality, and there were some who knew that though the profits arising from their sale were his ostensible means of a livelihood, he in reality needed no such resource. It was merely to blind the eyes of those who would not have wanted a pretext to fleece him of his possessions, the same as they had those of many of the oppressed people to whom he belonged.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

Some critics are like chimney-sweepers; they put out the fire below, and frighten the swallows from their nests above; they scrape a long time in the chimney, cover themselves with soot, and bring nothing away but a bag of cinders, and then sing from the top of the house as if they had built it.—Longfellow.

THE SEA-GOD'S TEMPLE, AT HAKODADI, JAPAN.

NATIVES OF LOO CHOO.

ADVENTURES IN THE EASTERN HEMISPHERE.

The engravings on this and the preceding page are from a splendidly illustrated 8vo volume recently published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia, entitled "My Last Cruise: or, where we went and what we saw: being an account of visits to the Malay and Loo-Choo Islands, the coasts of China, Formosa, Japan, Kamschatka, Siberia, and the mouth of Amoor River. By A. W. Hahersham, Lieut. U. S. Navy, and late of the North Pacific surveying and exploring expedition." The reader will see at a glance what a broad and unhackneyed field the author has before him, and how many incidents so extensive a voyage must have yielded. The whole cruise was indeed one series of adventures, and our gallant lieutenant has "logged" it in a style spirited and graphic, strongly dashed with genuine humor. It is a work of rare fascination, and it is difficult to leave it, after you have once commenced its perusal. Besides numerous wood engravings, executed in the highest style of art, there are several superb steel plates, including a most beautiful emblematic title-page, rendering the volume attractive in every way. In the course of his very modest preface, the author explains the object of the expedition of which he was an officer. "To test the accuracy of charts extant, to prepare others of unknown coasts, to lift the veil that hung between civilization and the customs and habits of isolated tribes and nations, and to collect data from unfrequented parts of our globe for the advancement of science, the government of the United States sent out the North Pacific Surveying and Exploring Expedition, and the following pages are simply intended to show where it was that we went, and what it was that we saw, while engaged in the attainment of these objects." Lieut. Hahersham's narrative is thus a popular one, leaving the scientific record to other pens. We shall not attempt to follow his career, but give a brief description of the engravings we have selected. The first picture, an "adventure with a snake," occurred on the island of Baneu, in the Indian Ocean, where the author and some men had landed for a hunting and exploring expedition. The lieutenant is startled by a piercing cry and rushes to the spot. "With bent frame and livid and distorted features, a strong man was gripping between his knees a bleeding hand. Terror had almost deprived him of speech, and seemed to have shaken his ordinarily stolid brain. He could only rock himself back and forth, and mutter in a hoarse whisper, 'a snake bit me! a snake bit me! a snake bit me!' It was a fearful sight. I looked around me for its author, and in my then excited state of mind quailed before the angry dash of its laden eyes. The snake was coiled around the half-stripped twig from which I had requested the man to pull a leaf, and, as the branch swung back and forth after the violent jerking away of the hand, he moved his flattened head and outstretched neck in keeping with the motion. His whole appearance was indicative of anger and readiness for further combat. I looked upon its flat head, its leaden body, its hostile eye, and its projecting fangs, and they turned to the bleeding hand. I felt that it was one of the deadly sort, and that a few hours more would probably add another to the missing men." The sufferer, however, is saved by a large dose of spirit and by sucking the venom from the wound. The next engraving delineates two Japanese women and a child, a specimen of the natives who met our author at landing. "And now we were in Japan," he says, "among the mysterious people who, for the last three hundred years had amused themselves by trying and otherwise harshly treating all shipwrecked mariners of whatever nation, and with whom the world was now beginning to renew its acquaintance after an isolation of centuries. It was a thrilling thought, the very idea of landing among them; and, although it was raining, several of us armed ourselves with umbrellas and took a boat for the beach. We landed between Kagasaki and the sea, and followed the beach until we reached the outskirts of the former, when we began to be struck by the great number of children and pretty girls that came forward to welcome us. They seemed quite anxious to see strangers, coming out of their houses, and lining our path with their fancifully-painted umbrellas overhead and their awkward silt-like sandals underfoot. There was considerable pertness, too, as well as curiosity, in their glances, but as a general rule their bearing was marked by anything but boldness. The people of this particular locality had seen so much of our countrymen, and apparently formed so favorable an idea of them during the two visits of Commodore Perry, that they now viewed us without fear; indeed, to have heard their questions and seen their pantomime, one would have imagined that the majority of them had been personally acquainted with the worthy commodore. They would pronounce his name quite plainly (Comdo Telly), and asked us, by signs, if we had ever seen him, giving us to understand in return, that they regarded him as a very powerful personage. Even the little children had now become reconciled to us (through associating with members of his squadron, we inferred), and approached us with perfect confidence. They would collect from all directions, as we passed, hold out their hands, with the salutation, 'How do you do?' or 'Ohio!' and, if noticed by a good-natured shake, would retire among the less adventurous with the steps of young heroes. They also, in many cases, evinced the utmost eagerness to pick up a few words of our language. One little fellow I remember in particular, who learned to count as high as ten in as many minutes; and the next day I found him on the sandy beach with a sharp stick, with which he was tracing 1, 2, 3, etc., as readily and accurately as many thick-headed schoolboys after a month of daily drubbing. He held in his left hand a slip of paper on which I had written him the numbers on the preceding evening, and, recognizing me as soon as I approached, made signs that he had no longer any use for those, and wanted me to put down some more. I looked at his childish frame, and bright, sparkling eyes, and began to conceive a high idea of Japanese brains. It is needless to add that myself and friend seated ourselves on a piece of ship-timber, and wrote him down the numbers ad infinitum, which he had no sooner received (the lead-pencil being added, to his lively joy) than he commenced counting on his fingers as high as each number, when, as we bent our heads in assent, he put the Japanese character opposite to each, and the whole being translated in that way, he smoothed off a place on the beach, and went to work with his sharp stick with a will that caused me to look back on my own truant-playing days and blush." The subject of the next picture is a "Sea-god's Cave at Hakodadi," a very curious place, but difficult of entrance. After some attempts, a portion of the party gave up the idea of entering it, and stood on a rock without, the remainder pushing their boat in. "Leaving one of the boys in the boat to keep her clear of the rocks, we now lit our candles and commenced climbing over the boulders towards the centre of the dome, where we could see the dim and uncertain outlines of a truncated cone, upon the top of which was perched something like an ordinary dog-kennel. This was by no means pleasant climbing, as one every now and then put his hand upon a knagrab, a young bat, or some object equally pleasant to the touch. Still, we climbed on, and finally reached the top. It proved to be a rugged mound, half rock, half earth, within whose closed portals we discovered a finely executed bronze casting of their sea-god. A number of copper cash were around about his sacred feet, and a gilded serpent twined about his head and secured its wide opened jaws over the stupid oriental eyes of the image. Altogether, it was a most singular looking 'josh.' Some of the party secretly determined to get possession of it before leaving port. But knowing that the Japanese spies kept their glasses on our every movement, and would visit the cave after night to see if we had carried off anything, we left empty handed." The fourth engraving exhibits the natives of Loo-Choo in their somewhat airy costume. The flying figure with the pig thrown over his shoulder indicates the terror which seized upon the natives at the sight of strange visitors. "Upon one occasion," says Lieut. Hahersham, "we were following a winding street, which brought us suddenly out upon the plaza, or marketplace of Nappa; and such a stampede as ensued I never before witnessed. The plaza probably covered a space of about two acres, and it was crowded with country people, with their pack-horses and truck-carts, and various articles which they had brought in for sale. The citizens, of all ages and sexes, were there also, making their purchases in their usual noiseless manner, and apparently wrapped up in their negotiations and bargains.

THE AINU, OR HAIRY KURILES.

Suddenly a confused feeling of alarm pervaded the whole square; strangers had appeared among them. Those who were near the opening of the street down which we came rushed pell-mell from us on either side, just as a crowd makes a passage for a mad bull. They left most of their things behind, though there was one fellow who took time to sling a pig over his shoulders, and one tall, finely-formed woman who gathered up her bundle of rice and walked off with majestic dignity. Those who were more distant from us mostly disappeared down neighboring streets or into friendly houses, though some had the courage to remain to pack their wares hurriedly before flight. I never before saw such a state of 'undecided alarm.' The next picture exhibits a couple of Ainu, or Kuriles, who have been described by various voyagers as differing from the generality of the Asiatics in having unusually heavy beards. Lieut. Hahersham doubts whether the hairy endowments of these people are as extensive as other writers have represented them. "As a general rule, they shave the front of the head a la Japanese, and though the remaining hair is undoubtedly very thick and coarse, yet it is also very straight, and owes its bushy appearance to the simple fact of constant scratching and seldom combing. This remaining hair is parted in the middle, and allowed to grow within an inch of the shoulder. The prevailing hue is black, but it often possesses a brownish cast, and these exceptions cannot be owing to the sun, as it is but reasonable to suppose that they suffer a like exposure from infancy up. Like the hair, their beard is bushy, and from the same causes. It is generally black but often brownish, and seldom exceeds five or six inches in length." They dress with great simplicity, and are very uncleanly. Their dispositions are mild, and they possess intellects of a high order. The last picture is a very spirited representation of a party waylaying a Siberian bear, and clubbing their guns to assail him as he advances to the attack. The adventure with the bear affords an opportunity for a very spirited and humorous sketch, occupying several pages of the book before us, to which we can only allude. We can assure those of our readers who have not yet read Lieut. Hahersham's volume that they have a treat in store, while the elegant style in which it is got up renders it an ornament to any drawing-room table. The book is selling largely.

WAYLAYING A SIBERIAN BEAR.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LINES.

BY CLARA RICHTER.

The sun shooes fair in lotus land,
And shadow there is never seen;
Pearls glitter in the snow-white sand,
And lilies dot the vales of green.

O would you thither with me go?
If so, come take me by the hand,
Shut out the world of work, and lo!
In fancy, we're in lotus land.—WILLIS E. PADON.

I'll place mine hand within thine own,
And fearless tread "the snow-white sand;"
If in one heart may be my throne,
And I sole queen in lotus land.

A wreath of lilies gold and blue,
Shall be my crown, and bind my braids;
And my heart-flowers bloom pure and true,
As lotus leaf "that never fades."

In dreamy hours of sweet repose,
Bright, rainbow fanes, serene and grand,
Shall glow and flash in light that flows,
From radiant skies of lotus land.

O I will "thither with thee go,"
Won by the light upon thy brow;
Forgetting, freed from grief and woe,
The tollsome past—the joyless now.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE YANKEE CRUISER.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

SOME years ago, while strolling about the grounds of the Greenwich Hospital, my attention was attracted toward a veteran sailor, with white hair, a wooden leg, and but one eye, who was seated upon a bench busily engaged in knitting a pair of mittens—a common occupation with the unseaworthy tars who are there laid up in ordinary, who by the sale of their easy manufactures are enabled to supply themselves with an extra allowance of tobacco and other groceries.

With a view to striking up a conversation with the old fellow, I seated myself by his side and opened negotiations for the purchase of the mittens, one of which was wholly and the other about half completed, I to wait where I was till they were finished. To this arrangement he willingly consented, all the more readily, perhaps, that I offered him somewhat more for them than I knew he asked. Our conversation having for some time run upon a variety of subjects neither instructive nor amusing, at length turned upon the subject of short passages and fleet ships, when I ventured to remark that, in my opinion, American ships led the world in that respect.

"Why, yes, those Yankee chaps do rather take the wind out of our sails on that tack," he replied, as he clumsily wiggled his needles and fingered the yarn. "But the loog and the short of the matter is just here, d'ye see; it comes nat'ral to 'em, like, to build clippers, and always has ever since they had a navy. I remember as long ago as when I was a little oakum boy, not much bigger than a plug of tobacco, how one of their frigates hurried up our time for us. It was war time, you know, and we were employed conveying the transport ships from port to port. Thirty or forty sail of all sorts had collected in the harbor of Cadiz, and our craft, together with a sloop of war, was sent over from the rock, where we were laying, to take them back to Portsmouth. Well, we laid at Cadiz a week or more waiting for a fair wind, and at last we got it, though rather light and puffy; but the commodore, not willing to wait any longer, hoisted the blue star at the fore, and all hands up anchors and sails, and stood out of harbor. All went nice and slick as a greased lanyard until we got to the north of Portugal and the coast of Spain, when one night, just after sundown, it was reported that there was a strange sail in the midst of the convoy. There had been a rumor currently reported among the officers on the station, that there was an American frigate cruising in those latitudes, and this was supposed to be the identical craft.

"You may be sure there was a jolly row when it became certain there was a stranger among us; for it was just coming on night, and there was no end to the mischief he might do among the convoy before morning; for I suppose you know, and then again perhaps you don't know, that, where thirty or forty craft are sailing together, they don't sail together at all; no, not by a heap. The longest legged among them will take the lead and keep it through the day, while the dull sailors lag behind, so that by night the fleet may spread over a surface of a dozen miles or so.

"Well, we signaled the commodore, and the commodore signaled us, back and forth, in a terrible hurry and flutter; then both of us signaled with all our might for the convoy to close. They took the alarm fast enough, and such a shortening of sail by those ahead, and making of sail by those astern, never was seen before or behind. Luck was on our side, and by the time it was dark the whole fleet, safe and sound, was clustered about us for protection, like a litter of chickens about a couple of old hens at the appearance of a hawk. As it was more than likely the stranger, if an enemy, which was pretty certain, would try to play a sort of Tom Cox's traverse among us in the dark, we beat to quarter aboard both ships, and cleared for action. The guns were cast adrift, loaded and double shotted; the lower and topsail yards were secured to the mast-heads, preventer braces rove at the yard-arms; shot racks were filled; powder monkeys formed lines to the magazine, and the men stood to the guns in momentary expectation of a brush with somebody.

"Well, we stayed at quarters all night, blowing our matches, chewing pig-tail, spinning fighting yarns, and peaking out of the ports for a sight of the enemy, till the morning watch. Soon as the gray dawn began to wink up a little in the east, we had a quarter-master on each topgallant yard to take a spy-glass view of matters and things; and it hadn't got to be good fair sunrise before they reported a strange sail, with queer, towering skysail poles, right ahead, three miles distant. As soon as we got this information the commodore signaled that he would stand away to port a bit, take a sweep round and head off this chap, whoever he might be, while we were to lay to where we were to protect the convoy and prevent the stranger escaping by working astern of us. Having thrown out all his flying kites to the light breeze, he bore up into the wind and got the weather gauge, and meantime, all hands aboard our craft were piped to grog and breakfast. Before we had got our grub fairly into us, we were heat to quarters, and tumbling up on deck, we saw, by the increasing light, the commodore and the stranger at broadside and broadside, not above a quarter of a mile from each other, but about two miles ahead of us, with their ports open, their guns run out, and all ready to fire. Both vessels now began to shorten sail for action. Studding sails were taken in, topgallant sails and royals furlled, and courses hauled up in the buntines. Neither ship had yet displayed its national flag; but as the commodore drew within close cannonade shot, he ran up the good old gridiron at the peak, and fired a couple of shot across the stranger's bow. This brought him to the conclusion to hoist his colors, which he did, at the peak end; and there, sure enough, was the saucy stars and stripes. The bunting had hardly time to shake itself before the commodore let drive his whole broadside slap bang right into him, and then luffed, to come about to deliver his other broadside.

"Now perhaps you may know what is meant by a raking fire, and then again perhaps you may not," continued my timber-toed acquaintance, after a pause to count the rows of stitches in his mitten, in order to know whether he was "narrowing" properly. "It's like this; suppose there was a flock of birds a cable's length or so ahead of you, on the green there, and they all stood in a row, two or three fathoms apart; now if the row was broadside on, it's plain that you wouldn't be able to knock over but one of them; but if you were to creep away round by the gate there, so as to bring them in a line, you'd stand a good chance to take the whole bunch, d'ye mind. Well, it's the same way with a ship; if you fire into her beam, the shot goes in at one side and out at the other, and the most that gun can do is to capsize one gun and the men that work it, while if the ball went in at the bow or stern it would walk the whole length of the deck, taking its pick of any or all of twenty or thirty guns on a side, and the two or three hundred men that stood by them. The confounded Yankee knew this as well as anybody else, and so held his fire until the commodore, after letting strip at him, luffed to heave in stays so as to bring his other broadside to bear, when just as he had got his jibboom end in the wind's eye, Mr. Stars and Stripes just yawned a little and poured his whole starboard battery right through the cabin windows, the balls dancing slap slap the whole length of the deck, capsizing guns, men and marines below, while chain and grape and causter cut up the rigging shockingly aloft. That broadside couldn't have come in a worse time, for the ship being just upon the point of coming about, with everything flat aback, the surprise and confusion—to say nothing of the braces being cut—prevented their swiveling the main topsail yard at the proper moment, so, of course, they missed stays, and were in irons in no time. This was at once taken advantage of by the Yankee, who hauled sharp on the wind and stood across the commodore's bows, at the same time pitching in just shot enough to knock the bowsprit out of her, and then scooted away to windward, taking the weather gauge of the whole of us.

"No doubt you've seen plenty of people when they felt middling cross, before now, but I'll bet a mug of beer you never saw a madder man than the commodore was just about that time. The way the signals flew up and down from his masthead must have kept the signal mid's claws out of his breeches pockets, now I tell you. We were signaled to stand to windward, to head off and engage the enemy while the commodore made the necessary repairs and preparations to come to our assistance. In obedience to the order, we cracked on all sail, and on a taut bowline stood up to windward, steering full and by. We kept up the chase for an hour or so; but bless you it was no use. The thundering Yankee drew ahead three knots to our two, and as we were getting too far away, the commodore signaled for us to come back; for being with convoy it was against the admiral's orders to quit the fleet on any account, no matter what prize offered. So, firing a couple of shots, out of spite, we squared away and run back to our place.

"All that day the enemy hovered on our weather beam; sometimes coming within long range, when we would have a crack at him, and then running hull down ahead of us. But when night came on he took up his position about two miles to windward, and shortening sail, jogged along at about the same speed that we made. While danger was so nigh it was of course no time to sleep; and having gathered the convoy into the smallest possible space, we stood at quarters all night, making an industrious use of our spare time by swearing lustily at the enemy for keeping us out of our regular snoozing spells. We made certain sure of having work on our hands that night. But no, the night passed away as peaceably as could be, and morning came, bringing with it about as thick a fog as ever was seen in this or any other world, without it be on the Grand Bank.

"This was a fine fix for us. In the night we could signalize each other with lanterns, but in such thick weather we could indicate our position only by fog horns and ship bells, which were blaring and jingling in all directions. After a sight of trouble and poking about, we managed to communicate with the commodore, and got orders to stand away to starboard, outside the fleet, while the commodore took a similar position on the larboard side, bringing the whole convoy between us. Guided by the sound of horns and bells, we dodged slowly along, and in about an hour got outside of everything, when we hoisted the main topsail to the mast and waited as patiently as we could. Well, the forenoon slipped away, eight bells was struck, and nothing had gone amiss—at all events, no guns had been fired within a dozen miles of us, and we were beginning to think the enemy had quit us altogether, when, happening to be aloft on the fore-topgallant yard, making up some stray gaskets, I felt a smart puff of wind in my face. 'Hillo,' thinks I to myself, 'we're going to get a breeze at last,' and looking in the direction from which it came, which was ahead of the fleet, I saw the fog-clouds twisting and curling as they lifted rapidly from the water; I fancied I saw, too, through a break in the fog, the tall mastheads of the Yankee; but as I got only a little mite of a glimpse and then lost it, I couldn't of course be sure, and so said nothing about it. The next minute a strong, whirling cat's paw from the coming breeze pitched right down upon the water where we lay, driving the fog, like a thick wall, away from us, and giving us a fair sight for some distance. There lay all our convoy, safe and sound, and away some two miles on the other side lay the commodore, with his main topsail to the mast, but nothing was to be seen of the Yankee. You know I told you that the puff of the rising breeze drove away the fog like a wall—pushing it back, like, so that we had a thick bank all around us.

"Well, just as we were getting ready to fill away and stand on our course, there came a great roar from two or three of the ships nearest to us, and looking to windward we saw, poking out of the fog-bank, first the jibboom, then the bowsprit, then the bows, and then the whole fore and aft of the confounded Yankee. With studding sails, royals and skysails set, the stars and stripes flying at her peak, and bringing a stiff breeze with her, she was rattling down right into the middle of the convoy. Now you recollect the fleet of convoy was in the middle and the commodore and ourselves were on each side, so that while the enemy was close on the fleet between us, we were something like a mile away from him. That wasn't bad range, however, to begin on, and soon as we got a fair sight at the critter's flag, the first luff sings out: 'Ready about. Stand by your braces. Put the helm down!' While, as the ship began to round to, the captain rushed to the main hatch, roaring like a bull of Bashan: 'Stand by your guns below there, men. Extreme train to the right. Elevate. Wait for the word!' then after a minute, 'Fire!'

"All the matches fell upon the priming at once; the double-shotted broadside making our craft shake and tremble like a big nigger under oath. Almost at the same minute, the commodore hove in stays, on the other side, and let strip his battery. But in the hurry, and at such long range, the shot from both ships flew pretty wild, doing little damage; and the Yankee, right before the wind, with every sail drawing, tore right in among the helpless fleet of unarmed vessels, rattling away with his guns on both sides, rip to split, making the spars, sails, and splinters fly at an awful rate. By this time we had got the breeze that brought him down among us in such handsome style, so that we could now work ship and manoeuvre as quick as we chose. But what could we do? We had a good bit to run to lay him aboard, and, as he was right in among the fleet, we couldn't fire a shot without doing a thousand times more damage to our own convoy than to him. There was nothing for it but to square away, make all sail, and run to leeward to head him off, which we did; while he was running through the thick of the fleet, playing the very old scratch, ponning in tons of iron, and knocking about spars and masts like tenpins. But, good lord! we might as well have tried to head off a jack-o'-lantern. By the time we had got to the rear of the fleet, he was two-thirds of a mile ahead of us, scooting away like a gull. And what d'ye think the impudent scamp did then? Why, I'm blowed if he didn't begin to shorten sail, just to show us what he could do in the way of sailing, and even then he could have sailed round and round us; and not content with that, he hoisted the English flag under the American, and while we, mad as blazes, and for good reason, too, threw shot and shell at loog range, just out of spite, he added insult to injury by keeping just out of range, and firing blank charges at us. Having played with us that way for an hour or two, he hauled his wind for the nor'ard and west'ard, and that was the last we saw of him, although we were compelled to lay pretty near in the same position for a week, to repair, before we could budge an inch. We heard of him, though, when we got home, for he'd gone up the channel, knocking about the colliers and revenue cutters like fun, and even landing upon the coast and carrying off people and property just as if he owned them. Here's your mittins, sir," he continued, as he "slipped and bound" the last three stitches, and broke off the yarn, leaving a long string at the toe of the clumsy hand stocking.

"Well, here's your money."

"Bliged to yer honor—thank yer honor."

"Do you recollect the name of the Yankee ship of which you have been speaking?"

"Well, no, yer honor, I've forgotten, if I ever did know what the ship's name was; but I think her captain's name was Jones, or something like that—Peter Jones, I reckon."

"Wasn't it Paul Jones?"

"Ah, yes, 'twas Paul, yer honor's right. Ye see I knew it was one of the 'postles, but I'd forgot which. Good-day t'ye honor."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

IMPROMPTU.

NO MORE SHALL YE BIND THESE WILD TRESSES OF MINE!

BY IRVING MONTAGUE

What! think ye to bind these wild tresses again,
 Because they were wreathed once on Fashion's high shrine?
 The torturing headbands were plighted in pain—
 No more shall ye bind these wild tresses of mine!

There's a spirit of freedom aloft on the wind,
 And a spirit of poesy corks on the wave;
 My tresses are free as a thought of my mind
 Unfettered and free—I am nobody's slave!

Ye may wreath them with flowers from the wildwood and glen,
 Or bedeck them with leaves from the frost's painted shrine;
 But away with your fetters—ye conjure in vain!
 No more shall ye bind these wild tresses of mine!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PROPHECY AND ITS FULFILMENT.

BY MRS. J. D. BALDWIN.

DESTINED from her birth to every vicissitude of fortune, Frances d'Aubigne was born in the prison of Niort, where her father, of an ancient but decayed family of Guyenne, was at the time confined for debt; his attached young wife persisting in remaining with him, the little Frances was conveyed by her aunt, Madame de Vilette, to her residence, and there treated with all care till her father's liberation, four years after, when he embarked from Bordeaux, with his wife and child, for the island of Martinique.

Entering into a mercantile house soon after his arrival in the colony, M. d'Aubigne amassed a considerable fortune, which enabled him to give his daughter a brilliant education, to which, since she was not at any period beautiful, must be attributed all her after prosperity. Fortune, that at first favored, again proved fickle, and M. d'Aubigne dying in indigence when Frances was in her fourteenth year, she returned with her widowed mother to France.

Shortly after their arrival at Bordeaux, Madame d'Aubigne married a farmer by the name of Gomart, with whom she retired to a small farm at Vaucouleurs. Fortunately for Mademoiselle d'Aubigne, she had a rich god-father named Dumouneau, who undertook, in consequence of her unwillingness to go to the country, to defray the expenses of her board and the completion of a finished musical education, at the convent of Saint Aure, where he placed her. While there she was earnestly solicited to take the veil, the abbess thinking her god-father would endow her richly, but Frances had other and more ambitious views, an old negress in Martinique having predicted that she would become a queen of France.

M. Dumouneau was a widower, and having no home to which to bring the young girl, whose head, full of ambitious dreams, soon tired of the monotony of a convent, he advised her to return to her aunt, Madame Vilette, then a dressmaker in Paris.

Being without asylum or resources, Mademoiselle d'Aubigne felt obliged, notwithstanding her distaste, to return to the roof that had sheltered her infancy, where the very nature of her occupation, the many brilliant women she assisted to unrobe while fitting on dresses of costly fabrics, their indiscreet remarks of her own fine figure and graceful manners, all served to disgust her with her surroundings, while contributing to the notion that she was fitted to move in a less humble sphere. With sentiments like hers, it was not long before she contrived to get introduced to the petite soupers of a lady of quality, where she attracted the attention of Paul Scarron, the most celebrated wit of the day. So indifferently was she always dressed, that Scarron, though himself poor, occupying two small chambers in the Rue de la Tisseranderie, offered, on the supposition of her poverty, to either pay her board, if she wished to return to the convent, or to marry her.

But no idea had Mademoiselle d'Aubigne of going back to the convent. Accepting the offer of marriage with tearful gratitude, the accomplished and graceful girl of sixteen hastened with joyous alacrity to her aunt, to borrow a gown wherein to be married to the aged and deformed writer, who, overwhelmed with ailments, could scarce rise from his elbow-chair. The poet's poverty did not prevent the most intellectual people from visiting him in his humble apartments; while she, tired alike of the cloister and her aunt's work-rooms, gladly accepted the "pauvre paralytique," as she called him.

For ten years, she shone the bright particular star of the brilliant society that gathered at the poet's house, when his death leaving her very poor, in her twenty-sixth year, she was obliged to seek a home on the little farm at Vaucouleurs.

On arriving at the farm, she was welcomed by her mother and step-father; but the odor of the farmyard with which his smock frock and leathern gaiters were reeking, reminded her painfully that she must in future bear with patience much she had not been accustomed to.

"Why did you not listen to the proposal of the notary's nephew your aunt writes me of?" asked her mother, after they were seated at the supper table.

"What trade has he got?" asked the farmer.

"He is a clerk in a great banking-house in Paris, aunt says; it is an excellent situation."

"Then why not take him, if his salary is sufficient to live on?" put in her mother.

"Because I have hopes that the Duke of Villars will get me appointed into the suite of Mademoiselle de Nemours, when she goes to Portugal to be married to Alphonso VI."

Evening came, and while the young widow arranged her few things with a heavy heart, in the small attic room allotted to her use, all unheeding the perfume of flowers or the song of the Provencal thrush that stole to her ear, she yet caught the sound of merriment from below; they were laughing at her folly in presuming to suppose she could influence Marshal Harcourt, or Villars. She felt she was a stranger there, since they talked only of persons and things in which she felt no interest; and while she sat in the dingy room, silently thinking on her late brilliant society, she determined to escape from her present abode, which to her seemed stagnation.

Without acquainting any one of her intentions, she wrote two letters that night, one to her aunt, requesting an asylum till she could obtain some suitable situation; the other to her friend Ninon de l'Enclos, begging her to use her influence to obtain for her the place of lady's companion at the Hotel Richelieu.

Receiving permission to return to her aunt in Paris, Madame Scarron again betook her to the needle, which, however, she gladly resigned for the appointment procured by Ninon de l'Enclos, her duties being to attend to seeing the fires replenished and to order the carriages of visitors, bells not having at that time been introduced. While serving in this menial capacity, her grace and intelligence, together with her indigence, subjected her to many temptations. Fouquet, the minister of finances, sent her a superb casket of jewels, which the young widow indignantly returned, repulsing, too, the offer of a suite of apartments in the hotel of Marshal d'Albret.

Retiring to a retreat in the Hospitalliers, she for a while tried to live content on the small pension granted to her as the poet's widow, by Anne of Austria; but the death of the queen-mother plunged her once more into utter indigence. The beautiful Marchioness Montespan, hearing that her name was inscribed on the charitable list of the parish of Saint Eustache, solicited the king, Louis XIV., to permit her to remove to her hotel in the Rue Vaugirard, Paris, to take charge of the young Duke de Maine. Joyously did the widow Scarron grasp at this offer, since it brought her near a court, while her office of governess of the Duke of Maine would insensibly bring her frequently there, leading her to the king's cabinet, in order to report of the health and progress of her royal pupil.

Aware that the queen, Maria Theresa, especially favored those who spoke the Spanish language, which from disuse she had nearly forgotten, Madame Scarron diligently applied herself to its re-acquirement. Affecting the utmost austerity of morals, she so contrived to please the unsuspicious queen, that she invited her frequently to the palace, spending much of her time with the intelligent widow; as for Louis himself, he so disliked what he termed her "prudrie," that he begged Madame de Montespan not to reply to any observation or remark of the governess, in his presence, beyond a monosyllable; while Maria Theresa, delighted with having secured an ally from whose humble position and retiring manners no evil could accrue, thought of appointing her maid of honor to Madame Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans.

Henrietta, daughter of Charles I, of England, at that time but seventeen years of age, bore in her beautiful features and provoking languor, that fatal impress of sadness that marked the Stuarts. When parliament, under Cromwell, had beheaded her father, she was brought to France by her mother—a daughter of Henry the Great—and wedded in her sixteenth year to the king's brother, the Duke of Orleans. Yet though calmly enduring the insipid society of her husband, Maria Theresa noted with extreme pain that the young and beautiful Henrietta of England was admired by Louis XIV., who was her cavalier at all court balls and fetes, and with a view towards breaking off the infatuation, she encouraged the presence of Madame Scarron, as being a woman of sufficient intelligence to interest, while too simple in her manners and of too humble origin to enthrall.

Meantime Louis, who detested the demure widow, indemnified himself for the surveillance kept over his attentions to Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, by amusing his lonely hours in the bewitching society of the brilliant and beautiful Francoise, Athenais, daughter of the Duke de Mortemar; descended from a family of high rank, remarkable for her intellectual acquirements and elegant facility in conversation, her acuteness of ideas and brilliant repartee, rendering her a most agreeable companion to the king, wearied with the dull stupidity of a court.

She contrived to win the good opinion of the queen by an assumed attachment to her husband, the Marquis of Montespan, rarely appearing in public, unless accompanied by him or her dual father, the governor of Paris. The grandeur of the superb marchioness contrasted strongly with the simplicity of the youthful Henrietta of England, who scarce lived to feel or bewail the king's neglect, dying early, generally supposed by poison administered by a second aspirant to her regard, the Chevalier de Lorraine.

All this time our heroine was working her way, slowly but securely, at court. By an assumed austerity of dress and manner, she was so skillful as to give the queen a high opinion of her correct principles, by a strict observance of religious duties. And though Louis himself appreciated her care of the young Duke of Maine, he otherwise had so unconquerable a dislike to her affected prudery, that when she first came to acquaint him of her pupil's progress, he could barely support her presence.

Yet though he never replied to any observation of hers, save by a gruff monosyllable, still did our ambitious widow cling to the Martinique fortune-teller's prediction that she would be a queen; and placing implicit faith in the prophecy, she continued her haughty manners, entering boldly into discussions in his presence, with the marchioness, respecting the mode of training her young charge, endeavoring to annoy the beautiful mother of the boy-duke, who, however, always forgave her, loading her with favors—even pressing the king with courageous perseverance for presents for "la belle Julienne," as she called the graceful, haughty widow.

Having frequent access to his cabinet, her office of governess, despite his dislike, at last led to lengthened conversations, in which Madame Scarron discovered the king's superstitious devotion to religious observances, and she skillfully used the discovery to lead imperceptibly towards the realization of her ambitious dreams. Ever faithful to religious observance, while forgetting its precepts, Louis XIV., who ever alternated between error and repentance, was at last won by her placid manner and urgent remonstrance, to return to his allegiance to his truly royal and devoted queen. It was, however, but a short dream of happiness for Maria Theresa, who still testified her sense of the obligation, by many an act of friendship towards our heroine.

Solaced by the presence of her husband, who addressed her in Spanish, the language she loved, Maria Theresa appeared to re-animate for a while, but grief had made too sure inroads on her constitution, and Louis, declaring that she never could him grief, but when she died, retained ever after the utmost veneration for her memory. Too polite to remain at court while the king's first paroxysm of remorse lasted, Madame Scarron requested permission to take her pupil to Harfanges, for the benefit of sea-bathing. When she returned, after an absence of some weeks, the young duke's health was so much improved by the change, that the former dislike of the volatile king for his governess changed to a contrary sentiment.

In 1679, Louis gave the ambitious widow apartments in the palace, in order that he might enjoy the charm of her conversation without restraint. The beautiful marchioness was exiled through her arguments, under the cloak of religion, the queen was dead and forgotten, while she, ever using the two powerful arguments, religion and superstition, drew the weak monarch to herself, until her path to the throne was uninterrupted and sure.

When Louis offered her the post of dame d'honneur to the dauphine, our ambitious widow refused it with contempt! There was but one place she thought worthy her acceptance; the king was a widower, her cavalier everywhere, wearing her colors, walking bareheaded by the side of her sedan-chair;—what cared he that the court was furious;—that the people rebelled at seeing the sons and daughters of France standing around her chair, uncovered in her presence? Working on his superstitious tendency, she had obtained his promise to make her queen, and though their marriage was obscure, it was none the less authentic.

In 1684, Frances d'Aubigne, born in a prison, reared in exile in Martinique, the destitute widow of a poor playwright, her name on a village charity list, was united in marriage at Versailles, to Louis XIV. of France, the archbishop, Harly, of Paris, pronouncing the benediction.

Though her marriage was not made public, nevertheless Madame de Maintenon (as she was styled from a marquise conferred previous to her marriage) affected all the prerogatives of a queen, receiving the homage of ministers and ambassadors, as such. And yet, though almost seated on the throne, she wrote to Ninon de l'Enclos, that she envied her peaceful independence, and to her brother, that it was a calamity to be obliged to amuse one "no longer amuseable."

Her power absolute, she profited by it to marry her niece to the Duke of Noailles, with whom she passed much of her time, no longer dissembling the enmity she felt in the king's society, who in his last years found his once brilliant palace deserted, his faithful, devoted surgeon, Mareschal, alone remaining with him; while his wife held her stern court at Saint Cyr, deriving much consolation from the reflection that, since the virtuous Fenelon had had the courage to exact an oath from his sovereign never to proclaim her queen, she had at least sent him into exile; since save in being proclaimed, the Martinique fortune-teller's prediction was verified, and she was queen of France.

LONGEVITY OF STUDENTS.

It is a popular error to suppose that scholars and literary men are shorter lived than other men. But the fact is "on the contrary quite the reverse." Consider for a moment that the chais, compared with what are called the "professions," is but a small one, and compared with the "trades," is very small indeed—and then mark the result. Hardly an eminent author of modern times but affords an example of longevity. Byron and Keats, it is true, died young—the latter by consumption, the former by irregularities that would have killed anybody. But Wordsworth, Southey, Tom Moore and James Montgomery lived to an advanced age. Rogers, at his decease, was above ninety, and De Quincey, Walter Savage Landor and Humboldt are still alive and at work, at past three-score and ten. Our own country furnishes similar examples in Benton, Silliman, Irving, Halleck and Pierpont—all old men—but still strong in health and mental vigor. The truth is, men oftener rust out than wear out, and there is no doubt that habitual mental employment tends to keep the body young both in fact and appearance. Students very rarely suffer from study, but, in common with the rest of mankind, are not proof against physical laziness.—N. Y. Gazette.

FEMALE DELICACY.

Above all other features which adorn the female character, delicacy stands foremost within the province of good taste. Not that delicacy which is perpetually in quest of something to be ashamed of, which makes merit of a blush, and simpers at the false construction its own ingenuity has put upon an innocent remark; this spurious kind of delicacy is far removed from good sense; but the high-minded delicacy which maintains its pure and undeviating walk alike among women and in the society of men—which shrinks from no necessary duty, and can speak when required, with a seriousness and kindness, of things of which it would be ashamed to smile or blush—that delicacy which knows how to confer a benefit without wounding the feelings of another—which can give aims without assumption, and pains not the most susceptible being in creation.—Horne Journal.

PRINCIPAL STREET IN SAULT STE. MARIE, MICHIGAN.

SAULT SAINTE MARIE, MICHIGAN.

We present our readers on this and the next page with a series of very interesting views of Sault Sainte Marie, drawn in Mr. Hull's best style, from sketches made upon the spot expressly for the Pictorial by a gentleman familiar with the localities. The first picture represents the principal street in the village, with the rail track in the centre, and characteristic groups of figures, including some Indians, who are not unfrequent visitors to the settlement. Then come two representations of the canal, with the locks, weirs and adjacent buildings, and in one of them, that representing the lower entrance, we have a full-rigged and gaily-decorated steamer passing on her way. The series closes with a faithful delineation of Fort Brady.—Sault, or Sault Sainte Marie is a post-village, and capital of Chippewa county, Michigan, situated on St. Mary's River or strait, four hundred miles north-northwest of Detroit and about eighteen miles from the entrance of Lake Superior. The rapids at this place have a descent of twenty-two feet within the distance of a mile, and form the natural limit of steamboat navigation. Before the great canal was constructed, the copper from the Superior mines was taken round the falls by railway, the cars being drawn by horses. The carrying trade was then considerable, and the prosperity of the town was owing to that fact. The place contains about eight hundred inhabitants, many of them being descendants of the old French "voyageurs," intermixed with the Indian blood. The village is pleasantly situated, and contains, besides the county buildings, churches for the Baptists, Methodists and Catholics, and one newspaper office. Steamboats frequently visit this place in summer with parties of pleasure. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in the fur trade and fisheries. In 1851, the value of imports was estimated at $151,134; that of exports at $340,800. The building of the ship canal was a most important enterprise, and will be prodigiously felt in this portion of the country. Saint Mary's Strait, on which the town is situated, separates Canada West from the upper peninsula of Michigan, and connects Lake Superior and Lake Huron. It commences at the southeastern extremity of the former lake, and after a general southeasterly course of sixty-three miles, enters Lake Huron by three channels. At some places it spreads out into little lakes, at others rushes through narrow rapids, or winds about beautiful islands. Its entire length is navigable by vessels drawing about eight feet of water, up to within a mile of Lake Superior. At this point the navigation is interrupted by falls—the "sault" of the river. Congress offered the State of Michigan 750,000 acres of land to construct a ship-canal round these rapids; and the State of Michigan contracted to give these lands, free of taxation for five years, to Erastus Corning and others, on condition of building the canal by the 19th of May, 1855. The work now completed, forms the last link in the intercommunication of the great lakes, and adds seventeen thousand miles of coast to our trade. The work in style is superior to anything of the kind on this continent, and the locks are supposed to be the largest in the whole world. The combined length of the three locks together is nearly one-third of a mile, all of solid masonry, twenty-five feet high, ten feet thick at the base, with buttresses at every twelve feet, six feet in width, all faced with cut white limestone of the first quality. The gates are each forty feet wide. The canal is one hundred feet at the top of the water, and one hundred and fifteen feet wide at the top of its banks. It is twelve feet deep, and the main body of the canal is excavated through solid rock of red sandstone. The largest steamboats and vessels which navigate the great lakes can pass through this magnificent canal with the greatest ease. The whole work was finished in little more than a year, a short space of time, considering the intervals of inactivity occasioned by the inclemency of the weather and the difficulties necessarily encountered. A vast saving of time and labor is effected by this work, as boats from the copper region can now pass directly to the ports on Lake Erie without re-shipping their freight at the "sault." A line of steamers has already been established, running from Cleveland and Detroit to the various ports of Lake Superior, and they are always crowded with pleasure-seekers who wish to enjoy the pure air of the northern waters. Every one knows that Lake Superior is the largest expanse of fresh water on the face of the globe. It has Minnesota on the west and northwest, the northern peninsula of Michigan on the south, and British America in all other directions. Its estimated area is thirty-two thousand square miles. Height above the sea level, six hundred and thirty feet; depth varying from eighty to two hundred fathoms. It is of very irregular shape. The northern shore is generally bold and elevated, and extends about twelve miles, penetrating almost unbroken ranges of cliffs, which vary from three hundred to fifteen hundred feet in height. The south shore is generally low and sandy, though occasionally interrupted by limestone ridges, the most remarkable of which, situated towards the eastern extremity, presents a perpendicular wall, three hundred feet high, broken by numerous caverns and projections, and forming, under the name of the Picture Rocks, one of the greatest natural curiosities of the United States. The central portion of the lake is clear of islands, but they abound on the south and north sides. In the former direction they are generally small, but in the latter, several, more especially the Isle Royale, are of considerable dimensions, and along with the indentations of the coast, afford good shelter for vessels. The water of the lake is remarkable for its transparency, and derives its supplies from a basin which is estimated at one hundred thousand square miles, and is drained by more than two hundred streams. About thirty of these are of considerable size, but they are all impetuous torrents, interrupted by narrows and falls. The only obstruction to navigation of the lake arises from the violent gales to which it is subject. It is well supplied with fish, principally trout, white-fish and sturgeon. The two former are of excellent quality, and have led to the establishment of a great number of fishing stations. The other principal export by the lake is copper, of which veins of great richness and extent have been discovered. The copper mines of Michigan, in the northern peninsula, to which the ship canal we have delineated will prove so great a benefit, are the richest in the world. They occupy a belt one hundred and twenty miles long and from two to six miles broad. A block of almost pure copper, weighing several tons, taken from these mines, is embedded in the walls of the national museum at Washington. A mass weighing one hundred and forty tons was uncovered in the North American mine in 1854. The same mineral is abundant in Isle Royale. One house shipped from this district, in five and a half months in 1854, two million seven thousand six hundred and thirty-six pounds; and in the nine years ending with 1853, inclusive, four thousand eight hundred and twenty-four tons were shipped. Silver has been found in connexion with the copper, yielding in one instance twenty-five, and another fifty per cent. of the precious metal. Iron of a very superior quality exists in a bed of slates, from six to twenty-five miles wide, extending westward for one hundred and fifty miles into Wisconsin. Though the mineral resources of Michigan are very imperfectly developed, yet lead, gypsum, peat, limestone, marl and coal are known to exist, the last in abundance at Corunna, within one hundred miles of Detroit. The utmost activity exists in the mining region of the northern peninsula, which has been intensely stimulated by the completion of the ship canal.—The last engraving of our series represents Fort Brady. It was built in 1823, and was at that time the most northerly fort in the United States. Its whitewashed buildings present a neat and cleanly appearance, characteristic of such establishments. A company of infantry is stationed there, but it is rarely called upon to perform active service. The Hudson Bay Company have a post on the opposite side of the river. It is a quadrangular enclosure, which, in addition to a dwelling and storehouse, contains several warehouses for furs. The St. Mary's Falls, or more properly speaking, rapids, present a picturesque appearance from below, the foaming water floating angrily over the rocks and between the numerous islands that fill the stream. The descent in a canoe was formerly attended with great danger, but the water has been slowly rising for years past, and the shoot is now performed without difficulty or peril. This is a favorite resort of the Indians for taking fish. They catch large quantities of trout, white-fish and siskowit, with dip-nets, several barrels being captured in a day. Such are the principal features of a locality interesting in every point of view.

EAST INDIAN THIEVES.

The East Indian thieves are the most expert in the world. The quartermaster-sergeant of a regiment at this station, was a very corpulent and heavy man. One night his house was entered by robbers, who not only cleared it of everything portable that was lying about, but absolutely stole the very bed-clothes from under the fat sergeant himself and his sleeping family, without disturbing one of them. When they awoke in the morning, they were lying on the bare mattresses. This is a common trick with East Indian thieves, and the way they manage it is this: The robber, before he enters a house or tent, first strips and anoints himself all over with oil—which is done in order that, in case any person should be awake and seize the intruder, he might be enabled to slip like an eel from his grasp. Thus prepared, he creeps into the dwelling as noiselessly as possible. The nights in India are generally very close and oppressive, and the sleep of most people, although heavy, is uneasy and disturbed. Of this the thief takes advantage. He quietly crouches down close under the bed, and with a feather gently tickles the nose of the sleeper, who, half-dozing, rubs it and turns on his couch. While he is doing this, the sheet on which he is lying is withdrawn a little from under him by the thief. When he is fast asleep again, a second application of the feather causes another turn, and again a little more of the sheet is pulled away. The thief then goes on the other side, and the tickling is continued until the sheet is completely withdrawn from under the unconscious sleeper. The operation takes some time, but is always so nicely managed that there is no case on record of the slumbler being awakened while the robbery was going forward.—Freeman.

UPPER ENTRANCE, SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

LOWER ENTRANCE SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

A GOOD WIFE.

A good wife makes the poorest and most desolate home a paradise, and moulds the most negligent and indifferent husband into a tender and thoughtful companion. The influence of woman—quiet, imperceptible and all-persuasive—is irresistible when directed by woman's instinctive tact and affection. The clamors for women's rights rarely attain their object; while the meek and yielding can bind manhood with chains of roses more potent than chains of steel. The first inquiry of a woman after marriage should be, "How shall I continue the love I have inspired? How shall I preserve the heart I have won?"—Endeavor to make your husband's habitation alluring and delightful to him. Let it be to him a sanctuary, to which his heart may always turn from the calamities of life. Make it a repose from his cares, a shelter from the world, a home, not for his person only, but for his heart. He may meet with pleasure in other homes, but let him find pleasure in his own. Should he be dejected, soothe him; should he be silent and thoughtful, do not heedlessly disturb him; should he be studious, favor him with all practicable facilities; or should he be peevish, make allowance for human nature, and by your sweetness, gentleness and good humor, urge him continually to think, though he may not say it, "This woman is indeed a comfort to me; I cannot but love her, and requite such gentleness and affection as they deserve."—Invariably adorn yourself with delicacy and modesty. These, to a man of refinement, are attractions the most highly captivating; while their opposites never fail to inspire disgust. Let the delicacy and modesty of the bride be always, in a great degree, supported by the wife.—If it be possible, let your husband suppose you think him a good husband, and it will be a strong stimulus to his being so. As long as he thinks he possesses the reputation, he will take some pains to deserve it; but when he has once lost the name, he will be apt to abandon the reality.—Cultivate and exhibit with the greatest care and constancy, cheerfulness and good humor. They give beauty to the finest face, and impart charms where charms are not. On the contrary, a gloomy, dissatisfied manner is chilling and repulsive to his feelings; he will be very apt to seek elsewhere for those smiles and that cheerfulness which he finds not in his own house.—In the article of dress, study your husband's tastes. The opinions of others on this subject is of but very little consequence, if he approves.—Particularly shun what the world calls, in ridicule, "curtain lectures." When you shut your door at night, endeavor to shut out at the same moment all discord and contention, and look upon your chamber as a sacred retreat from the vexations of the world—a shelter sacred to peace and affection.—How indecorous, offensive and sinful it is, for a woman to exercise authority over her husband, and to say, "I will not have it so; it shall be as I like!" But we trust the number of those who adopt this unbecoming and disgraceful manner is so small, as to render it unnecessary for us to enlarge on the subject.—Be careful never to join in a jest and laugh against your husband. Conceal his faults, and speak only of his merits. Shun every approach to extravagance. The want of economy has involved millions in misery. Be neat, tidy, orderly, methodical. Rise early, breakfast early, have a place for everything, and everything in its place.—Few things please a man more than seeing his wife notable and clever in the management of her household. A knowledge of cookery, as well as every other branch in housekeeping, is indispensable in a female; and a wife should always endeavor to support with applause the character of the lady and the housewife.—Let home be your empire—your world. Let it be the scene of your wishes, your thoughts, your plans, your exertions. Let it be the stage on which, in the varied character of wife, of mother, and of mistress, you strive to shine. In its sober, quiet scenes let your heart cast its anchor, let your feelings and pursuits all be centered. Leave to your husband the task of distinguishing himself by his valor or his talents. Do you seek for fame at home, and let your applause be that of your servants, your children, your husband, your God. That fame is ever the noblest which the true, loving and affectionate wife secures from among the inmates of the home circle.—Hutchinson and Reflector.

THE ITALIAN PULPIT.

The Italian preacher is as much an actor as the Italian comedian. His gestures, his postures, the play of his voice, the changes of expression in his face, the adjustments of his dress, are half, often wholly, theatrical. The prim monotone of the English pulpit, and the pious drawl of puritanism, are a long remove from even the most respectable style of Italy. The preacher is not afraid to shout, to start, and to sigh in the pulpit. Now his voice is a cry which echoes back from the lofty arches, or lingers ringing like the Miserere, and now it drops to a whisper, which is felt rather than heard. As he tells some thrilling tale, which works up to its climax, lifting himself as his story goes on, you can see in what anxious suspense he holds his hearers. It may be the scene of the judgment of Solomon between the rival mothers. How the congregation shudder, when the sword seems to fall, before their eyes, upon the living child! In what breathless silence they listen for the verdict! How speedily, too, the painful tension is removed by some quaint remark, which sends a smile running over the face of the crowd, like the sunshine after the passage of a summer cloud over a meadow. The Italian preacher does not disdain a laugh for himself or for his hearers, though he loves more to move them to tears. His style is adapted to its theme, and it has not the plaint of a dirge when it tells of heaven and holiness. The thorough knowledge of his discourse, before he enters the pulpit, enables the preacher to speak with more ease and freedom. He has not to decipher a manuscript by the "dim religious light," but it is all in his memory before it falls from his tongue. The imitations of Catholic architecture in some of our churches have proved to be severe trials to our reading preachers; but the gray dusk of a Roman November helps the preacher to produce his effect. There is nothing more impressive than an afternoon discourse in Advent in one of the old Roman churches. The preacher's voice and form, in the vast peopled space, contrast strangely with the silent marble forms around him.—Christian Examiner.

A CHARMING PET.

Mr. Kingsley, in his late interesting work, entitled "Glaucus: or, Wonders of the Shore," gives the following description of the "long sea worm," (Nemertes (Dorcasii)) an animal possessing few personal attractions, and with whose appearance and attributes it is probable few of our readers are acquainted: "You see it! That black, shiny, knotted lump among the gravel, small enough to be taken up in a dessert spoon. Look now, as it is raised and its coils drawn out. Three feet—six—nine, at least; with a capability of seemingly endless expansion; a slimy tape of living caoutchouc, some eighth of an inch in diameter, a dark chocolate black, with paler longitudinal lines. Is it alive? It hangs helpless and motionless, a mere velvet string across the hand. Ask the neighboring Anelelida and the fag of the rock fishes, or put it into a vase at home and see. It lies motionless, trailing itself among the gravel; you cannot tell where it begins or ends; it may be a dead strip of sea-weed, Himantula lora, perhaps, or Chorda filum; or even a tanned string. So thinks the little fish, who plays over and over it, till he touches at last what is too surely a head. In an instant a bell-shaped sucker-mouth has fastened to his side. In another instant, from one lip, a concave double proboscis, just like a tapir's (another instance of the repetition of forms), had clasped him like a finger; and now begins the struggle; but in vain. He is being 'played' with such a fishing-line as the skill of a Wilson or a Stoddard never could invent; a living line, with elasticity beyond that of the most delicate fly-rod, which follows every lunge, shortening and lengthening, slipping and twining round every piece of gravel and sea-weed, with a tiring drag such as no Highland wrist or step could ever bring to bear on salmon or on trout. The victim is tired now; and slowly and yet dexterously, his blind assailant is feeling and shifting along his side, till he reaches one end of him; and then the black lips expand, and slowly and surely the curved finger begins packing him end foremost down into the gullet, where he sinks inch by inch, till the swelling which marks his place is lost among the coils, and he is probably macerated to a pulp long before he has reached the opposite extremity of his cave of doom. Once safe down, the black murderer slowly contracts again into a knotted heap, and lies like a boa with a stag inside him, motionless and blest." Quite an ugly customer to deal with.

A MURRAIN APPROACHING.

Mr. Samuel Caswell, an extensive miller and corn merchant, in Limerick, writes to the Times as follows: "A most fatal epidemic has been for some time past ravaging the herds of central Europe, and has now reached Königsberg, where one proprietor is said to have lost 300 head in a night. The time of its arrival in Hamburg—whence cattle are weekly imported to the English markets—must now, in all probability, be a question of days. In 1745 the same or a like epidemic was introduced into England by means of two calves from Holland (vide Youatt on cattle, art. Malignant Epidemic Murrain). In the second year after its introduction, 40,000 cattle died in Nottingham and Leicestershire, and almost as many more in Cheshire. During the third year, remuneration was given by the government—who had ordered the destruction of diseased cattle—for no fewer than 80,000 head, while twice as many more, according to the report of one of the commissioners, died of the malady. In the fourth year it was equally fatal, nor does it appear to have completely disappeared till nearly eight years after. On the continent, every exertion is being made to arrest the progress of infection by this exterminating disease; military detachments are charged to destroy all that become infected. In Prussia, if only one of a herd should be attacked, the authorities order the whole to be slaughtered; and cordons sanitaires are established along the frontiers, to prevent the ingress of cattle from districts in which the disease exists. Happily, from their insular position, there can be little difficulty, under Providence, in preventing its introduction into Britain. It is only to lay an embargo on live cattle and raw hides, the produce of countries where this disease has already appeared. This seems to be the only practical method to adopt."

FORT BRADY, SAULT STE. MARIE.

[Furnished for Ballou's Pictorial.]

BURNS AND HIS HIGHLAND MARY.

We publish the following piece of poetry as a literary curiosity. It is stated to us that it originated as follows:—A lady-medium in Burlington, Vt., by the name of Keyser, was waited upon a short time since by another lady, who said she had a question to ask relative to Burns the poet. She, however, declined stating her question, saying that if the spirit of Burns was present her wish would be known to him without her speaking it. Nothing further transpired at the interview, but in about a week afterwards, the lady-medium, when alone, was inspired to write, and produced the following verses, which upon being presented to the inquirer, proved to be an answer to her mental request, which was to be informed whether Burns was wedded to his Highland Mary in the spirit land? These facts were well authenticated by our informant, who also ascertained that Mrs. Keyser was not at all familiar with the works of Burns, and had no particular liking for his poetry. It must, we think, be admitted that the resemblance to Burns's style in the piece here given is great, and that some of the expressions are truly worthy of the Shepherd Poet.

Fair lady, that I come to you
A stranger-hard fa' well I ken,
For ye've known naught of me, save through
The lays I've poured through Scotia's glen;
But when I speak o' gliding Ayr,
O' hawthorn shades and fragrant ferns,
O' Doon and Highland Mary fair,
Mayhap ye'll think o' Robert Burns.

I am the last, and why I'm here,
I heard the gude dame when she said
She'd know, in joyous spirit-sphere,
If Burns was wi' his Mary wed.
I sought to tell her o' our joy—
Na muckle impress could I make:
And lady, I have flown to see
If ye'd my message to her take.

Tell her that when I passed from earth,
My angel-lasse, crowned wi' flowers,
Met me wi' glowing love-lit torch,
And led me to the nuptial bowers;—
That all we'd dreamed o' wedded bliss,
And more, was meted to us there:
And sweeter was my dearie's kiss
Than on the flowery banks o' Ayr.

Where love's celestial fountains played,
And rosebuds burst, and seraphs sang,
And myrtle twined our couch to shade,
I clasped the love I'd mourned sae lang;
And while by angel-harp were played
The bonnie "bridal serenade,"
Though nae gown'd priest the kirk-rite said,
Burns was wi' Highland Mary wed!

There's nae destroying death-frost here
To nip the hope buds ere they bloom:
The "bridal tour" is through the spheres—
Eternity the "honeymoon."
And now, my lady, if ye'll hear
These words unto the anxious dame,
I think I can ye so reward,
Ye'll ne'er be sorry that I came.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

REMBRANT VAN RYN.

BY RALPH TRITON.

On the banks of the Rhine, near the city of Leyden, a miller by the name of Herman Gerretz rented a small mill. He had been so long identified in connection with it, that from this circumstance he had acquired the surname of Van Ryn. So general was the appellation, that he finally adopted it in preference to his family name, and his son, the subject of our sketch, was known only as Rembrant Van Ryn.

This youth, born the 15th of June, in the year 1606, had reached his sixteenth year, and much to the mortification of his father, was known as the greatest dunce of the neighborhood. The miller, by his shrewdness and industrious habits had acquired a snug property, and liberally provided for the education of his son, but the amounts thus expended seemed literally thrown away, for the boy could scarcely read and write. The only approach to talent that he displayed was in his ability to caricature the "domine" and his schoolmates, for which he was rewarded by frequent applications of the rod.

But his propensity for sketching could not be controlled even by this harsh manner. Every black leaf of his books, and even their margins, were crowded with these pencillings. One morning the miller was surprised to find him at the mill loog before school-hours were finished. The usually dull features of the boy were lighted with a show of energy, and his eyes flashed with indignation.

"I go to school no more."

"What is the meaning of this?"

"Simply as I have said."

"Something has happened, Rem?"

"Happened, father, look for yourself!"

The youth divested himself of his jacket, and Van Ryn started to see that his shirt was stained with blood. He flourished his huge fist as he demanded to know who had inflicted such an outrage upon a Van Ryn.

"The domine, father."

"Then I will chastise him, for, by the blood of our ancestors, I would not brook such cruelty from a father of the church."

"Spare yourself the trouble, sir, for I am satisfied if I am not compelled to return to school again; besides, the domine has met with no light usage from my hands."

"But what was it all about?"

"I arrived at the school-room before master Zoeller had made his appearance, and at the suggestion of one of the boys, had nearly completed a full length sketch of him in chalk upon the closet door. I represented him in one of his sternest moods, and the boys were laughing heartily at the resemblance, when suddenly I received a buffet upon my ear which laid me sprawling upon the floor, and looking up I perceived the domine standing over me, his eyes glaring with rage. He then ordered me to take off my jacket and proceeded to beat me most unmercifully with his rod. I bore this as long as I was able, and until I felt the blood trickling down my back, then I resisted, and finally left him with one eye closed and his big nose swollen to a fearful size."

"And you served him right. Let me embrace you, my son, for this show of spirit convinces me that you will yet make your way in the world. But what will you do? Will you become a miller, as our family has done for three generations?"

"Nay, father, I have no taste for labor of this kind."

"What, then, would you desire to do?"

"I would become a painter."

"A painter! is the boy mad?"

"Not mad, father, but simply in earnest."

"But do you know that every one cannot become an artist at will? Genius is the gift of Heaven, and I fear, my son, that you have it not. There was my old schoolmate, Van Zwanenburg, now a great master at Amsterdam, he was an artist from childhood."

"Listen to me, sir. One day not long since, as I sat sketching on the banks of the river, I suddenly found a stranger at my side. He demanded to see my work. I attempted first to conceal it, but there was something in his voice and manners which I could not resist, and reluctantly I placed it in his hands. He examined it for some moments in silence, and then looking me full in the face, said: 'My lad, there is that in you which with proper study and training might one day make you a great artist. He then told me that when I was ready to make the experiment, to come to him at Amsterdam; and then handed me a card upon which was written Van Zwanenburg.'

"And you have seriously determined to become a painter?"

"I did not think much about it at the time, but since then it has continually occupied my thoughts, and I really do not believe I can ever make anything else."

"Well, my son, I will not oppose you, for I believe that Providence ordered this meeting with my early friend. You shall at least make the trial, and if Zwanenburg is satisfied with you, I shall place you entirely under his care."

"And you really give me leave to start for Amsterdam?"

"As soon as you can get ready."

That evening upon the banks of the beautiful Rhine walked two young persons, earnestly conversing with each other. Several hours were thus passed ere they became aware of the necessity of parting. At length the youth, taking the hand of his fair companion in his own, said:

"Elise, I must leave you; already I have tarried too long, and my father will be impatient."

"Then may the saints bless you, Rembrant, and return you to us in their own good time."

"I shall never return to my native village, Elise, until I have mastered my profession."

"But if you fail?"

"I shall not fail. I feel there is that within me which those about me do not understand. I know our good neighbors think me idle and worthless, but they shall find that Rembrant is a name which one day they will mention with respect and pride. Elise, I must say adieu!"

"Adieu, dear Rembrant, and in the new life about to be opened to you, do not entirely forget your old friends."

"I have but few to remember or forget; but you are one, and the only one, perhaps, except my father, who understands me, and rest assured that it will be hard for me to forget either."

Thus they parted, Rembrant Van Ryn and Elise, his fair playmate since early childhood, the daughter of Eichler, the village smith. The preparation for the journey was completed that night, and with the rising sun of the next morning, after having received his father's blessing, he was on his way to Amsterdam. Zwanenburg had not forgotten the young sketched, and upon his arrival, welcomed him most heartily, especially when he found him to be the son of the miller, his early friend.

Young Rembrant lost no time in commencing his studies, to which he applied himself with the strictest diligence. In a short time he astonished his master by his wonderful inventive genius and a facility of execution which completely outran the slow mathematical ideas of the worthy Zwanenburg. The pleasures of a city life could not allure him for a moment from his case.

Two years had passed away, and he still continued day by day to linger over his canvases, scarcely allowing himself sufficient time for his meals. His friend at length felt it to be his duty to expostulate with him, fearing that his untiring labors would undermine his health, but Rembrant laughed at his fears and worked on harder than ever. Strange to say, his constitution did not appear to suffer in the least, and he wrought, according to Zwanenburg's words, "with an arm of adamant and fingers of steel."

At the end of the third year it was the master who sought advice from his pupil, rather than the latter instruction from the former. He had made new discoveries in the compounding of colors, and gained a character for originality for which years afterwards he was so eminently distinguished. He had just finished a painting, which was carefully screened by a gauze curtain, and sat awaiting the coming of Zwanenburg to pass his judgment upon it.

As the worthy old artist entered, the covering was removed and he gazed upon it for some moments with speechless admiration.

It represented a fair girl in the dawn of womanhood, gathering flowers upon the banks of the Rhine. She was in the act of severing a lily from its stem, and her posture was so gracefully and naturally chosen that it seemed life itself. The spirit and strength of coloring was exquisitely blended with its delicacy, and the strong effects of light and warmth were subdued by the masterly touches of a cool, refreshing shade. The features were the exact counterpart of Elise Eichler, but this was a secret to all save the young man.

"This exceeds art!" exclaimed the master, when he found words to express his admiration; "it is rather breathing, animated life. Go, my pupil, go forth to the world, for no longer can you obtain instruction from such as me. In three short years you have mastered what it has cost me a lifetime to perform."

Rembrant afterwards studied with several other masters, and then returned to his father, who greeted him with a most affectionate welcome. His neighbors also sought to honor the rising reputation of the young artist, but he coldly repulsed them, and for some time shut himself up in the mill, where he prepared a painting-room and excluded all save his father and the fair Elise.

Here he remained, perfecting himself in his art, and occasionally sending a picture to Amsterdam, for which, even at that early period of his life, he obtained an extravagant sum. The celebrity of his works at length forced him from his quiet retreat, and he was compelled by the solicitations of his friends to remove to the city, where he had first commenced his studies; there he carried as his bride the playmate of his childhood. He was at this time only twenty-four years of age, but he no sooner found himself in that great city than he was at once overwhelmed with business, and so great was the number of pupils who offered themselves for his instruction, that he was compelled to lease a large warehouse which he fitted up into numerous apartments in order to accommodate them.

From this moment to the hour of his death, his prosperity and reputation kept pace with each other in their rapid strides, and enabled him to amass an immense property. Had he studied at Rome, and possessed the powerful accessory of an academical education, he would doubtless have reached the very highest pinnacle of fame. As it was, he owed to nature the talent which he possessed. His genius was unquestionable, and his pictures commanded an immense price. A century after his death, one of them was sold for the sum of five thousand pounds. He lived until he attained his sixty-eighth year, and expired in the year 1674.

THE HOLY LAND.

In reference to the presentation to the Emperor Louis Napoleon of the ancient palatium at Jerusalem, the former residence of the Knights of St. John, some particulars relative to the Order may not be without interest. The military Order of the Knights Hospitallers was founded by Gerard Tour, who was born at Martigues, in Provence. After the capture of Jerusalem, he established in that city, in the year 1099, a house of refuge, for the purpose of giving an asylum to the pilgrims who were in the habit of coming from all parts of the Christian world to visit the Holy Places. Raymond Dupuy succeeded Gerard as Grand Master of the Order. He decided that the Order should in future become military as well as hospitaller, and that it should defend by arms the Christians against the infidels. The Order thenceforth assumed the title of Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. When Saladin obtained possession of Palestine, in the year 1188, the Knights quitted Jerusalem to establish themselves at Acre, subsequently at Rhodes, and in the year 1530 in the island of Malta, which was given them by Charles V. The French government have long coveted the ruins of the establishment at Jerusalem, as belonging to France by right, which, since the Crusades to the present day, has always assumed to represent in the east the military spirit of the west, and to be in that country the most pious and steadfast supporter of Catholic interests.—London Times.

CLIMATE NOT THE CAUSE OF COLOR.

It is a common opinion that climate alone is capable of producing all the diversities of complexion in the human race. A few facts may show that such cannot be the case. Thus the negroes of Van Diemen's Land, who are among the blackest people on earth, live in a climate as cold as that of Iceland; while the Indo-Chinese nations, who live in tropical Asia, are of a brown and olive complexion. Humboldt says the American tribes of the equinoctial region have no darker skin than the mountaineers of the temperate zone. The Palches of the Magellanic plains, beyond the fifty-fifth degree of south latitude, are absolutely darker than the Abipones, Tobas, and other tribes, who live nearer the equator. The Charunas, who live south of the Rio de la Plata, are almost black, while the Guayacas, under the line, are among the fairest of the American tribes. Finally, those nations of the Caucasian race which have become inhabitants of the torrid zone in both hemispheres, although their descendants have been for centuries exposed to the most active influences of climate, have never exhibited the transformation from a Caucasian to a negro complexion.—Types of Mankind.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 75,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 23 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TO THREE.

BY M. F. J.

Near to possession of the bliss I craved,
Close to the joy ambition sought,
Only to see both vanish ere I saved
One ray of hope to beacon thought,
And I am sad.

More than a twelvemonth I've pursued—
In thought by day, in dream by night—
A happiness my spirit viewed:
Both thought and dream have taken flight,
And I am sad.

I could have patient borne the gloom,
Did I not feel my self to blame;
With this dark thought I cannot pride assume,
But bend beneath a weight of shame:
And I am sad.

He who through folly loses hope,
But suffers justly for misdeeds,
With sorrow he can never cope,
But silent must receive his meed,
And I am sad.

If true resolve to humbly bear
The just load of his blameful deed;
If honest words and actions fair
Entitle him for hope to plead,
Then I am glad.

Not merely words shall prove my grief,
But actions show in manlier way
How I would earn thy true belief
That folly, not talent, led me astray,
And made me sad.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SCAR ON THE FOREHEAD.

BY MRS. CAROLINE A. SOULE.

MIDNIGHT had tolled its solemn chime, yet still the weary watcher sat beside the hearthstone, plying her busy needle. Her eyes were dim and sunken, her cheeks thin and pale, her lips pinched and purple, and her slender fingers so shrivelled with the icy chill that was fast palsying her, that the plain gold ring they wore and the silver thimble that they held were every few moments dropping into her lap with a slight musical tinkle. Her delicate form was shivering even in the heavy bed blankets that she had thrown about her shoulders, and she looked often with a wistful glance at the little basket of clips that stood beside the tongs.

An hour passed, and the clock struck one. "No must soon be here now," whispered she, in a half-frightened tone. "I will lay aside my work and make things as cheery as I can." And she brushed the ashes from the hearth, drew the coals together, threw on them a handful of the carefully-saved fuel, and fanned the faint flame till it flashed high in the chimney. Then she looked about the room to see if aught could be mended there; but the few articles it held were all in their wonted place, and everything as neat as the hands of love could make it. An arm-chair was drawn from a corner close to the crackling fire, the dressing-gown that hung upon it spread out anew, and a pair of slippers were hung upon the fender. The lamp was trimmed afresh, the stand dusted, and a carefully covered dish set upon it, and beside it was placed a knife almost as bright as though the blade had been silver instead of steel.

"I have done the best I can," said the pale watcher, as again she sunk into her little rocker. "O," and she wrung her hands convulsively, "if I were only sure of one kind word. Hark!" And she started up and listened. "It is he, and how he bangs the gate. I shall have a fearful time with him." And she hastened to the front door and gently opened it.

He staggered in, and reeling this way and that, reached finally the room his gentle wife had made so bright and cheerful. But what was her reward? A volley of oaths so foul that it seemed as if an army of fiends had spoken with one voice. He cursed the beggarly fire, though to make the scant blaze she and her children had half frozen all the day; he swore at the patched dressing-gown, though out of her own thin wardrobe she had planned it; he raved at the broad and neat, though her own lean fingers had earned them both. And when, angel-like and woman-like, too, she gave him a smile for every frown, an endearing epithet for every oath, and would have wound her arms about him to win him back to reason and himself, he raised his heavy hand and dealt her a powerful blow; ay, he struck her, till every nerve quivered with anguish, and she his wife and the mother of his beautiful children! And now, when she lay prostrate before him, he raised himself to kick her thence. A slight young hand pushed off the booted foot, even as it was falling on the trembling woman, and a voice, agonized in its tones, exclaimed:

"Forbear, my father; for though your wife, she is yet my mother, and I will save her from your rage!"

The eyes of the drunkard quailed a moment before the upturned gaze of his first-born, so mournfully holy was the look that beamed from his tearful face; then a fiendish glare burned in them, and exclaiming: "You, too. Must I level my whole household ere I can find peace," he seized the glistening knife and struck.

"Will he live?" moaned the poor mother to the surgeon, when he had bandaged the boy's head. "He is very pale and weak."

"It was a ghastly and dangerous wound—only an eighth of an inch between life and eternity—yet with care he may survive."

"Mother,"—there was a pathos in the tone that drew her eyes earnestly to the speaker, a stripling of but seventeen years,—
"Mother, I am going away."

"Away!—and where, Earnest?"

"I cannot say,—God must direct my steps,—but go from here I must. The curse of the drunkard's son is on me. None will regard me—none even give me work. And more, mother, if I stay here I must forget my Bible, for how can I honor my father when he so dishonors himself?"

Very long did the boy talk and plead ere he won the tearful consent; but she gave it at length, and with a little knapsack on his back, his mother's Bible in one pocket and her slender purse in the other, Earnest went forth in the great world to seek, not so much fortune or fame as that peace and joy which a drunken father would not give him in his home.

Years passed away, and there came no tidings from him, save that after the first one, each quarter brought the mother an envelope with a bank note, and each successive one was of a higher figure. First it was a simple five, then a ten, a twenty, a fifty, and a hundred. Welcome, too, were they all; for, but for such generous aid the almshouse or charity had claimed her and her little daughters; for downward, still downward, went her husband, his absence no longer counted by hours, but weeks and months. In a bustling city, many miles from his native village, a stranger one night found him in a gutter, half frozen, starved, weary and sick. Like a good Samaritan, he picked him up, and as he was too weak to walk, placed him in a carriage and had him taken to his own home. A bath, clean garments, wholesome food, and a soft bed were freely offered him, and passive as a child when worn and languid, he suffered them to deal with him as they chose, and soon sank into a deep, refreshing slumber.

It was hours ere he awoke, and then he seemed as in a dream. The filthy gutter in which he lost his consciousness, was now a downy bed, with pillows white and soft as snow, with silken counterpane and damask hangings. His rugs were dropped, and in their stead he saw himself robed in fine linen. The slime was washed from his face and hands, his matted hair combed out, and his tangled beard neatly shorn. He put back the curtains. Glad, golden sunbeams were stealing through the crimson drapery of an alcove window, and their brilliant light showed him a lofty chamber, with frescoed walls, a carpet from oriental loom, and a rosewood suite that a prince might covet. "It is a dream," breathed he, and he closed his eyes. Light footsteps aroused him soon, and unclosing them again he saw, bending over him a noble looking man in life's early prime, and beside him a lovely woman, and in the eyes of both great tears were standing.

"Tell me," said he, eagerly, "do I dream, or am I the poor drunkard so greatly cared for?"

"You were sick and we ministered to you," said the lady.

"Sick! ay, sin sick. But you do not know how vile I am, or you would cast me out at once. Listen. I have broken the heart of my wife; I have driven my only son from home; ay, and half killed him first; and I have scarred my little girls till they fear me more than the evil one. Will you care for me now?"

He almost shrieked out the question, and it seemed as though life and death hung on the answer.

"We must forgive, even as we would be forgiven," said the master of the house. "While you can be happy, stay with us."

A week passed away, and still the old man tarried in that beautiful home, now toying gently with the little Lillie, the wee delicate babe, and then playing gay pranks with Harrie, the pride of the household, a noble boy of four summers; now dreaming in the pleasant chamber where he first awoke again to manhood, and then lolling in an arm-chair in the parlor, tears and smiles chasing each other over his wrinkled cheeks as the lovely lady of the mansion sang, now a gay ditty and then a saintly hymn. But he never offered to cross the threshold. "I dare not," he would say, when asked to ride or walk, "there is danger in the street, and this calm is so very sweet. If it could only last!" And then he would sigh, and sometimes weep and sob like a little child.

"There is to be a grand rally of the friends of temperance to-night—the new and splendid hall is to be inaugurated. Banners will wave, torches flame, music ring, ladies smile, and children crow! Shall I invite you, my wife, to accompany me?"

It was the master of the house that spoke.

"Of course, after such a programme," said she, gaily, "and you may depend upon my going, too. How soon must I be ready?"

"In an hour's time. I will send a carriage for you, and meet you myself at the door of the hall. Be sure that you are ready, for there will be a tremendous crowd."

"I will be in time, trust me for that," said she, and hastened to perform her evening duties to the little ones.

"But what was her astonishment when she returned to the parlor, all bonneted and cloaked, to find their stranger guest awaiting her.

"I cannot surely be tempted there," said he, in a low, sad voice, "and if you will suffer me to ride with you, I will gladly go. It may be that I shall complete there the salvation here commenced."

Gladly did the lady acquiesce in the request, and they were soon at the door of the thronged hall. Not her husband but an intimate friend of his joined them there, and led them to some reserved seats near to the speakers' stand.

There had been stirring music by the band, fervent prayers by the clergy, and thrilling speeches from orators from distant cities, and the hearts of that vast multitude were aroused as they had never been before to the dangers of the cup. Then, while yet they were all riveted to the subject, the president announced, "a voice from our home." There was a breathless silence for a moment, and then long and loud exclamations greeted the good Samaritan of our sketch as he bowed to the waiting throng. It had seemed to them, as the last speaker hushed his voice, that the theme, world-wide as it is, was quite exhausted; but so impassioned was the eloquence that now mastered it, that they hung upon every word as if he had spoken of something fresh from heaven. Where others had generalized, he individualized. He did not take the mass of drunkards, but only one out of them all, and he portrayed his course in such vivid colors that the audience seemed gazing upon dissolving views rather than listening to chosen words. And so wrought up were they, that when he pictured that horrible scene in the tragedy of rum, where the husband levels to the floor the wife who once slept so sweetly upon his bosom, the wife that is also the mother of his children, they seemed to hear the gentle and wronged one fall, and sobs, screams, and groans broke out from every voice. The speaker paused till they were quiet, wiping, meanwhile, the tears from his own cheeks.

"Do you ask," said he, when he again resumed his theme, "do you ask why I stand here to-night and speak these things? why I not only speak, but feel them? Look at this." And he lifted the glossy locks from his left temple. "Do you see that scar on my forehead?"

In the brilliant gas-light it was visible for a wide space, and to many a watchful eye, a ghastly, frightful-looking scar, marring the beauty of a brow that might otherwise have been a painter's model. Slowly and solemnly did the speaker utter each word, then, as he stood, pushing back the raven hair:

"After the drunkard had felled his wife to the floor, he would have kicked her prostrate form, but that her young son glided between the two. What did he do then?" exclaimed he, in a voice of thunder. Another pause, and a breathless hush. More slowly, more solemnly did he speak. "He seized a knife; ay, and the one, too, his gentle wife had herself laid beside his plate for him to carve the dish her worn and weary fingers had earned to sustain his life; he seized it and—did this," and he pointed to his forehead. "To my grave will I carry this scar, and not till I rest in my grave will I cease to plead for the drunkard's wife and the drunkard's babes."

With these words fresh on his lips he withdrew. There was no applauding, but a silence as of death rested in the vast hall. Ere it was broken by prayer or hymn, an aged man, older though it seemed with grief than years, tottered upon the platform. Trembling in every nerve and muscle, he leaned against the desk, and finally grasped it for support. Many times did his lips move ere he could utter an audible sound, and when he did speak his words were rather felt than heard.

"The son has spoken—now let the father. With the scar on his forehead yet bleeding, my Earnest, my first-born, my noble boy went from his home, to seek among strangers the peace his father would not give him on his own hearthstone. Ten years from thence, one week ago to-night, that son picked up his father from a gutter, and instead of spurning him as a crimson sinner, he took him to his home as though he had been the angel instead of the demon of his youth. Deep is the scar on his forehead, but deeper are the scars on my heart. Ye have heard him—ye see me. Let the story and the sight be your salvation, as it is even now my own." And exhausted, he fell back into his son's arms.

ADVENTURE WITH A LEOPARD.

Two African farmers, returning from hunting the hartbeest, roused a leopard in a mountain ravine, and immediately gave chase to him. The leopard at first endeavored to escape by clambering up a precipice; but being hotly pressed, and wounded by a musket ball, he turned upon his pursuers with that frantic ferocity peculiar to this animal on such emergencies, and springing on the man who had fired at him, tore him from his horse to the ground, biting him at the same time on the shoulder, and tearing one of his cheeks severely with his claws. The other hunter, seeing the danger of his comrade, sprang from his horse and attempted to shoot the leopard through the head; but, whether owing to trepidation, or the fear of wounding his friend, or the quick motions of the animal, he unfortunately missed. The leopard, abandoning his prostrate enemy, darted with redoubled fury upon his second antagonist, and so fierce and sudden was his onset, that before the boor could stab him with his hunting-knife, the savage beast struck him on the head with his claws, and actually tore the scalp over his eyes. In this frightful condition the hunter grappled with the leopard; and struggling for life, they rolled together down a steep declivity. Before the man who had been first attacked could start to his feet and seize his gun, they had fallen together down the bank. In a moment he had reloaded his gun, and rushed forward to save the life of his friend. But it was too late. The leopard had seized the unfortunate man by the throat, and his comrade had only the satisfaction of completing the destruction of the beast, already exhausted with the loss of blood from several deep wounds by the knife of the expiring huntsman.—Penny Magazine.

NECESSITY OF CHANGE OF AIR.

An occasional change of air may be said to be almost necessary to the well-being of every man. The workman must leave his workshop, the student his library, and the lawyer his office, or sooner or later his health will pay the penalty; and this, no matter how great his temperance in eating and drinking; no matter how vigorously and regularly he uses his limbs; no matter how open, and dry, and free from impurity may be the air of the place in which he is employed. In the slightest cause of impaired health, the sleeping in the suburbs of the town in which the life is chiefly spent, or even spending a few hours of detached days in some accessible rural districts at a few miles distance from the dwelling may suffice to restore the healthy balance of the bodily functions, and maintain the bodily machine in a fit state for its duties; or in cases of somewhat more urgency or of somewhat more aggravated character, a few days once or twice a year, may suffice to adjust or restore the due economy of the system.—Robertson on Diet and Regimen.

EBENEZER W. STONE,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL OF MASSACHUSETTS.

The accompanying portrait was drawn expressly for the Pictorial, by Mr. Charles A. Barry, from a photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, of this city, and we have no hesitation in pronouncing it an accurate likeness of the accomplished and popular officer it is intended to represent. Ebenezer W. Stone was born in this city, June 10, 1801, and is a son of Samuel Stone, who was born in Charlestown, in 1771, and was a descendant of the second generation of Elias Stone, who emigrated to Charlestown from England. On the maternal side, Gen. Stone is a grandson of Stephen Stodder, of Cohasset, who was a lieutenant of a company of infantry from Cohasset, and served in the army under Washington, when he was stationed at Cambridge, in 1775-76. Gen. Stone's father removed with his family to Westford, Middlesex county, in 1804. In the acquisition of his early education, the subject of our sketch labored under the usual disadvantages of living in the rural districts at that time, working during the summer, and attending school only during a portion of the winter season. In 1817, he was attached to the United States army, and remained in the family of Col. (afterwards General) John R. Fenwick, until the fall of 1821. To his early impressions and acquisitions, we may trace that fondness for the military subsequently developed to such advantage to the commonwealth. At the date last mentioned, he left the army, and engaged in mercantile pursuits in Boston. Until 1843, he was engaged in the clothing business, and afterwards in that of drugs, paints and dye-stuffs up to the autumn of 1850. His first connection with the Massachusetts militia was in the spring of 1822, when he enlisted as a member of that fine corps, the Boston City Guard, and turned out with the company on its first parade in uniform. Rising from the ranks, he soon wore the chevron of orderly sergeant, and was (after eight years' duty with the musket) appointed adjutant of the fine regiment of infantry commanded by Col. Wm. H. Spooner, July 1, 1829. He held this office until March 31, 1834, when he was appointed brigade-major and inspector of the first brigade, Gen. E. W. Bradley, commander. He retained this office till May 21, 1836, when he was appointed division inspector of the first division. He held this office under the respective command of Major-Generals E. W. Bradley and Appleton Howe, until April 20, 1850. In the April of the next year, Governor Bontwell appointed him adjutant-general—a post for which he was in every way fitted, and which he still retains, to the satisfaction of the officers, and of all who take an interest in the military of the commonwealth. He appears to be wedded to his duties, and discharges them with unwearied zeal. His reports are monuments of his vigilance, industry and high military qualifications, and have won him a high reputation at home and in other States. We have frequently heard General Stone commended in the warmest terms by officers holding high rank in the regular service. In 1830, Gen. Stone was admitted as a member of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company; in 1832, was elected adjutant of the corps; in 1837, was chosen lieutenant, and in 1841, captain; and for twelve years was present at every parade of the company. General Stone has served, either as private or officer, in the Massachusetts militia longer, with a single exception (Major-General Wm. Sutton), than any other gentleman now in commission. He has also served the commonwealth in a civil capacity. In 1840, he was elected a representative to the General Court from Roxbury, was appointed on the military committee on the part of the House, and, together with Col. George T. Bigelow (at present judge of the Supreme Court), and Major Charles Webster, of West Stockbridge, composed the sub-committee who reported the present organization of the Massachusetts Volunteer Militia, which was adopted by the legislature that year. In 1848 and 1849, he was elected a member of the common council of the city of Roxbury. Gen. Stone is the author of a "Digest of the Militia Laws of Massachusetts," prepared in conformity with an act of the legislature, which has been highly commended, and exhibits his great care and thorough acquaintance with the subjects treated of. The office of adjutant-general was certainly never more acceptably filled than by the gentleman whose career we have thus briefly sketched.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL EBENEZER W. STONE.

FORT HENRY AND CEDAR ISLAND, KINGSTON, U. C.

The pretty landscape on this page was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn. We see on the left, the long, embattled lines of Fort Henry, on a point overlooking the town of Kingston, while on the island in front, Cedar, is a picturesque Martello tower. The harbor is defended by several other Martello towers. The name of this kind of tower is a corruption from Mortella, in Corsica, where a certain strong tower maintained a determined resistance to a superior English force, in 1794. In consequence of the great strength exhibited by this fort, the British government erected twenty-seven similar towers on the coast of Kent, at intervals of about a quarter of a mile, as a defence against the threatened invasion from France. They are circular, with walls of great thickness, and roofs bomb-proof. One traversing gun is mounted upon each, in working which, the men are secured by a high parapet. They are surrounded by a deep, dry ditch; the entrance is by a door several feet from the ground, approach to which is then cut off by drawing up the latter. The ordinary guard consists of from six to twelve men. The Indian name of Kingston is Cadaraqui. The French commenced building a fort here in 1672, under the orders of M. de Courcelles, then governor of Canada, and it was finished by his successor, Count Frontenac. In 1688, upon hearing of the capture of Montreal by the Indians, the garrison abandoned the fort, leaving slow-matches burning in connection with a train of powder leading to the magazine, in order to destroy the works. By some mismanagement, however, this purpose was defeated. The position was again garrisoned by the French, in 1689, and held by them till 1756, at which time an expedition under Col. Bradstreet embarked from Oswego, and after two days' hard fighting, obtained possession, and destroyed the fort and vessels. The peace of 1762 extinguished the French title, and the English named it Kingston. It is now one of the most important towns in Canada, and, next to Quebec, the most strongly fortified.

A WEDDING RACE.

Among the Anzarehs—people of Asia—the following is the way weddings are managed:—The suitors of the maiden, nine in number, appear in the field all unarmed, but mounted on the best horses they can procure; while the bride herself, on a beautiful Turkoman stallion, surrounded by her relations, anxiously surveys the group of lovers. The conditions of the bridal race are these:—The maiden has a certain start given, which she avails herself of to gain a sufficient distance from the crowd to enable her to manage her steed with freedom, so as to assist in his pursuit the suitor whom she prefers. On a signal from the father, all the horsemen gallop after the fair one, and whichever succeeds in encircling her waist with his arm, no matter whether disagreeable or to her choice, is entitled to claim her as his wife. After the usual delays incident upon such interesting occasions, the maiden quits the circle of her relations, and putting her steed into a hand gallop, darts into the open plain. When satisfied with her position, she turns round to the impatient youths, and holds out her arms towards them, as if to woo their approach. This is the moment for giving the signal to commence the chase; and each of the impatient youths, dashing his pointed heels into his courser's sides, darts like the unhooded hawk in pursuit of the fugitive dove. The savannah is generally extensive, say twelve miles long and three in width, and as the horsemen speed across the plain, the favored lover becomes soon apparent by the efforts of the maiden to avoid all others who might approach her. On a certain occasion, after two hours' racing, the number of pursuers were reduced to four, who were all together, and gradually gaining on the pursued. With them is the favorite; but, alas! his horse suddenly fails in his speed, and as she anxiously turns her head, she perceives with dismay the hapless position of her lover; each of the more fortunate leaders, eager with anticipated triumph, bending his head on his horse's mane, shouts at the top of his voice, "I come, my Peri; I'm your lover." But she, making a sudden turn, and lashing her horse almost to fury, darts across their path, and makes for that part of the chummon (plain), where her lover was vainly endeavoring to goad on his weary steed. The three others instantly check their career; but in the hurry to turn back, two of the horses are dashed furiously against each other, so that both steeds and riders roll over the plain. The maiden laughed, for she well knew she could easily elude the single horseman, and flew to the point where her lover was. But her only pursuer was rarely mounted, and not so easily shaken off. Making a last and desperate effort, he dashed alongside the maiden, and stretching out his arm, almost won the unwilling prize; but she, bending her head to her horse's neck, eluded his grasp, and wheeled off again. Ere the discomfited horseman could again approach her, her lover's arm was around her waist, and amidst the shouts of the spectators they turned towards the fort.—Oriental Tourist.

From youth upwards, Goethe had been prone to theorize on painting, led thereto, as he profoundly remarks, by the very absence of a talent for painting. It was not necessary for him to theorize on poetry; he had within him the creative power. It was necessary for him to theorize on painting, because he wanted "by reason and insight to fill up the deficiencies of nature."—Lewes.

FORT HENRY AND CEDAR ISLAND, KINGSTON, UPPER CANADA.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

NEMESIS.

BY BLANCHÉ D'ARTOIS.

Write on, write on, my heart, for this is fame:
 Ay fame, to toil ignobly for neglect.
 And yet thy dreamy life wouldst thou reject?
 Wouldst thou relinquish e'en thy humble name?
 Be still, be still, my heart, content with fame:
 Think not to 'scape the chains Nemesis winds!
 She ever ellogs most round fame's favorite shrines,
 And may e'en now obliterate thy name.
 What if thou lavish all thy wealth for naught?
 Wouldst thou recall thy life of feverish pain,
 And live it o'er for ease? Vain doubt, begone!
 My inmost soul is agonized by the thought.
 Should it be granted me to live again,
 My former life would be my chosen one.

THE ANGELS.

Now list while I tell thee, my darling child,
 How lovely and fair are the angels mild!
 They have radiant faces more purely bright
 Than the heavens and earth in soft spring light;
 They have eyes so blue, and serenely fair,
 And eternal flowers in their golden hair,
 And their flashing wings, which to thee would seem
 Of silvery moonshine, a dazzling beam,
 The angels were so stately and light,
 From rosy morn till the dewy night.—FROM THE GERMAN.

A PICTURE.

At last she sank luxuriously on her couch,
 Purple and golden-fringed, like the sun's,
 And stretched her white arms on the warmed air,
 As if to take some object whose warmth
 To ease the empty aching of her heart.—ALEXANDER SMITH.

Who loves not woman, wine and song,
 Will be a fool his life-time long.—LUTHER.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Swift thought it was generally the fate of a double-dealer to lose his power, and keep his enemies. . . . The old age of a literary person is the evening of a fine day. Such is Washington Irving's, serene and tranquil. . . . Who but the author of "Anastasia" ever thought of deriving comfort from an empty pocket? He says:—"I have found pecuniary embarrassments an excellent remedy for a settled melancholy. When a man knows not how to support life, he has little leisure for feeding sorrow." . . . A London newspaper states that an "Indian belle" company has been formed, for the exportation of marriageable ladies to the East Indies, and that the shares are expected to go off at a high premium. . . . An honest farmer in one of our country towns, lately refused to subscribe for a newspaper, "because," said he, "my father, when he died—heaven rest his soul!—left me a raft of papers, and I haint had time to read 'em thru yet." . . . "Etil," says Sauria, "is in the world, and the permission of it is certainly consistent with the attributes of God. Our inability to account for it is another thing, and the fact is not affected by it." . . . The following story, which we heard the other day for the first time, is almost too good to be true. A young man living near the Potomac was very backward in making a matrimonial proposal to a young lady to whom he was paying attentions, and one day she grew impatient, and exclaimed, "Frank, if you intend to marry me, I wish to know it, so that I make my arrangements." A long pause ensued. At length Frank broke silence, and exclaimed, "No meat, no corn, and fishing time almost over. Good Lord, Nelly, I can't!" . . . The other day an aged gentleman, Mr. Turner, of Yorkville, S. C., died at the age of ninety-eight, and on the second day thereafter, his maiden daughter, Sarah, who had been his comfort and support throughout her life, followed him to the grave at the age of seventy-two. Her mission was accomplished, and she followed him whose life had been identified with hers, with a willing spirit. "In death they were not divided." To us there is something extremely touching in this life-long fidelity, and there is a whole heart-history in this simple record. . . . A splendid opera house is projected for Cincinnati. Soon every great city of our Union will have one of these magnificent temples. Who will say that the fine arts are not patronized in America? . . . Miss Hosmer, the works of whose chisel have surprised the cognoscenti in Italy, will soon be among her American friends. . . . The question most soon to be decided whether the will of Brigham Young or the laws of the United States are to rule over the vast territory of Utah, which would be a land of promise but for the abominations which have there been perpetrated. . . . A Yankee lately appeared in Louisville, whose wife had eloped, carrying off their feather bed. "I don't vally her a red cent," the poor fellow remarked. "but them are feathers is worth 48 cents a pound." Money, money!—it is the idol of the day. . . . A lady advertises for a husband in the New York Herald, and says he must be six feet high. This votress of hy-men ought to marry a grenadier. . . . All women, we are told by a sparkling writer, love and love passionately. An unloving woman is an impossibility, unless we can imagine a pillar of ice to withstand the rays of a July sun. A woman must love something—man, parrot, or canary bird. . . . In what respects were the governments of Algiers and Malta as different as light from darkness? One was governed by deys, and the other by knights. . . . Very pleasant it must be to be mashing a meaty potato at dinner, and by the operation liberate a live snake; yet this actually happened at Chicago, lately. . . . Gen. La Vega, the Mexican general, was recently stopping at Willard's Hotel, at Washington, as was also Col. May, who took La Vega's guns, and made him prisoner at the battle of Palo Alto; and to complete the curious re-union, Col. Magruder, to whom May handed La Vega over for safe keeping, was also there at the same time. . . . Mr. Longworth, of Cincinnati, urges horticulturists to try the raising of seedlings from native grapes. In this way new varieties are obtained, and we may procure table grapes equal to those of Europe. . . . A gentleman at one of the New York churches lately put $12,646 in the contribution-box. It is rarely that so large a sum is contributed by an individual at once, though three times as much have sometimes been squandered at the gaming-table at a sitting. . . . The Duke of Wellington once deposited his umbrella at a lady's table at a fair. When he came back, the umbrella was gone, the fair lady having found it impossible to resist an offer of twenty-five guineas for it. The implied compliment amply repaid the "Iron Duke" for walking home in the rain. . . . An Irish gentleman by mistake led off the duke at a race-ball, and was challenged in consequence by the person he had supplanted. We think his reply was in excellent taste:—"My dear sir, I can't conceive why, because I opened a ball at night, a ball should open me in the morning." If his adversary had shot him, the homicide would have been "open to conviction." . . . A Jack-of-all-trades, in a Western paper, after advertising all sorts of things in the way of business, winds off with "suctioneering of the loudest kind, interwoven with ventriloquism." We don't know what the ventriloquism has to do with it, except to make bogus bids. . . . The New Yorkers are complaining of the dust in their streets. Why do they allow the street commissioners to throw dust in their eyes? Those New Yorkers are never satisfied; they must have either mud or dust. Then why complain of a rigorous necessity? . . . The New York Picayune sagely asks, "Must a man be mealy-mouthed, before he can make a flowery oration?" . . . The Boston Post thinks that Patagonians live the longest of any people on the face of the globe, because they range from eight to ten feet in stature. . . . Two men attempting to rob a vessel in New York, the other night, were shot, and one of them killed. This is the way to serve scoundrels who prey upon the hard earnings of others. If persons in exposed situations were always prepared to protect their rights, robbery would soon cease to be a paying business. Revolvers and thieves are institutions that cannot flourish simultaneously. . . . Walker's army had a hard time in Nicaragua, lately. Male meat, when eaten sixteen days in succession, rather palls on the appetite, and ceases to be regarded as a delicacy. . . . A large proportion of the papers of New York city are conducted by New England men. Like the Scotch, New Englanders are fond everywhere, and turn their hands to anything that will pay. . . . It turns out that Mr. Dean didn't marry Mr. Boker's daughter, after all. It was Mr. Dehan! Such is fame!—to have one's name misspelt in newspaper reports and bulletins of battles! . . . Mr. Proudhon, the well-known French socialistic philosopher, has recanted, it seems: "He has found that Socialism, in all its ramifications, is but a gaudy bubble; and having learned this in bitterness and disappointment, he confesses it with a manly sorrow that does honor to his heart and intellect." . . . In the biography of a Chinese genius, we find the following amusing paragraph:—"Having, it would seem, something like a presentiment of the future greatness of this child of his affections, Hung-Jaog often said to his wife that the little Phuh would live to make their old age honorable; and fondly stroking the little fellow's queue, as he sat upon his knee, made his boast that it was a full inch longer than that of any boy of the same age in the village." . . . An Edinburgh clergyman has been preaching against the opera. He attacked La Traviata and Don Giovanni for the immorality of their plots—and he was quite right. But he did it so coarsely, as to drive many ladies out of his church. A common error with satirists and reformers is to overcharge their language. . . . When Forrest was a young man, before he came out on the public stage, he used to play at a place called the "Apollo," in Philadelphia. It was here he played Lady Anne, in the tragedy of Douglas. Fancy Edwin Forrest, as an interesting young lady! Think of the sensation it would cause if he attempted the same character now! . . . Land can be purchased in Dinwiddie, Accomac, Southampton, and other counties of Southern Virginia, at from three to five dollars an acre. . . . An advertisement in the New York papers for four hundred horses and carts for the purpose of cleaning the streets, looks as if Gotham was waking up in an important particular. . . . They keep deer in Logan Square, Philadelphia; but the city finds it dear amusement, for they have to pay for damages frequently inflicted by the animals. Whenever the citizens are "treated to a horn" by one of these gay bucks, they make the corporation pay up. . . . John G. Gemin, Esq., the wealthy and liberal proprietor of the world-renowned bazaar under the St. Nicholas Hotel, Broadway, New York, has purchased Powers's fine allegorical statue of America. . . . Ninety thousand dollars worth of ivory was lately brought in a vessel from Africa to Salem. What an array of noble elephants must have the dust to furnish that amount! . . . We have often heard of ladies wearing quart of diamonds—but diamonds of quart are said to be extensively used by the fair instead of the real gems. It is only very rich people, however, who can afford to wear false jewels. . . . The second Duke of Richmond was married to a very young girl, whom he pronounced a "dowdy." Immediately after the ceremony he was hurried to the continent with his tutor, and remained three years. When he returned, he dreaded to see the "fright" to whom he was united for life; so he went to the theatre instead of his own house, and had his attention attracted to a beautiful woman, the reigning toast of that day. He inquired her name, and found that this admired of all admirers was his own wife. He died in 1750, and such was the happiness which had resulted from the inauspicious alliance, that his widow pined away through grief at his loss, and only survived him a twelvemonth. . . . A beautiful opera singer lately died suddenly in the green-room of the Philadelphia Academy of Music, arrayed in the brilliant costume of the Swiss cantons, for she was to have appeared in the opera of Linda di Chamounix. There lay the body cold and frigid, while a few feet off, its late companions were simulating gaiety, festive music flowing from their lips, and the house blazing with diamonds and ringing with rapturous applause! What a contrast! What an impressive illustration of the truth, "in the midst of life we are in death!" . . . Willis always writes interestingly, and sometimes naturally. Here is a picture of a storm dashed off in two brief sentences:—"The sky is wildly dark, and upon the clouds above, and the tall hemlocks below, the winds are charging like a cavalry of trumpeted hurricanes. The trees hiss and groan, the gale screams around the corners of the house, the waves of the Hudson dash sullenly on the shore, the echoes of the whirlwind come hoarsely from the hills." . . . Here are some of the celebrities grouped about Newburgh Bay, on the North River, New York:—N. P. Willis, Morton the artist, J. T. Headley, Drs. Forsyth and McCarrell, Mrs. J. J. Monell, S. W. Eager, M. L. Domanski, Brownlee Brown, H. K. Brown, Lockwood, Withers, Tice, Clarence Cook, Charles Downing, Charles Grant, Wall, Dr. Potts, Gulian C. Verplanck, Professor Davies, Judge Kent, H. W. Sargent, H. C. Wetmore, G. P. Morris, Weir, Henry Warner and his accomplished daughters. . . . The emperor and empress of France will be crowned at Rheims, in the month of August. More expense for the French people. We wonder they do not kick at their burdens. . . . We believe the Boston Traveller originated the following item, which "made us for to laugh," as Tony Lumpkin says:—A Chinese boy, who is learning English, came across the passage in his Testament, "We have piped unto you, and you have not danced," and rendered it thus:—"We have foot, foot to you, what's the matter you no jump?" . . . Bayard Taylor returned to Stockholm from his winter tour in Lapland about the middle of February. The most northern point reached by him and his companions was Kantokino, in Finmark, 65° north latitude. They travelled in Lapland costume, on sleds drawn by reindeer, and were objects of great interest with the natives, as Taylor was the first American seen in those parts. . . . Tom Brown, a famous wag of the time of William III., of England, said, in speaking of long sermons, that, though a clergyman preach like an angel, yet he ought to consider that two hour-glasses of divinity are too much for the most patient constitution. The hour-glass, in old times, used to stand one side of the pulpit. . . . The total number of newspapers and periodicals published in Canada is two hundred and twenty-six.

When the mind acts up to nature, and is rightly disposed, she takes things as they come, stands loose in her fancy, and tucks about her circumstances; as for fixing the condition of her fortune, she is not at all solicitous about that. "This true, she is not perfectly indifferent, she moves forward with a preference in her choice; but then 'tis always with a reserve of acquiescence, and being easy in the event.—Antoninus.

The more a man disregards the consequences of his actions, the more repose he has in action. The fountain does not stop to calculate through what regions of the earth its stream shall flow, what foreign matter it shall take in, and where it shall finally lose itself. It flows from its own fullness, with an irrepressible motion.—Herd.

Choice Miscellany.

CONSUMPTION OF FOOD IN PARIS.

According to Mr. Hodson, the Parisian consumes 360 pounds of bread in the year, a pound a day for every soul; and the Londoner not 300 pounds, including the flour made up into puddings; so that we are far from being such bread-eaters as our neighbors. On the other hand, the same authority informs us, the Londoner consumes nearly ninety-six kilograms (of two pounds each) of butcher's meat and pork in the year, whereas the Parisian disposes of but seventy-three kilograms; and the Berliner of only fifty-four kilograms of vegetables, and the Parisian one hundred and thirty-seven. Each Parisian soul consumes nearly a pound and a half of sweetmeats or syrups in the year, which accounts for the number of their bon-bon shops, so rare with us. There is not more wine consumed in Paris than beer with us; but admitting the quantities equal, what a difference in the nourishment. The consumption of sugar in France is increasing; from six and a half pounds a head per year it has reached nearly eight and a half pounds, notwithstanding the dearth of the article. Unfortunately, the consumption of spirits has increased in a much greater proportion. Previous to 1830, each Parisian consumed but nine litres, or quarts of eau-de-vie in the year; he now consumes fourteen litres. A great deal of this increase is no doubt owing to the bad vintage and the non-spirituos quality of wine; but this is not enough to account for the whole. The supply of fish has doubled in Paris since 1817, but it is not equal to the demand; and the price, except of very inferior kinds of fish, is enormous. Fish in that capital, and indeed throughout almost all France, is still a luxury; whereas in London and most parts of England, it takes rank for price and plenty with the other necessities of life. A lucrative trade is carried on in Paris by the boiling and preparing of salmon and other costly fish, to be served up at the tables of great inland cities from Madrid to Warsaw.—London Examiner.

EXPENSIVE HOUSES OF WORSHIP.

The Christian Intelligencer, of New York, some little time ago, in alluding to the completion of St. George's Church, in New York, indulged in the following comments:—"The open spires of this magnificent edifice have at last been completed, and the whole building is now a very great ornament to the city. It is a solid, substantial work of stone throughout, and destitute of all shams. Of course, so large a church (171 feet by 94) has cost considerably money—the spires alone involving an outlay, it is said, of about eighty thousand dollars, so that the whole structure, with its grounds, must have absorbed a sum above, rather than below a quarter of a million. Yet the church, as a public building, is no more splendid and costly than the private residences of its more wealthy attendants. Nor does it follow, as some folks seem to think, that the cold and stately stone of the imperial house implies an icy, barren, petrified religionism on the part of the worshippers. Dr. Tyng's church is famous for its godly activities. The gospel is preached as faithfully under those expensive open stone spires, as it is in any log hut in the interior; and the people who put so much upon the outward adornment of God's house, contribute yet more largely to all works of religion and charity. This is as it should be. Let every church be as fine a model of architectural taste and power as the purses of its builders will allow, and then let 'the king's daughter show herself all glorious within,' the entire splendor being only a type of the far greater beauty of holiness in the living temple.

SLAIN BY WAR.

It has been computed from the very best calculations that can be made, that about (14,000,000,000) fourteen thousand million of human beings have perished in war since the world began. This is a number of which we cannot form an adequate conception. Now, how long would it take a man, counting night and day, at this rate, to number the killed in war? He would count 180 in a minute, 18,800 in an hour, 259,200 in a day, 94,608,000 in a year; and consequently, to be exact, the time it would take him to count the 14,000,000,000 would be 147 years, 11 months, 22 days, 18 hours, 17 minutes, 46 2-3 seconds. Or it would take four men, counting twelve hours a day, a fraction less than 74 years. If all the corpses of those who have fallen victims to war were laid one after another across a road, allowing three feet to each body and the space between it and the next, that road would be nearly 8,000,000 miles long, i. e., to be exact, 7,954,545 5-11. This road would run around the world more than 318 times. Only think, more than 318 belts of dead people encircling the globe! For a man to step over all these bodies, proceeding night and day at the rate of two miles an hour, would occupy more than 454 years, or if he should travel 12 hours a day at the rate of three miles, it would take him 681 years.—N. O. Crescent.

THE LION'S FEAR OF MAN.

Lichteinstein says that the African hunters avail themselves of the circumstance that the lion does not spring upon his prey till he has measured the ground, and has reached the distance of ten or twelve paces, when he lies crouching upon the ground, gathering himself for the effort. The hunters, he says, make it a rule never to fire upon a lion till he lies down at this short distance, so that they can aim directly at his head with most perfect certainty. He adds that if a person has the misfortune to meet a lion, his only hope of safety is to stand perfectly still, even though the animal crouches to make a spring; that spring will not be hazarded, if the man has only nerve enough to remain motionless as a statue, and look steadily at the lion. The animal hesitates, rises slowly, retreats some steps, looking earnestly about him, lies down, again, retreats, till having thus by degrees got quite out of what he seems to feel as the magic circle of man's influence, he takes flight in the utmost haste.

THE TOMB OF JULIET.

An Italian correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, in narrating his experience in Verona, says:—"I went on a Shakspearian research, to see what is shown as the tomb of Juliet. It is not a mausoleum, but merely a coffin, or trough of stone, whose authenticity is perhaps as good as many other relics which have received high sanction. Even the house of the Capulets is pointed out, not omitting the very window where the impassioned Romeo beheld the star of his admiration:

"But soft, what light through yonder window breaks?
 It is the East, and Juliet is the sun."

Who wishes to be told that Romeo is only an invention, and the gentle Juliet but a poet's dream. How real, after all, are the beings of the imagination!—and how much deeper the impression which the scenes they moved to make upon the mind, than the dull, ordinary relations of history.

Foreign Items.

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston

CHINESE MODE OF CARRYING THE WOUNDED.

CHINESE MILITARY SCENES.

Everything relating to the empire of China is now looked at with increased interest, since its government is engaged in a two-fold strife, with its own rebels and with the might of England. We, therefore, add to our previous sketches two pictures illustrating Chinese operations on the battle field. In No. 16 of this volume, it will be remembered we gave pretty full details of the military organization of the imperial troops; our present sketches relate to the rebel forces. These men are far more valorous in action than the imperialists. They will be distinguished as rebels at a glance by the absence of the long queue which forms so marked a peculiarity of the loyal Chinese. As soon as a recruit joins the rebel standard, his queue is immediately cut off, which ensures his fidelity for a long period of time, no one of these shorn individuals daring to desert his standard, because the absence of the distinguished queue is regarded as proof positive of high treason, and the offender is immediately put to death when he falls into the hands of the government troops and officials. The first engraving on this page represents the mode adopted by the rebels of carrying their wounded off the field. The sufferer is provided with a seat and a rest for his feet suspended from two long bamboo poles carried on the shoulders of men, while he is supported by comrades on each side, rendering his conveyance as easy as possible. The attendants on the wounded man in our picture exhibit the style of arms used by the insurgents. They are remarkably handy with the sword and spear, and have not yet dispensed with the use of the ancient buckler. The second picture on this page exhibits a group of rebels in action. On their left is the standard bearer, with his colors firmly planted. Near him a "stout man of his hands," is drawing his good sword in anticipation of a hand to hand conflict. Another is loading his gun. Of the two kneeling sharpshooters, one is about to fire, and the other watching the opportunity for a shot. The officer is waving his sword and cheering on a small reinforcement marching on to take part in the engagement. As we have before remarked, the rebels have evinced their superiority over the imperialists by beating them nine times out of ten in the countless engagements that have taken place since the commencement of the Chinese revolution. They have displayed their gallantry in the open field, and their courage in the attacks of walled and fortified places. They appear to be better armed and more adroit in the use of the musket than their opponents. The Chinese officials are wedded to ancient usage, and employ the same weapons and the same mode of warfare that has been in vogue in the empire for ages. What will be the issue of the rebellion no one can tell, but as far as we can judge, it has already inflicted serious wounds on the strength of the imperial government, decimating the emperor's armies, exhausting his treasury, and destroying his former self-reliance.

A GROUP OF CHINESE REBELS SKIRMISHING.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM | VOL. XII., No. 20.—WHOLE No. 309.
6 CENTS SINGLE

STATE OF ALABAMA.

The beautiful emblematical figure on this page closes the brilliant series of State scenes, designed expressly for us by Billings, which have been published in the Pictorial, eliciting the warmest commendation for their ingenuity and artistic skill. The State arms, which surmount the design, are simple—a map of the State, and a scroll of the constitution supported by fasces. The principal object in the picture is a heavy ox-team loaded with cotton, and driven by a black wagoner—other wagons are seen winding their way in the distance. To the left we have a railway train, characteristic groups of figures, a steamer loaded with cotton, and a sailing schooner. The State is bounded north by Tennessee, east by Georgia, south by Florida and the Gulf of Mexico, and west by Mississippi, and has an area of 50,722 square miles. De Soto and his followers, in 1541, were the first whites who visited this portion of the continent. In 1702, Bienville, a Frenchman, built a fort on Mobile Bay; and in 1711, the present site of Mobile was occupied. At the peace of 1763, Alabama, with all the French possessions east of the Mississippi, excepting New Orleans, came into the hands of the English. Until 1802, this State formed a part of Georgia; from this date it was included in Mississippi Territory till 1817, and, in 1819, was admitted into the Union. It ranks fourth in population among the Southern States, numbering, by the census of 1850, 771,623. The Alleghany Mountains terminate in the north part of the State. The face of the country gradually declines from the north to the Gulf of Mexico. It is rich in mineral treasures, particularly in coal, iron, limestone and marble. The noble bays and rivers admirably fit the State for the prosecution of trade and commerce. Approaching within seven degrees of the tropics, it is allied in production with the torrid zone. The rivers seldom freeze in winter, and the heats of summer are mitigated by refreshing breezes from the gulf. A great portion of the soil is very rich, yielding more cotton—the great staple of the South—than any member of the confederacy. It also produces the usual cereals and other vegetables, tobacco, wine, silk. Indigo may be, and has been, cultivated here; but it has been abandoned because undersold by the foreign article. Comparatively little attention has been paid to manufactures, although, in 1850, 1022 manufacturing establishments were reported. Education is well provided for in this State. In 1850, there were five colleges. The free school system went into operation early in 1854. The State university, located at Tuscaloosa, is in a very flourishing condition, with an annual income of $15,000. In 1850, there were sixty periodicals in the State, and 1373 churches. There is a State penitentiary at Wetumpka, a State lunatic asylum at Tuscaloosa, an asylum for the blind at Mobile, and we believe an institution for the deaf and dumb has gone into operation. In 1850, there were four public libraries, with 3848 volumes; 32 school libraries, with 3500 volumes; 15 Sunday school libraries, with 5775 volumes, and five college libraries, with 7500 volumes. The governor of Alabama is elected for two years by the people. The senate consists of 33 member, elected for four years, and the house of representatives of 100 members. One half of the senate is elected every two years.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN: —on— THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XIII.—[CONTINUED.]

As Redding entered the shop, he caught a glimpse of a young and beautiful woman, as she disappeared through an opposite door. He handed the Jew the opal, who started a little at sight of it, and eyed him rather keenly.

"Who sent this?" he asked.

"That will tell you," replied Redding, and he put the piece of paper into Jeduthan's hand, given him by Falkland.

"It is well," said he, when he had read it. "The gentleman spoke to me about a gem he wished to dispose of, but gave no description of it."

"My master told me he had written the price he demanded on the piece of paper I gave you."

"He has, and I will give it."

Without saying more, the Jew counted the money and handed it to Redding. Having secured it about his person, he lingered a minute as if he wished to say something more, but finally turning abruptly away, left the shop. He had no sooner gone, than the Jew took the opal from the drawer where he had deposited it, and carefully examined it once more.

"It is the same I gave to Abi, as a birthday gift, three years ago, which soon afterward she lost," said he, speaking to himself. He then carefully enclosed it in a casket, which he put in his pocket.

Harleigh, while Falkland had been thus taking measures to procure by the means of the former's gift to Alice, surreptitiously obtained by Mildred Dacres, the means of liquidating a gambling debt, had been brooding over the scene of the preceding evening. Although he so boldly denied to Falkland that Alice gave him the opal, with spirits depressed by the gloom of the prison, he could not refrain from looking at the matter through a medium that reflected the gloom by which he was surrounded. All those doubts respecting Alice which Mildred Dacres had formerly succeeded in infusing into his mind, and which had continued in moments of despondency to rise before him in imagination, like dim and hideous spectres, were revived and rendered more vivid.

While indulging in thoughts and feelings so little to the advantage of Alice Dale, the door opened, and a lady closely veiled was admitted. Harleigh handed her a chair, which she accepted in silence.

"Half an hour I think you said was the time you wish to remain?" said the warden, as he turned to withdraw.

"Yes."

She did not move, nor again speak, till the grating of the bolt was heard on the outside of the door. She then threw aside the thick veil, which had entirely concealed her features.

"Can it be possible that I see Mildred Dacres?" said Harleigh.

His voice expressed surprise, but no pleasure, nor did he seek that friendly clasp of hands by which is expressed the pleasure of meeting even with a common acquaintance after some months' separation.

"Must I infer from the cold astonishment you evince, that you consider me intrusive, or it may be, even bold?" said she.

"I could not be otherwise than surprised, for I supposed that you were in America."

"I came in the same vessel that Falkland did, and I thought it likely that he might have mentioned it."

"I didn't see him till last evening, and then others were present."

"I should think that you might have found opportunity to inquire for one of the friends, at least, from whom you have been so long absent."

"I will not affect to misapprehend your meaning, but I inquired for no one."

"I rejoice to find that you are so indifferent; otherwise, it might give you pain to know that all, and more than all, I hinted to you respecting Alice Dale, has turned out to be true. But I came not here for the purpose of accusing her. I would learn from your own lips in what way I can serve you."

"You are entitled to my thanks," said Harleigh, somewhat gravely, "yet as I expect to be free again in two or three days, I think it will be unnecessary for you to put yourself to any trouble to my behalf."

"Then I have been misinformed. If, on the contrary, what I have heard be true, you will have reason to be thankful if the few days you speak of, before you are restored to liberty, do not instead prove to be as many months."

"I am wholly at a loss to imagine why. The offence for which I am under restraint may certainly be deemed a venial one."

"It is not on account of what passed between you and Falkland last evening," said she, looking him steadily in the eye as she spoke. He met the look, as unflinchingly as it was given.

"If I must speak more to the point," said she, "you and the others have been betrayed by one of your associates."

"Betrayed!" said he, with an air of bewilderment.

"Yes. You should have been careful whom you trusted in a matter of so much moment."

"All that you have said is to me an enigma."

"In plain words, then, the plot to assassinate the king has come to light."

"You say the plot, as if I was knowing to it, but I assure you that its existence is now made known to me for the first time."

"Even if it can be proved that you are ignorant of it, it may not be easy to make it appear that you are not involved in another, brought to light by the detection of this."

"Respecting which, I am quite as much in the dark as I was relative to the assassination plot, previously to your enlightening me. What is it?"

"Nothing more than an innocent plan of insurrection, for a simultaneous rising of England and Scotland."

"By whom formed?"

"Some of the Whig leaders, of course. Among others, Lord Russell, Sidney, and your particular friend, John Hampden, with whom, unfortunately for yourself, you have of late often been seen in company."

"Not so often as I have with several other gentlemen, who certainly cannot be suspected of favoring any such enterprise."

"Still, as he is one of the chief of the conspirators, it has caused suspicion to fall on you."

"From which, as he never revealed to me any of the secrets of the confederacy, I think I shall find no difficulty in freeing myself."

"It may be difficult to prove that he never did. There is another thing, too, which will tell against you."

"What is it?"

"Your having, while in America, spent most of your time in Mr. Walworth's family, who was, as is well known, violently opposed to the restoration. There is no use in disguising it: your life, even, is in danger."

"You magnify the danger."

"Not so. But you shall be saved in spite of yourself. I will throw myself at the king's feet, and plead for you as never woman pleaded before."

"It may, at least, be well," said he, "to first let the danger approach so near as to be able to look it in the face."

"I understand the covert sarcasm your words convey; but if I wait till that time, it may be too late."

Harleigh was embarrassed. He hardly knew what to say. The emotion she expressed was too passionate, he thought, to be genuine. Still, though unable to free himself from this impression, he could not forbear feeling somewhat grateful for the interest she manifested in his welfare, though certainly she was not the person to whom he would have preferred to owe a debt of gratitude. It was, therefore, with a sense of relief that he heard the door open and the voice of the warden announce to her that the half hour had expired. Mildred, who had hastened to draw her veil over her face, stepped close to Harleigh ere she left the room, and in a suppressed voice, said:

"The mediation which I have offered to undertake in your behalf, though now rejected with scorn, may ere long be accepted, if not sought."

"You express yourself too strongly, Miss Dacres," he replied.

"I do not scorn your offer, yet having never in thought, word, or deed, been guilty of what you say I am suspected of, it is only natural for me to suppose that my innocence will prove my best and most powerful plender."

"We shall see."

"Yes, and meanwhile let me advise you as a friend not to go so far in anything on my account as to injure yourself without benefiting me."

Mildred made no answer to this, but she bit her lips till the blood came. Courtsaying slightly with an air of dignity she well knew how to assume, she left the room.

CHAPTER XIV.

AN ANONYMOUS MISSIVE.

"WHAT should you make of that, George?" said the king, speaking to the Duke of Buckingham, who had sought the royal presence at an earlier hour than usual, in consequence of the discovery of the two plots alluded to in the foregoing chapter.

As Charles spoke, he handed him a neatly-folded paper, which had been selected from rather a formidable pile lying near him.

"It looks like a billet-doux. At any rate, the writer, whether fair or brown, appears to have been impatient." And he read aloud: "Will your majesty please give this immediate attention?" This was written on the outside.

"Am I to read the inside?"

"Certainly. The nut must be cracked before we can decide on the quality of the kernel."

"It is a delicate morsel of calligraphy, and, as I should say, written by dainty fingers," said he, glancing at the writing. "You have read it?"

"Yes; I own that I have, for I needed something by way of zest—a kind of sharpener of the appetite, to enable me to digest the graver and weightier contents of these ponderous documents lying at my elbow. I must say, however, that it fell short of the object I intended it for."

"A single perusal will not always give the pith of the matter contained in so delicate a missive as this, as I have reason to know. I will read it to your majesty."

"Do so. It is brief, and will not cost you a great deal of breath."

Buckingham read as follows:

"Among those near your majesty's person last evening, as you need not be reminded, was Clarence Harleigh, who is the sworn friend of John Hampden, and others of his stamp. After what came to your majesty's knowledge, subsequent to the time that he and Gilbert Falkland left the banquetting-chamber, you may deem it prudent to prolong his imprisonment, as it is suspected that he has been a sharer in the councils of those who planned the insurrection, even if he was ignorant of the assassination plot. The writer of this humbly prays your most gracious majesty not to pass lightly by this hint, from one of the most loyal of your majesty's subjects."

"It was written by a woman—that is plain," said Buckingham, when he had finished reading it.

"There can be no doubt of that. What do you think of Harleigh's being a participator in one or both of the plots?"

"There's nothing in it. I know Harleigh well enough to be certain that he has no taste for such things."

"Exactly the opinion I had formed of him."

"And you may be equally certain that this most loyal of your majesty's subjects is practising some crooked piece of policy as regards Harleigh."

"Weaving a little plot of her own, you think. Let me see that hand-writing again. If she were in this country," said Charles, after carefully examining it, "I should say it was written by one who would almost risk dabbling the feathers of Cupid's shaft in blood, for the chance of bringing a lover to her feet. You know, George, that my studies have not been restricted to the science of government, which enabled me to find that out before either she or Harleigh went to America."

"It must be Mildred Dacres that you have in your mind."

"Even so. I have seen her hand-writing, and this resembles it."

"By my royal George, it is as you say. It was written by the fascinating Dacres. She has returned to England. I saw her yesterday morning."

"All now is as plain as day. Harleigh has given his allegiance to old Walworth's rustic ward, as is evident by what took place last evening—an allegiance which this Mildred Dacres is anxious to have transferred to herself. But we must drop the discussion of so light a matter, for here are older, and as they doubtless imagine, wiser men coming, who would be scandalized at seeing a smile on my face almost at the very moment of such grave and important discoveries. The truth is, Villiers, Dame Nature, in the construction of my phiz, was so prodigal of those harsher lines with which she sometimes delights to mar the human countenance, that I am obliged to soften them with smiles, to save my loyal subjects from the sin of thinking I resemble a bandit chief more than a Christian king."

"Those who have the honor and happiness of meeting your king most frequently," said Buckingham, "know that he is the most affable and best bred man alive, and that he treats the humblest of his subjects like gentlemen, rather than like vassals and bores."

"After all, I believe my people love me, with all my faults, and, as I tell James, when he remonstrates with me for walking abroad unattended, I shall never be assassinated to make him king. If I am taken off in that way, it will not be by one of the populace, but by some one who has ambitious views of his own to gratify."

Buckingham, with all his assurance, looked a little abashed, for he himself had not escaped the imputation of having been engaged in a conspiracy to change the succession, even before the present occupant of the throne had "shuffled off this mortal coil."

The Duke of Ormond, and several others, who had entered the room, and who had remained in the background till Charles had finished speaking with Buckingham, now came forward, and were soon in grave and earnest consultation relative to the recent alarming disclosures.

CHAPTER XV.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

ALTHOUGH the vessel in which Alice Dale left America for England was nearly two weeks later than the one in which Falkland and Mildred Dacres took passage, yet owing to its being a better sailer, it arrived nearly as soon. It was more than a week after her arrival before either they or Harleigh had the least suspicion of her being in London.

Alice had never heard the name of Harleigh mentioned, for although Edward Elliston knew of his imprisonment, and had heard him alluded to in connection with those who had planned the insurrection, he decided to refrain from communicating to her the intelligence till something sufficiently definite should transpire to criminate him more fully, or to make manifest his innocence.

Mrs. Elliston neither went abroad nor entertained visitors, with one or two exceptions. These were ladies near her own age, and as gloomy and ascetic as herself. When she did go out, however, she invariably took Alice with her, for she felt that the home to which she had invited her was but one degree removed from a prison. This impression would have been correct, had it not been for her son; yet she did not see this, for with all her motherly devotion, she could not, like Alice, understand and appreciate his generous and noble qualities.

An old, lumbering carriage was, on those occasions alluded to above, usually brought into requisition, but one day, Mrs. Elliston being suddenly indisposed, a sedan, as being attended with less trouble, was engaged for Alice, who, she insisted, should visit her friend, Mrs. Wade, though she was obliged to remain at home herself. The chairmen who conveyed her were instructed to go for her early, so that she would reach home before nightfall. Edward Elliston told her he would call and attend her home, but being unexpectedly called away, a servant was sent in his stead. He had been in waiting nearly an hour, and was about going in pursuit of the tardy chairmen, when they arrived.

As the evening had already set in, dark and gloomy, Mrs. Wade sent one of her own servants, and provided torches for each. Alice had never before, since her arrival in London, been out after dark, and as she was one moment borne swiftly along through the narrow street, the next impeded by the passing crowd, with the flaring torches borne before her, now lighting up a set of rough though good natured features beneath the flat cap of the apprentice, and anon throwing their red glare on the smoother or handsomer though not homelier face shaded by the waving plume of the courtier, she experienced a degree of apprehension, amounting almost to alarm. This sensation was not diminished, when she heard what passed between Mrs. Elliston's servant and one of the chairmen.

"You mustn't turn into this street," said the servant.

"We shall turn into whatever street we please," was the gruff answer.

"But it will lead as a round-about way, besides taking us into more dangerous and lonely streets," remonstrated the servant.

"That's what it will," said the other torch-bearer.

"If we are a mind to take the longer road, it is our lookout, not yours, seeing we have the burden to carry. We can find the way without the aid of your torches, so we will part company whenever it suits you."

"And the sooner the better, I say," remarked his companion.

"What say you, Bill? If I take them at their word, and show them by the light of my torch that I have a light pair of heels, will you follow me?" said the servant of Mrs. Wade.

"Willingly, if it were not for the young lady; but I haven't the heart to desert her."

"All that I can do, then, is to leave you, for it may eat up half a year's wages to get a broken head mended, which I shall stand a good chance of being obliged to have done, if I stay here."

"A good riddance," said one of two ruffian-looking fellows, who darted from beneath a low arch which formed the entrance of an alley.

At the same moment, the torch borne by Mrs. Elliston's servant was struck from his hand and trampled under foot.

"You had better profit by the example of your fellow-servant," said one of the villains.

Instead of replying, he addressed the chairmen, who had very coolly set down the sedan.

"When there are three of us," said he, "are we going to suffer ourselves to be stopped by only two?"

"There's no hurry—is there Dick?" said one of them, addressing his companion.

"No," was the reply; "and besides, how are we to find our way in the dark?"

"I pray you to proceed," Alice ventured to say. "My friends will suffer much anxiety on account of my protracted absence."

"We should be glad to oblige you," said one of them, "but we think of stopping here a while to rest," and his remark was chorused by a loud laugh from the three others. "Stop your noise," said he who had excited their merriment, "or you will bring the police down upon us, with a score of grave citizens at their heels."

It now appeared evident to Alice that the four were acting in concert, though she was lost in conjecture as to the motives by which they were actuated. The place where they had stopped did not appear to be the resort of those on whom a helpless girl would like to call for help, and except the wish she had expressed to proceed, she had remained perfectly silent. This had served to divert attention from her, and she determined to try and make her escape. At the very moment she was about to attempt it, one of the men stepped close to the side of the sedan.

"It is certainly time for him to be here," said he.

"Who knows but that we've made a mistake in the place where we were to stop?" said another.

"I know," said the first speaker, "that it is the exact spot where he told us to wait for him."

"It won't do for us to wait here much longer, anyhow, for that rascally knave of a torch-bearer has made off with himself, to procure help without doubt, and before we are aware, the quarter-staffs of half a dozen flat-caps will be about our ears."

"Hush!" said he who stood by the side of the sedan. "If there's any dependence to be placed in my ears, that is Falkland's voice;" and as he spoke, he moved a little forward.

Falkland, then, was the person they were waiting for, which, together with the attending circumstances, was to Alice a new cause of terror. Favored by the darkness, she succeeded in leaving the sedan without attracting the attention of those near, and with feet winged with fear, flew along the narrow street in the direction opposite to that in which Falkland, with some one with him, was approaching. She turned the first corner she came to, and had proceeded only a short distance, before she saw the door of a building open, a little further on, and a woman enter. She left the door slightly ajar, and almost breathless with terror and the haste she had made, the moment Alice reached it, she pushed it open, entered, and stood in the presence of an elderly man who had something in his appearance that inspired her with confidence.

"O, sir," said she, "give me shelter! hide me before they can get here!"

"I am sorry that it has so fallen out that you should be driven to seek safety here," said he; "for those who belong to the remnant of the despised people of Israel, have little power to protect themselves or others."

"I will be only till I can send to my friends, when— There! I hear their voices. In a minute more they will be here. Is there no closet—no corner where I can be concealed?" said she, looking wildly round the apartment, which she now found was a shop where were exhibited articles of old clothing, and others scarcely more attractive.

Jeduthun, the Jew, for he it was, in answer to her appeal, opened a door which led into an inner room, and handed her a rush-light.

"On the further side of the room," said he, "there is a door which will admit you into a long and narrow passage, at the extremity of which is another door. Knock three times, and it will be opened by one as young and as fair as yourself. I will remain in the shop, lest my absence excite suspicion. Aseneth," and he turned towards a woman who sat near the fire, "strangers may be speedily here, who may ply you with questions concerning the maiden, who has just passed through the room. Mind and be discreet, lest you betray her."

"I will remember your words, my master," said the woman.

By this time, loud voices, some of them in angry contention, were almost at the threshold. Jeduthun hastened to remove the bar, which, when Alice had first entered, he had placed across the door which opened on the street. He had only time to assume the appearance of one who is ready to serve customers, when the door was thrown wide open, and the two ruffians who had waited under the shadow of the arch for the arrival of the sedan burst into the shop, followed closely by the two chairmen. Jeduthun stepped forward a little, and said:

"What is your will?"

"Dog of a Jew," said one of them, "you know well enough it isn't your vile merchandise we want!"

"What would you have, then?"

"We would have the bird that's escaped from the cage standing just outside the door."

"I know nothing of bird or cage," answered the Jew.

"Why don't you speak to the purpose, Dick?" said one of the others. "One would suppose you were a bird fancier. Come to the point, and tell him that a fair damsel in the guise of a Paritan, yet still more cunning than fair, while we were waiting for the arrival of the gentleman who was to give us directions as to where we should carry her, stole out of the sedan."

"For which, as I was not there, I am not to be blamed," said Jeduthun.

"She fled hither," said he who had been called Dick.

"Which I could not prevent."

"She was seen to enter your shop."

"It is easy to be mistaken so dark a night as this, but you have your eyes, and can look where you please."

It needed only a slight search to show that there was no place of concealment in the shop.

"Here's a door," said one.

"Yes, and we will see what is the other side of it," said Dick.

"It is a poor place," said the Jew, "and you will see no one there, save my maid-servant, who, having been abroad, returned some few minutes before your arrival, and was doubtless mistaken by you for the damsel you are in pursuit of."

On opening the door, they saw, as they had been told, only a poor place, as far as could be judged by the dim lamp and the light of a few half-burnt brands in the large, open fire-place. Near it sat the maid-servant, employed in repairing some coarse garment. As they entered, she for a moment raised her eyes, with a vacant, stolid look, and then again fixed them on her work.

"She looks like a fool," said Nym Skellum, "and ill-favored at that."

"So much the better," replied Dick; "for, as the proverb says, children and fools speak the truth, it will be better than if she were sharp-witted."

"That is true," said another; "but then there would be a pleasure in being foiled by one as comely as some of the Hebrew maidens I have seen. But this one, with her dull eyes, and a complexion the color of a tanned sheepskin, there promises to be so little entertainment that I for one shall leave the task to Skellum, who appears to think it no hardship."

"His tongue," said Dick, "being always well oiled, it will run of its own accord, if only set going."

Skellum, meanwhile, without hearing the star cast on him for his loquacity, or regardless of it, if he did, went on questioning the stupid-looking servant-maid. He, however, could make nothing of her answers. At last one of them discovered the door which opened into the passage, and unclosed it.

"Is she hid away there?" said Skellum.

What seemed a sudden and transient gleam of intelligence, lighted up her countenance.

"Maybe my master hid her there while I was gone for the penny's worth of oil," she replied.

"Ah, we shall have her now!" said he, exultingly, and snatching the lamp from the table, he entered the passage, followed by the three others.

At the end of it, they found nothing but a closet with a few shelves, on which were some empty glass bottles and cracked China dishes.

"A mouse couldn't hide here," said Skellum. "It seems strange, though, that so long a passage was made to lead to so useless a place."

"There's something more here than there appears to be," said Dick, "as I would show you if I had an axe."

"Yes, an axe—we must have an axe!" exclaimed two or three voices at once.

"'Twas the stairs the passage was made for," said the maid-servant, who, without their knowing it, had closely followed them.

"Stairs! I see no stairs," said Skellum.

She closed the closet-door, and pointed to a flight of stairs that were concealed when it was swung back.

"She's put us on the right scent now, I'll be bound," said Skellum; and they rushed up stairs with as much eagerness as a few minutes before they had into the passage.

For five or ten minutes, the dingy and scantily-furnished rooms above re-echoed to the heavy tramp of their feet, as they ransacked every recess and corner.

"We have lost our labor and our time," said Skellum. "The closet must be the place, after all," and to the closet he returned, followed by the others.

With all the force of his strong and muscular arm, he drove a bar of iron, which he had chanced to find among some rubbish, against the back of the closet. But instead of giving way, it gave back a dull, echoless sound, as if the blow had been struck against a thick and heavy wall.

"Once more barked," said Skellum.

"Falkland said she was a little angel, and I believe him now," said Dick, "for if she hadn't had a pair of wings hid under her russet cloak, she never could have made her escape."

"Little should I care," said Skellum, "for the escape of twenty such angels as she is, if the gold angel which I was to have for my share in this business were safe in my pocket."

"That's what I say," said Dick; "but as we've failed in our undertaking, we may think ourselves well off if we get a few copper farthings, so that we can quench our thirst with a tankard of ale."

"What if we should frighten the Jew into giving us what will make up the loss of what we expected?" said Skellum; "for I'll never give up but that I saw the identical angel we had in the sedan fly in at the outer door."

This suggestion met the approbation of all concerned, and with the intention of acting upon it, they returned to the shop; but a glimpse of some one outside, seen by the light that shone from the door, which, since their entrance, had remained partly open, prevented.

"Are you satisfied with the search you have made?" inquired the Jew.

"No, as you will some day find to your sorrow," replied Skellum.

After they had withdrawn, a few words in suppressed tones passed between one of them and the person who had been loitering near the door. Shortly afterward, Gilbert Falkland entered. A quick, almost imperceptible knitting of the brows, accompanied by a compression of the lips, equally slight and transient, showed that either the Jew did not care to see him, or that some suspicion to his disadvantage had entered his mind.

"I have come to make you an offer," said Falkland.

"I am ready to listen to it."

"Either give me one hundred pounds, or deliver up to my protection the young lady who is somewhere concealed beneath this roof."

"If you have lost a wife or a sister, and it can be proved that she is beneath my roof, she shall not be withheld from her natural protector."

"And what if she be neither?"

"In that case, even if there were a damsel here, I wouldn't, against her will, deliver her up."

"Give me the gold, then."

"I already hold your bond for twice the sum you just now named, which, were I to tell you what I think, I should say was of little value."

"A minute since, I gave you your choice, either to deliver up the maiden you have concealed, or give me one hundred pounds. I give it to you no longer, for, on second thought, a day or two will place her where I can try the same game over I have tried to-night, which I shall take care she won't be a losing one; and the better to insure success, those employed must be liberally rewarded, which can't be done with an empty purse. You see, therefore, that I must have the money."

"You must find it elsewhere, then."

"You deny me?"

"Yes, I deny you."

"Do you remember that opal I sent here a few days ago?"

"I do."

"It has a history which may cause you to alter your mind."

"What do you know about it?"

"That it was sold to Lingard the goldsmith by a Jew, who, as he has since had reason to believe, came by it dishonestly."

"And if one of my Hebrew brethren has been guilty of a dishonest deed, am I to be answerable for it?"

"You are answerable for your own misdeeds. It was you who sold it to him."

"I?"

"Yes, as can be proved."

"Nevertheless, I shall not let you have the hundred pounds to aid you in your iniquitous schemes against a helpless damsel."

"Not if, in return, I will undertake to procure the goldsmith's silence?"

"Not even then."

"If it can be proved that you stole that opal, not all the vile old clothes you have coined into gold for the last twelve years, with twice as much added to the amount, will save you from the punishment which is your due."

"What if I have the means of disproving it?"

"I'm not afraid of that. You will see me again, within twenty-four hours, when you may not be quite so resolute in your denial."

The Jew made no answer to this, though a smile of contempt, in which was mingled some bitterness, passed over his countenance, as Falkland withdrew.

CHAPTER XVI.

ABI, THE GRANDDAUGHTER OF THE JEW.

ALICE, according to the directions given her by Jeduthun, knocked at the door at the termination of the passage. After a little delay, it was pushed open, and she found herself in a closet, standing face to face with one who, as the Jew had told her, was as young and as fair as herself. The young girl started a little, as if surprised at the sight of Alice.

"I thought it was either my grandfather or Asenath, the hand-maiden," said she.

"I was told to knock at this door," replied Alice, "by an elderly man I saw in the shop."

"It was my grandfather who told you. You are welcome."

By means incomprehensible to Alice, what she had taken to be the back of a very plainly-constructed closet, was made to swing slowly back, till there was an opening sufficiently wide for ingress into an apartment fitted up in a style of so much splendor that it reminded Alice of a story she had once heard told of an enchanted palace; while her conductress more than realized her ideal of the beautiful princess inhabiting this regal abode, and who had nothing to do from morning till night, save to enjoy herself, or watch from the window the coming of the handsome and adventurous knight who, by his bravery and prowess, had won her for his bride.

It was not till the massive door was closed, and a drapery of Tyrian purple embroidered with gold, such as covered the rest of the walls of the room, was drawn back over it, that Alice had opportunity to do more than note her general appearance. When, at her request, she had seated herself on a pile of cushions at her side, she found that her eyes, though shaded by lashes intensely black, were gray, instead of their being, as she had at first thought, of the same hue. Yet it mattered not what color they were, so full even to overflowing were they of a soft and brilliant light. Her hair, of the same jet-black as her eyelashes, and restrained from falling over her forehead by a jewelled band, fell in free and flowing masses over her shoulders, and descended to the cushions where she sat.

Among the few ornaments she wore, there was one which drew the attention of Alice from all others. It was the opal she had lost, and when she recalled what Silas Watkins had told her, it at once occurred to her that it might have been given her by Falkland. The thought was a painful one, for now that she had learnt something of the dark traits of his character, she felt that he was not a person from whom a young and beautiful girl should receive so rare and costly a gift. She observed that the eye of Alice was fastened upon it.

"A birthday present," said she, "and one that I value very highly on account of the donor."

"Who must be a very dear friend, then?"

"The dearest I have in the world," she replied.

Alice watched her as she said this, but there was no faltering of the voice, nor deepening of the faint rose-color which tinged the pure white of her fair and softly-rounded cheeks. Unsuspecting of what was passing in the mind of Alice, she said:

"Will you not tell me your name?"

"Alice Dale."

"And mine is Abi. How glad I am that you came here this evening! You cannot think how lonely I am."

"Have you no mother nor sister?"

"None."

"Neither have I."

"Yet you cannot be so lonely as I am, with no one but Asenath to speak to, except my grandfather, and he has little time which can be spared from his daily toil to devote to me."

"Can it be necessary for him in the evening of his days to attend so strictly to his daily task?" said Alice, involuntarily looking round the splendid apartment.

"We are, as you doubtless know, of an oppressed and despised people, and obliged to bury our luxuries, and even comforts, under a show of wretchedness, or the princes and nobles of the land would speedily find some pretext to wrest from us our wealth. I say we, for since my father died a year ago, I have had no one to look to for protection, except my grandfather."

The eyes of Alice were often directed to the opal, as they sat chatting together, for after what Abi had told her, she thought she must be mistaken as to its being the one which had been given her by Harleigh. But the more she examined it, the more convinced did she become that it was the same. Several times she was on the point of telling Abi what she knew of it, but finally concluded to suffer its history, as far as she herself was concerned, to remain undisclosed, lest she might think that she wished it to be restored to her. The fair Abi, however, could not help noticing with what interest she regarded it, though she mistook the cause. She imagined that it was its rare beauty which attracted her attention, and she unclasped the gold chain to which it was appended, and handed it to her.

"Take it," said she, "so that you can the better examine it. Those best skilled in precious stones pronounce it to be unique, no one of its kind they have ever seen or heard of being equal to it in size and purity, or comparing with it in fine and brilliant play of colors."

"A birthday present, you said?" remarked Alice, hoping that she would be led to say something more of it.

"Yes, and what renders it more sacred and doubly dear, it once belonged to my mother. My father being absent the day I was twelve years old, my grandfather gave it to me, with his blessing. Judge, then, of my distress, when the very first time I wore it from home, I lost it."

"Lost it?"

"Yes, and I had long given up all hope of ever recovering it, for we dared not noise abroad the loss of so precious a gem, when, a few evenings since, some one came to the shop and offered it for sale."

"Who offered it? Did your grandfather know?"

"I think he did, though he didn't tell me. He was glad to get it back again, for more than two-thirds of its full value, without asking any questions."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

CRINOLINE.

As this word is often used now-a-days, we subjoin the following definition:—"The term crinoline is derived from the Latin word crinis, which means the hair of the head. This word in the French language becomes crin, and is generally applied to horse hair. In colloquial Latin, or the Latin of the Lower Empire, crinis might actually pass into the diminutive crinola, and from this we easily form the term crinoline, to signify a fabric woven of hair—a finer and more dainty tissue than the common haircloth called by the French elice."—Home Journal.

MAIDENHOOD.

STATISTICAL FACTS.

The number of languages spoken in the world amount to 3064. The inhabitants of the globe profess more than 1000 different religions. The number of men is about equal to the number of women. The average of human life is about 33 years. One quarter die previous to the age of seven years; one half before reaching seventeen; and those who pass this age enjoy a felicity refused to one half the human species. Of every 1000 persons, only one reaches 100 years of life; of every 100, only six reach the age of 65; and not more than one in 500 lives to 80 years of age. There are on the whole earth 1,000,000,000 inhabitants, and of these, 33,333,333 die every year, 91,824 every day, 3700 every hour, and 70 every minute, or one in every second. These losses are about balanced by an equal number of births. The married are longer lived than the single, and, above all, those who observe a sober and industrious character. Tall men live longer than short ones. Women have more chance of life in their favor previous to being fifty years of age, than men, but fewer afterwards. The number of marriages is in proportion of 75 to every 100 individuals. Marriages are most frequent after the equinoxes—that is, during the months of June and December. Those born in the spring are generally more robust than others.—New York Journal of Commerce.

GROWTH OF MACHINERY.

'Tis a curious chapter in modern history, the growth of the machine-shop. Six hundred years ago, Roger Bacon explained the precession of the equinoxes, the consequent necessity of the reform of the calendar, measured the length of the year, invented gun-powder, and announced (as if looking from his lofty cell over five centuries into ours) "that machines can be constructed to drive ships more rapidly than a whole galley of rowers could do; nor would they need anything but a pilot to steer them. Carriages also might be constructed to move with an incredible speed, without the aid of any animal. Finally, it would not be impossible to make machines, which, by means of a suit of wings, should fly in the air in the manner of birds." But the secret slept with Bacon. The six hundred years have not fulfilled his words. Two centuries ago, the saving of timber was done by hand; the carriage wheels ran on wooden axles; the land was tilled by wooden ploughs. And it was to little purpose that they had pit coal, or that looms were improved, unless Watt and Stephenson had taught them to work force-pumps and power-looms by steam. The great strides were all taken within the last hundred years. The "Life of Sir Robert Peel," who died the other day, the model Englishman, very properly has for a front-piece a drawing of the spinning-jenny, which wove the web of his fortunes. Hargreaves invented the spinning-jenny, and died in a workhouse. Arkwright improved the invention, and the machine dispensed with the work of ninety-nine men; that is, one spinner could do as much work as one hundred had done before. The loom improved further. But the men would sometimes strike for wages, and combine against the masters, and, about 1820-30, much fear was felt lest the trade would be drawn away by these interruptions, and the emigration of the spinners to Belgium and the United States. Iron and steel are very obedient. Whether it were not possible to make a spinner that would not rebel, nor matter, nor scowl, nor strike for wages, nor emigrate? At the solicitation of the masters, after a mob and riot at Stalybridge, Mr. Roberts, of Manchester, undertook to create this peaceful fellow, instead of the quarrelsome fellow God had made. After a few trials he succeeded, and, in 1830, procured a patent for his self-acting mule; a creation, the delight of mill owners, and "destined," they said, "to restore order among the industrious classes;" a machine requiring only a child's hand to piece the broken yarns. As Arkwright had destroyed domestic spinning, so Roberts destroyed the factory spinner. The power of machinery in Great Britain in mills has been computed to be equal to 600,000,000 men, one man being able, by the aid of steam, to do the work which required 250 men to accomplish 50 years ago. The production has been commensurate. England already had this laborious race, rich soil, water, wood, coal, iron and favorable climate. Eight hundred years ago, commerce had made it rich, and it was recorded, "England is the richest of all the northern nations." The Norman historians recite, that "in 1067, William carried with him into Normandy from England more gold and silver than had ever before been seen in Gaul." But when to this labor, and trade, and these native resources, was added this goblin of steam, with his myriad arms, never tired, working night and day everlastingly, the amassing of property has run out of all figures. It makes the motor of the last 90 years. The steam pipe has added to her population and wealth the equivalent of four or five Englands. 40,000 ships are entered in Lloyd's lists. The yield of wheat has gone on from 2,000,000 quarters in the time of the Stuarts, to 13,000,000 in 1854. A thousand millions of pounds sterling are said to compose the floating money of commerce. In 1848, Lord John Russell stated that the people of this country had laid out £300,000,000 of capital in railways, in the last four years. But a better measure than these sounding figures, is the estimate that there is wealth enough in England to support the entire population in idleness for one year.—Emerson's English Traits.

MAIDENHOOD.

The charming ideal picture on this page is lovely as a poet's dream of youth. A young girl of sweet sixteen, with her hands clasped, stands in "maiden meditation" on the banks of a woodland stream. The water lilies that gem the surface of the brook are emblematic of her own purity and beauty, and those bright pellucid waves, mirroring their wooded banks, the image of her own true heart. Like that river, fresh from its fountain, flows the current of her young life, through scenes of matchless beauty and tranquillity, now catching a gleam of sunshine, now wandering in solitude, and brightened with the reflected view of heaven itself. Further on, perhaps rocks may obstruct its course; further on, it will lose its tranquil character, and quiet music, and foam and dash in its narrow channel. So, too, may the maiden's heart be tossed in the wild storm of passion. Love itself—and she is a being formed to love and to be loved—may prove the agony instead of the glory and crown of her after life. But we will not anticipate an evil future for her. Let us rather believe that her life will be as sparkling and joyous as the bright waters, as calm as that of the woodland stream in its gentlest flow, as careless as that of the birds that build in the leafy bowers. "Such should, methinks, thy future be," and such, could we control her destiny, we would make it.

KATE COOKE, THE EQUESTRIENNE.

The picture on this page represents Miss Kate Cooke, now one of the most daring female riders of Europe, as she appears in the ring during her equestrian exercises, which are described as graceful, bold and attractive in the highest degree. As this performer will soon visit this country, her portrait will prove peculiarly acceptable. She is quite young, having been born at Hull, England, in 1840. She is a member of that family which some twenty years ago visited the United States, and travelled extensively throughout this country, giving equestrian entertainments in all our principal cities. They were particularly successful in Boston and New York. In the latter city, the whole troupe appeared at the Bowery Theatre, in the melodrama of Mazeppa, which was produced with wonderful effect. Nearly all the horses, and all the costly properties of the Cooke company, were destroyed by fire, creating a great sympathy for the sufferers. Miss Cooke commenced at the early age of three years to ride and manage her favorite pony with a grace and ability equal to the first equestrians of mature years. Her public appearance and performances were always hailed with rapturous enthusiasm. Her style of riding is one greatly in vogue of late, and consistent with perfect propriety. Instead of exhibiting in the old style, standing on the back of the horse, dancing, standing on one foot, etc., Miss Cooke, like some of the most favorite of the French equestriennes, enters the ring, seated and dressed like any lady for a ride. Then she puts her horse through all his paces—makes him rear erect, as in the picture, perform the volte, demi-volte, passage, and all those manoeuvres of the old manège, which used to develop all the agility, power and good qualities of that noble animal, the horse. All these manoeuvres are executed with the most perfect ladylike grace, the fair rider never moving in her saddle, but appearing "incorpoised and demi-natured with the brave beast himself," thus almost realizing the fable of Centaur. To this kind of equestrian exhibition no kind of objection can be raised in any quarter. Miss Cooke is described to us by those who have seen her, as a perfect model of a horsewoman; and it is said that Queen Victoria has personally complimented her on her achievements. Her seat is graceful, her action natural, and her feats surprising. Her presence of mind and self-command in the circus receive universal admiration. It is doubtless a positive pleasure to see a handsome young girl mounted on a dumb animal, which she seems to inspire with her own intelligence. We look upon her performances as upon any of the fine arts. How obedient the horse is to her hand and voice! How he frolics, capers, prances and rears at her bidding! Talk of five-barred gates! We feel certain that such a girl as Kate Cooke would leap the gates of Babylon! We have certainly no desire to see our ladies indulge in any unfeminine occupation or exercise; but we should really be delighted, if they could get up a little more enthusiasm on the subject of riding—one of the most exhilarating and invigorating of all out-door exercises. We wish our American belles would imitate, in this respect, their English sisters. It would prolong their lives and beauty. Little Queen Victoria would never have been the robust and blooming woman that she is, had she not early learned to "back the flying steed," and kept up her equestrian exercise in all weathers, riding in the school when it was too stormy to take the road. Quite a furor for equestrianism was created in our cities some twenty-four years ago, when Fanny Kemble was in the zenith of her histrionic fame, and set the example. Since then there have been periodical outbreaks of

MISS KATE COOKE, THE FAMOUS EQUESTRIENNE.

THE CASTEL NUOVO, AT NAPLES.

This ponderous and imposing pile of buildings is one of the most remarkable features in the city of Naples. Its towers and bastions rise like the pinnacles and walls of a mountain—and, indeed, it is mostly hewn out of solid rock. At its base we see all the bustle of an Italian street—groups of infantry officers, priests, ladies and beggars, and that queer vehicle, a "corricolo," drawn by a single horse, and carrying passengers enough to fill an omnibus. The castle is one of the most interesting relics of mediæval architecture in Naples. It was built, or begun, in the 13th century, by Charles I., on the site of a Franciscan monastery, dismantled in 1284. From that time it has borne the name of Castel Nuovo. It has five principal towers, which are now enclosed within the castle. The strong outer works were built under Alfonso II., about the middle of the 15th century. Within and about its precincts are included the military armory, the arsenal for artillery, the royal foundry and the marine arsenal. It communicates with the royal palace, and may serve as a place of refuge, should King Bomba's subjects rise against him. Of little use in modern warfare, the Castel Nuovo is formidable only against the inhabitants of the city; and of late years, great attention has been given to making it formidable in this way. Cannon threaten the surrounding neighborhood. They point downward through the populous street called Bassa Porta, towards the Largo Castello; and as if that were not enough, a parapet has been erected on the Grand Guard and the houses in the foreground of the picture, behind which the soldiery can pour forth their volleys of musketry. These are interesting proofs of the success of the actual system of government, and of the contentment and happiness of the Neapolitans! We have heard of such a proverb as "killing with kindness," and we think it must have originated in Naples. On the opposite side to that which is represented in the sketch, the view is towards the sea. On the right of it is the royal palace, and on the left the façade faces the popular quarter of the Bassa Porta, which swarms with lazzaroni. In the Darsena, or marine arsenal, there are now 205 prisoners. The city, of which this castle is a prominent feature, has gone through many vicissitudes of fortune, and may yet be the scene of emphatic events. It was founded by the Greeks, who called it Parthenope, from a siren of that name, who was fabled to have been cast upon the coast near this place. It afterwards took the name of Neapolis, and is said to have retained traces of its Grecian origin to a late period of the Roman empire. In more modern times, the French took it in 1779, and again in 1805. Joseph Bonaparte was made king of Naples, but was replaced by Murat, in 1808; and the latter was driven from it by the Austrians, in 1814. In 1848, it was plundered by the lazzaroni. Its environs abound in objects of interest, embracing Vesuvius, the buried cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum, and the isle of Capri, and the city always swarms with visitors.

THE CELEBRATED CASTEL NUOVO, AT NAPLES.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE WORLD IN WHICH WE LIVE.

BY MARY C. GRANNISS.

O, the world in which we live,
 'Tis a world of beauty rare!
 That sparkles every blossom,
 And breathes in balmy air.
 O'er hill and plain, through earth's domain,
 A thousand streams of beauty flow;
 From infant seas to giant main,
 From insect-light to stars that glow;
 It shows throughout the realm of art,
 It lingers in the poet's dreams;
 To music rapture-thrills the heart,
 On every page of science beams.

O, the world in which we live,
 'Tis a world where sadness dwells;
 Where oft joy's gushing fountains
 Are turned to "Marah wells;"
 Where life's bright years are dimmed with tears,
 That, deep through sorrow's misty veil,
 Earth but a darkness way appears,
 Where sighs are borne on every gale:
 Whose hope-flowers bloom not save to fade,
 Where greetings to farewells are changed,
 Where love within the grave is laid,
 And friends are from dear hearts estranged.

O, the world in which we live,
 'Tis still a blessed spot
 Where harshness, and impurity,
 And coldness, enter not.
 When this we know, what'er we sow,
 The same we also here shall reap:
 That only ill from wrong can flow,
 That truth and justice never sleep;
 That all the griefs that mark our lot,
 But cover blessings kindly given.
 To hearts thus lessoned, is it not
 The gate and vestibule of heaven?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

RUNNING DOWN A MAN-OF-WAR.

BY DUNCAN McLEAN.

JACK SQUIRREL was a gay fellow of twenty-five, always on the move and inclined to be reckless, but on the whole, was honor bright to the core. He was five feet six inches high, rather slimly built, but tough as whalebone, and quite good looking. Thin lips, dark, piercing eyes, and an ample forehead, bespoke him a man of intellectual power and great firmness. His education, as he described it himself, was "like an old woman's rag-bag, made up of odds and ends, but nothing valuable." Yet he had seen much of the world, and knew mankind like a Jesuit.

Jack was fitting out, in Buenos Ayres, an old bark, which he had purchased on the beach, where it had been driven by a gale, and abandoned to the underwriters. The job of heaving her off and making her ship-shape, was to him amusement, for he had no more use for her than a cat has for a pair of specs. But, though well off, he could not remain idle, neither could he settle down into any permanent line of business. He had just crossed her top-gallant yards, and was giving her the finishing touch with the paint-brush, when a Spanish lady came on board, and requested a private conference. Jack was the soul of gallantry, and, like the general run of sailors, would have perilled his life in honor of the sex. The request, of course, was granted, and both descended into the cabin.

"Captain," said the lady, throwing aside her veil, displaying features of great beauty and sweetness, but deeply overcast with nervous melancholy,—"Captain, is there any one near who can hear our conversation?"

"Wait a few minutes, lady, and the men will go on shore to dinner; then you may speak freely. Be seated."

The captain left her, and rummaged the hold to see if any lazy darkey had sought shelter from the sun below; and by the time he returned, the men who had been employed aloft and about the decks had gone on shore.

"The coast is clear, lady; there is not another soul on board, but ourselves, so you may speak without fear of being overheard."

"A friend in whose judgment I place implicit confidence, has informed me that you are the man for my purpose; hear me, then, without interruption. I propose to buy your vessel, if I can at the same time engage your services for three months. From here you must proceed to the outer harbor of Rio Janeiro and there anchor, to await further orders. The enterprise will be dangerous, but not dishonorable. Do you accept?"

"Of course I do, lady. I'm always up and dressed for an adventure. When do you want the vessel?"

"As soon as she can be made ready."

"That means in six hours. All I have to do is to head sails, ship a crew, get on board water and provisions, clear and be off."

"What, so soon? No, two days hence will do. You must not excite suspicion by being in a hurry. To-morrow I will visit you again, but I will be in man's attire. Adieu."

The next day at the same hour, a young man in the garb of a ship's steward, approached Capt. Squirrel respectfully, hat in hand, and inquired if he wanted a steward.

"I do," replied the captain; "and you may go to work at once. Your wages, eighteen dollars a month."

"But where is the ship bound, sir?"

"To the moon or Davy Jones's locker. I see you don't want to go. Be off; I'm busy."

"I do, sir; but—"

"None of your buts. Go to work, or go to—"

"That will do, captain. Let us arrange for our departure. Here is a bag of doubloons, as the first installment; in the afternoon I will bring another. I am the brother of Maritana, who called upon you yesterday. She is unwell and could not come."

"Young man," said the captain, eyeing him sharply from head to heels, "you have made a mistake; perhaps the captain of that outward bound bark astern, is the person with whom your sister has business."

"Sir," replied the sham steward, evidently confounded, "did not a lady visit you yesterday, and promise to repeat the visit to-day or to-morrow?"

"Lady, my lad, twenty ladies visit me every day of my life. But what is that to you? I have given you an answer. I have told you that I am not the person you're in search of."

The sham steward lingered a minute or two, and seemed inclined to continue the conversation, but the captain left him and proceeded to the other side of the vessel, to answer a hail, alongside. The sham steward left, and while he was descending one side, the lady, dressed like a ship-boy, ascended the other. Hurrying her into the cabin, he threw open one of the windows, and putting a spyglass in her hand, asked her if she knew that fellow who was standing up in the boat.

"Heavens, captain!" she exclaimed, "he is the enemy of our house."

"I thought so."

"Can you go to sea to-night?"

"Yes."

"When will you be ready to receive my friends?"

"At sundown."

"I go, then. Nothing but death or Rosas can detain us."

Captain Squirrel proceeded ashore and sent a couple of casks of rum aboard. He then went the rounds of the rum-shops and invited about twenty noted beach-combers to come on board the Zenobia, as he was going to have a grand blow-out in honor of having finished her repairs. Everybody knew the captain, and were not astonished at any freak he might undertake. In his rounds he saw the sham steward, and another hang-dog looking fellow in his company, and slapping them familiarly on the backs, invited them also on board; but they declined.

Boats were continually passing from the Zenobia to the shore, and the harbor police having satisfied themselves of the proceedings on board, took no further notice. Songs, laughter, and other nautical frolics were the order of the day in the between decks of the bark. The captain of the port, an old friend of Squirrel's, came on board to see the sport, and before leaving, Squirrel gave the health of Governor Rosas and confusion to his enemies, which was drunk with three times three. About this time a boy made his appearance in the between decks; but the moment Capt. Squirrels saw him, he sang out:

"Be off, you young scamp; we are all old sinners here. Now, my lads,"—turning to the sailors,—“by way of working off this blow-out, let us up anchor and have a cruise down the bay under bare poles."

The boy disappeared.

"Agreed," cried one and all. "Bundle up, bundle up, then, and man the windlass."

"Yo heave O; clank, clank, and hurrah," mingled with shouts and laughter, resounded far and near. Up came the anchor, and slowly the vessel drifted stern foremost before the land breeze.

"Hang it, boys," shouted the captain, "this must never be; we must have canvass on her, or we'll go ashore. Let us haul the sails up and bend them, and then we'll blow it out straight. Pass along that foresail and foretopsail, and you, Long-boy and Jack Ketch, bend the jib."

"Ay, ay, sir," was the ready response.

All on board was bustle and animation, and though the sun was down an hour, the old sea-dogs went to work like heroes.

"Hoist away the jib, my boys, and haul the sheet to port. Starboard the helm—she's got stern way on her. Good—belay, there, she falls off like a lady."

And slowly the good craft canted to starboard, her after-yards being square and her head yards abox. Soon she was dead before the wind, and the jib hung flapping idly from side to side.

"Square the head yards," cried the captain. "Let fall the foresail and haul both sheets aft. Belay. Is that foretopsail ready?"

"All ready, sir."

"Let fall—sheet home. Man the halliards. Hurrah, my boys, give us a song. Port your helm a little, there; very well done. Keep her as she goes."

And away she went spanking at the rate of six knots, for she was flying light, having only about fifty tons of ballast on board and three casks of water. All hands but the mate, who was at the wheel, descended to the between decks, where a glorious spread of cold ham, corned beef, and a variety of other meats, with abundance of good Jamaica was waiting for them. To work they went in gallant style, and were soon as happy as lords. By three o'clock next morning they were all keel up in the folds of an old sail. The wind continued fresh and fair, and soon the good craft passed Point Indio.

About noon, some of the tars awoke, and were not a little astonished at their whereabouts; but a good breakfast, and a little more rum soon put them to rights, so that they went to work and bent all the other sails, satisfied that the vessel could not work back under her jib, foresail and foretopsail. Still she was kept headed seaward, for the captain told them that he did not intend to return until all his grog was out. Such a resolution met the warm approbation of all hands, who again went to work with a will upon the good old Jamaica.

About noon of the second day out, the wind, which had been westerly, changed to due north, the very course Capt. Squirrel wanted to steer, so he had to brace up sharp, but still kept her headed to the eastward. Next morning at daylight, a sail was seen on the lee quarter, coming up with her hand over hand. As she neared, Capt. Squirrel made her out to be the "Argentine," a man-of-war brig belonging to Rosas, manned by a hundred men and mounting ten guns. He descended to the cabin, where were Don Gonzales, his two sons, and two daughters.

"Sir," said the captain, "has Rosas anything against you?"

"He has," replied the Spaniard, gravely, "if my unfaithful servant has betrayed me. But why do you ask?"

"Be seated, ladies and gentlemen," said the captain, for they had all started to their feet when he asked the dreadful question, "and let us talk this matter over without fear or excitement. Rosas's brig, the Argentine, commanded by bloody Dick the Dutchman, is not more than fourteen miles distant, and will be alongside of us in four or five hours, unless we give him the slip to leeward, for I know my old box can run three miles to his two before the wind. Now, seeing that Rosas has business with you,—the nature of which I will not ask,—I can tell you that he has business with me also. My vessel has no papers. I ran out of port without clearing; have nothing on board but an old Yankee flag to show my nationality, and am, therefore, to all intents and purposes, in the eye of the law, a pirate. Don't start, ladies; I'm no pirate; in fact, I only state this to give you confidence that all mortal man can do to get you and myself out of this scrape will be done. I may as well tell you that I can't run to leeward; the wind is now due north, but it ought to be southeasterly, and will probably blow from that quarter before sunset. In that case, we would be all right, for then Rio Janeiro would be under our lee, and bloody Dick might whistle for us. But how to keep him at arm's length till night I don't know. We can't fight, for I don't believe there is even a brace of pistols on board; and if we are captured, the Lord have mercy on our souls, for Dick will have none on our bodies. I know Rosas too well to doubt the nature of his orders. Now I'm going on deck, remain below, for the boys don't know you're on board, and trust me."

He was on deck in a twinkling, and shutting the companion, he turned to the mate, and said:

"That's bloody Dick, and he's after us for running out of port without clearing."

"Yes, sir," said the mate, "and for having those pretty Spanish girls on board. You see I know more than you think I do; but trust old Ned, he'll never say die. I wouldn't care an old quid, if we had a bulldog or two to show fight with; but we have nothing, except some old handspikes, and a parcel of drunken sailors to use them. Never mind, captain, let us go down together, rather than fall into the hands of bloody Dick. I know him—'dead men tell no tales' is his watchword as well as the pirate's."

"Give me your hand, old Dick—honest old Dick—and if we don't send that infernal pirate to Davy Jones before sunset then I'm willing to go there myself."

The Argentine was a fine Baltimore built clipper brig of two hundred tons, very long and very sharp, with raking masts and great spread of yards. The Zenobia was a down east bark of four hundred and fifty tons, almost square at both ends, and flat upon the floor as a mud-scow. The brig left a wake straight as an arrow, while the bark was making sometimes a point and a half leeway. Both vessels had their royals set, but while the bark was heeling over at an angle of thirty degrees, the brig was walking along almost upright. It was evident that unless the bark up helm and ran to leeward, the brig would cut her off in a couple of hours. All hands were mustered on deck, and Capt. Squirrel addressed them as follows:

"Boys, bloody Dick is after us. Now I'm going to play him a trick that will wind his time-piece up for a week at least; but mind, you must obey my orders to the letter, or you'll lose all the fun. In the first place, then, as the parsons say, let us licker. Pass the grog along, my hearties."

Three cheers for Capt. Squirrel were tossed off in a humper all round; then to work the men went with a will. The hobstays, bowsprit, shrouds, martingale stays, and guys, and all the other rigging outside, as well as the chainplates fore and aft, were greased, as a precaution against being boarded. The braces, tacks and sheets, and the gear of the gafftopsail, spanker and jib, were led into the between decks, and a house of rough boards, stuffed with old canvass, bullet-proof, was built around the wheel. A spare topsail was hauled on deck and roughly thrummed with oakum, the chains were taken from round the windlass and unshackled at fifteen fathoms, and the anchors made ready to let go in a second if required.

These arrangements clearly indicated that if Capt. Squirrel could not escape, he was determined, if possible, to disable the Argentine by a bold attempt to run her down. The wind had changed to northeast, which induced Capt. Squirrel to tack, but being very light, the bark was a long time in stays. She now headed north-northwest, but the breeze freshening, she made nearly two points leeward, and had to take in her royals and flying jib. The brig continued on the port tack until she was nearly abreast of the bark, about two miles to leeward, and then went in stays; but her yards being very square, became locked when abox, so that she lost headway and drifted half a mile to leeward before her head yards were braced round. This seemed to exasperate Bloody Dick, for shortly afterwards he hoisted a black flag at the main, the Buenos Ayrean colors at the peak, and put a board in the main rigging, upon which was written in large letters,—“Heave-to, or I'll sink you!” A minute or two elapsed; the breeze freshened and changed two points to the eastward, which brought the bark up to her course.

"Hurra, my boys!" shouted Capt. Squirrel,—"two points more, and we'll show Bloody Dick a clean pair of heels. Keep her clean full."

The brig was still two miles to leeward, about a point before the beam, in such a position that the bark could easily be cut off if she attempted to run before the wind. Soon went the report of a gun to leeward, as another admonition to heave-to; and the bark, as if regarding the signal, kept off a point. This induced the brig to keep off also; but perceiving that the bark did not intend to approach nearer, a shot was fired over her. Capt. Squirrel immediately put in his main rigging a board with the following inscription,—"Don't sink me; I've a million on board,"—and at the same time hoisted the Yankee ensign.

"Down in the between decks, every man of you, except two to stand by the anchors; and mind, for your lives, obey my orders promptly," cried Capt. Squirrel.

Hardly had they cleared the deck when a volley of musketry rattled against the wheel-house, backed by a loud hail to heave-to; but no one was hurt. The brig was not more than three-quarters of a mile off, about two points on the bark's lee bow, huffing occasionally in the wind to deaden her way till the bark came up. Her crew, armed with pistols and cutlasses, were ranged along the weather bulwarks ready to board.

"Now, my boys," said Capt. Squirrel, "ready about."

"All ready, sir."

"Hard a lee—rise tacks and sheets—haul well taut for a good awing—mainsail haul (and round flew the after yards slap against the backstays). Down with the main tack and aft with the sheet, while the sail is heeled—well. Belay; haul up the jib sheet; haul off all. Round with the headyards. Haul aboard the tack; aft with the sheet. So, well of all. Now stand by to round in the after yards in a twinkling. Stretch the weather braces along."

The bark was now on the port tack, heading southeast, and the brig having worn at the time she stayed, was ranging alongside of her, about half a mile distant, firing volley after volley of musketry, all aimed at the wheel-house of the bark. But Capt. Squirrel and the helmsman were too well protected to be either hurt or frightened. Unable to range alongside on the port tack, and evidently apprehensive that the trade wind, southeast, would soon set it, the brig kept away a point and darted ahead of the bark, with the intention of boarding her to leeward on the opposite tack. The very moment the brig came to the wind, Capt. Squirrel could not restrain his joy; he dashed his hat off and danced upon it.

"Now," said he, "I'll have him, in spite of all. Stand by your afterbraces, main tack and sheet," he sang out through the after-senttle, to the men in the between decks, then turning to old Ned, who was at the wheel, he said: "Keep her off a little. Hurra, my boys, she's in irons (the brig's yards were locked). Down with the gafftopsail and spanker. Up with the helm, old Ned, and take her between the masts. Square away the afteryards. Pull for dear life—pull, my hearties. Ease off the larboard main sheet, and haul in the starboard one—quick, with all your soul. Square the head yards—well."

She was now dead before the wind, flying at the rate of twelve miles an hour, bearing down upon the brig, hardly a stone's throw distant, and though the brig had cleared her yards and put her helm up, yet she had not gathered headway, but was drifting bodily to leeward. Dick was desperate. He roared and swore, and poured a raking broadside at the bark; but the excitement was so great that no aim was taken, and only one shot struck her, and that was about the fore rigging.

"On deck, my boys," cried Capt. Squirrel, "and stand by to repel boarders. Up, my hearties, and see the fun."

The men on board the brig were horror struck. Escape was impossible. The brig could not be expected to survive the shock of the inevitable collision. Foaming the water before her; now rising, now falling, borne onward by the waves and wind, the bark bounded down upon her victim. Crash went her flying jibboom against the brig's maintopmast stay, and down came her maintopmast and all above it on deck.

"Board her, board her!" roared Dick; but it could not be done; she was too high out of water, and all her ropes were greasy.

"Stand by the anchors," shouted Capt. Squirrel. And the next second the bark came bounce, like the report of a cannon, full upon the brig, tearing and crushing all before her; and at that instant Capt. Squirrel hallooed: "Let go the anchors;" and down they went, smash through the brig's deck, making the chains fly fore and aft, killing or wounding all in their way.

"She's sinking, she's sinking!" resounded from the brig's crew as the water rushed over the decks into the holes made by the anchors, and many desperate attempts were made to board the bark, but all were repulsed. Not a soul reached her deck.

Quick as lightning, Capt. Squirrel and six of the best men went forward and cut away the jibboom; and as the bark swung broadside on, he backed her afteryards, and cautioned her to leeward, across the brig's stern, carrying away her trysail, boom and gaffs.

"Save us, save us!" hailed the crew of the brig, "we're sinking;" but Capt. Squirrel replied:

"No you aint. Man your pumps, and heave your guns overboard. I've no boats. Good-by. Three cheers, boys." And three times three were given by the bark's crew.

The brig, owing to her solid bulwarks, was only cut down three strokes below the plank-shear, but when in contact she heeled over so much that the water rushed over her deck. When clear of the bark, however, the wind filled her courses and brought her upon an even keel; and taking Capt. Squirrel's advice, her crew hove the weather guns overboard, which lightened her enough to bring the leak out of water.

Leaving the brig to take care of herself, the bark ran to leeward, and fortunately the wind kept changing in her favor until it settled into a steady trade. It was now four o'clock in the afternoon, and the bark having obtained a good offing from the brig, was hove to to repair damages, and not before time, for she had five feet of water in the hold. Her cutwater and stem were crushed flat against the planks, her hoods were started, the head of her bowsprit twisted off, and both jibboom and foretopgallant mast gone. The sail which had been prepared for the contingency of collision, was now passed over the bow and bound to it with ropes, and the oakum with which it was roughly thrummed, was drawn into the leaks and soon stopped them. Pumping and hailing, however continued the order of exercise full fifteen hours before she was freed; but as there was plenty of rum served out, the tars worked without growling. Sail was then made, and away she went before a favoring trade in good style, notwithstanding the clumsy canvass over her bow. In a week she ran alongside of a British frigate at anchor in the outer harbor of Rio Janeiro, and hove to, when Capt. Squirrel bailed her to take some passengers and treasure on board, as the bark was leaky and would have to be beached. As Don Gonzales and his family took leave, Capt. Squirrel remarked:

"My object in putting you on board the frigate is to secure your protection; for Rosas has some private treaty with the Emperor of Brazil about delivering up gentlemen charged with certain crimes, which he would be sure to advance against you, to get you in his power; but under the British flag both you and your property will be safe, in spite of Rosas or the Emperor of Brazil. I shall visit you to-morrow. Adieu."

The bark was then run into the inner harbor, where she procured an anchorage, and was brought up. A grand blow out, and five donbloons each, tapered off with the tars for their twelve days' cruise. The next day Capt. Squirrel visited the frigate, and was received by her captain and officers with a warmth of welcome which he could not have anticipated. He was treated like a hero, and spontaneously cheered by the crew. Don Gonzales and his family had painted his conduct in the most glowing terms.

"You are thrice welcome, Capt. Squirrel," said the British captain, "and as I am the senior officer in command, I tender you the protection of the British flag against all comers."

Capt. Squirrel expressed his gratitude, and then by invitation proceeded to the cabin, where Don Gonzales briefly related the circumstances which caused his flight from Buenos Ayres.

"My private secretary," he said, "obtained possession of a correspondence between Gen. Urquiza and myself, and as the price of his fidelity, demanded the hand of my daughter Mariana. I was so enraged at his baseness that I could have slain him on the spot; but he coolly informed me that his death would only hasten my own destruction, for he had a confederate, who would reveal the whole to Rosas if he were absent only a single day. Finding myself completely in his power, I communicated his designs to my daughter, who, with a heroism worthy of her name, undertook to effect our escape. By feigned kindness and other stratagems, she threw the fellow off his guard, while she conveyed our moveable property—half a million—on board the bark, and finally our whole family. My children," he continued, "kneel to God, who has protected us, and kiss the hand of Capt. Squirrel in gratitude for his disinterested heroism."

The request had not to be repeated. Tears of gratitude filled their eyes, while they eagerly grasped the whole-souled sailor's hand and blessed him with a fervor not to be described by words.

"This scene must not be prolonged," said Capt. Squirrel, "or I shall envy myself. If you're happy, so am I. So that will do, belay. I'm up and dressed for another adventure, just by way of keeping my hand in."

A few days afterwards Capt. Squirrel sold the bark, and at the request of Don Gonzales, accompanied him and his family to Spain, where, rumor says, he was spliced soon after to the beautiful Mariana.

The brig managed to reach Rio Janeiro, and reported having had twenty-five men killed by the bark's anchors and chains, which fell upon her decks; five of her beams were broken, her plank-shear and rails smashed, her decks burst, her maintopmast and all above it carried away, the foreyard sprung in the slings, and all her guns overboard. The bark's anchors had lodged in the berth deck, and had to be taken out by shears. Bloody Dick denounced the bark as a pirate; but could obtain no satisfaction, as Capt. Squirrel was safely lodged on board the frigate. The story of the collision eventually found its way into the newspapers, and so completely exposed the lubberliness of Bloody Dick that he was ashamed to appear ashore in daylight. Afraid to encounter the wrath of Rosas, who had sent him to capture the bark, he deserted the brig and went to Europe, where it is hoped, he became a better man.

WE LIVE IN DEEDS, NOT YEARS.

A cheerful, generous, charitable-minded woman is never old. Her heart is as young at sixty or seventy as it was at eighteen or twenty; and those who are old at sixty or seventy are not made old by time. They are made old by the ravages of passions, and feelings of an unsocial, ungenerous nature, which have cankered their minds, wrinkled their spirits, and withered their souls. They are made old by envy, by jealousy, by hatred, by suspicions, by uncharitable feelings; by slandering, scandalizing, ill-bred habits, which, if they avoid, they preserve their youth to the very last, so that the child shall die, as the Scripture says, a hundred years old. There are many old women who pride themselves on being eighteen or twenty; they are dry, heartless, cold, indifferent; they want the wellspring of youthful affection, which is cheerful, active, and always engaged in some labor of love calculated to promote and distribute enjoyment. There is an old age of the heart possessed by many who have no suspicion that there is anything old about them; and there is a youth which never grows old, a lover who is ever a boy, a Psyche who is ever a girl.—Tribune.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE BRIDAL.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

THE sunshine made pretty Margery's bridal robe look even more beautiful, as it went inquisitively over it, peeping beneath its rich folds and finding its way through the vanity-like lace that fell from the short sleeves; and Margery was evidently pleased with it, laying carefully by its side on the table a wreath of white, bursting rose-buds, which told as plainly as could be, that only a few hours would elapse before the muslin robe, with its falling lace, would set off Margery's form, and her head bow gracefully with the fresh gift of early summer upon it. And so she sat down, with a half blush upon her pure face, and clasped her hands over her eyes to shut out the last fading ray of sunshine that was pressing through the little chamber. She sat there till the twilight came, with its great purple wings, and swept over the dewy roses that blossomed by the gate—swept over her bridal robe and wreath, and even down into her happy heart so that quiet tears fell through her fingers.

"Only two hours," she said, at last, musingly, to herself, "before I shall be Philip's wife—Mr. Philip Hughes's wife! How strange it will seem to be called 'Mrs.,' and to have people say Margery Hughes when they call my name. I don't feel sad and gloomy to-night, as they all told me I should, but instead, happy, O, so happy that nothing hereafter can have power to part us! Let me see: he told me all about the house this morning—about the sitting-room where the sunshine comes very early in the morning—I think so much of having a great deal of sunlight. And then the parlor windows are covered with vines; and he says he has bought a stuffed rocking-chair large enough for us both to sit in—I am so little. I don't know, but I suppose I shan't be bashful about sitting in his lap then. His mother has given him a great family Bible, which he says contains a register (here Margery blushed). Of course we shan't want it for a long, long while, though I didn't tell him so. I wonder if Philip knows how much I love him, and how I pray God every day to make me great and noble—so pure and true that his life will be a delicious hymn of joy that he has taken me! How I thank God for giving me somebody to love!"

Then, after she had said all this, Margery lit a lamp and wound her sunny brown hair about her head, till she looked like a young queen. A friend came in and told her how very soon she must be ready, for it wanted only an hour of the time appointed for the ceremony. The robe was put on, and the white leaves of the bridal wreath lay upon Margery's head. In a flutter of anxiety, she began to pace her chamber, looking down the brown path that led to the road every moment for Philip. "It was strange that he didn't come," she said. She wondered if he would like her hair, and if he wouldn't know at once that her wreath was made of the very buds that he had brought her in the morning.

Presently she heard voices in the road, and with a glad smile upon her face she peeped through the blinds, eagerly listening to catch the tones of Philip's voice. But no, there was only a confused murmur, then the outer door was hurriedly opened, and Margery thought she heard a suppressed scream. The clock struck eight, and no one came for her; and pale and trembling, she started, unbidden, for the parlor, a horrible fear knocking at her heart for admittance.

The parlor door was open, the sofa drawn to the middle of the room, and white and ghastly, some one was lying upon it. Margery did not speak, but went forward until her robe touched the hand that, even in death seemed stretched forth at her coming. There was no wild sob upon the lips—no burning tears upon the cheek of poor Margery; her fingers did not tremble as they lay caressingly upon the black, wavy hair of her betrothed, or her voice sound broken, as she said:

"Philip! O, Philip!"

"He was drowned by the overturning of a boat, while crossing the river," said the minister, wiping his eyes.

Death, silent and cold, sat at the bridal that night. Bridal, though one soul, free and unfettered, rejoiced in the presence of its Maker, and one, in its sweet, patient holiness, drew the angels from above to minister unto it. Two, yet one, bound by that tie which outreaches far the light of the stars on the breadth of the blue sky; and Margery's wedding, though it made black night in her heart, was a joy to all heaven.

HOME.

Home; it is a little world, it has its own interests, its own laws, its own difficulties and sorrows, its own blessings and joys. It is the sanctuary of the heart, where the affections are cherished in the tenderest relations—where heart is joined to heart, and love triumphs over all selfish calculations. It is the training school of the tender plants, which in after years are to yield flowers and fruits to parental care. It is the fountain whence come the streams which beautify and enliven social life. If any man should have a home, it is the man of business. He is the true working man of the community. The mechanic has his fixed hours, and when these have run their course, he may, ere the day closes, dismiss all anxiety as his labor ends, and seek the home circle. Comparatively little has been the tax on his mind, and not much more on his physical system, as he learns to take all easy. But the man of business is under a constant pressure. His is not a ten-hour system, with an interval of rest; but he is driven onward and onward, early and late, without the calculation of hours. He must be employed. In the earnestness of completion, in the complexity of modern modes of business, in the fluctuations which frequently occur, in the solicitous dependence on the fidelity and integrity of others, he has no leisure moments during the day. With a mind incessantly under exciting engagements, and a body without its appropriate nutriment, he may well pant for home, and joy in its quiet affection and confidence.—Boston Herald.

BANVARD, THE ARTIST, AND HIS RESIDENCE.

We present on this page two pictures, drawn and engraved expressly for the Pictorial, which will be found to possess no ordinary interest. The first represents Mr. Banvard, the panoramic artist, in his oriental travelling costume, with fez and caftan, and the luxuriance of beard necessary to harmonize with his eastern dress. Though a good likeness, the change of dress and style of hair afford a striking contrast to his appearance as we formerly represented him in the plain garb of an American citizen. Our second picture is a view of the beautiful and costly dwelling the artist has recently erected for his permanent residence. We are pleased at this latter evidence of his prosperity, for certainly no one has more honorably earned a fortune. He has attained it by the persevering culture and exercise of his natural talents, by untiring industry, and by that bold enterprise which so eminently distinguishes the American character. But a very few years since, Banvard, a poor young man, was floating down the Mississippi in his skiff, sketching the features of the father of waters to form the basis of a panorama, miles in extent—a gigantic undertaking. He made little noise about it, only, before coming to the eastern cities with his completed work, he obtained authentic testimonials to the accuracy of his representations. His painting he left to speak for itself. We well remember the opening of his exhibition at Amory Hall in this city—the audiences rapidly increasing, the long-continued attraction of his remarkable painting, and its complete success. It proved an immediate fortune. Wherever he exhibited it, it was received with the same enthusiasm, and attracted the same crowds. After having travelled with his panorama extensively in this country, he removed it to England, meeting with the same good fortune which had established his reputation in this country. He remained abroad a long time; and, after returning to the United States, projected a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, which he carried into effect, gathering, with great exertion, difficulty, and expenditure, the data for a panorama no less successful than that of the Mississippi, and still a lucrative exhibition. And now, after wandering for a quarter of a century, without a fixed habitation or a home, Mr. Banvard has at last pitched his tent on the shores of his native State, at Cold Spring Harbor, one of the most beautiful of the many inlets which indent the shores of Long Island Sound. The architecture of "Glenada," so faithfully represented in our engraving, is in the Italian castellated style, and the house is located in a lovely and romantic glen, which declines gradually towards the water, the southern side ascending the slope of a gently swelling hill, from which a view is obtained of one of the most beautifully picturesque landscapes in this country. Mr. Banvard was the architect of his own house as well as of his own fortunes, and personally superintended the direction in all its details. The material is rubble stone, stuccoed, and the mansion, when viewed from the water, with the various towers rising above the loeust trees, with which the lawn in front is bounded, has a magnificent appearance, reminding you forcibly of some of the quaint old castles nestled among the glens of old Scotland. The castellated style was selected for its picturesque effect and its peculiar adaptability to the local scenery. We do not dislike it for its quaintness, for the monotony of American domestic architecture has hitherto been one of its crying sins. In travelling in the United States, it is most fatiguing to the eye to meet house after house and village after village erected on the same pattern; and again, to see beautiful sites disfigured by inappropriate buildings. In a wild glen, for instance, with all the striking peculiarities of northern scenery, we shall see a Grecian temple, only it will not be a purely Grecian temple, but have its iron balustrades, and Venetian blinds, and non-descript balconies, such as were never conceived of by Doric or Athenian imagination. Of late years, however, a vast improvement has taken place; some of the first minds in the country devote themselves to the improvement of domestic architecture, and valuable works upon the subject of building and landscape gardening have been disseminated broadcast through the country. Mr. Banvard has committed none of the sins to which we have alluded. With the large experience of extensive travel, and with a painter's eye for scenery, harmony and effect, he has produced a picture, while building a home, and his tact has enabled him to conciliate in-door comfort with external display. The building contains twenty-four apartments. There are nine rooms on the first floor, as you enter from the esplanade, viz., the drawing-room, parlors, conservatory, ante-room, servant's room, and several chambers. The second story contains the nursery, school-room, guest chambers, bath, library, study, etc., with the servants' rooms in the towers. The basement is occupied with the culinary offices, store-rooms, etc. Although the facade extends in front one hundred and fifteen feet, still Mr. Banvard says his castle is not completed, as he has his plans arranged for adding a large dojon or keep, to be occupied by his studio, pointing-room, and a museum for the reception of the large collection of curiosities which he has gathered in all parts of the world. The grounds immediately surrounding the castle contain about six acres, the entrance to which is from the lawn in front. By the gateway is a cosy porter's lodge, occupied by Mr. Banvard's faithful man, Stringer, who has followed his fortunes about the world, and now sits down to enjoy life under the shadow of his master's "vine and fig-tree," and to superintend the farm, which consists of about sixty acres. The taste of the owner and the skill of his gardener are rapidly converting this territory from an ordinary farm into a picturesque ferme ornée. In the immediate vicinity of Glenada is the village of Cold Spring, but in view of the numerous towns and villages of this name—one being not far distant on the Hudson—it has been proposed to change the name of the place and call it BANVARD, from the circumstance of the distinguished owner of Glenada having appreciated the beauties of the neighborhood by selecting it as a place of residence, thus adding to its importance, and causing it to be as extensively known as the name itself.

JOHN BANVARD.

RICHARD CROMWELL.

He had no faith in his cause, nor confidence in himself, nor reliance on those around him; and his unceremonious ejection from power was a natural consequence where such premises existed. If they who ejected him had paid his father's debts as well as his own, they would have made him a richer, but not a happier man. They would have added some dignity to his retirement, but, as it was, he had enough for enjoyment,—such enjoyment as he could find in the pursuits he most cared for—of a country gentleman and boon companion. These pursuits, however, were not always practicable. From May, 1659, to the middle of 1660, he lived at Hursley, in some fear of creditors, whom even now he could not satisfy, and in some doubt as to what his fortune might be if Charles II. were recalled; he then retired to Paris, where he lived in obscurity, and under the fictitious name of Wallis. Twice he visited Geneva; and on one of these occasions he was told to his face, by the Prince de Conti, who received him under his assumed name, as coxcomb, rascal, coward, base fellow, and sot. About twenty years after "Mr. Wallis" first buried himself in obscure lodgings in Paris, a Mr. Richard Clark settled at Cheshunt.

It was by this name that Richard Cromwell, no longer in fear of creditors, chose to be known. He was a hearty church and conventicle-going, hunting, joyous gentleman, loving good wine a little and fair ladies more. He was choice in the selection of his company, seldom referred to his past greatness, and was never sarcastic, save when he alluded to the addresses of the people of England, who, on his being proclaimed protector, laid their lives and fortunes at his feet. There was a touch of King Lear in the old man's destiny, after all. His daughters opposed his having life-possession of an estate left him by his son, on account of mental debility. Queen Anne was then reigning, and old Mr. Clark came up to town, appeared personally in court, where his suit was carried on, and was not only courteously treated by the judge, but was requested by him to remain covered during the proceedings. He won his suit, was reconciled to his daughters, and in 1712, being then in his eighty-sixth year, he died at Cheshunt. His enemies ridiculed him under the names of "Tumbledown Dick" and "Queen Richard;" but even they could not deny that he was an honest man than he for whom Richard was compelled to make room.—Macaulay.

GLENADA, BANVARD'S CASTLE, COLD SPRING HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

BLUE FISHING AT SANDY HOOK, NEW YORK BAY.

BLUE FISHING AT SANDY HOOK, NEW YORK BAY.

The very spirited seaside scene on this page was drawn expressly for us on the spot, by Mr. Hill, and delineates a mode of fishing which, as far as we know, is peculiar to this country. The sport is carried on to a great extent, both from the shore, as represented in our engraving, and from boats. The modus operandi, in the former case, is as follows:—The fisherman fastens one end of his line round his waist, and swinging the squid—generally a piece of bright lead, or an imitation minnow on a hook—round his head, flings it outside the breakers to where the blue fish lie, and immediately, if he have a bite, begins to haul in and run back at the same time. Sometimes, when a fish is hooked, it breaks away just as it reaches the beach, when the fisherman will often recover it by following it up quickly. The shipping on the horizon line are not exaggerated in number, for all inward and outward bound vessels pass round Sandy Hook. In the summer season, it is a favorite bathing spot, and frequented by thousands of overhauled New Yorkers. In our picture, one of the excursion steamers from the city is represented slowly paddling along, to give the passengers an opportunity of fishing. Astern of the steamer is a clipper from California or China, coming in with studding-sails set; and in the farther distance, a whole squadron of fishing vessels standing out to sea. In the foreground is a gentleman supplying his lady friends, who are picnicking on the shore, with refreshments. The whole scene is lively and picturesque, and strikingly faithful in every particular.

ORGAN BLOWING BY WATER POWER.

We find the following scientific fact in a late English paper:—An apparatus of great value and importance in connection with the performance of large organs, has been affixed to the organ in East Parade Chapel, Leeds. The invention—which has been patented in England and France by Dr. D. Joy, engineer, and Mr. W. Holt, organ builder, Leeds—is called the "Hydro-Pneumatic Engine," and can be affixed to any organ. Its object is to supersede manual labor and the more expensive steam power in blowing large organs in churches, chapels and public edifices; and its usefulness and economy are not more apparent than its compactness and simplicity. The apparatus in East Parade Chapel is affixed to an ordinary one inch pipe, conveying the town's water, brought into the vestry beneath the chapel. The whole apparatus does not occupy a space exceeding four feet; and it is found fully equal to blowing the bellows of the above organ, which is an instrument of forty-four stops, including pedal pipes of twenty-four feet to G G G. The apparatus is capable of being supplied to the largest organs; indeed, Mr. Holt's workmen are at present engaged in attaching it to one of the largest in London, manufactured by Hill. Three such cylinders as are used in Mr. Holt's workshop would blow the Liverpool organ, which at present costs £200 per annum; whereas, by the hydro-pneumatic engine, the cost would not exceed £20 a year.—Leeds Mercury.

SCENES ON THE OCEAN FLOOR.

Besides the countless varieties of the ferns, the bottom of the sea is overgrown with the curled, deep purple leaves of the sea-lettuce, with large porous lichens, and many-branched, hollow algae, full of life and motion in their rosy little bladders, thickly set with ever moving tiny arms. These plants form submarine forests, growing into one another, in apparently lawless order—here interlacing their branches, there forming bowers and long avenues; at one time thriving abundantly, till the thicket seems impenetrable, then again leaving large openings between wold and wold, where smaller plants form a beautiful pink turf. There a thousand hues and tinges shine and glitter in the changing light. In the indulgence of their luxuriant growth, the fungi especially seem to gratify every whim and freak. Creeping close to the ground, or sending long-stretched arms, crowned with waving plumes, up to the blessed light of heaven, they form pale-green sea groves, where there is neither moon nor star, or rise up nearer to the surface, to be transcendently rich and gorgeous in brightest green, gold and purple. And, through this dream-like scene, playing in all the colors of the rainbow, and deep under the hollow, briny ocean, there sail and chase each other, merrily, gaily-painted mollusks and bright shining fishes. Snails of every shape creep slowly along the stems, while huge, gray-haired seals hang with their enormous tusks on large, tall trees. There is a gigantic Dugong, the siren of the ancients, the sidelong shark with his leaden eyes, the thick haired sea leopard, and the sluggish turtle. Look how these strange, ill-shapen forms stir themselves from time to time! Perhaps they graze peacefully in the unbroken cool of the ocean's deep bed, when lo! a hungry shark comes shyly, silently around that grove; its glassy eyes shine ghost-like with a yellow sheen, and seek their prey. The sea dog first becomes aware of his dreaded enemy, and seeks refuge in the thickest recesses of the fungus forest. In an instant the whole scene changes. The oyster closes its shell with a clasp, and throws itself into the deep below; the turtle conceals head and feet under her impenetrable armor, and sinks slowly downward; the playful little fish disappear in the branches of the marocystis; lobsters hide under the thick, clumsily shapen roots, and the young walrus alone turns boldly round, and faces the intruder with his sharp-pointed teeth. The battle commences; both seek the forest; their fins become entangled in the closely interwoven branches; at last the more agile shark succeeds in wounding his adversary's side. Despairing of life, the bleeding walrus tries to conceal his last agony in the woods; but he soon falls an easy prey to the shark, who greedily devours him.—Putnam's Magazine.

CAFE ON THE NILE.

The bright, sunny picture on this page presents us with a characteristic phase of oriental life. The sketch was made at the locality on the banks of the Nile, and represents a café in the open air, its patrons requiring no other shelter than that afforded by the vines and other plants trained over the rude and lofty trellis reared against a natural wall of rock. Here, protected from the sun, but catching every breeze that stirs, they abandon themselves to their dreamy and indolent enjoyment. By the parrot, and against the wall, recline the smokers of the "vile weed," its narcotic properties perhaps dashed with a little opium, to fill the brain with day-dreams, or steep the senses in a dangerous oblivion. An Arab, mounted on the universal donkey, is giving his orders to an attendant Egyptian. Grouped together, a knot of long-bearded and turbaned Moslems are discussing the latest news—the movements of the pacha, or the innovations which the infidel Franks are introducing into the land of darkness and bondage. Through the open vista a crumbling minaret and lines of broken arches show the antiquity of the place, and carry us back into the night of ages.

CAFE ON THE RIVER NILE.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A MAY MORNING LYRIC.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

Listen, maidens and youths, I pray,
To my song, this sweet May morning:
Cupid wandered one sun-bright day,
Blossoms his path adorning!
"Twirl always be fair," so Love did sing,
As from flower to flower on his radiant wing
He flitted, gilded by sunbeams gay,
And deemed that with him 'twould be always May!

With the songs he sang his pathway rang
The whole of that sweet May morning;
But a dark rain-cloud loomed up, and aloud
Pealed thunder; yet Cupid, scorning
The omen, sang on—soon the urchin's wings
Were folded and dripping. "Alas!" he sings,
"I find it is true what the wise ones say,
That even with Love 'tis not always May!"

Now, listen, maidens and youths, I pray,
All on this sweet May morning;
Laugh while you can, and dance while you may,
But heed my song for its warning!
Whatever Pleasure and Youth may say,
Don't think that life will be always May;
Nor like young Love, in his thoughtless play,
Fail to provide for a rainy day.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GRAVE OF HERNANDO DE SOTO.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

NEVER, perhaps, in the annals of the world was there a braver or more ambitious spirit than that which burned in the manly bosom of Hernando de Soto, the successor to Columbus and Vesputius, and the other distinguished discoverers of various parts of the New World. Born at Baccarola, according to the historians, in 1501, of poor but respectable parents, De Soto was obliged to depend on his own resources for subsistence; and to that end his natural courage and bravery led him into the army.

Accompanying Davila to America, the brave soldier displayed so much prudence and heroism, that the command of a troop of horse was given him. With this he followed Pizarro to Peru, and in the great battle between Pizarro and Almagro, he distinguished himself by deeds of bravery, such as the world has seldom known. Returning to Spain, he re-appeared at the court of the emperor, Charles V., where he was not less distinguished for the surpassing graces of his person and manners, than by the extraordinary soldierlike qualities which he had displayed at Peru.

Beyond the period of extreme youth, De Soto still retained many of its advantages. Handsome beyond the ordinary standard of manly beauty, with a countenance at once gracious and commanding, hair black, glossy and curling, eyes dark and lustrous, teeth that rivalled pearls in whiteness, and a voice in which music and softness were combined, Hernando De Soto was the embodiment of woman's wildest dreams of romance.

Won by his musical voice and graceful manners, even more than by his personal beauty and the heroic reputation which he bore, Isabella de Bobadilla gave her affections to the youthful and gallant soldier, even before they were solicited. Sole heiress to the wealth of her illustrious father, Don Alfonso de Bobadilla, the young Isabella, ever since the death of her parents, had resided at court, under the joint protection of Charles V. and her aunt by the mother's side, Mariana de Estrella, now married to Don Josef de Mendoza.

Donna Mariana was more indulgent to her niece than she would have perhaps proved if she had been her own child; and the young lady, between her aunt and the emperor, had the disposal of her time and her affections pretty nearly in her own hands. Chance had thrown the daughter of a Spaniard of some rank into adverse circumstances, and she had been obliged to accept the offer of Donna Mariana to become a companion to her niece. The two young girls, being exactly of an age, equally educated, and with tempers and dispositions alike sprightly and cheerful, soon became inseparable, and all differences of condition were forgotten, and Leonora de Cervera was at once a friend and sister, but never a servant, to the young Isabella.

When, therefore, the gallant De Soto presented himself at the court of the emperor, Isabella and Leonora were alike captivated by his noble bearing, conspicuous among the bravest and handsomest of the Spanish cavaliers. Neither, however, suspected the other's state of heart; and it was some comfort to each of these fair damsels that their friend knew not that she had bestowed her affections without asking.

It had been a festival day at the court; and the regal magnificence which the courtiers loved to display, had shone conspicuously in their dress and decorations. Foremost in the crowd of beauties, were Isabella and her companion, and foremost too in the crowd of cavaliers was De Soto.

He was then thirty-six years old; in the full height of that remarkable beauty which everywhere earned for him the title of "Hernando the Handsome." The flush of gratified pride was on his cheek through the whole day, for the emperor had particularly distinguished him, and his ambition was fast reaching its climax. It was the first time that Isabella's eyes had proclaimed that she loved; but on this day, she unwittingly gave rise to hopes in the young soldier's heart which she alone could fulfil.

It had been a whim of Isabella's that Leonora should dress exactly like herself, and although Donna Mariana at first offered objections, she at last consented. Leonora's extreme love of simplicity baffled her friend, who wished to array her in all the magnificence of court splendor; and finding her resolved on a simple white robe, she took care that her own should be equally simple, with the exception of the diamonds which etiquette forced her to wear, and which in Leonora's dress, found a substitute in a few pearls, gracefully bestowed about her person. In all other respects they were alike, even to the fan and bouquet, and many were the speculations among the cavaliers of the court, as to which most deserved to hear away the palm of beauty.

Something in this evening's observation had awakened Leonora's suspicions that the gallant soldier was thinking too deeply of her friend, and for a moment her heart rose against her. She turned away into a little side room, used as a conservatory, which was lighted only by the light of the lamp in the grand saloon shining into it through a glass door, before which was a curtain of white silk. The perfume of the plants and flowers made her feel heavy and sleepy, and she closed her eyes while seated on one of the crimson benches which had been placed here from the hall, to make room for the throngs that were still pouring into it.

Half-waking, half-unconscious, she sat perfectly still, dreaming perhaps, of the loneliness which would settle upon her life when Isabella should marry. She started to feel a warm breath upon her cheek, and to hear a soft, musical voice pleading at her ear. Not with so confident a manner had others tried to woo Leonora, and yet she had repelled them all—but this intruder was none other than Hernando de Soto, the object of daily and nightly dreams for months; and she suffered him to take the unresisting hand and even to press his lips upon its sooty surface.

"Found at last, fair lady!" he said, with mingled respect and presumption; "and in a fitting place to hear and utter a love-tale. Nay, start not away. Believe me, the heart that bends to thine is an honest one—and for the love it bears to thee, lady, I beg thee not to reject the true and loyal offering which thy beauty and merit demand from me."

Silence, complete and perfect, was Leonora's only answer; but she did not throw off the arm that encircled her, and she even allowed her head to be drawn upon his shoulder. It was but for a moment, however, for the cry of "Fire," from a distant part of the palace was heard, and De Soto sprang to obey its summons. A moment afterwards Isabella entered in search of her friend, and drawing her to the lighted hall, she whispered:

"For heaven's sake, Leonora, tell me what you have done to your cheeks! They are a perfect crimson. Has Juan been breathing some tale of love into your ear?"

Bright grew the maiden's blushes, confirming her friend's suspicions. She rallied her unmercifully upon the extreme youthfulness of her lover, and had scarcely ceased when the throng of cavaliers, who had started at the sound of fire, entered.

With what wonder poor Leonora beheld the lover who was as impressive in his devotions to her in the conservatory, not half an hour since, now bestowing all his attentions upon Isabella! With what wonder and indignation, too! What could she think of one who had thus told her the idle tale of love, and then followed another as he was following her friend? Tears sprang to her beautiful eyes, as she beheld the two walking arm in arm together and stopping before the emperor, who seemed to be rejoicing in their apparently mutual regard.

Heart-sick and distressed, Leonora was about retiring that night, when Isabella called her to come into her chamber. Obeying her call, she found her still sitting up, with eyes as radiant as the diamonds which she wore, and cheeks whereon the crimson flush burned deeply.

"He is mine, Leonora!" whispered the agitated and excited girl. "Hernando has spoken words this night, which make me the happiest of women. Why do you not congratulate me, Leonora? Are you weeping, child?" she continued, as the tears gushed afresh from the girl's eyes. "You do not rejoice with me as I did with you this evening?"

Some dim perception of the truth dashed along Leonora's mind; but she only wept on.

"Silly child! Will you not tell me what you are thus fretting your little heart out for? But come, cheer up; we will be married on the same night, if Juan is but a mere boy. He will make you happy, doubt it not."

Leonora helped her friend to undress, and returned, without a word, to her own room, where, throwing herself on her couch, she wept herself to sleep.

Meanwhile the young beauty in the adjoining chamber slept not, or if she slept at all, it was but to dream as in waking, of her gallant and noble-looking lover. Her countenance, when Leonora met her the next morning, wore its brightest hue; but she herself was struck with the pallid cheeks of her favorite. In vain she questioned her of the cause of her secret sorrow. Leonora kept her own counsel; nor was it until a chance observation of De Soto's, respecting an interview in the conservatory, which she did not at first comprehend, threw some light on the affair, that Isabella recollected that her friend might well have passed for herself in that dim and subdued light. Delicacy prevented her from saying anything more to Leonora; but she was pained beyond measure, to see how her form became thinner and her step lighter, and to feel that the "poetry of life" had departed from one she had loved so well.

The marriage of De Soto and Isabella met with no hindrance. The emperor was delighted to bestow one of the fairest of his court upon one of the bravest; and Isabella's aunt, although a woman who worshipped wealth, was yet dazzled by the reputation of her niece's lover, and offered no obstacle whatever. The marriage was celebrated at court, with great pomp and magnificence, Leonora acting as one of the bridesmaids; for by this time she had acquitted De Soto of all intention to deceive her, and knew that he must have mistaken her for Isabella.

Scarcely however had the married pair begun to realize their happiness, ere De Soto's imagination was roused by the narrative of the expedition to Florida by Pamphilo de Narvaez. He appealed to the emperor to undertake the conquest of Florida; and Charles, willing that his favorite should reap the reward of past bravery, created him captain-general for life, of Cuba and Florida.

One brief year of happiness with Isabella, and then the devoted wife accompanied him to the port of San Lcar de Barrameda, where nearly a thousand young men, the flower of the Spanish youth, gathered around him to embark for Cuba. This was on the 6th of April, 1538. On the 25th of May, the following year, he arrived at Espiritu Santo, and took possession of the country in the name of Charles V.

The result of this expedition, in all its details, is matter of history. Hardship, toil and danger were its distinguishing characteristics, and only such brave spirits as were gathered around Hernando de Soto would have borne all without murmuring. One bright morning in the summer of 1542, the remnants of this once large and powerful band were gathered beneath the gigantic oaks that overshadowed the banks of the Mississippi. In the shattered frames and pallid faces that were assembled there on this glorious summer morning, no one would have recognized the bright and hopeful members of the gallant band that had embarked four years before, in the Sao Christoval and its attendant fleet.

Tears, such as the bravest may shed, were in every eye, and attested the strength of their affection for him who now was about to receive its last touching office. Through the leafy branches of the trees which skirted the broad bosom of the river, the morning sun shone with broken and subdued light, as if in accordance with the solemn scene about to be witnessed. The wild notes of the birds sung the requiem, and the deep sound of the waters gave back the response to the solemn ritual. Close to the banks of the mighty stream, an evergreen oak had been felled, and in the hollow of its ponderous trunk, the glorious form of Hernando de Soto lay, as in a coffin.

Meet casket for that gallant heart to rest in! Meet type of its strength and endurance! Meet, too, that they should thus fall together—the brave oak that had breasted the western winds so long, and the brave heart that had spent its last pulsation in these western wilds! Meet grave was that mighty river for the noble dead!

"The forest is his everlasting fame,
The palm his monument, the rock his tower;
The eternal torrent—
The green savannas and the mighty waves,
And isles of flowers bright floating o'er the tide—"

All speak of the glorious form that has slept in the blue depths of the Mississippi for three hundred years.

Hernando—Isabella—Leonora—have they not met ere now?—the wife whose brief year of happiness thus closed in sorrow, and the gentle maiden whose short hour of joy was as the rose's fleeting perfume, and the dark-eyed hero whom they both had loved and lost?

COPENHAGEN.

Our sail for the last two hours was one of the most beautiful that can be imagined. The impressions were so new and lively that none of us can forget the excitement of the scene. All were struck by beauties of which they had previously heard so little; and all acknowledged that the first appearance of Copenhagen is among the finest in the world. Only one or two of the capitals of Europe make so gallant a show on approaching them. The Danish capital, in fact, is a complete triumph of art and taste; it is beautiful in spite of its position, which is perhaps the worst imaginable; yet with such admirable skill are its buildings grouped, that it looks finer than some cities which enjoy the advantage of magnificent situations. Nature has here done little; man a great deal. In the city itself, towers, some light, some massive; in the basin, masts tapering and graceful; on the heights behind, trees of great size and beauty; and along the flat shore, dense masses of foliage already in summer splendor: such at first are the only objects standing out from the huge piles of buildings, till ere long these masses break down into palaces, churches and fortresses. By-and-by we distinguish, in front, ramparts and moles stretching far out into the sea, while new life is added to the scene, by the many ships from every country waiting in the roadside for a favorable breeze to get up to the Baltic, or swiftly shooting on for the Sound. Elsewhere, too, with literary recollections endearing it to every Englishman, is in sight. The more distant coast of Sweden, with the houses of Malmö, are sparkling in the setting sun. While here before us, just as we enter the noble file of ships, lined out from the harbor as if to grace our arrival, the little landing-place and rampart-walk covered with thousands of holiday idlers come to witness the entrance of a steamer—and a fine display they make, all in their gayest attire.—Dr. Bremner.

ONE DOLLAR!

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

- There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.
- Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.
- Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.
- It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.
- In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.
- It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.
- Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.
- Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.
- Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 50,000 copies!
- Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year, or any person sending us right subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE FUTURE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITZ.

The wand of Fate is thine! Within thy halls,
Unseen, unknown, the unborn ages wait
Thy fiat, and emerge at thy command.
The victor of the world, relentless Time,
Himself is governed by thy sway, and moulds
His purpose to thy fiat, unchanging law.
What is the past? A dream—a vanished wave
Upon the sea of life, which rolls away
Into oblivion's dark gulf. But thou,
The parent of the past, dost always live,
And anxious mortals still await thy beck—
Still say, "To-morrow!"

Empire of to-day

Are doomed in thee; earth's best and noblest sons
Live out their years and hold their fated lives
In fear of thee, while thou dost awe their souls
With fear of death, who is thy messenger.
How wide the gulf!—how thick the pall that shuts
Thee and thy deep arcana from my view!
Mysterious Future! Canst thou not reveal
To me—before the season shall arrive
And haply find me unprepared—the time,
The manner of my end? Wilt thou require
Of me my life when youth's high pulses throb
With hope angelic!—or wilt thou do for
The action of thy fates, and dig my grave
When, like a stricken oak, I may revolt
But feebly thy invidious approach?
No voice gives answer—wrapped in mystery,
Thou deignest no reply; and still we wait
Thy firm decrees of good or ill, which we May only in the present time receive.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GRECIAN BRIDE.

BY WILLIAM THORNDIKE.

SMYRNA, or Giaour Izmir, as it is styled by the Mussulmans, is the gate to Syria, and the means of commercial communication between Europe and Asia. From its position it is peculiarly cosmopolitan in its character. You are there surrounded by the people and customs of many nations; the fussy European adopts the East and calms his restlessness by the Turkish tchibouque of tranquillity; the Jew offers his services as intermediary and is beaten for his pains; the genuine Osmanlee smokes in the street with all the majesty of a sultan, until his Asiatic dignity is disturbed by an English midshipman, who, mounted on a Smyrna hack, unfeelingly rides him down. The incongruities of the "infidel city" are at ordinary times to a looker-on excessively amusing.

Not the least noticeable peculiarity of the "infidel city," is the vast number of saints' days that the Greek Church enjoins her followers to keep. The custom tends practically to shorten the lives of those people very considerably.

The Smyrnaites keep holy these saints' days in very much the manner in which well-behaved Protestant housemaids keep the Sabbath. They attire themselves in holiday costume and consume the day in the contemplation of street scenery; the men taking their posts at the doorways, and the women guarding the easements with their bright eyes. Greek custom has so decidedly appropriated the windows to the women as the suitable station of their sex, that it would be regarded as criminally effeminate for a man to choose such a situation for the proper observance of saints' day.

My attendant, Paulonius, or Pauloni, as habit had abbreviated the appellation, had procured lodgings for me in Smyrna, at the house of a Greek Christian of the wealthier class. Pauloni was a glorious-looking fellow, with a regular and handsome cast of countenance. His features displayed a good deal of serene pride, self-respect, and considerable sharpness of intellect. Being accustomed to the habits of the East and the peccadilloes of Eastern functionaries, his advice and experience were of invaluable assistance.

I had been several days in Smyrna before I discovered by what means the accomplished Pauloni had been able to secure me such unexceptionable quarters. I well knew the vastness of his resources, from having experienced repeatedly their benefit; but I knew, too, that a wealthy citizen of any country, and especially of Syria, must have urgent inducements to convert his mansion into a hotel for strangers.

It was one of the inexhaustible catalogue of saints' days. I was leaving the vestibule of my Greek host for the purpose of amusing myself with the scenes in the narrow streets of the city. As I stood in the doorway I observed the seductive Pauloni conversing by mute signals, with a beautiful descendant of the Ionian race, who was adorning one of the transom-shaped windows of mine host's house. After the fashion of all the fair denizens of Smyrna, who wear their wealth upon their persons, she was attired with studied magnificence. Her head was crowned with scarlet, and loaded with gems and coins of gold. The broad, calm brow, the large black eyes, deep-set and self-relying, which in ordinary mood pierce through you like the eyes of a conqueror, were now softened into an expression of mildness, perhaps tenderness, as with expressive looks they answered the equally expressive gestures of Pauloni. The thin and fiery nostrils, and the bold line of chin and throat which usually disclose all the passion and power which dwells in the character of the Smyrna maiden, were touched with a softer pencil, and a smile enhanced the rare womanly beauty of the sweetly-turned lips.

If I grudged Pauloni his good fortune, it was not my purpose to disturb him in it. I accordingly turned carelessly from the doorstep, taking such a direction as not to interfere with the noiseless tete-a-tete. But I was unfortunate enough to alarm them. The easement was vacant instantly, and Pauloni, with an anathema expressed in every feature of his face, though it was not uttered, entered the house. Theascal had secured such excellent lodgings not for my convenience then, but for the selfish purpose of furthering an amour of his own!

The consciousness that I knew his secret most have annoyed him, for immediately on my return from my walk he assailed me.

"Smyrna has many beautiful women, your excellency?"

"You have a good Greekian like judgment in matters of taste, Pauloni; I agree with you."

"Ah, your excellency, they are cold as ice-water and fickle as air!" (A crafty stroke on the part of the cautious dragoman, for which I gave him my policy full credit.)

"Not all of them. Some I have seen sit at their windows and talk with their eyes by the hour to the passers-by."

Pauloni's impudence was for an instant staggered, but he soon recovered.

"If one cannot talk with one's consins on saints' day, he had better be a Bedouin roving the desert, or a Mahomedan, your excellency."

"But mine host, your uncle, seems a kindly disposed man, and would, doubtless, allow his nephew, if he knew his anxiety to converse with his fair cousin, to do so, without the inconvenient interposition of walls."

Pauloni was too skilful to bandy words uselessly, and as dissimulation was of no avail, he told the whole story. He had passed through Syria frequently in his present capacity, and had had the good fortune to be the recipient of the smiles of this proud Smyrna girl. He became madly enamored of her, and at once in the usual way, commenced his suit by presents of the costliest Cashmeres, and the most persuasive finery of every description. Whenever it was his good fortune to attend a traveller as interpreter, through Smyrna, he invariably established "his excellency" in the abode of his prospective father-in-law, but was careful to exercise the most jealous diligence to prevent "his excellency" from getting sight of her. He was fearful that it might interfere with his wooing.

There was another motive to seclusion at this time. He possessed a rival in one Nicoloso, a mariner on board a Greek brigantine. Like Pauloni, Nicoloso was imbued with the roving tendencies of his Ionian ancestors. He had now been blowing about the Aegean, under the influence of its ever-varying and whimsical winds, for several months, and as the average period of a cruiser had about expired, might at any time be blown upon the Syrian coast. In anticipation of this contingency, Mariani was sedulously guarded from street-contact.

Now, however, that I was privy to his passion, Pauloni did not deem it necessary to guard his love within the upper-chambers, and I had an opportunity of beholding that transcendently glorious shape. You smile at a pretty woman; you turn pale before beauty which is great enough to subdue you. Those dark, luminous eyes, shining in all the pomp and might of beauty, would have overpowered and humbled at once a man of a mind less well-balanced and of purpose less inexorable than Pauloni's. He knew nothing of fear, nor of abandonment of a well-laid design. It was this energy and determination dignifying his character, together with the attraction of a handsome person, which first charmed the beautiful Smyrnaite. The subsequent devotion and costly love-offerings completed the business.

Pauloni was delighted at this removal of the restraint upon his courtship. He would sit for hours upon a divan in one of the halls facing the garden, with the beautiful Greek crouched at his feet, soothing him with the witchery of the guitar, which she played exquisitely. I used to study this graceful picture from a distance. The apartment was open to the garden upon one side. The floor was tiled with marble, and the walls inlaid with decorations of the most fanciful designs and exquisite workmanship. Around the room ran a low divan, and the cold floor was covered at intervals with costly Persian carpets. It was the favorite resort of the lovers; Pauloni would recline upon a divan in an ecstasy of happiness, but at the same time with a gravity of demeanor which became the dignity of the great man's character, inhaling the fragrance of a tchibouque or quaffing the wine of the Lebanon; while the beautiful girl performed at his feet the most enchanting airs, and now and then overcame his tranquil gravity by one of those sweet smiles which I had seen beaming on him from the easement.

But the irrevocable law of true love could not be avoided nor provided against, even by the circumspection of Pauloni. An ill-wind blew Nicoloso upon the Syrian coast, and a complication of tacks and other manoeuvres peculiar to Greek navigation, brought the brigantine to anchor in the harbor of Smyrna.

The day after her arrival was saints' day, and as usual, Mariani took her position at the easement, for its due observance. Scarcely had she done so when a slight scream brought the active Pauloni to her side. The sailor Nicoloso had passed, and exchanged signals of recognition with her. He had mingled with his recognition, gestures of displeasure and tokens of vengeance, which had startled the haughty and fearless beauty into a shriek.

The next day, Nicoloso presented himself at the door in person, and requested an interview with the beautiful Mariani, which Pauloni peremptorily and energetically declined to accord him. His authority for the refusal was the assurance of his betrothed that nothing in the world would be more disagreeable to her. The Greek mariner went away, crushing between his teeth the most emphatic maritime oaths and imprecating the favored dragoman with vehemence.

I was lingering in the garden next day, among the formal parterres in which Oriental taste so much delights, listening to the music of the fountain spray as it tinkled upon the bottom of the marble basin, and inhaling the breath of the damask roses with which the slow air was loaded. It was about noon. Pauloni and Mariani were in the apartment opening upon the garden, entirely absorbed in each other, and oblivious of all without. The air was cooled by the fountain, and impregnated with the perfume of flowers. There was no sound nor sight to mar this charming scene of unearthing Eastern luxury.

Suddenly a clatter of rose trees, growing next to the house, and so hemmed in and choked up by interlacing boughs as to seem impenetrable, parted, and a light, spectre-like figure glided, serpent-like and noiselessly, across the cold tiles, to the spot where the lovers reclined, unconscious of everything but each other's existence. In an instant the lithe form has reached the group—a stout arm clutching a poniard is raised in the air over Pauloni's head,—then comes a wild shriek, the crimson blood stains—and Pauloni is assassinated!—no, he is struggling with the murderer valiantly, and has hurled him senseless upon the marble pavement. I saw it all, from the moment Nicoloso emerged from the rose-thicket, but so instantaneous was the act, that I reached the spot only just at the moment when the Greek mariner heavily struck the floor.

The beautiful Smyrnaite had saved Pauloni's life. Her white arm was drenched in blood. It had received the blow meant for his heart, and she lay faint and sick, the blood oozing from a frightful gash, and discolored her dress and the white marble pavement.

Pauloni was calm as a midsummer midnight. Servants were summoned, and Mariani was taken to her chamber. Nicoloso was restored to his senses and delivered up to the municipal authorities. The floor was cleansed, and a surgeon summoned, who dressed the wound in Mariani's arm, and administered an opiate which soothed her into calm slumber.

Ten days afterwards, I left Smyrna to visit the rest of Syria. The Greek maiden was convalescent, and Pauloni was again happy. Nicoloso was tried and condemned to imprisonment for life. I procured another dragoman to accompany me through Palestine. To have separated the lovers would have been an act too wicked for a moment's contemplation.

A FRIGHTENED AFRICAN.

Dr. Livingston, the African discoverer, relates the following incident, which occurred to one of the party of Makololo, whose faithful services had been of so much value to him through his perilous journey from the interior of the continent to the sea-coast:—Anxious to bring one of his companions with him to England, that he might convey back to his countrymen in the interior of Africa a good report of English civilization and Christianity, Dr. Livingston made his selection. But the issue was most affecting. When this Makololo stranger reached the seaport of Quillanene, he was sufficiently surprised at the marvellous novelties that there surrounded him. The sea, then tossed by a tempest, which prevented the ship-of-war awaiting Dr. Livingston's arrival from approaching the shore, filled him with amazement. And when at length the "Frolic" hove in sight, although the waves were still running high, they put off to her in a boat. The Makololo, of course, accompanied his friend. But as the boat rose and sank with each billow, he turned to Dr. Livingston, and with a look and tone indicative of no ordinary excitement, not unmixed with alarm, said—"Is this the way you go?" Though repeatedly assured they were approaching the ship, he often renewed the question. At length they were on board, and set sail for the Isle of Mauritius. But the strain put upon the mind of this untutored African by the many novelties, which, in rapid succession, filled him with wonder or fear, proved too much for his faculties; and when, on entering the harbor of St. Louis, he saw a steamer in motion, reason reeled, and in a fit of temporary insanity he flung himself into the sea and perished.

LONDON STREETS IN SHAKESPEARE'S TIME.

The Elizabethan streets were filled with itinerant salesmen, many of whose trades have long since passed away; charcoal-sellers from the country, buyers of old lace, sellers of "hot peas," and Irish apple-mongers. The open stalls were piled with rapiers and targets, Italian armor and poniards, silk points and ruffs, feathers, roses for shoes, scarfs, and a thousand other articles of finery now mouldering in quiet country vaults, and treasured here and there in the wardrobes of old show mansions. The paths were filled by jostling serving-men, French pages, watermen, wounded soldiers from the Dutch wars, Spanish gallants, Greek merchants, and here and there an astrologer or an alchemist came out for a moment to breathe a purer air than the poisonous atmosphere of his cellar or turret. There were actors and bear-wards, masters of fence, bullies and gentlemen pensioners, gay citizens' wives and falconers all bright, colored, shifting, motley and picturesque. There were boards of all classes and professions; the citizen with his trimmed gown and gold chain; the noble with his silk cloak and scented doublet, gold spurs and spangled feather; the scrivener with his rusty black coat and untailing bag; the divine with his cassock and bands; the yeoman with his unbarbed staff; and the court lady rolling by in her gilded coach.—London Globe.

REMARKABLE ESCAPE FROM POISON.

We find the following statement in a late English paper:—A strange rumor is rife in the neighborhood of Watford, relative to an occurrence, which, if true, is quite remarkable. It appears, as near as we can gather from reliable sources, that a man (we omit names for obvious reasons), a short time since died bequeathing his property to his brother's wife, who has been suffering from continued ill health to such an extent as to render the services of a nurse indispensable. It also appears that a few mornings ago her husband took up to her room two cups of coffee, one for his wife, which he gave into her own hands, and the other he placed by the side of the fire for himself, after which he left the room for some purpose. In his absence, his wife complained of the coffee being cold, and the nurse exchanged her cup for the one on the hob, which the wife drank; soon after the husband returned and drank the coffee which had been substituted for his own, when he was immediately seized with the most racking pains in the stomach, and exhibited the usual effects of the most virulent poison. In five minutes the man expired, but from what cause at present can only be conjectured.

JAMES WILLIAM WALLACK, JR.

The portrait on this page was drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Waud, from a photograph by Masury, Silsbee & Case, and is a fine likeness of the popular tragedian whose name heads this article. The fine, classical features, the fiery eye and lofty brow, are well delineated, and the individuality of the head will carry conviction of its likeness even to those who have not seen the original. James William Wallack, Jr., is the son of Henry Wallack, well known as a popular manager and performer, a nephew of James William Wallack, senior, a favorite veteran of the English and American stage, and was born in the city of Hull, Yorkshire, England, February 24, 1821. He made his first appearance on the stage at Wood and Warren's old Chestnut Street Theatre, as Rolla's child, J. W. Wallack, senior, playing Rolla, the father of the child being a member of the talented company. Mr. Henry Wallack removing to New York, his son received his preliminary education in that city, and afterwards pursued his studies in England at the celebrated "Baron House Academy," near London. It was his father's wish that young Wallack should enter one of the learned professions, but he yielded in view of the youth's invincible attachment to the stage. In 1838, we find him a member of the Bowery Theatre, New York, under the management of the late Thomas S. Hamblin, who became his warmly-attached friend, and continued so till his death. Mr. Wallack next went to the National Theatre, New York, then under his uncle's management, but at first gave no proofs of genius, his talents being overshadowed by diffidence in the presence of the public. At last, however, as the hero of Miss Charlotte Barnes's new tragedy, "Francesca Brigaldi," a part he assumed at a few hours' notice, on account of his father's illness, who was cast for the character, he made a resolute effort to do himself justice, and succeeded, electrifying the large and brilliant audience. From that date his position was established. After the destruction of the National Theatre by fire, Mr. Wallack made an extensive professional tour in the South and West, and, returning to Philadelphia, was engaged at the Walnut Street Theatre during the seasons of 1845 and 1846. Here he played "Werner" in Byron's tragedy of that name, on its first representation in this country. His "Melantius," in the "Bridal," and "King James," in the "King of the Commons," particularly the latter, were brilliant successes. He next accepted a very flattering engagement from Mr. Hamblin, to play the leading business at his theatre, with the privilege of contracting star engagements elsewhere, and became at once a reigning favorite. His next engagement was with Mr. Webster at the Haymarket Theatre, London, and the approbation of the first English critics ratified the verdict of our American public. At the Haymarket he sustained with success the most difficult characters in the whole range of the English drama, opening with Othello, and afterwards performing Hamlet with great success. Of his delineation of the latter character, a leading English journal remarked: "The melancholy prince was remarkably elaborated by his representative, who threw into it so much of picturesque effect, with such minuteness and variety in the distribution of the histrionic lights and shades, that the picture grew into unwonted life under the artist's hand, and the admiring audience were so strongly excited as to summon the performer before the curtain at the end of the second act. This is indeed an extraordinary honor, and through the entire piece his delineation of this most difficult part was performed with consummate skill, princely grace, and high tragic power." Of his performance of the almost equally difficult part of Macbeth, another accomplished critic wrote: "The entrance of Macbeth was greeted with prolonged applause, which quite accorded with the 'all hail' of the witches, and showed that he had established himself at first sight a favorite with the audience as well as with the 'world of spirits.' Mr. Wallack's commanding figure is well calculated to extort admiration, and there is a manly dignity in his personation of the brave general returning crowned with victory, which well accords with our idea of the character in the earlier scenes of the play. As the piece progressed, the actor rose with the occasion, and proved that his talents was not confined to mere elocutionary display; in the banquet-scene, his terror was perfectly natural, and in the subsequent scenes, when he feels himself tottering to his fall, and braves despair itself, loud and hearty plaudits crowned with entire success the efforts of our debutant." Those of our readers who have had the good fortune to witness Mr. Wallack's splendid delineation of Macbeth, will endorse the warm eulogies of the English critics. In 1851 Mr. Wallack returned to this country, of which he is now a citizen, and played a round of brilliant engagements. To those who have not witnessed his performances we cannot well convey an idea of his various excellencies. There are many points in acting which defy the subtlest analysis and baffle the descriptive powers of language. It is by comparing an unknown with a known actor that we impart a faint conception of his manner, but in the case of Mr. Wallack, this resort fails us, for he is one of the most strongly individualized performers on the stage. His style is emphatically his own. If he possess traits that remind you, at times, of other eminent tragedians, they are all fused in the original mould of his genius. Well educated, handsome in face and person, graceful in gesture, with a full, melodious, and highly cultivated voice, he ranges through a wide field of dramatic characters, displaying gifts that enable him to do full justice to each. A great flexibility of feature and a fine eye permit him to express with rapidity and intensity the various phases of intense passion and strong emotion. A remarkable analytical power develops traits of character that elude the grasp of less subtle students and delineators. In him the representative power of the actor rides to the height of the creative power of the dramatic poet. To him we may apply in all its force and scope the much abused name of artist. His impersonations are no crude sketches, but the elaborations of lofty genius combined with laborious and conscientious study. Mr. Wallack is now playing an engagement at the Boston Museum. Mr. Wallack is particularly a favorite in Boston, and always attracts large audiences; but then, as we have said, he is equally successful elsewhere. He possesses certain qualities which are universally admired, notwithstanding the great diversity of opinion which exists with regard to minute details of the histrionic art. Some actors of eminence succeed only in certain localities, and meet with comparative failures elsewhere; but Mr. Wallack, like Mr. Forrest, is everywhere acceptable, and for the same reasons, though they are not to be compared in style. Mr. Wallack has the fine expressive face, the melodious voice, the dash and spirit, and grace and picturesqueness of attitude which always secure attention from the outset. He has other and higher qualities, too, to secure the consideration his appearance commands, and confirm his success; he combines the physical and intellectual in a happy manner.

JAMES WILLIAM WALLACK, JR.

VIEW ON MILLER'S RIVER, MASS.

The pleasing and picturesque landscape on this page was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, and will give our readers an accurate idea of the scene it delineates, with its rocks, woods and winding turns. Miller's River is one of the most romantic streams in New England; it is quite shallow, winding among rocks, now turbid and now serenely tranquil. It takes its rise in ponds in Ashburnham and Winchendon, and follows a devious course through Royalston, Athol, Orange, and Weodell, till it reaches the Connecticut River at Irving. During the summer it is a quiet stream, but in the spring it becomes a river of mighty power, tearing its way along, rising suddenly many feet by the influence of the melting snow on the mountains between which it passes, and sweeping away mills, bridges, and whatever opposes its raging torrent. It often becomes choked by the logs which are floated down and by the ice, during the breaking up of winter, and when the dam thus formed breaks, the amount of damage to everything on its borders is immense. The county road between Orange and Greenfield passes for nearly eighteen miles on the banks of the river, and the Vermont and Massachusetts Railroad follows its course, crossing it a number of times. Altogether, the route is one of much beauty, and exhibits favorably many of the peculiar features of the natural scenery in this part of the State.

VIEW ON MILLER'S RIVER, IRVING, MASS

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATHURIN M. DALLON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR

FRANCIS A. DEBRIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

L. C. D. Mohls.—Four Works in All.—Hallow's Pictorial, The Weekly Novelist, The Flag of our Union, and Hallow's Dollar Monthly.

MAINE.—Lieut. Maury says that the whales first pointed out the Gulf Stream, by avoiding its warm waters.

F. C.—The very last words that Nelson is said to have uttered were, "I thank God I have done my duty."

YAKTOW.—Jen. Cass's father was Major Jonathan Cass, who enlisted in the Revolutionary army twenty-four hours after the Battle of Lexington was fought, and served in many campaigns.

JEWELL.—On the coast of California the pearl oysters do not lie in regular beds or heaps, but are most abundant in fissures and clefts of rocks in sheltered bays.

MISS U. C. Pelham, Mass.—During a part of the last century, the head-dress of a lady sometimes added three feet to her stature.

C. D. Quilley, a native of New England, and California, are not the same as those of New England. The difference, in certain respects, is even greater than between the animals of New England and Europe.

R. T. U.—The deepest part of the North Atlantic is probably somewhere between the Bermudas and the Grand Banks.

M. F.—Koechinko died at Solitude, Switzerland, Oct. 16, 1837.

ANTIQUARY.—A monument, commemorating Penn's treaty with the Indians, was erected on the banks of the Potomac, in Kensington, where the chiefs stood under which the treaty was made.

F. R. H.—The origin of the Mexicans is a question of great obscurity. According to Mr. Prescott, the plasma of Azimane were overrun, previous to the discovery of America, by several successive races from the northwest part of the continent where it approaches Asia.

SYNOPSIS.—Dr. Johnson distinguished deeds and bonds as the greatest possible evils on the face of mankind.

MACHINERY.—In electrotyping, very ounce of copper deposited requires the solution of somewhat more than an ounce of zinc from the zinc plate of the battery. Five or six electrotypes may be made at once without increasing this expense, by arranging in succession several plates, each containing a mould and a copper plate connected by a wire with the mould in the next one.

INDUSTRY.—The Hong merchants are a body of Chinese merchants residing at Canton, who have the exclusive privilege of trading with Europeans.

TEMPERANCE.—George Washington Rauhart, the temperance poet, of Kingston New York, is lecturing on temperance in California, and is meeting with success.

F. P.—There is some talk of a national subscription—Individuals limited to a very small sum each—for the purpose of erecting a splendid monument to the memory of Dr. Kane.

R. M. C.—There are no tombs or monuments with escutcheons earlier than the 14th century.

G. A. D. Harre, Vt.—The book you refer to is not to be obtained in this city.

T. G.—Augustus William Millard was a celebrated German actor and dramatic writer. He died September 22, 1834.

F. H.—Science has discovered no certain remedy for that terrible disease, hydrophobia. You are right in supposing that it has sometimes broken out after lying dormant in the system for years.

R. D.—The monster English steamer, Eastern State, is expected at Portland some time in June, though her first voyage may be delayed beyond that.

POST-OFFICE STAMPS.—If post-masters throughout the country would be particular in stamping the envelopes of letters mailed at their respective offices, so that the same can be read, how much trouble would be avoided, and how many mistakes obviated! Correspondents should also be very careful to head their letters with the name of their post-office, the county and State very plainly written. What is simple enough to them, is an enigma to a stranger.

SPLINTERS.

.... The permanent debt of the city of New York is about thirty millions—just about the amount of our national debt.

.... The pope has conferred on Prince Gortschakoff, the Russian minister of foreign affairs, the order of St. Pias IX.

.... Mrs. McMahon charges the press of this country with corruption. Her ill success has distorted her vision.

.... If men would follow the dictates of nature in their diet and habits, long life would be the rule.

.... The commerce of the United States has increased so rapidly every reduction of the tariff has produced increased importation.

.... The police force of Baltimore now numbers about four hundred men. They wear a neat and serviceable uniform.

.... Secret revolutionary societies are said to exist all over the continent of Europe. Trouble is ahead there.

.... Light is as necessary as air to life, and a brown complexion is preferable to the sickly pallor of ill health.

.... The post-office of London is the largest in the world, having a frontage of 400 feet, with a depth of 150 feet.

.... Tamouche, a war-chief of the Utahs, lately killed two of his physicians, because they failed to cure two of his wives.

.... It is feared that the cold weather of the last month seriously injured the cotton and sugar crops.

... Tempting ripe strawberries were lately exhibited in a druggist's window at Springfield. Such medicine is easy to take.

.... It is reported that England has ceded to France Longwood House and Napoleon's tomb at St. Helena.

.... The U. S. Treasurer recently received a letter actually directed as follows:—"You night ED Stats Treser."

.... Young physicians find it hard to get into business; but they will succeed if they only have patients.

.... The Costa Ricans have offered $10,000 for Walker's head, or $20,000 for him alive.

.... There are 26 orphan asylums in the State of New York, in which 9000 little ones are fed, clothed and educated.

.... The copper mine in Warren, N. H., is now being worked with a good prospect of success. A very rich vein has been struck.

.... There are places in Europe where, though the landlord has two-thirds of the produce, farming yet pays well.

.... The publishers and booksellers at the New York Trade Sale adopted resolutions in honor of the late B. B. Mussey.

.... Mr. Zimmerman, killed in the Canada railroad accident, left real estate valued at $7,000,000.

THE EMPIRE OF FASHION.

A traveller who had roamed over the whole world, one day landed on an almost unknown island in the Pacific, where he found an Englishman established, like another Robinson Crusoe, who had not seen a European for many years, and who gave him a cordial reception. "Come and dine with me," said he, "and tell me all the news, and I'll introduce you to my wife, who has remained faithful to the customs of our dear Europe in the midst of this savage solitude." In the evening, the navigator met in the colonist's house, a woman clad in a lilac silk dress, with a scarlet ribbon round her waist, a gauze turban and feather on her head, kid gloves on her hands, and satin slippers on her feet. It was in the days of the Waterloo campaign, and the English colonist asked a thousand eager questions about the politics and history of Europe. His wife, on the contrary, had but one idea—it was to learn what was the favorite color of fashionable ladies, whether waists were longer or shorter, whether sleeves were tight or made large, en gigot, or whether bonnets were large or small. The fate of Napoleon, the destinies of Europe, were nothing to her. For four years, she said, she had not received a ray of light as to the changes of fashion, and she was afraid she was behind the rest of the world in the style of her dress.

Such is the empire of this absolute tyranny, of this sovereign despotism called Fashion, which extends its sceptre over the remotest realms, unites the most dissimilar minds in the same subordination, and alone of all the great powers of the earth, can truly say, with Charles V., "that the sun never sets on its dominions."

Thrones crumble—nations change; the most brilliant triumphs come to nothing—glories, reverses are forgotten; but Fashion remains, ruling and governing the world. With eyes wide open, and mind alert on everything that afflicts or dazzles humanity, Fashion makes a trophy of each celebrity, gives an illustrious name to a knot of ribbons, and commemorates a new bonnet. Wellington and Blucher will be remembered by many from the style of boots which bear their name, just as Talma, the great actor, was memorialized by a cloak.

Sages and scribes toil in compiling biographies and narratives of great men and deeds, but the rulers of fashion do more than they to perpetuate a reputation. There are warriors and artists, and actors and statesmen, whose names are circulated by means of coats and ribbons, where books and newspapers never penetrate. Railroads and steamboats are the busy messengers of fashion, one of the greatest powers that rule the world. There are many men and women, we are sorry to say, who would rather be unrighteous than unfashionable.

CHINA.

We have strong hopes that the difficulties between Great Britain and China may be settled without a long war, for, obstinate and infatuated as the Chinese government may be, the emperor cannot but see that longer resistance to the pressure of western civilization must be suicidal. For, it must be remembered, the Chinese have not a simple foreign enemy to deal with; the revolution within their own borders is gnawing at their very vitals. Little positive information as we have respecting the character, objects and actual extent of the rebellion, we know that the insurgents have maintained themselves for years, that they are very numerous and have gained important victories at many points of the empire. The result of the difficulty with England must be to throw open the ports of China to the commerce of England and America, to the benefit of both the Chinese and the merchants of the western world. It may be that the fruits of free intercourse will be the regeneration of China, but what will be her future aspect and government it is impossible to predict.

BINDING.—Those of our readers who have valuable pamphlets, magazines, music, or newspapers, which they desire to preserve, have only to do them up in a package, hand them to the express, addressed, with directions inside, to this office, and they will be elegantly bound and returned in one week. Binding of every description done at this office in the neatest manner and at the lowest rates. Books which have become soiled, binding injured, or torn off, we can repair and make as good as new.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.—We have observed with pleasure the steady improvement in this favorite American illustrated journal, both in the reading matter and the finish and beauty of the engravings. Its editorial gossip is particularly terse and spicy, and its contributors are among the best writers of the day. It is highly creditable to Boston to send forth such a brilliant publication all over the land. Mr. Ballou richly deserves the remarkable success which has crowned his labors. — Davton Sentinel.

SWINISH.—An Indiana paper descanting in raptures on the multitudes of swine en route (root?) for Cincinnati, says—"It seemed as if the vast arena of Nature's storehouse was filled with hogs."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.—This admirable and useful weekly journal comes to us regularly with its columns crowded with interest and choice information. If there is another miscellaneous newspaper in the country of more true value to the home circle, it has not yet been our chance to see it.—Westford (Ohio) Examiner.

JAPAN FASHIONABLES.—The ladies of Japan bent ours entirely, for when they frequent the theatre, they make a point of changing their dresses two or three times during the performance.

A GALLANT OLD GENTLEMAN.—Major Noah used to say that his great-grandfather, at the age of ninety-six, had a constant disposition to make love to all the handsome market-women.

SNAGS.—The steamboats employed to take snags out of the great rivers of the west are called "tooth-pullers."

HOOK MAKING.

The wise man told us long ago that "to the making of many books there was no end," but could he walk the earth at the present day he would hold up his hands in amazement at the frantic activity of authors and publishers. Is it possible for a man to read all that is written and published? No—not for a man but for men—a distinction and a difference worth noting. Because books are poured forth in such quantities that it is next to impossible to remember only the titles, we are not rashly to suppose that they are all trash. By no means—they are many because they address themselves to a multiplicity of tastes—devote themselves to a thousand different specialities.

The young and ambitious student, in the outset of his career of toil, is dazzled and daunted at the number of dishes which make the "feast of reason." Let him beware of tasting of all, or he will spoil his appetite and digestion. Let him remember that thorough familiarity with a few good books makes the really learned man now just as it did before the mechanical improvements which enable us to facilitate the manufacture of books on an enormous scale. A few good books contain the outlines of all history, science and art—the skeleton of knowledge with which every well-bred man must be acquainted. Then, when a passion for any particular science or particular part of history is engendered, the wealth of modern literature comes into play. Then the student realizes what a blessing the activity of the press is. If he wishes to sound to their depths the great heart and mind of Napoleon, he will find a library of Napoleonic books—histories, codes, memoirs, debates, reports, journals. So, would he unroll the history of Egypt, he will find long lines of volumes all bearing on the subject. The complaint that this is an age of money-getting and materialism is groundless; the account sales of the bookmakers tell a different story. Enormous production can only be the result of an enormous demand, and the literary activity of the age is its proudest characteristic.

"BLANCHE D'ARTOIS."—We are permitted to state that the poems which have appeared from time to time in our various publications under the above nom de plume, and which have elicited deserved commendation, were written for us by Mrs. Julie H. Layton, of Roslyn, N. Y.; also, that the same lady is the authoress of all the poetry we have published under the names of "Frank Freelove," "Lieut. Holm, U. S. N." and "Irene Montague." Though dashed off currente calamo, this lady's productions evince poetical merit of a high order.

NO ADVERTISEMENTS.—We are constantly importuned by persons knowing our large circulation to advertise for various parties in Ballou's Pictorial. We beg to say, once for all, that we devote the entire space of our mammoth sheet solely to reading matter and illustrations.

GOOD IDEA.—A school ship is fitting out at Baltimore for the instruction of maritime pupils. It is the first of the kind in the United States, and we dare say the pupils will go on swimmingly.

Fresco Painting.—This is said to be the most durable style of the artist's work, lasting for centuries. We are glad it is becoming fashionable for the decoration of elegant apartments.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Miner, Mr. Aaron G. Walker to Miss Lucretia R. Jones; by Rev. Mr. Grimes, Mr. Prince H. Saunders, of Hartford, Ct., to Miss Lucinda M. Smith; by Rev. Mr. Howe, Mr. Thomas Starbird, of Portland, to Miss Hannah A. Johnson; by Rev. Mr. Kellogg, Mr. James F. Wiggins to Mr. Lavina Lucas; at East Boston, by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. Edward F. Russell to Miss Clara L. Coet, both of Candia, N. H. — At Chelsea, by Rev. Mr. Caldwell, Mr. S. M. P. Hersey, of Charlestown, to Miss George S. Williamson. — At Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Harrington, Mr. Edward McIntyre to Miss Mary C. Beot, of Sudbury. — At Brookline, by Rev. Dr. Hedge, Mr. George Thomas, of Hopkinton, to Miss Abby A. Winch. — At East Weymouth, by Rev. Mr. Hoeghton, Mr. William O. Currier, of Providence, R. I., to Miss Varona A. only daughter of the officiating clergyman. — At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Carlton, Mr. George F. Emerson to Miss Amelia F. Taylor. — At Lawrence, by Rev. Mr. Packard, Mr. John Johnson, to Miss Harriet Wiley, both of North Andover. — At Worcester, by Rev. Mr. Jones, Mr. Samuel Hornor, of Danvers, to Miss Elizabeth A. Atkinson. — At Taunton, by Rev. Mr. McKewen, Mr. Willard Blanding to Miss Mary E. Griger. — At Northampton, by Rev. Mr. Crane, Mr. Eliza A. Tenny to Miss Amelia A. Way. — At Springfield, by Rev. Mr. Childs, Mr. W. L. Dodge to Miss Hannah W. Burdett.

DEATHS.

In this city, Miss Isabella D Perkins, 34; Miss Sarah V. Dean, 25; Mrs. Alice Chandler, 33; Miss Sarah Jane Ferguson, of Bristol, Vt., 18; at East Boston, Mrs. William C. Marden, 49.—At Charlestown, Miss Helen Titus, 26.—At Roxbury, Mrs. Jane N. Finley, 39.—At Cambridgeport, Mr. Josiah Kirkland, of the firm of George B. Richardson & Co., Boston, 40.—At Jamaica Plain, Mr. Nathaniel Curtis, 83.—At Dorchester, Mr. George D. Jordan, 23.—At Quincy, Mr. Adam Hardwick, 84.—At Waltham, Mrs. Ann Maxwell, 69.—At Clinton, Miss Louisa Faulkner, of Lowell, 54.—At Lowell, Miss Josephine A. Gordon, of Cheshire, Me., 27.—At Kingston, Deacon George Russell, formerly of Boston, 53.—At Newburyport, Mrs. Eleanor Hicken, 28.—At Newbury, Miss Sarah Ann Little, 34.—At West Newbury, Mr. George Gordon, 50.—At Salisbury Point, Mrs. Polly Currier, 83.—At Norton, Mr. Ezra Dodge, 47.—At Northampton, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Currier, 79.—At Springfield, Mr. Henry C. Brewer, 82.—At Coleraine, Mr. George Thompson, 38.—At Ware, Mr. John Robinson, 82.—At South Amherst, Mr. Francis De Witt, 85.—At Barchelon, Mr. Silas Walker, 82.—At Russell, Mr. Newman Bishop, 57.—At Lee, Mr. Stephen Bradley, 82.—At Agawam, Mrs. Sarah Worthington, 39.—At New Bedford, Mr. John A. Wood, 21.—At Provincetown, Mrs. Bethiah E. Earl, 43.—At Portland, Me., Miss Frances Brewer, 62, formerly of this city.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                                                                                     |        |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year.....                                                         | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers .....                                                                 | 10 00  |
| 10        "        "        "        "        "        "        "        "        " | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

* The copy of BALLOW'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE PLAN OF OCEA UNDOY, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

The Poet's Corner.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

ACROSTIC.

BY MACO MADRICE.

Bright child of Art, we welcome thee,
All sparkling from her lavish hand,
Like corals from an Eastern sea:
Like diamonds dug in foreign land!
O'er countless homes thy smiling face,
Uvreiling beauties full of grace,
Sheds truth and light in every place.

Proud is thy name where'er 'tis known—
In foreign laods its accents trill:
Come back again in warbling tone,
Then echo clear o'er stream and bill.
O, may thy mission still proceed:
Record the beautiful in art;
Intwice with wreaths the honest deed,
And beautify each willing heart:
Live on, and ne'er thy fame depart!

PERFECTION.

Scorn not one verse because it might soar higher—
What's perfect on poor earth? Is not the bird,
At whose sweet song the forests ache with love,
Shorn of all beauty? Is the bitter cry
As merry as the lark's? Is the lark's as soft
As the lost cuckoo's? Nay, the lion hath
His fault; and the elephant, though sage as wisdom,
May grieve he lacks the velvet of the pard.—BARRY CORNWALL.

THE HEART.

My heart is like the sleeping lake,
Which takes the hue of cloud and sky;
And only feels its surface break
When birds of passage wander by:
Who dip their wings and upward soar,
And leave it quiet as before.—WILLIS.

THE TRUE WOMAN.

A creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food;
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears and smiles.—WOODSWORTH.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

In the old Plymouth colony laws for 1669, we find the following, to which we invite the attention of our bachelor friends:—"Whereas great inconvenience hath arisen by single persons in this Colonie being for themselves, and not betaking themselves to live in well gov'ned families, it is enacted by the Court, that henceforth no single pson be suffered to live of himself, or in any family but such as the Selectmen of the Towne may approve of; and if any pson or psons shall refuse or neglect to attend such order as shall be given then by the Selectmen, that pson or psons shall be summoned to the Court, to be proceeded with as the matter shall require.".....It is currently reported that Arrowsmith, the fabricator of the Georgia Railroad duel story published in the London Times, is an opium eater. He undoubtedly believes his impossible story himself, though it has been disproved by the affidavits of all the railroad employees. .... We see a rumor that there is a likelihood of a reconciliation between the Hon. Mrs. Norton and her husband. It would be strange if they should be re-united after so many years' separation. .... A curious item has come to light in the history of our secret service-money. It seems that the "$10,000 to a Mexican officer of rank," paid out by Gen Scott, in Mexico, was paid to no other than President Santa Anna, the man whose patriotism began and ended in his own pocket. .... The organ-grinders of New York have lately abandoned their instruments for a time, and engaged in the good work of cleaning the streets. This was good policy—the better the condition of the streets, the better chance of obtaining out-door auditors. .... It is mentioned in the course of an able article in the North British Review, that very rarely has a woman who has been employed as a domestic help, and has preserved her character, been an applicant for charity at the workhouses or other charitable institutions of England. Every other class of out-door employees has been admitted into the poorhouses, many of them having much higher wages than these domestics. In this country a great prejudice exists in the minds of girls against domestic service. It was not so formerly. .... The great resort of the Germans of New York is a place called the Volks Garten. .... An anti-garrote collar has been invented. It is made of iron, and a knife-blade is hidden, so that when a garroter seizes the neck of an unsuspecting wearer of the collar, his fingers are terribly lacerated. That gartry will need a good deal of tact in pursuing their occupation. We believe garroting is on the decline. .... Laura Keane manages her new theatre in New York with infinite tact. .... Gould Brown, the celebrated writer on English grammar, died lately at Lynn, in this State. .... An urshin at one of our schools, the other day, failing to recite his lesson, quoted, in excuse, the old adage, "Little boys should be seen, not heard!" His ingenuity saved him from punishment. .... This is surely an age of wonders. The other day we read of a mare who broke her leg in a race, in Australia, had it amputated, and now performs her work with a cork leg. This beats Mynheer Von Clam's cork leg all hollow. .... Rev. Daniel Waldo, the venerable chaplain of the National House of Representatives, is ninety-four years of age. He was a soldier of the Revolution, and once fell into the hands of the infamous "Cow-Boys," of the "Neutral Ground." .... Happening into Cotton's, the other day, we saw a magnificent landscape fresh from the easel of Morviller, a French artist, now located in this vicinity. It is admirably done, and its color and atmospheric effect rich and truthful. .... A monument is to be erected at Pittsfield, Mass., over the grave of Mrs. Denning, the first female pioneer in the settlement of that town. We are glad to see the efforts making in every direction to commemorate the good deeds of our ancestry. .... The English admiralty are preparing for a long struggle with John Chinaman. John may serve yet to "point a moral," as well as "adorn a tale." .... A coal-burning locomotive, in Illinois, recently ran 254 miles, and saved $22 50 in cost of fuel, by burning coal instead of wood. Our forests are so fast disappearing, that it becomes imperative to substitute coal for wood—otherwise the cost of fuel will soon become ruinous. .... There are very few good and brilliant talkers in this country, and very few persons who understand the art and mystery of silence. La Bruyere says, thoughtfully, "It is a great misfortune not to have mind enough to talk well, nor judgment enough to be silent." .... We believe it was Bulwer who first commented on the periodicity of certain crimes. Just now there seems to be a murder mania, and the community are discussing the best manner of dealing with homicidal criminals. .... Lord Bacon, we think, was rather mistaken when he said, "You may observe that, among all the great and worthy persons, there is not one that hath been transported to the mad degree of love; which shows that great spirits and great business do keep out this weak passion." .... Sir Robert Peel has lately got into trouble by satirizing the Russians, and some of their coronation guests, in a public lecture. But he does not seem to care a straw about their censures. His lecture at Manchester made his audience laugh, and accomplished his object. .... The emperor of Japan has received, in a style of royal magnificence, a scientific German, sent out to work his mines at his request. .... The works of Pedro de Soto, a fine Spanish poet, frequently alluded to by Cervantes, in his Don Quixotte, have been recently brought to light in Andalusia. .... Dr. Alcott, among the many valuable truths in his "Laws of Health," says:—"Woman, in fact, engaged as she is much of the time within doors, needs out-of-door employments, and even muscular ones, far more than man—especially the farmer, laborer, or mechanic." A reform in the habits of our young ladies is certainly much needed. .... A memorable edifice, situated in Tottenham Court-yard, London, has recently been destroyed by fire. It was the first place of worship erected by George Whitefield, and was capable of seating 20,000 persons. The overheating of a flue, a common cause of fire in this country, produced the catastrophe. .... Hiram Powers is hard at work on a Masonic statue of Washington, to which the various lodges in this country have subscribed the funds. .... A new umbrella has been manufactured in Connecticut, it seems, called the "lending umbrella." It is made of brown paper and willow twigs. Tin-bladed jackknives, to accommodate borrowing friends, should also be thrown into the market. .... The famous revolutionist, Danton, said the French were incapable of revolt when the sun was shining; and a fire-engine has often dispersed a mob that would have resisted a charge of infantry or cavalry. We are decidedly in favor of hydropathy for rioters. .... General Scott's headquarters will remain at New York for the next four years. The old veteran looks finely still, erect, soldierly and vigorous. .... In the religious world, we hear most cheering accounts of awakenings to grace all over the country, and in various denominations of Christians. .... Rowland Hill made a good remark upon hearing the power of the letter H discussed whether it was a letter or not. "If it were not," he said, "it would make me all the days of my life." .... Eight and a half pounds of corn are required to produce one pound of pork. .... Now that Mr. John Dean is receiving an education at a country school, and Mrs. John Dean is with her family, we do really hope the papers will give them a respite from their comments. .... Now is the time to set out grape-vines. Let every man who has a patch of ground in the country, or a little yard in the city, attend to this. There is no production of the earth that more liberally repays culture; and the only fault to be found with a grape-vine is, that it grows too luxuriantly. The best vine for out-door cultivation in this latitude is the Diana. .... The constant unrest of a great city is like the perpetual motion of the sea. Even at midnight the waves are stirring. When is New York ever silent? .... A Latin epitaph was proposed by a French theologian for Voltaire, which may be translated as follows:—"In poetry, great; in history, little; in philosophy, least; in religion, nothing." .... The bass-wood paper experiment has failed, and the mill at Rome has been closed. .... The first railroad in the United States was the granite railway at Quincy. The pioneer among the advocates of the railroad system in this country, was Hon. Nathan Hale, of this city. His articles on the question, in the Boston Daily Advertiser, would fill volumes. .... A letter in a New Orleans paper says, that if the Indians in Florida are not subdued in the course of this month, it never can be done. It seems strange that a few hundred Indians are able to set at defiance the military power of the United States. .... M'me de Jussieu, widow of Antoine Laurent de Jussieu (the creator of the Methode Naturelle), died at the Garden of Plants, Paris, recently, in her ninetieth year; and with her disappears from the Garden of Plants the name of de Jussieu, illustrated by five botanists, all of whom were members of the Academy of Sciences. .... Various arts are taught and practised now-a-days, but to learn how to grow old gracefully is something that, important as it is, few have attempted. .... The art of haranguing armies in actual service seems to have gone out of use, and we fancy there are few living generals capable of making a good speech. Yet what an effective use Napoleon made of the power of eloquence! His reference to the "sun of Austria!" will never be forgotten. And at a later period—his return from Elba—the few words, "Victory rushes forward at the charge," were sufficient to overthrow the resolution of so old a soldier as Ney, and were, in fact, the immediate cause of his death. .... A friend of ours paid a visit to Mount Monadnock once, and was astonished that his hostess, in the immediate vicinity, had never ascended it. "Waal," said she, "most folks doer think it kinder carous." .... Our old friends, the flies, have begun to buzz round us about these days in quite sufficient numbers. A fly lays four times during the summer, each time 80 eggs, which make 320; and it is computed that the produce of a single fly in the course of a summer, amounts to 3,980,320—so that Uncle Toby's tenderness to the blue-bottle was rather mistaken sentimentality. .... We do not believe the story that strawberries and green peas have made their appearance in Salem market. If so, it must be "six of one and half a dozen of the other." .... An editorial friend of ours, living not a thousand miles from our sanctum, has had a knife presented him with many blades, which, in addition to a corkscrew, gimlet and bodkin, contains a hair-brush, a bootjack, and a season ticket to the Boston Theatre. .... Met with a pretty good anecdote in a French jest-book, the other day. A Franciscan friar, mounted on an ass, had to pass through a rivulet which crossed the road. The beast was unwilling to go on, and the friar dismounted to urge him on. The animal at length entered the water, but trembled as he stepped forward. A man, who was passing at the time, said, "Father, your ass trembles." "O, replied the friar, "if you were in his situation, you would tremble too. If you had a rope round your neck, irons on your feet, and a friar at your side, you would certainly think you were going to be executed." .... There is a man in New Jersey who once received a flogging from Louis Philippe, when he was teaching school at Haddonfield, in that State. .... Foreign smugglers use the most ingenious devices to deceive the revenue officers. Among a bushel of French eggs lately seized at Dover, were a large number manufactured out of ivory, and filled with very rich and expensive lace.

RESUSCITATION—A LA CHINESE.

The Chinese have many queer customs, among which their method of restoring to life those persons who have been the victims of suffocation, is as curious and absurd as any. A short time since, several Chinese were poisoned with the fumes of charcoal, and two of them, a man and woman, underwent the process of resuscitation, the modus operandi of which was as follows:—They were laid on the sidewalk in the midst of a large crowd, which had been drawn to the spot through curiosity, when their "great medicine man" went to work. By his directions, little bits of wood and paper were lighted and strewn over the bodies, and one, if we remember right, was placed in the man's ear. Finding this did no good, the "medicine man" took from his pocket a mass of some compound, which formed, no doubt, a principal agent in his practice of medicine. This substance he lighted and placed on the man's forehead, and another of the same sort on the woman's. These drugs in burning emitted a heavy smoke, and a most sickening smell, sufficiently disgusting to turn a living man's stomach; it was probably expected that, if any signs of life remained in the subject, this would fetch him. The drugs having burnt down to, and blistered, the skin, without producing any effect, the "medicine man" called for a bucket of water, when, having lifted his mouth, he ejected it over the bodies before him, accompanying each shower with a loud exclamation, very much like a man clearing his throat. Having repeated this several times without success, he gave it up as a bad job, and departed.—South Californian.

Choice Miscellany.

ORIGIN OF COAL.

Dr. David Dale Owen, in a recent lecture at Vincennes upon Agricultural Chemistry, incidentally alludes to the origin of coal. The doctor is not a believer in the theory of the vegetable origin of coal, but, in the language of the Gazette, is an advocate of the more modern and rational idea that coal is the condensation or solidification of the vast volumes of the carbonic gases that surrounded the world before the temperature of the earth and its atmosphere had been reduced to a condition to support animal life. It was the gradual reduction of temperature, and the absorption of the carbonic gases—so fatal to animal life—into vegetables and woods, and the condensation of them into those vast store-houses of fuel—or coal strata—for the future use of man, that prepared the earth first for the rougher animals, and finally for a habitation for man. This is undoubtedly the true theory, and most beautifully illustrates the beneficent providence of the Creator, who transformed the most fatal substance to man's existence in the early periods of the world, to be one of his chief blessings in the maturer ages of the earth, when man should be fitted for and need its use. And thus are all apparent evils upon earth made, in his infinite providence, the basis of great good to the subjects of the divine government. In reference to manuring, the doctor remarked:—"The idea of manuring land from the atmosphere was novel to some, who were surprised to learn that the ammonia deposited by the rain on each acre of land in a year was sufficient, with its accessories, to produce two tons of vegetable matter. This explained the difference between rain and irrigation to plants."

CHATSWORTH.

The Duke of Devonshire's palace, at Chatsworth, is said to exceed in magnificence any other in the kingdom. In the grounds about the house are kept four hundred head of cattle and fourteen hundred deer. The kitchen-garden contains twelve acres, and is filled with almost every species of fruit and vegetables. A vast arborescens, connected with the establishment, is designed to contain a sample of every tree that grows. There is also a grass conservatory, three hundred and eighty seven feet in length, one hundred and twelve in breadth, sixty-seven in height, covered by seventy-six thousand square feet of glass, and warmed by seven miles of pipe conveying hot water. One plant was obtained from India by a special messenger, and is valued at ten thousand dollars. One of the fountains near the house plays two hundred and seventy-six feet high—said to be the highest jet in the world. Chatsworth contains thirty-five hundred acres; but the duke owns ninety-six thousand acres in Derbyshire. Within Chatsworth is one vast scene of painting, sculpture, mosaic-work, carved wainscoting, and all the elegances and luxuries within the reach of almost boundless wealth and highly-refined taste. The duke's income is one million of dollars per annum, yet he manages to spend it all. It will be remembered that Paxton, the originator of the Crystal Palace, is the Duke of Devonshire's head gardener; and to him is the duke's palace at Chatsworth indebted for all its glories.—New York Chronicle.

DISCIPLINE IN CHILDHOOD.

Young people who have been habitually gratified in all their desires, will not only indulge more in capricious desires, but will infallibly take it more amiss when the feelings or happiness of others require that they should be thwarted, than those who have been practically trained to the habit of subduing and restraining them; and consequently will, in general, sacrifice the happiness of others to their own selfish indulgence. To what else is the selfishness of princes and other great people to be attributed? It is in vain to think of cultivating principles of generosity and beneficence by mere exhortation and reasoning; nothing but the practical habit of overcoming our own selfishness, and of familiarly encountering privations and discomfort on account of others, will ever enable us to do it when required. Indulgence infallibly produces selfishness and hardness of heart, and nothing but severe discipline and control can lay the foundation of a magnanimous character.—Lord Jeffrey.

New Publications.

THE WORLD'S OWN. By JULIA WARD HOWE, author of "Passion Flowers." Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857. 16mo. pp. 141.

Whatever differences of opinion may exist with regard to the story of this play, no one who reads it can deny the splendor and vigor of its language. It contains very many passages of wonderful poetical beauty, and more than one scene of great dramatic power. As a first effort in a difficult branch of literature, it is a decided success.

HOFFMAN'S FAIRY TALKS. Boston: Burnham Brothers. 1857. 16mo. pp. 274.

A collection of deeply interesting and exciting stories, admirably translated. It is understood that one of the Messrs. Burnham is the author of this spirited version. "Ye Antique Bookstore," Cornhill, Boston, where this work is issued, is one of the most valuable literary repositories in the country. It is crowded from cellar to roof with works in all languages, modern and ancient, and the whole establishment is managed with energy, tact and success.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL SKETCHES. By MACAULAY. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 335.

Macaulay is one of the most vivid intellectual portrait-painters living. This volume groups together his most brilliant biographies, and is eminently readable. For sale by Keddling & Co.

VIVIA; OR, THE SECRET OF POWER. By Mrs. E. D. E. N. SOUTHWORTH. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. 12mo. pp. 540.

Mrs. Southworth is an indefatigable writer, and keeps up the interest of her romances wonderfully, in spite of the immense amount of brain work she performs. "Vivia" is a highly exciting story. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

ENQUIRE WITHIN FOR ANYTHING YOU WANT TO KNOW: OR, Over Thirty-Seven Hundred Facts worth knowing, etc. New York: Garrett, Dick & Fitzgerald. 1857. 12mo.

Such is the quaint title of a work crowded with items of useful information, that would be really bewildering, but that it is systematically arranged, indexed and alphabetized, so that any topic can be found in a moment. As a work of reference, every family should possess one. For sale by Sanborn, Carter, Bazin & Co., 25 and 27 Cornhill.

STORIES OF THE ISLAND WORLD. By CHARLES NORDHOFF. New York: Harper & Brother. 1857. 15mo.

These stories of Madagascar, New Zealand, Ceylon, and other noted islands, are narrated in a pleasant style, addressed to juvenile readers, and are finely illustrated. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

THE DAYS OF MY LIFE. An Autobiography by the author of "Margaret Maitland." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 12mo. pp. 411.

A well written and deeply interesting domestic story. The incidents, though some of them are startling enough, are all within the scope of probability. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—From Oliver Ditson we have received "La Blondina Polka," "Tacea la Notte Florida," from El Trevatore. "Reverie du Nord" (Nocturne Maestriani), by Bergueller, Spanish March, for the guitar, "The Ye Sunny Land" more bright and fair (song), Beethoven's "Adelaide," "Song of Marion," and the "Home Quadrilles."

EASILY DONE.—There is not a village or town in the country so small, but that a club of twelve subscribers might be easily obtained for "Ballou's Pictorial," and the work be thus procured for each at two dollars a year, besides a gratis copy to the person who sends the names and money.

Editorial Melange.

The forty thousand Jews who form a part of the population of San Francisco, have started a paper. — Wm. Wallace, a young man living in Londonderry, N. H., had his arm broken singularly, lately. He was standing in the doorway of the barn, and the wind blew the door to, breaking both bones of the right arm between the wrist and elbow. — The president has appointed Christopher Carson—the "Kit Carson," of Fremont's expedition—Indian agent for New Mexico. — While several negroes belonging to Dr. Selby were engaged in clearing up an old field situated in the upper portion of Liberty county, Missouri, they killed, on about four acres of field, twenty-one rattlesnakes and one moccasin snake. — A steamboat is to be put on the Susquehanna River, at Harrisburg, where it was thought nothing could run but a raft in a frochet. — Comet panics are no novelty. During one of these popular terrors, the French Academy of Science offered a prize for the solution of the problem, "What are the chances of the earth being struck by the impending comet?" The answer, if we recollect right, was, "One chance for two millions against!" The public agitation immediately subsided. — The exports from New Orleans to Boston amount to some $9,000,000 a year. — In London, the police are the most omnipresent and efficient of men — always ready to do you any proper service, to protect you from any unestablished and unauthorized impositions, and always doing either in a prompt and polite manner. They take a pride in their profession. — Rev. George Daland, who has labored usefully and acceptably at South Braintree for the last eight years, has accepted a unanimous call to become pastor of the Baptist Church, Meredith Village, N. H., and has entered upon his labors. — The manufacture of hoop skirts is shortly to be entered upon on a large scale at Sing Sing prison, under the State contract. Hoop skirts are becoming as much of a staple as hats and shoes. — Rev. H. Ballou, D. D., was very agreeably surprised, a few days since, to see, on entering his parlor, a valuable collection of books for his library and a splendid oil painting some three feet square, representing Chocoma Peak, a mountain of great majesty in the region of the White Mountains. These gifts were sent him by a coterie of his friends in Boston. — Governor King, of New York, has returned to the president of the Hudson River Railroad a free pass that had been sent to him, and declines to receive this delicate attention from the corporation. — The iron crown of Lombardy contains a thin inner rim of that metal, believed by some to be a nail of the cross beaten out into a circle. Externally it is enriched with jewels set in gold. — Upwards of one million and a quarter dollars have been subscribed for the six new banks to be started in St. Louis. — A movement is said to be on foot in New York city, to establish an "Independent Religious Association," for public worship in one service on Sunday, eschewing all denominational name or sectarian peculiarity. It is said that the project has the support of several influential persons, who think of inviting a distinguished scholar to assume the pastoral care of the association. — The fisheries in the Potomac River have been very unproductive this season, the mud banks which formed last winter interfering very much with the catch. — The following extraordinary notice appears in the Nantucket Enquirer:—"I, the only lawful wife of John P. Gardner, hereby forbid all clergymen or justices of the peace from marrying him until he gets a divorce from me—Louisa T. Gardner." — There are in operation, in Maine, 508 miles of railroad, costing about $17,500,000, showing a gross income of about $1,500,000 for the last year. — Two little boys, seven and eight years of age, sons of Isaac Bunn, near Mazepa, Minnesota, died recently from drinking freely of whiskey, to which they obtained access during the absence of their parents from home. — The only daughter of Omar Pacha, who was married, in 1853, to Tekik Pacha, nephew of the Serdar, and after his death in the Crimea, to Omar Bey, another nephew, poisoned herself at Belgrade. She had been educated according to European habits, and was driven to the rash act by the bad treatment she experienced from her husband.

CONGRESSIONAL ELOQUENCE.—A few years ago a green orator in Congress delivered himself of the following burst of argumentative eloquence:—"Mr. Speaker, my opinion is, that the generality of mankind, in general, are disposed to take the disadvantage of the generality of mankind in general."—"Sit down, you fool," whispered Col. Crockett, who sat near him, "you're comin' out the same hole you went in!"

A MODEL ANSWER.—A highly respectable old gentleman, in a neighboring State, being tendered the nomination for governor by his friends, declined, saying, "I have enjoyed a good character all my life, and I have no notion of losing it now, in my old age, by being set up for governor!"

ADVANTAGE OF UGLINESS.—Mirabeau was both the ugliest man and most effective orator of France. "You know not," said he, "the power of my ugliness." It certainly aided the terror of his denunciations.

NEW DEFINITION.—A young lady at a boarding school being asked why the noun bachelor is singular, replied, "Because it's very singular they don't get married."

Wayside Gatherings.

Our affairs with China continue to occupy the attention of the administration.

The Mexican question continues to be discussed by the inhabitants of Cuba.

A Mrs. Brown of Providence poisoned her child by giving it Croton oil instead of Castor oil. The babe lived but a few hours.

Mrs. Davis Kepler, in a New York city court, has recovered a verdict of $1300 against Andrew Sonnenman for breach of promise of marriage. She is a widow with three children.

Hon. James Gadsden, late minister to Mexico, has made a donation of $500 to the Ladies' Calhoun Monument Association. The fund at the disposal of this association now exceeds $20,000.

The New York Chamber of Commerce has appointed a committee of twelve shipowners, to inquire into the alleged cruelties to seamen on board merchant ships, and to adopt measures for the suppression of the abuse.

Peers of the realm are not allowed to vote for members of the English House of Commons. The same disqualification is extended to every class of officers concerned in the management or collection of the excise, customs, stamp duties, salt duties, window and house duties, or in any department of the post-office.

Rev. Bishop Bacon, of Portland, while engaged in preparing the altar in the Catholic church for the devotional services of Holy week, fell from a ladder and was precipitated against a settee, breaking his right arm, fracturing the elbow joint, and producing a severe contusion on the hip and right side.

The New York Mirror says in many of our fashionable families, a game of billiards, in which the ladies join, follows the dinner as regularly as "tea time." In this very way home is made pleasant, heartful, and full of amusement; and young men will not be driven abroad to low haunts for their excitement.

For the purpose of illuminating under water, a submarine lantern has been contrived. The flame in the lantern is surrounded with two glass cylinders—the outer being placed half an inch from the inner. This leaves a space for air, by which means the vapor from the lamp is prevented from dimming the light by condensation.

The well-known "Yankee Card-Writer" was subjected to a horse-whipping at the St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans, recently, for having sent a couple of ladies a bouquet with a card attached, stating that he wished to make their acquaintance. An uncle of the young ladies took umbrage at the supposed insult, and castigated the gentleman accordingly.

The New York Express gives an account of a Quaker wedding in high life, which appears to have been a wide departure from the rigid simplicity with which the ceremonies of the Society of Friends are generally conducted. Six bridesmaids officiated, and not only white satin, but ermine, rose-colored trimmings, and hoops of the usual enormous size, made a part of the bridal attire.

The executors of the estate of the late Mrs. Emily C. Judson (Fanny Forrester), have released the Rev. Dr. R. W. Griswold from his engagement to prepare a history of her life for the press, on account of the critical condition of his health. An engagement has been made with the Rev. Dr. Kendrick of Rochester, New York, to perform the service.

The Persian Ambassador at Paris, Ferouk Khan, has just presented to Louis Napoleon four Arab horses of the purest blood, from his master the Shah. Their peculiarities are two—that they are larger than any blood horses hitherto seen, and that they have no manes. Paris was very much delighted with the beauty of these animals.

A wealthy gentleman of New York offers to support, during a four years' course of study preparatory to the Christian ministry, fifty young men chosen for piety and intellectual promise. The estimated expense is $300 a year, making the sum of $15,000 a year for four years, or $60,000 in all, contributed to the cause of ministerial education.

The genuine bank note circulation of the United States, at the present time, is estimated to represent $190,000,000. In addition to these, there is in circulation a vast number of counterfeit bank notes, whose representative value cannot be computed, and which perform all the functions of money, the holders of each being, for various reasons, unable to distinguish the one from the other.

The Louisville Journal says that in that city, recently, an old Irishman, who is verging on the grave, was sent the workhouse in default of bail. He is a very fine scholar, and was once the professor of mathematics in an Eastern college. He has been living there for many years, leading a quiet life without family or friend, and devoting his time to trading in old iron, brass, and similar articles.

Mr. Samuel White, a young married man in Chatier's township, Washington county, Pa., was recently brutally murdered with an axe. His body was found in his bed, his head completely severed from his shoulders. He had a considerable sum of money in his possession to be used in payment for his farm, and it was doubtless to obtain this that the murder was committed. The murderers got about $700.

By the new postage treaty with France, letters can be sent by any of the steamers, prepaid or not, at the rate of fifty cents the quarter ounce. Now as the letter scale in general use has no mark less than the half ounce, by placing an American quarter in the scale with a letter, it will at once indicate whether it exceeds a quarter of an ounce, as the quarter weighs that, according to the post-office rule.

Seven years ago there was but little madder sent from Marseilles to the United States; now, it is shipped by the cargo, and the demand for it steadily increases. Four years ago neither American flour nor American pork were to be found in the French market, but of late large quantities have been imported. This importation was not produced by the war, for it will continue to exist, and its fluctuations will depend upon the natural laws of trade.

At a recent meeting of the French Academy of Medicine, the peculiar disease of engineers and firemen of railroads was discussed. It was stated that the inhaling of the gases from the fire affects their nervous system, and frequently deprives them of the presence of mind so necessary for men who have the lives of thousands in their hands. The society recommended to directors of railroads to diminish the labors of these classes by doubling their number.

Some French gentlemen from Louisiana, largely engaged in sugar planting in that State, have purchased a tract of land in the neighborhood of Tausa, on the line of the Illinois Central Railroad in Illinois, where they will organize a colony of French residents, who are now on their way from Canada. Arrangements are made for the erection of stores, hotels, mills, warehouses, and dwellings; and it is expected that a large and flourishing colony will be firmly located the present season.

Foreign Items.

The governor general of Algeria has placed the property of the tribe of Mechras under sequestration, by way of punishment for the part taken by them in the last insurrection in Kabylia.

The French government is about to establish several new journals in the provinces, whose mission will be to stir up the constituency to vote for the government candidates at the coming general election.

Letters from St. Petersburg speak of Count de Morny having become more Russian than even the subjects of the autocrat himself; and of the increasing favors bestowed by the emperor upon the French ambassador.

Russia having demanded explanation of recent landing of three hundred Poles and Turks under Mehmet Bey, from English steamer Kangaroo, on the coast of Circassia, the port has appointed a commission of inquiry.

Two British steamers forced Port Mangaratli, in Japan, because they were refused admission, contrary to treaty. Communication was, however, made to the emperor, who published an edict, giving orders that the three ports should be opened, but crews of any foreign vessels are forbidden to penetrate into the interior.

Since Baluchana was evacuated by the British, it has been invaded by an army of fierce rats, who consume every object within their reach, and at night attack people in the streets. The inhabitants who had returned to their dwellings were obliged to leave again, and trust to the severities of winter to diminish the forces of the four-footed enemy.

Sands of Gold.

.... Nothing is sure for him who offers no surety.—Pindar.

.... From the thorn springs a rose, and the rose a thorn.—Greek Proverb.

.... A court is an assemblage of noble and distinguished beggars.—Tallyrand.

.... Be at least as polite to father, mother, child, as to others. For they are more important to you than any other.—Rockfoucauld.

.... Be sure that of two men, the best is always the least to be pitied, and let us try each day to be a little better than the night before.—Amillon.

.... The endeavor to convince a bel esprit by the force of reason, is as mad an undertaking as the attempt to silence an echo by raising the voice.—Tallyrand.

.... A man is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work, and done his best; but what he has said or done otherwise, shall give him no peace.—Emerson.

.... Man's works, even in their most perfect form, always have more or less excitement in them. God's works are calm and peaceful, both in nature and in his word.—Hure.

.... Love makes its record in deeper colors as we grow out of childhood into manhood; as the emperors signed their names in green ink when under age, but when of age, in purple.—Longfellow.

Joker's Budget.

In Africa, they punish naughty boys by rubbing red pepper in their eyes. It is said to make them very smart!

To make Rhine wine—to a pint of vinegar add a sixpence worth of clapped sole leather.

Sir John Germain was so ignorant that he left a legacy to Sir Matthew Decker as the author of St. Matthew's Gospel.

The White House—the place where the President gets lodged at the government's expense and bored at his own.

If you put two persons to sleep in the same bed-room, one of whom has the toothache, and the other is in love, you will find that the person who has the toothache will go to sleep first.

Why is a prisoner on trial like a ship at the wharf? Because they are both in the dock. And there's another reason, too: because the ship can be remanned, and the prisoner remanded.

Chinese Ejectment.—John Chinaman, in poisoning bread for the purpose of serving an ejectment on the Europeans, may be regarded by lawyers as having highly entitled himself to be described by the sobriquet of John Dough.

Some one twitted John Randolph on the lack of early education. "The gentleman himself," retorted Randolph, "reminds me of the head waters of the Montgomery, which are poor by nature, and cultivation entirely ruined them."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.

DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after seven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the friends of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the maximum size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the Illustrated copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston

HIGHLAND SOLDIERS—BRITISH ARMY.

The picture on this page exhibits a characteristic group of Scottish Highlanders in the British service, with an accurate delineation of their martial costume, modernized from the "garb of old Gaul." Thus, in place of the single heron's or eagle's feather that used to designate a man of rank among the Highlanders, the modern soldier has his cap overshadowed by a towering crest of black plumes. The coat is similar to that worn in the other infantry regiments, the waist and cross belts being the same, but the kilt is preserved, and the goatskin purse, which serves the purpose of a sabbatash. Two of the figures in the engraving wear light foraging caps. The gaiters are another innovation on the ancient costume. In the past century, and when at war with the British government, the favorite arms of the Highlanders were the basket-hilted sword (claymore) and the round target for defence. They were not unskilled in the use of the fire-lock, but in battle, after discharging them, they would fling away gun and plaid, rush on the enemy with the cold steel. Since the subjection of the Highlands, and the firm establishment of the British government over all parts of this United Kingdom, the Highlanders, enrolled in the British service, have proved themselves admirable and loyal soldiers. The mountains of Scotland send to the British army some of its very finest men, and their valor has been attested on every hard-fought field of this century, from east to west. In the bloody peninsular campaign, at Waterloo, at the Crimea, the sons of Albyn nobly did their duty, and the greenest laurels before Sebastopol were reaped by Sir Colin Campbell and his gallant Highlanders. The Scottish Highlanders preserved their ancient usages down to a very late date, and it was long before they yielded to the present dynasty of Great Britain. At the beginning of the present century, the people of London knew less about the population of the Highlands, than we do now about the Chinese. What is called the Scotch Highlands is that part of Great Britain divided from the Lowlands by the Grampian Hills. These mountains, which, at a distance, appear an undivided mass, are separated by many valleys and declivities, the largest of which are the beds of the rivers Leven, Carn, Tay and Dee. Besides these extensive valleys, there are others, the openings of which, from the Lowlands, were originally so wild and narrow that they appeared almost impassable, until widened and improved by art. Among these passes, the most extraordinary are Bealach, on Loch Lomond; Aberfoil and Leney, in the county of Monteith; the pass of Glenalmond over the Crieff, and the entrance into the county of Athol by Dunkeld, over Mount Birnam. This natural boundary assisted to preserve the Highlanders as a distinct race from the Lowlanders. Some hills of the Grampian chain, like Ben Lomond, Ben Lavers and Shehallion, are very lofty. The Highlands present a variety of grand and romantic scenes. Covered with clouds, or enveloped in fogs, their summits are often almost hidden; while their sterile appearance, and the deep, rocky declivities by which they are furrowed, are evidences of the violent convulsions of nature. Towards the summits of these mountains, the soil is barren; lower down, there is a thin covering of heath, where none but birds of prey, white hares and ptarmigans are found. Red deer and grouse are plentiful further down, and the valleys and plains afford pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep and herds of cattle. The boundary of the territory peopled by the Gaelic race forms a line, beginning at the entrance to the Pentland Frith, extending round St. Kilda, and encircling the whole group of the eastern and southern islands to Mull; then continues, proceeding from Ardnore, in the county of Dumbarton, on the mainland of Scotland, along the Grampian Hills to the county of Aberdeen, and ending at the northeast point of Caithness. The inhabitants are the descendants of the Celts, and their territory forms the land of the old Scots. They call their country Gaelach (land of the Gaels), or Albanich. The names England and Scotland are unknown in the Gaelic dialect. The English are called by them "Saxons (Sassenachs)," the Lowlanders "Gall (strangers)," and their country "Gualdach (strangerland)." While, after the union of the Picts and Scots, in the 9th century, the Scotch Lowlanders, by their intercourse with southern Britain, gradually became more and more civilized, the isolation of the Highlanders served to maintain their peculiarities. The division of the country of the Gaels into single valleys, glens and islands, separated either by mountains or inlets of the sea, necessarily led to the formation of small tribes; and men of considerable property, or distinguished talents, under whose command the others had fought, or under whose protection they had settled, became chiefs. As the inhabitants of these valleys had little intercourse with each other, on account of the natural condition of the country, each valley became the territory and property of a tribe, who had arms for defence, a sufficient number of artisans for their limited wants, pasture for their cattle, wood for building, moss and turf for burning, and a territory for hunting. These tribes were without inducement to change their habitation, to invite foreigners, or to promote a general intercourse among the varied settlements; so that each of them isolated itself. Thus was formed in each tribe or clan a patriarchal government, a sort of hereditary monarchy, founded rather on custom, and confirmed by general assent, than regulated by laws. The Highlander honored, in his chief, the descendant of a distant ancestor, from whom the whole clan was believed to have sprung. The clan showed him a filial devotedness; and even the name clan is derived from the Gaelic word kleann, that is, children. The clansmen intermarried within their own "sept," and thus a general relationship grew up. Many of the members, therefore, had the same name with the chief, so that a feeling of kindred and mutual attachment grew up. Towards all, the chief stood in the light of a superior, commander and judge. He could call on the young men to accompany him to the hunting or the battle-field. The chief was generally the proprietor rounded by his dependents, and expended all his income in rude hospitality. The laws of the clans were few and simple, and the chiefs, generally, never abused their power. The rebellion against the house of Hanover, in 1745, in favor of the Stuart dynasty, was soon suppressed by the British government, which seized the opportunity to abolish the patriarchal constitution of the Highlanders in 1747, to execute the law for disarming them, and even to prohibit their national dress, of Celtic origin, which distinguishes them from all other people. This beautiful dress, favorable for light and free motion, was peculiarly fitted for the warrior, the huntsman and the herdsman. The material of Highland clothing has remained the same for centuries—a woollen stuff, sometimes with cotton wool, and always checkered with various colors. Each clan has usually its peculiar mixture of colors. The chief part of the dress is a short petticoat descending to the knee, and called the kilt. Chieftains, aged men and horsemen sometimes wore a kind of tight pantaloons, called trews. The waistcoat and kilt were embroidered and adorned with lace. The plaid was two yards wide and four long. It was a piece of tartan which surrounded the body in broad, gracefully-arranged folds, fastened by a girdle; the lower part fell down, and the upper part was drawn round the left shoulder, leaving the right arm free. If it were necessary for both arms to be free, it was fastened by a silver clasp upon the breast. In front hung a large pouch of goat or dogskin. There was a dagger, besides a knife and fork, hanging in a sheath on one side. The cap belongs to the Highland dress. Instead of the feathers, which distinguished persons of rank, the lower classes wore branches of heath, or leaves of the holly and oak. The shoe or sandal consisted of pieces of thick leather which were fastened with strips of leather over the foot. The strict prohibition of this dress was peculiarly galling to the Highlanders, and they often disregarded it. This prohibition was first formally removed in 1782. Since then, it has been abandoned, except in certain districts. The arms of the Highlanders were, the sword upon the left side, and a short dagger upon the right, a musket, a pair of pistols, and a target. In the want of a musket, or when ammunition failed, a long lance was used with a hatchet near the top, called a Lochaber axe, and fitted for cutting or thrusting—a terrible weapon in the hands of a strong, agile man. Each clan formed, under the command of its chief, a regiment, whose companies consisted of separate families, each under the direction of its head. Courage and love of freedom, attachment to country and domestic ties, hospitality and a social disposition, honesty in private intercourse, and inviolable fidelity to trust reposed in them, were the distinguishing characteristics of the Highlanders, and are so still, notwithstanding all the changes which their manners have undergone in later times. A knowledge of books was but little diffused, and only among those of high rank, who were educated partly in France. But the history of their native land, poetry and music, were darling pursuits even among the lower classes. Each chief had his bard, who sung the deeds of his race, and of the individual members of the clans. These singers were held in high esteem, and were, like the seanchuirs, or the elders of the tribes, the conservators of old stories, which they retained in memories strengthened by constant exercise, in the absence of a written literature. The favorite musical instrument was a harp, and its lively sounds in battle supported the animation of the contest. A warm imagination, affected in a lively manner by the sublimity and the perfect solitude of the landscapes of their country, was the source of many of their peculiar superstitions. The Highlands form the only country in Europe that has never been disturbed by religious contests, nor suffered from religious persecutions. The Presbyterian and the Catholic are the prevailing forms of belief. The latter is limited to the county of Inverness, and some of the islands. Among the nobility, there are also some adherents to the Episcopal Church. Sir Walter Scott, who has reproduced all the poetry of the Highlands, has given many illustrations of the hardihood of these mountaineers. "Hardihood," he says, "was in every respect so essential to the character of a Highlander that the reproach of effeminacy was the most bitter which could be thrown upon him. Yet it was sometimes hazarded on what we might presume to think slight grounds. It is reported of old Sir Ewen Cameron of Lochiel, when upwards of seventy, that he was surprised by night on a hunting or military expedition. He wrapped himself in his plaid, and lay contentedly down upon the snow, with which the ground happened to be covered. Among his attendants, who were preparing to take their rest in the same manner, he observed that one of his grandsons, for his better accommodation, had rolled a large snow-ball and placed it beneath his head. The wrath of the chief was awakened by what he conceived degenerate luxury. 'Out upon thee!' said he, kicking the frozen bolster from his head; 'art thou so effeminate as to need a pillow?'"

HIGHLANDERS OF THE ENGLISH ARMY.

of the whole territory of the clan, yet did not have absolute right of possession, the land being parcelled out among the clansmen. The largest clans were frequently subdivided into branches, headed by subordinate chieftains. When the population in these narrow valleys increased, the means of subsistence became scarce, and predatory expeditions called creaghs were undertaken against the Lowlands or hostile clans, and cattle were seized, and some prisoners who were held to ransom. There existed, also, a class of bold adventurers called ceannachs, employed on expeditions of extraordinary peril. In later times, however, their profession was considered less honorable, and consisted in gathering tribute from the lower country, or payment for protection against depredation, called black mail. Many of the younger sons of the chieftains found employment in the military service of France and Spain, and after the banishment of the house of Stuart, to which the Highlanders were faithful, it became still more common to follow foreign colors. The tastes of the people were warlike, and they despised the toils of the field and the workshop. Weaving was a labor for women, but the men were tailors. The smith or armorer of the tribe was especially honored. The chieftain generally lived surrounded by his dependents, and expended all his income in rude hospitality. The laws of the clans were few and simple, and the chiefs, generally, never abused their power. The rebellion against the house of Hanover, in 1745, in favor of the Stuart dynasty, was soon suppressed by the British government, which seized the opportunity to abolish the patriarchal constitution of the Highlanders in 1747, to execute the law for disarming them, and even to prohibit their national dress, of Celtic origin, which distinguishes them from all other people. This beautiful dress, favorable for light and free motion, was peculiarly fitted for the warrior, the huntsman and the herdsman. The material of Highland clothing has remained the same for centuries—a woollen stuff, sometimes with cotton wool, and always checkered with various colors. Each clan has usually its peculiar mixture of colors. The chief part of the dress is a short petticoat descending to the knee, and called the kilt. Chieftains, aged men and horsemen sometimes wore a kind of tight pantaloons, called trews. The waistcoat and kilt were embroidered and adorned with lace. The plaid was two

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. { Vol. XII., No. 21.—Whole No. 309.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The engraving below was executed expressly for the Pictorial from a photograph taken for us, and one of the finest specimens of the art we ever saw. Every line of the architecture was defined with the minuteness of a steel engraving, and the lettering on the smallest signs was distinctly visible. Our artist has very graphically produced the striking features of this splendid building, which, in some respects, has not its equal on the Atlantic seaboard, and which affords emphatic evidence of the progress of art in the great empire of gold so lately added to our domains. This building was erected in 1854, with the intention of establishing a Merchants' Exchange on the New York and Boston plan, but it proved a failure, from a miscalculation as to the eligibility of the site. It was discovered to be too remote from the places where "merchants most do congregate." Barry and Patten's, and Sweeney and Baugh's, being too long established as places of meeting and exchange on Montgomery and Clay Streets, this splendid edifice was rented to the United States' courts. The building has 120 feet frontage on Battery Street, and 137 feet depth on Washington and Oregon Streets, and cost, exclusive of the land it occupies, $120,000. It is owned by Jardine, Mathison & Co., an English house in Canton. The whole recent history of San Francisco, and indeed of California, surpasses in romance the wildest fiction that over the imagination of an oriental story-teller gave birth to. It is only because the startling events of which it is made up have occurred in our own days, that we do not recognize them as marvels. Coming generations will be infinitely more impressed than ourselves by the "plain, unvarnished tale." It was not till California had come under the flag of the United States, and a decade has not passed since then, that this splendid series of events began to be unrolled. In 1848, the gold discovery at Sutter's mill opened a new page in the history of the world, and gave to civilization an impetus which no point in the past story of the world can match for intensity and power. The tidings of the gold discovery sped all over the globe with almost electrical rapidity, followed by that remarkable exodus from all the old States of the confederacy, and all the old countries of the East, which could not have been accomplished at an earlier period for lack of means of transportation. Steam and canvass carried to the land of promise thousands of immigrants, monthly. Then we witnessed the enactment of a most splendid and surprising drama, lacking in none of the elements of the wild, the wonderful, the mirthful and the tragic; the almost instantaneous birth of an empire in a locality hitherto regarded as beyond the pale and beyond the reach of civilization. Towns and cities sprung up as if by magic, just as on the mimic stage, at the whistle of the prompter, the painted desert glides away, and in its place we behold temples and palaces, busy streets and mammoth warehouses, and battlements and spires.

THE MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN:

—OR,—

THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XVII.

A GUILTY COMPACT.

FALKLAND, as he slowly returned to his lodgings, felt at a loss what to do. Scarcely a day passed, but that he recklessly contracted some debt, without the means of paying for it, and now that Jeduthan, the Jew, had refused to advance him the hundred pounds for which he had applied, his last expedient for satisfying the most clamorous of his creditors, who daily harassed him, was cut off, for he knew of no one to whom he could apply, with any chance of success. A thought struck him as he placed the key in the lock of the door which opened into his room. He stopped, reflected a minute, and then retraced his steps.

There was a tract of land still in his possession, belonging to the estate left by his father, which yielded him only a trifling income. He would offer the Jew a mortgage of this land, if, instead of the one hundred he had asked for, he would give him two hundred. He found the Jew preparing to close the shop. Assuming a more conciliatory air than when he parted with him, he made known the reason of his return. His proposal was accepted, and the following morning was appointed for the transaction of the business.

When, at last, he found himself in his own apartment, he saw a man sitting near the table, who, as there was no light, except what was afforded by a fire nearly burnt out, he supposed to be his valet, to whom, as he did not care to have him know anything relative to the affair he expected to be engaged in, he had, early in the afternoon, given leave to visit some relations who lived a little out of the city.

"Why are you back so soon, Redding?" said he. "I gave you leave to stay away till morning."

"You mistook me for that rascally valet of yours, eh?" said the man, rising and coming forward.

"Is it you, Jem Corkle? How did you get in?—through the key-hole?"

"As the door wasn't locked, such an expedient was unnecessary."

"Then I must have forgotten to lock the door when I returned an hour ago. As Redding has a master key, I supposed it was he."

"You have great confidence in that valet of yours, I suspect."

"No, I don't trust him at all in any affair of importance, and that is why I sent him away to-day."

"There is little need of your trusting him, for his curiosity is such that he finds things out without being trusted."

"What do you mean?"

"That he overheard the whole of what you told me, the other evening, about altering the date of the will old Burlington made in favor of his niece."

"How came you to know?"

"No matter how, as long as what I tell you is true."

"I am lost, then."

"Not so bad as that. As yet, he has told only one person."

"Who, of course, then, must be you?"

"Well, to confess the truth, it was."

"I didn't suspect that you were on such confidential terms."

"He had little inclination to bestow his confidence on me, you may be certain. When, on the night in question I left you, I opened the door rather suddenly, when some one darted away from behind it in such haste, as to make me suspect it was some one who had been listening. I managed to overtake him, and by dint of persuasion and threats, succeeded in making him confess that he had heard all we had said. I didn't part company with him, however, till I had extorted a promise from him not to mention what he had heard to any person living."

"A promise which he will be sure to break, as he is as much given to talkativeness as curiosity."

"Yes, and I've been thinking it will need a sharp argument to keep his tongue from wagging."

"But where shall we find one who will be willing to make use of such an argument?"

"Leave that to me. But then there must be time and opportunity."

"To-morrow evening, I will find some pretext for sending him to the shop of Jeduthan, the Jew."

"At what hour?"

"Nine."

"Ten would be the better time."

"Yes, but the shop will be closed before then."

"Nine let it be, then. I remember a nice, snug place close by the Jew's tumble-down domicile, where he who is to be employed can conceal himself."

"And let him be sure not to part company with him till he has lost all power of telling tales."

"You needn't caution me on that score."

"And tell him, if the affair occasion noise or outcry, he will be in no danger of being surprised, as the Jews, who are the sole inhabitants of that quarter, are much like the snail, which, at the intimation of danger, draws itself further into its shell. Tell him, furthermore, that he may count on a good round sum, if all is performed with skill and dexterity."

"That lies between him and me. I will take care of it, and shall look to you for the pay. A few lucky games at primero will furnish you with the means."

"Yes, but I'm always certain to be unlucky."

"Try some other game, then."

"Fortune is always against me, let me try what I will."

Just then, some one knocked at the door. Both started, as guilty people will.

"What if we've been overheard?" said Falkland, in a whisper.

"No danger of that," replied Corkle. "One who had overheard what we have said, would sooner go in search of a policeman than knock for admittance."

"There's something in that."

The knocking was now repeated louder than before.

"Go, Falkland, and open the door, or I will," said Corkle.

He obeyed, though not without some misgivings. A lad of fourteen or fifteen put a sealed note into his hand, and without speaking, withdrew. The two had been sitting by the dim fire-light, as if they did not care to look each other in the face. To enable him to read his note, Falkland was obliged to light a lamp.

"From a lady or a courtier," said Corkle, "as one may know by the odor of musk. Which is it?"

"A lady."

"A billet-doux, then, I suppose?"

"Nothing of the kind," said Falkland, rather sharply.

"You think me too inquisitive, eh? Now I think it is hard if two such confidential friends as we are cannot share each other's love-secrets, as well as such dangerous ones as that we've been talking about."

"There's no love-secret in the case. The note is from Mildred Daerres, as I know by the handwriting, though it is without signature."

"I believe you now. Handsome as she is, I should sooner think of falling in love with a harpy."

The note contained only the following briefly worded request, or rather command:

"Come to me to-morrow morning, at ten, without fail."

"It is getting late," said Corkle. "It is time for me to go. Nine o'clock, to-morrow evening, is the hour?"

"Yes; but why need you go? You may as well stay all night, now you are here."

"And so you would rather have Jem Corkle for company than no one? I can't say that I should, were I in your place."

"Why? You wouldn't think of doing me any harm?"

"To be sure not. It wouldn't, I think, be much for my interest just now. I was only thinking that if my head should happen to get confused, by waking suddenly from some frightful dream, I might mistake you for your valet."

"And what then?"

"Nothing—nothing. Why, how frightened you look! The truth is, I have an important engagement, and couldn't stay if you should get down on your knees to me. Good-night, and when I am gone, remember to lock your door, and not leave it as you did an hour or two since, for anybody to walk in who pleases to lift latch. If I should call to-morrow night, shall I find you here?"

"That depends on what time you call."

"A little after nine, or thereabouts."

"You'll find me here then."

"I'll speak to you through the key-hole, so that you may be sure who it is."

"Well thought of."

"And as I've already charged you, mind that your door is fast."

CHAPTER XVIII.

WHAT HAPPENED TO ASENETH, THE JEWESS.

SOON after Falkland's departure the second time, the Jew, casting aside his coarse gaberdine, which concealed a rich and becoming dress, joined the fair Abi, and their equally fair and unexpected guest. Alice had already communicated to Abi all that she herself knew of what she supposed to be a plan for her abduction, which she now related to him.

"And have you any suspicion who was the employer of the ruffianly fellows?" he asked.

"I have," she replied. "His name, as I have reason to believe, is Falkland."

"You are right; there can be no doubt. I have had dealings with him, and have reason to believe that, though still young, he is familiar with vice. You have much reason to be thankful for your escape."

"I have been thinking of my friends," said Alice, after a few moments' silence. "They will suffer much anxiety on my account, and I must let them know, as early as possible, what kind hands I have fallen into."

"I would fain relieve their anxiety to-night," said the Jew, "but the lad in my service is unfortunately absent, and it would be hardly prudent for me to convey intelligence of your welfare myself. Some one might be lurking near who would recognize me, which would be likely to lead to a still stronger suspicion than has yet been excited as to your hiding-place. As there will be explanations to make and directions to give, the message better be a written one, which Aseneth shall carry to your friends early in the morning."

"And it must be written to-night," said Alice.

"Yes, if you would have your friends hear from you early in the day."

Abi having placed writing materials before her, the subjoined note, addressed to Mrs. Elliston, was soon completed:

"DEAR AND HONORED MADAM,—The servant you sent to attend me home has, without doubt, fully informed you of what befell me up to the time when he left, for the purpose, as I think, of obtaining help. I, therefore, need only say, that soon after he was gone, I succeeded in making my escape from the sedan. I knew not whither to go, but providentially I sought refuge among those who have with great kindness sheltered and protected me. Your son will know where to find me, when I mention that it was the shop of Jeduthan, the Jew, which I entered, in order to escape from the miscreants, who, as I could hear, were already pursuing me. I have passed the evening with his granddaughter, a very lovely girl, near my own age, in a secluded apartment. I shall be in readiness to return whenever and in whatever manner you may see fit to appoint. I am, dear and honored madam, with sentiments of dutiful regard, yours,

ALICE DALE."

Early in the morning, as the Jew had promised, he gave Aseneth the note, with the necessary directions where to carry it. But when she had left what was called the Jews' quarter, having seldom had occasion to go beyond it, she became bewildered, and lost her way. There were as yet few people stirring, but those of whom she inquired the way to the street she was in pursuit of, answered her only with gibes or a sneering laugh, for they knew by certain peculiarities of her speech and dress that she was a Jewess.

She was not aware that, during all this time, a man, who, when she left the house, was standing near by, in a little blind court, was following her. At last, when the street passengers began to multiply, and she, becoming still more perplexed, ventured once more to inquire the way, he who had been following her stepped quickly forward. He was in season to hear that the man of whom she had inquired answered her civilly, though being a stranger in the city, he was unable to direct her.

"What place do you wish to find, my good woman?" said he, addressing her.

"A house in Charles Street, where dwells the widow Elliston," she replied.

"Fortunately," said he, "I live in a house near hers, and can show you the way, or if, as I suspect, you are going for the purpose of delivering the letter I see in your hand, I will with pleasure carry it for you, and thus save you the trouble."

"I must go with it myself," she replied, "for so I was directed."

"Follow me, then, and you will soon be there."

He walked so rapidly that she had some difficulty in keeping up with him, the more as he frequently turned from one street into another. They had gone a much greater distance than she imagined it would be, from what he had said, when he stopped abruptly in front of a somewhat spacious building. It did not in the least resemble what she had pictured to herself as the dwelling of a Puritan lady, such as, from some remarks made in her presence, she supposed Mrs. Elliston to be, yet though she had some misgivings, she remained silent.

"This is the house," said her conductor; and ascending the steps, he rapped at the door.

It was speedily opened by a man whose dress accorded as little with the style of that worn by the Puritans, as the slovenly appearance of the building and the gaudily furnished apartment seen through an open door, were in unison with their daily habits.

"Is it you, Corkle?" said the man. "I didn't expect—"

Here his words were cut short by a significant look from him to whom they were addressed.

"I called," said Corkle, "to inquire if the widow Elliston is at home. Here is a woman who wishes to see her."

A sign accompanying this inquiry caused the man to answer in the affirmative.

"But it is so early in the day, she isn't visible yet, eh?"

"No."

"Well, go and tell some one to let her know that somebody is here, who wishes to see her very particularly."

The man vanished, and Corkle turned to Aseneth.

"Come in and rest yourself," said he, "till the lady is ready to see you."

She was glad to accept his invitation, being much fatigued from her long and rapid walk.

"Go in there," said he, indicating the room she had seen as she stood outside the building.

He entered an adjoining apartment, and she neither saw him nor any other person, though she could hear voices for a number of minutes. He then made his appearance.

"I've seen the lady's waiting-maid," said he, "and her mistress sends word that she shall not leave her room under an hour from now, and requests you to send her the letter you are the bearer of."

"Can I see the lady's handmaid?" she asked.

"Certainly;" and opening a door through which was seen a staircase, he called, "Cicily—Cicily!"

"What do you wish?" said a voice from above.

"You are wanted here a minute."

A girl came down stairs, and stood in the doorway.

"Hand the billet to her, and she will give it to her mistress."

The Jewess rose, advanced a few steps, and then stopped irresolute. Everything appeared so different from what she had supposed, that her mind misgave her.

"Perhaps," said Corkle, "you would prefer to wait an hour or two, till the lady leaves her room; although," added he, and winking at Cicily, "she is so unwell I shouldn't wonder if she didn't leave it for the day."

"I don't think she will be able to," said Cicily. "I will give her the letter, which, I suppose, will be the same as if you gave it to her yourself."

"You are not deceiving me?"

"Deceiving you?" said Corkle. "Who has thought of such a thing? And what good could it do, either the girl or me?"

"It is often sport to the Nazarens to afflict the despised sons and daughters of Israel. But I will trust you," said she, looking towards Cicely; "and woe be to you and this man, rather than to me, if evil befall the guiltless, by my so doing!"

Cicely, a little awed by the solemnity and pathos with which she said this, recoiled a little as the Jewess approached her. A threatening glance from Corkle, however, recalled her to herself, and with a smile she held out her hand for the letter.

"Take it," said Aseneth, handing it to her, "and may you find a serpent's sting in it, if you have possessed yourself of it wrongfully."

By the gingerly way in which the girl received it between her thumb and finger, it seemed as if she feared there was some tangible evil about the missive which might prove personally dangerous to herself. Aseneth stood a minute, looking at the turn of the stairs, where she caught sight of the last wave of her flowing skirts, as if half a mind to follow her, and demand the restoration of the note.

"I wish I knew what to do," said she, and as she spoke, she looked round, thinking she would speak to Corkle about it, and found herself alone.

It was already late in the morning, and with this thought, interwoven with a vague apprehension of impending evil, she left the house, with the arduous task before her of finding her way back, through what appeared to her the perfect maze of streets and dark alleys, where, guided by Corkle, she had recently passed.

CHAPTER XIX.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN FALKLAND AND MILDRED DACRES.

FALKLAND, who, after parting with Corkle, did not pass a very quiet night, in the morning paid more attention to his dress than he felt in a humor to, that he might be in fitting trim to call on Mildred Dacres. On the whole, he felt glad that she had sent for him, for he felt restless and uneasy, and the interview would serve to wear away the time.

Redding, his valet, would probably return before ten o'clock, the hour mentioned in Mildred's note, and to avoid meeting him, he left his lodgings sooner than he otherwise would have done, and took a circuitous route, that he might not arrive previously to the time named. After all, he was five minutes before the time, yet he found Mildred, who was pacing up and down the room in an agitated manner, impatient for his arrival.

"I should have said nine, instead of ten," said she. "I have spent a whole hour on the rack."

"What has happened?"

"Do you ask, when you must know that Harleigh is accused of being one of the plotters?"

"Very well; I, for my part, consider it one of the luckiest things which could have happened—that is, as far as I am concerned."

"I don't see why."

"His imprisonment will keep him out of the way, and prevent him from prying into and thwarting certain affairs of my own."

"I have heard that his life is in danger."

"No such thing."

"I had my information from good authority."

"There was an anonymous letter, or something of the kind, addressed to the king, which, by its appearance, he supposed to be a billet-doux, I believe, and consequently received his prompt attention. But on perusal, he found that it accused Harleigh of being engaged in the conspiracy. It was inadvertently cast aside among a mass of papers to be examined by the council, otherwise the king, after reading it, for certain reasons, would have taken no notice of it."

"And that is the only evidence against him?"

"So I understand; but the council look upon it in a graver light than the king does, who, as the note was written in a woman's hand, suspected the accusation was instigated by some freak of jealousy, and are determined that he shall stand his trial with the rest of the conspirators."

"The king has no power to prevent this?"

"No; one accused of a crime so flagrant must, as the phrase is, be adjudged by God and his country. The king can only use his influence to prevent his condemnation."

"Yesterday, I sought an audience of the king, and he told me the same himself, but I thought it was only to get rid of importunity."

"Sought an audience of the king to plead for the life of Clarence Harleigh?"

"Yes; why shouldn't I?"

"As he prefers another, I imagined you had too much pride to do it."

"If you knew all, you would think differently. I was his accuser."

"You?"

"Yes; 'twas I who wrote the accusation, and sent it to the king. I imagined, that without seriously endangering him, it would afford a pretext for me to interfere in his behalf, which, by awakening his gratitude, would serve to divert his thoughts from Alice Dale."

"In which there might have been a shadow of success, if she were the other side of the water, where we left her. Out of sight, out of mind, the old adage says."

"And isn't she the other side of the water?"

"Is it possible that you don't know that she arrived here in Old England almost as soon as we did?"

"How should I know it? You seem to have taken especial pains to avoid me, and there are none else among my acquaintances who would be likely to know anything about it, or if they did, would think it worth mentioning. Does Harleigh know that she's here?"

"I think not, which wouldn't have been likely to be the case, if he had had his liberty."

"Why did she come to England?"

"That is what I am unable to tell you, though I have a suspicion that the object in view by her friends is to bring about a match between her and a young puritanical, psalm singing knave, by the name of Edward Elliston."

"I've heard of him. His mother is a widow, and the sister of Mr. Walworth."

"Yes, and if such a thing could be, ten times more straight-laced than he is."

"And the son, I suppose, may be included in the same category?"

"That comes, of course. Yet, to do him justice, he is a really handsome fellow, and wears his gray jerkin with as much grace as a courtier does his velvet pourpoint; so that while by prolonging Harleigh's imprisonment, you have done yourself a good turn, and one that promised equally well to me. I have only too good reason to suspect, that in the young Puritan, I have a rival quite as much to be feared as in the cavalier."

"Where is the danger? He isn't a resident of the city, as I have heard both Mr. and Mrs. Walworth say, so that there will be little chance of their meeting."

"They have already met. About the time Alice was expected to arrive, it was suddenly found that his presence was needed in London, so that ever since she came, they have been members of the same family. But I must leave you now."

"You have been here only fifteen minutes."

"I know it, but I have an appointment which must not be neglected."

"And so you don't intend to take a single step to procure Harleigh's release?"

"No. If he is brought to trial, he will, without doubt, be acquitted; if not, old Rowley, who being better learned in certain ways of the world than some of his grave council, and who from the first has had a shrewd suspicion of what, according to your own confession, I find to be the truth, will exercise the royal prerogative in his behalf."

"The king doesn't suspect I was the author of the accusation?"

"I am unable to say as to that. Even if he does, you may be certain that there are few he will share the secret with; so you may rest easy on that score. Good-morning. I've already been here too long. I will call again soon."

"Pray don't trouble yourself about one of so little consequence as I am."

In his eagerness to leave—for he was afraid that she might suggest something more to which common civility would oblige him to listen, and thus detain him still longer,—he had already left the room, and, therefore, did not hear her answer with sufficient distinctness to comprehend its import. If he had heard it, and seen the look with which it was accompanied, he would have felt, to say the least, that he had been guilty of an indiscretion.

Falkland had just turned the corner of a street, which introduced him into one of the most thronged of the great thoroughfares, when, through an opening of the crowd of foot-passengers, some proceeding in the same direction as himself, but more in the one opposite, he had a glimpse of some one who resembled Clarence Harleigh, coming towards him. He felt nearly certain it was not he, yet he advanced no further till he had succeeded in obtaining a second look. There could no longer be any doubt. It was Harleigh himself, and as Falkland at this time was particularly anxious to avoid meeting him, he lost no time in turning back into the street from which a minute before he had emerged. It lengthened his walk to Jeduthun the Jew's, and when he arrived, he found the papers, relative to the agreement made between them the preceding evening, ready for his signature.

Harleigh's release from prison, which had so surprised and disconcerted Falkland, had been effected by Edward Elliston. Without entering into the particulars, it will be enough to say, that information received from a reliable source convinced young Elliston that Harleigh was detained in prison on a false accusation. He at once sought the Duke of Ormond, who, if not a favorite of the king, he knew possessed his confidence, and made a plain statement of those incidents in reference to Harleigh which had come to his knowledge. They were so clear and so simple, and went so directly to prove the prisoner's innocence, that when repeated to the king, he did not for a moment hesitate to order his release, on the plea of false imprisonment.

CHAPTER XX.

HARLEIGH AT LIBERTY.

ASENETH, the Jewess, after leaving the house to which Corkle had guided her, proceeded for some time with a heavy heart, in that appeared to her the right direction. Now and then she looked wistfully round on every side for such landmarks as she had the foresight to set down in her mind while following her perfidious conductor, but she could see nothing which looked familiar. She had, thus far, avoided inquiring the way, for she shrank from again encountering the scoffs and jeers which by so doing, when in pursuit of Mrs. Elliston's dwelling, she had brought upon herself. Now, however, fearing that instead of approaching, she was wandering further from home, she concluded to closely observe those she met, and seek the desired information of the first person whose appearance pleased her.

Not long after she came to this conclusion, she saw a young man coming towards her, whose air and dress showed that his rank was that of a gentleman. As he drew near enough to enable her to have a full view of his countenance, the confidence inspired by his appearance, when she first saw him, increased. She felt certain that he was one of those whose goodness of heart and true nobility made him above treating with contempt even one of her despised race. He was walking slowly, which gave her a good opportunity to accost him.

"Can you," said she, "tell me the way to the shop of Jeduthun, the Jew?"

"You are so great a distance from it," he replied, "that it will be difficult to direct you. The way you were going, when I met you, was in a contrary direction."

Her heart sunk within her when he told her this, for she was faint and weary.

"What can I do?" said she.

"There are some chairmen at a little distance," said the young man. "Shall I speak to them, and order them to convey you to the place where you wish to go?"

The mere mention of this caused her to tremble with fear.

"O, sir," said she, "I dare not trust them. I am, as you see, a poor Jewess, and they would not hesitate to treat me with scorn and derision."

"What you say is only too true. You won't be afraid to trust me for a guide?"

She looked at him as if she doubted whether she heard him aright.

"Will you permit me to guide you?" said he, noticing her look of bewilderment.

"You surely cannot mean to show me the way yourself?"

"Why not?"

"It would be stooping too low."

"Not a whit. I had it in my mind, before I met you, to call at the Jew's shop you mentioned, and, perhaps, some of those belonging to others who live near by, between this and night. I may as well go now as later in the day. As I have already told you, you are now a long distance from there, but I shall be careful to take the most direct way. Keep near by, or you may lose sight of me."

After all her fatigue and perplexity, since she left home, this was an unnecessary caution. It did not enter her mind that he was deceiving her, as it did more than once when she was following Corkle. The gentleman walked rapidly, but soon coming to a stop, he looked back, and inquired if she did not find it difficult to keep up with him.

"No," she replied, "for I no longer carry a heavy heart."

At last, when they entered the street where she lived, though lined on either side with buildings that were old and unsightly, she could scarcely suppress a cry of joy. Her conductor almost wondered at the delight depicted in her countenance on reaching a place where all around wore an air of so much wretchedness and gloom. When they reached the door of the shop, Aseneth stood without, till her conductor had entered.

"I was afraid that some evil had befallen you," said the Jew, as, on raising his eyes, he saw her standing near the threshold.

"That there has not, thanks are due to this stranger," she replied. And passing through the shop, she opened a door, and entered an adjoining apartment.

"I have called," said the young man, as soon as she had closed the door behind her, "to request the favor of examining a gem which I have been told is in your possession."

"I am not a dealer in gems, as you will readily perceive if you look round you," said the Jew, evasively, and, in spite of himself, manifesting some alarm.

"Yet you purchased an opal the other evening."

The Jew remained silent.

"You needn't be afraid that I shall make use of my knowledge of this transaction to injure you. I merely wish to satisfy myself that it is the same which I once was the owner of."

"You, then, are the one who found it, when it was lost by Abi, my grand-daughter?"

"The one I refer to I first saw at Lingard's, the goldsmith. I subsequently purchased it of him at a high price. All I wish to ascertain is, if the opal sent here for sale by Gilbert Falkland be the same, or only one that resembles it. I wish you to understand, however, that in either case, it is not my intention to deprive you of it, the transaction having been, as I learn, a fair one on your part. If it shouldn't prove to be that I had of Lingard, I have no right to it, while if I find it to be the same, I would sooner grind it beneath my feet than retain what would ever be hateful to my sight."

"I would willingly grant your request, were it in my power; but only a few minutes before you came, it was discovered that the setting had sustained some injury, and it was sent to one of our people to be repaired. When it is returned, you can see it."

"When will that be?"

"Some time during the day. At what hour, I am unable to tell."

"Then I will defer coming till evening."

He turned to go, when the Jew again accosted him.

"Pardon me," said he, "but I would fain know the name of one who disdained not, if I rightly understood the meaning of her words, to screen her, my faithful servant, from the rudeness of those who seem to forget that our despised people are within the pale of humanity."

"My name is Clarence Harleigh."

"One that I sha'n't forget. Favors sink deep into the hearts of those who are little used to them."

"Showing your servant the way thither, as I wished to come myself, scarcely deserves the name of a favor," replied Harleigh, as he turned to leave.

Had he known that Alice Dale was at that moment in the same building, forgetful of the promise he gave Mr. Walworth, he might have been tempted to seek an interview with her. Now, he did not even know that she had left the distant home where he last saw her. It was on Harleigh's way back that Falkland obtained sight of him, in season to avoid meeting him, a meeting which must inevitably have taken place at the Jew's, if Falkland had not been detained against his will, some ten or fifteen minutes, by Mildred Daeres.

As the day wore away, Alice began to think it was somewhat singular that she heard nothing from Mrs. Elliston. She had, all the morning, been expecting that Edward Elliston would come for her, as, after what had taken place, it might not even by day be exactly safe to trust her to the protection of servants. Had it not been for the anxiety she experienced in this respect, the time would have passed away very pleasantly, with the beautiful and intelligent Abi, who, in the fullness of her delight, treated her with the same affectionate confidence and freedom from all disguise, as if she had been her sister.

Aseneth, meanwhile, was ill at ease. When the joy of finding herself safe at home had time to subside, the misgivings she had felt as to whether the note she had been entrusted with had fallen into the right hands, revived with redoubled force. If she heard voices in the shop, she listened at the door, to hear if any one inquired for Alice Dale.

Mizer, the lad who stood outside the shop-door, and whose duty it was to remind those who were passing that rejuvenated garments of various descriptions were for sale within, had, during her absence, returned, and more than once she nearly decided in her own mind to reveal her fears to her master, and request that the boy might be sent with another message. From time to time, however, she was diverted from her purpose by the hope that her fears were without foundation.

Thus the hours slipped away, till night set in, with a sky darkened by heavy clouds. Alice, by this time, began to be so seriously uneasy, that when Aseneth entered, bearing a silver salver, on which were bread and wine, with Barcelona chocolate, frothed after the most approved fashion, for their evening meal, Abi inquired if she gave the billet into Mrs. Elliston's own hand.

"I did not," she replied; and she then gave a true account of all that happened to her, and expressed her fears that she had been deceived by the man who with so much apparent kindness offered to conduct her to the place where she desired to go.

"There can be no doubt that he deceived you," said Alice, "as is shown by the description you give of the house, and the people you saw there."

Her anxiety was now excited on a different account. The contents of the note addressed to Mrs. Elliston showed where she had found refuge, and if, as she feared, it had fallen into the hands of one of the men who had been employed by Falkland, it would be likely to bring trouble and danger to those who had so kindly befriended her, as well as to herself.

The Jew, who had entered the apartment in season to hear what was said, evidently shared her fears, though he forbore to express them. Whether or not they had reason for them, will be seen by the next chapter.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE VISIONARY.

This striking picture would seem to be suggested, it certainly recalls, the lines of one of Moore's melodies:

"Thus shall memory often, in dreams sublime,
Catch a glimpse of the days that are over,
Thus sighing, look through the waves of time,
For the long-faded glories they cover."

Or the visionary may be looking forward, and building castles in the air, though the sadness of her look rather favors our former hypothesis. The mournful look, the fixed gaze, the sad expression of the drawn-down mouth, rather indicate a retrospective glance. This poor, barefooted girl may not always have lived beneath the humble thatch of a cottage; she may have seen better days; and the Italian poet tells us that there is no more exquisite misery than is caused by recalling vanished joys in hours of distress. The friendless, deserted and houseless wanderer, who has fallen from some high estate, feels his heart wrung with woe indescribable, when he brings to mind scenes of joyous festivity, when friends crowded round him, when luxury ministered to his taste, and pleasure gilded the "primrose path of dalliance." At such times, unless the tear of faith pours down its pure and serene beams upon the widowed heart, the sense of loneliness and misery becomes too oppressive to be endured, and madness usurps the throne of reason. Such states of mind precede the act of suicide, and impel their victim to the dark river or the poisoned cup as a grateful resort. To persons pre-disposed to melancholy solitude is fraught with danger, and the lone dreamer, by a fearfully easy transition, passes into the hopeless maniac. Our engraving was taken from a painting, and though our copy wants the magical effect of color, still the forms and the play of light and shade which make its principal charm, have been faithfully preserved. The design is one of a very peculiar character, and has been well handled by the artist, poetically and graphically.

THE RAT CAN BE TAMED.

If he can be savage when self-protection requires, he also has his softer moments, in which he shows confidence in man almost as strong as that exhibited by the dog or cat. An old blind rat, on whose head the snows of many winters had gathered, was in the habit of sitting beside our own kitchen fire with all the comfortable look of his enemy, the cat; and such a favorite had he become with the servants, that he was never allowed to be disturbed. He unhappily fell a victim to the sudden spring of a strange cat. A close observation of these animals entirely conquers the antipathy which is entertained towards them. Their sharp and handsome heads, their bright eyes, their intelligent look, their sleek skins, are the very reverse of repulsive; and there is positive attraction in the beautiful manner in which they sit licking their paws and washing their faces—an occupation in which they pass a considerable portion of their time. A writer on rats in "Bentley's Miscellany" relates an anecdote of a tame rat, which shows that he is capable of serving his master, as well as of passing a passive existence under his protection. The animal belonged to the driver of a London omnibus, who caught him as he was removing some hay. He was spared because he had the good luck to be piebald, became remarkably tame, and grew attached to the children. At night, he exhibited a sense of the enjoyment of security and warmth by stretching himself out at full length on the rug before the fire, and on cold nights, after the fire was extinguished,

A MODEL WIFE.

A pleasant little Florentine story reached us the other day. One of our famous American sculptors, residing in that delightful city, whither all the genius of England and America seems to tend, was one day seated in his studio at work on an Apollo—for which, by-the-way, he might stand as a model himself—when his attention was attracted by a tremendous trampling of horses in his courtyard. He looked out the window and beheld a magnificent carriage, with outriders, drawn up before his door. Presently a gentleman claimed admission to his studio, and announced himself as the Prince di B—. He came to give the sculptor a large commission. His daughter, who had been struck by some statues of the American that she had seen, wished to sit to him for her bust. She was then below in the carriage. Was the sculptor at leisure? Price was no object; all that was necessary was to gratify his daughter, who was an invalid. The sculptor expressed his willingness to begin the work instantly; and the prince, making a sign to his lackeys from the window, they proceeded to lift a lovely girl, who seemed about eighteen, out of the carriage, and bore her in their arms carefully up the stairs to the artist's studio. The sculptor could not repress a look of surprise at this curious mode of locomotion, particularly as the lady did not bear the slightest trace of illness in her countenance. The prince interpreted his glance and replied to it. "My daughter has been paralyzed in all her limbs," he said, "for the last two months. It is a sad thing."

She has had all the medical aid in Florence, but without avail."

The sculptor looked again at the invalid. Nothing more beautiful in face or form could have been dreamed by Phidias. A face like Cenci's, before it was clouded with the memory of crime; masses of rich, lustrous auburn hair, framing a clear, pale face, with deep blue eyes swimming beneath a fringe of the silkiest black lashes. Through her delicate muslin robe, the contour of a divinely moulded form was indicated, and when the young signorina cast upon the sculptor a rapid glance, soft as starlight, piercing as electric fire, he felt his heart leap with a mysterious presage of some indefinable catastrophe. She sat. The sculptor worked at his model like one inspired, and a pang struck his heart as the hour for her retiring came. The prince and his lackeys bore her again down stairs in their arms. The carriage door closed on her; the horses swept through the gate. The sculptor did no more work that day. To-morrow she was to come again. He lay awake all night dreaming of her. Then he would shudder, and say to himself, "It is not love, but pity that I feel. She is a paralytic!" The next day, the same scene was repeated; with this difference, that the prince, having seen his daughter poised by the artist, excused himself, on the plea of a business engagement, saying that he would return in time to conduct his daughter home. Poor girl! although the sculptor was a model of manly beauty, her deplorable condition was, in her father's opinion, a safeguard against any of the dangers which he might otherwise have anticipated. He left the room, and drove away in his carriage. A silence ensued. The sculptor dared not look at his model, but worked away on his clay image without raising his eyes. Still a silence. Then it seemed as if a slight rattle had filled the room. A small white band stole across his mouth, and a burning kiss was printed on his forehead. With almost a shriek he leaped to his feet, and there, with blushes crimsoning her pale cheeks and alabaster neck, knelt the paralytic girl, with her beautiful eyes imploring pardon. "I saw you a long time ago," she said (an Italian woman, when she loves, knows no half measures), "and I loved you. My father was very strict with me. I could not move without being watched. It was impossible for me to meet you or see you. I feigned paralysis. For two months I have scarcely moved. In his pity for my condition, my father relaxed his surveillance of my motions. He gratified every wish; and, as an invalid, I excited no suspicion by desiring to become your sister. I have said that I love. If you do not return my love, I can only die!" What answer had the American? We need not inquire; only when the Prince di B— returned, he found nothing in the studio but a clay model of his paralytic daughter. A few days afterward, in a small town of France, the Florentine princess sunk her nobility in the name of an American sculptor.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

AN INGENIOUS TEST.

A short time ago, a merchant, in prosecuting his morning tour in the suburbs, found, as he walked along, a purse containing a considerable sum of money. He observed a lady at some distance, who, he thought, would be the owner and loser. Determined to be correct in the party to whom he delivered it, he fell upon a strange yet ingenious plan to effect this. He resolved to act the part of a "poor distressed man," and boldly went forward, hat in hand, and asked alms. This was answered with a "Go away! I have nothing to give you." The poor man, however, persisting in his entreaties, would not go until he had got assistance for his "furnishing wife and children." The lady at last condescended; but, to her dismay, found the wherewith was gone. The merchant with a polite bow returned the purse, with the advice in future to be more generous to the distressed.—London Journal.

THE VISIONARY.—AN IDEAL PICTURE.

he would creep into his master's bed. In the daytime, however, his owner utilized him. At the word of command, "Come along, Ikey," he would jump into the ample great coat pocket, from which he was transferred to the boot of the omnibus. Here his business was to guard the driver's dinner, and if any person attempted to make free with it, the rat would fly at them from out the straw. There was one dish alone of which he was an inefficient protector. He could never resist plum-pudding, and though he kept off all other intruders, he ate his fill of it himself. These are by no means extraordinary instances of the amiable side of rat nature, when kindly treated by man. In addition to his other merits, he possesses dramatic genius. We have heard of military fleas, we have seen Jacko perform his miserable imitation of humanity on the top of a barrel-organ, but who ever heard of a rat's turn for tragedy? Nevertheless, a Belgian newspaper not long since published an account of a theatrical performance by a troop of rats, which gives us a higher idea of their intellectual nature than anything else which is recorded of them. This novel company of players were dressed in the garb of men and women, walked on their hind legs, and mimicked with ludicrous exactness many of the ordinary stage effects. On one point only were they intractable. Like the young lady in the fable, who turned to a cat the moment a mouse appeared, they forgot their parts, their audience, and their manager, at the sight of the viands that were introduced in the course of the piece, and dropping on all fours, fell to with the native voracity of their race.—London Quarterly.

TREBIZOND FEMALES.

WOMEN OF TREBIZOND.

The group of women at the fountain, represented in the accompanying picture, was sketched from life, and shows us specimens of the women of Trebizond, as they appear at different ages. Their costume is very simple, being only a loose linen garment and trousers, with a small linen cap upon the head. The seated figure is a woman advanced in life, but still retaining traces of beauty, though time has destroyed the elegant contour of her person. The figure resting a water-pitcher on her knee, is in the prime of womanhood, and a model of statuesque grace. The two others are mere girls. The home of these women is quite famous. Trebizond, the ancient Trapezus of Xenophon, is one of the principal cities of that mountainous country which extends all along the borders of the Black Sea, from the eastern limits of Anatolia to the last slopes of the Caucasus on the side of Russia in Asia. The surrounding country is cut up into valleys, and bristles with hills, the summits of which, covered with snow a portion of the year, give birth to numerous water-courses, that descend into the bays with which the shores are indented. This configuration of soil explains the remarkable variety of weather experienced in that territory. Thus, while the temperature of the valleys is burning and almost insupportable in summer, the first approach of winter renders the colds on the high grounds almost insupportable. There the snow falls in abundance during many months, and it is only at an advanced period of spring, that these regions become accessible for pasturage and culture. Many cereals are cultivated, such as wheat, barley and maize; the vine succeeds well, hemp and tobacco are raised with success, and fruit trees bear abundantly. The pear-trees of Trebizond are particularly celebrated. The mountains are covered with superb forests, in the shade of which pasture numerous flock of goats and sheep. The melliferous flowers, which spring up in the woodlands—the plants which grow wild in the meadows, feed a multitude of bees, where honey and wax form an additional element of trade for the interior of the country. The principal wealth of the inhabitants of the coasts consists in fisheries, which are better here than at any other portion of the Black Sea, and the products of which amply supply the markets of the neighborhood, and even find their way to Constantinople. Trebizond was an important place, even at the remotest period of its history. The agreeable aspect of the hill, on the reverse of which it rises—the happy location of its port, and its situation as an opening of one of the most fertile countries of Asia, must have largely influenced the selection of its founders, who, according to the accounts of the Greek historians, were no other than colonists from Sinope. But its existence is effaced completely in the obscurity of ages, until the appearance of the kings of Pontus, whose dominion forever closed its independence. On the fall of Mithridates, the Romans seized it, and made it the capital of the province comprised under the name of Pontus Cappadocius. Its part, during all this period, and up to the 13th century of the Christian era, was confined to that of a commercial city. But in 1203, after the taking of Constantinople by the French, it emerged from its obscurity by the will of Alexis Comnenus. Alexis made it the capital of a new state, which, under the name of the Empire of Trebizond, extended from the mouths of the Phasis, now Rioni, to those of the Halys, at present, Kizil-Ermak. This glory lasted two centuries and a half; in 1461, Mahomet II. seized on the place, under the last emperor, David Comnenus, and all this part of Asia submitted to the yoke of the Mussulmen. The city contains many ruins commemorative of its history.

THE SUBAQUEOUS LAMP.

We present herewith an engraving of a very curious invention, showing its adaptation to the business of fishing, and adding one other to the manifold contrivances by which men are enabled to ensnare the finny tribes. We subjoin a description of this apparatus, and the manner of using it, which, taken in connection with the picture, will prove perfectly intelligible. Several attempts have been made from time to time to construct a lamp that would burn under water, without the desired object being attained till lately. In Paris, an electrical light machine was fitted up that answered the purpose, as far as light was concerned; but the expense was too great to allow of its general application. The object has now been attained by Herr Karl Kohn, and the engraving shows the simplicity of the apparatus. It is intended to make examinations of wrecks and impediments to navigation at the mouths of harbors. The inventor anticipates being able to sink it to the depth of from 60 to 100 feet, without the chance of its being extinguished. Like most useful inventions, this seems to have originated from a simple idea. It is well known that fish will come to a light at night; and this mode of poaching is extensively practised in Scotland for catching salmon, and is called "burning the water." In the lamp in question, the effect upon the finny inhabitants is greater than the torch at the bows of the boat. The lamp is sunk to a considerable depth, and fish of all sizes, with laudable curiosity, are attracted by the novelty of the affair. When a large company is collected, the lamp is gradually raised, the fish following; and then, when at a convenient depth, the hest are taken with hand-nets. Description of the lamp:—a, Two exhausting bellows, by which a current of air is produced; b, a double cranked tin tube fixed to the boat, on which the bellows work; c, the supply-pipe, for the fresh air to feed the flame; d, the lamp itself, with glass air-tight case; e, the small pipe, to which the tube c is fixed to the lamp; f, the tube by which the deoxidised air passes to the bellows (this tube springs from the cover, which is hermetically closed upon the glass case containing the light); g, g, two small openings to supply a draught till the lamp is ready for use; h, weight to sink the lamp; i, a wire to raise or lower the lamp.

THE SUBAQUEOUS LAMP.

A REMARKABLE LINGUIST.

In the course of a lecture delivered not long since before a "Mutual Improvement Society" at Walthamstow, Cardinal Wiseman observed that the power of acquiring and remembering a number of languages—that is, knowing them thoroughly, grammatically and familiarly—was extremely rare. Of this power, his (Cardinal Wiseman's) late friend, Cardinal Mezzofante, was a striking example. His labors were in the prisons, in which he found confined natives of every habitable country—Croats, Hungarians, Wallachians, Bohemians, Hungarians, Poles, Lithuanians, Cardinal Mezzofante set himself to work, and in a few days was able to speak with them readily and fluently. Cases have been known of persons coming to this extraordinary man for confession, but speaking only some out of the way language which debarred them from intercommunication with all priests within their reach. On such occasions, Cardinal Mezzofante would request a delay of three weeks, during which time he would so completely master the language, however difficult, that he could apprehend the most minute particulars communicated to him. At the age of fifty, he was thoroughly versed in fifty languages; and before his death, the number he knew must have amounted to seventy or eighty. Of these, it must be added, he was acquainted with all the varieties of dialect, provincialisms and patois. He would detect the particular county in England from which a person came, or the province in France, and was conversant, not only with the grammar, but with the literature of all these nations. He could write a note or an apology—perhaps, after all, the greatest test—without an error in form, language, style, or title of address of his correspondent, and would turn his sentences without ever losing sight of the little niceties, idioms, and peculiarities which form the distinctive characteristics of a language. His method of studying a language was to take the grammar and read it through, and at the end of that time he was perfect master of the whole thing. He used to say he had never forgotten a single thing he had ever read or heard. He also possessed an acuteness of ear, and a flexibility of the organs of speech, which enabled him to express himself with the most faultless accent. With all this he had never been out of Italy in his life, and only once out of Rome, when he visited Bologna.—London Morning Star.

DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The first animals brought to America from Europe were imported by Columbus on his second voyage, in 1493; he left Spain admiral of seventeen ships, bringing a collection of European trees, plants and seeds of various kinds, a number of horses, a bull, and several cows. The first horses brought into the territory at present embraced in the United States, were landed in Florida by Calaca de Vaca, in 1437, forty-two in number, all of which perished, or were otherwise killed. The next importation was also brought to Florida by De Soto, in 1539, which consisted of a large number of horses and swine, among which were thirteen sows, whose progeny soon increased to several hundred. The Portuguese took cattle and came to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, in the year 1553; thirty years after, they had multiplied so abundantly, that Sir Richard Gilbert attempted to land there to obtain supplies of cattle and hogs for his crew, but was wrecked. In 1509, three ships from England landed at Jamestown, in Virginia, with many immigrants, and the following domestic animals, viz., six mares, one horse, six hundred swine, five hundred domestic fowls, with a few sheep and goats. Other animals had been previously introduced there. The first animals introduced into Massachusetts were by Edward Winslow, in 1624, consisting of three heifers and a bull. In 1629, twelve cows were sent to Cape Ann; and in the same year, one hundred and fifteen cattle were imported into the plantations on Massachusetts Bay, besides some horses and mares, several conies, and forty-one goats—they being mostly ordered by Francis Higginson, formerly of Leicestershire, whence several of the animals were brought. The first importation into New York was made from Holland, by the West India Company, in 1625, consisting of horses and cattle for breeding, besides sheep and hogs.—Boston Journal.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MARION'S APPEAL TO HIS COUNTRYMEN
BEFORE THE ATTACK UPON CHARLESTON BY THE BRITISH.

BY CAROLINE L. JACQUES.

Arouse ye sluggards! Shall it be,
To despots such as these,
That free-born citizens will c'er
Submissive bend the knees?

Shall England's myrmidons, unchecked,
Invade with lawless stride
The land where Freedom's altar stands,
Undaunted in its pride?

Awake! be men, and scornful hurl
Defiance to their teeth;
Nor dare, unconquered, c'er to thrust
Your swords within their sheath.

What though unarmed against the foe,
Shall tyranny prevail?
Protectors of your country's rights,
With God, ye cannot fail!

Your watchword, Liberty!—your shield,
Hearts unappalled by death:
Resolved for victory, or else,
Unvanquished, yield your breath.

Then up, to arms! With rapid steps
Britanna's blood-stained hosts
Advance—death to the traitor who
Can now desert his post!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"SNOWED UP" IN THE CARS.

BY KATE WADE.

THE clock was striking eleven, and Kate Duncan was sitting in a low chair in front of the grate looking musingly at the bright coals. The room (Kate's room) was in a shocking state of disorder; bits of paper scattered all over the floor, little boxes and bundles lying on the table, bed, and chairs, and muslins, boots and brushes in unwonted neighborhood on the bureau, while an open trunk, already nearly full, told the cause of the confusion. Kate was going on a journey to-morrow. Mrs. Duncan had an old friend, now a widow, living in Boston, who had been pleading for a long time for a visit from Kate. Her own daughter was near Kate's age, and they would do everything to make her enjoy herself. So "mother" had at last consented, as Kate had just left school and needed relaxation. 'Twas a great event in her quiet, simple life, this first visit from home. So, tired with packing, and running up and down stairs after things that can never be found when wanted, she had settled herself comfortably before the fire, and was wasting her time in true girl-fashion, in dreaming dreams and building "castles in the air," instead of undressing and going soberly to bed, as a tired, well-behaved young lady should do.

Here let me make a little digression. As the age and appearance of the heroine are always of the first importance in a story, I consider it right to inform you at once as to Kate. She is, or rather was at this time, eighteen years old, and she was not what people generally call "a beauty," though she looked almost so now, with the ruddy fire-light dancing over her face and form. Kate, alas, was only "pretty." She had pretty hair, wavy and brown, clear, truthful, brown eyes, and her lips and cheeks were bright with the rich, healthy bloom of youth, while shining through all, and making their truest charm, was her frank, sunny, loving nature, that always won her friends.

Sitting there musing, all sorts of romantic notions and fancies were chasing through her brain at this visit—far Kate had read the usual number of novels that go to make up a part of every girl's reading, and had besides an imagination quite active enough before. After a while, becoming more prosaic, she wondered if the Hamiltons where she was going to visit would like her, she being sure to like them, hoping very much they would, that is, all but Robert. "It was such a pity that he wasn't somebody she should like, it would have been so nice, and they would have had such pleasant times." She had heard much about this Robert, Bella Hamilton's only brother. He was handsome she imagined, and he was talented, and his sister was never tired of praising or admiring him, so that Kate really had an uncomfortable awe of the paragon, and feeling sure that he wouldn't deign to notice her, had made up her mind to dislike him. Then there was another thing about him; he couldn't be called a "woman hater" certainly, for he was everything to his mother and sister, but she had heard that though it was the fashion in Boston to admire him, he kept all the belles at a distance by the polite indifference and reserve with which he treated them, and Kate didn't relish the idea of being so treated, though to be sure she wasn't a belle at all. Altogether, she viewed him as likely to be the one great drawback to the pleasure of her visit. Having pursued her "maiden meditations" thus far, her mother's foot was heard on the stairs, and she came in with a dress on her arm.

"Kate, why don't you go to bed? it's after eleven. Is your trunk packed?"

Kate started.

"Almost, mother, just a few things to put in."

"Well, I'll finish it. Please hand me those muslins on the bureau. I'll put your travelling dress here on the chair for you, so as to be handy in the morning. You'd better go right to bed."

The weather next morning was anything but pleasant; the sky was dull and leaden, and, as Mr. Duncan remarked at breakfast, "looked as though it would snow before noon." It made but little difference though to Kate, since it didn't prevent her going. She stood waiting for the carriage, and as she shook out the folds of her pretty brown travelling-dress, and threw back her veil over her becoming little bonnet as she tied it on before the glass, the reader must pardon her if it was with an agreeable consciousness that that face and form were unmistakably pretty; and yet she wasn't vain of it, but only glad. But she forgot all about it when she came to bid "the children" good-by, and was very near crying as her mother kissed her, and whispered: "Don't forget to pray night and morning, Kate, and write often, for we shall miss you very much." Her father's "come, Kate, the carriage is waiting," was just in time to prevent such a catastrophe, however, and when he claimed his kiss in the entry, "for fear of being cheated out of it at the cars," she laughed merrily, and put on a shocked expression and serio-comic air, and asked him "if he supposed she was going to kiss there, right before the hackman!"

The cars started at last. Kate leaned back in her seat and made herself as comfortable as she could for the tedious five hours' ride before her. When she got tired of watching the trees and fences fly past, for all the world as though they were on a skating match over the hard smooth snow, she took to watching those around her. Unfortunately, there was nothing at all funny or out of the way in any of them, except, perhaps, a couple on the opposite side of the car, evidently just married, who were most undisguisedly affectionate and proud of each other. The bride was arrayed in the most bristly of bridal bonnets, and was in constant fear of getting it hurt and spotted, and Kate couldn't help laughing to hear her exclamations of "O, dear! there's a spark! Now there's another!"

In front of Kate sat a gentleman all intent on a newspaper. Before they got to the first way-station it began to snow thick and fast, and she noticed that the further they went the deeper the snow looked, as though it had been snowing all night, while here and there it was much drifted. The scenery was very monotonous, so having nothing else to do, she made her vis-a-vis a subject for her favorite study, physiognomy, and amused herself with guessing from his face what his character was.

It was a striking face, with a great deal of firmness and "character" in the expression of the mouth, a certain calm earnestness and clearness in the eyes, and in his whole person and manner an unmistakable air of the gentleman. "I'm glad he has got such a fine face, if he is going to sit opposite me," thought Kate. Just at this interesting point in her reflections, the gentleman in question looked up, and met her eyes fixed on him. Kate colored at being caught staring so, and looked quickly away to the other side of the car. The bridegroom was just then tenderly spreading his red silk handkerchief over the bonnet of his fair one, to protect it from a sudden shower of sparks, and Kate to keep from laughing had to turn away again, and met a second time the eyes of the gentleman, who was looking the same way, and evidently trying to conceal a smile. "Your mouth is handsome when you smile," thought Miss Kate, "and I've no doubt you may be aware of the fact yourself. I don't wish to be caught staring at you all the time though." So, as a last resort from ennui, she drew her veil over her face and tried to go to sleep.

About eleven o'clock the cars, which had been moving very slowly, stopped altogether. Everybody looked out of the windows, but could see nothing but great drifts of snow and a little red farmhouse way off in the distance. The gentlemen who went out to see what the trouble was, soon came back and stood round the stove, talking and stamping the snow off their feet. Kate listened to what they said, and found that they had got into a snow drift, and that it would take two or three hours at least to shovel the snow away so that they could go on. Some were grumbling and scolding because the conductor had taken no snow-plough.

"We had better take it easy," said a great cheery looking man in a red woolen comforter. "They say there is just such another drift a little way ahead, only worse if anything. It will be time enough to fret when we come to that."

Kate was of the same opinion, but did not feel quite easy till she had asked the gentleman in front of her if there was any danger of their being run into by another train.

"O, no; but we shall be delayed on the road a few hours, and not reach Boston till late in the afternoon."

Perhaps he noticed that she looked rather disconsolate at the thought, for after taking the last "Harper" from his overcoat pocket and looking it over a few minutes he offered it to her, politely saying perhaps it would help pass away the time.

Two, three, four hours passed, wearily "dragging their slow length along," and no progress, the red farmhouse still in view. At last they detached the hind car, and the passengers were turned into the next one, which was where Kate sat, and every seat was filled except the one beside her. Then the engine gave a great puff, as if taking a long breath and preparing for a great effort, and the cars started in earnest. Everybody brightened up, the bridegroom whispered in the white bonnet, "Martha Ann, dear, cheer up, we're going!" and there was a universal expression of satisfaction, and exclamations of "This is something like now!" "How delightful!" etc.

But they hadn't run more than half an hour when they came to a deeper drift than the one from which they had just been shovelled, and made a full stop. The snow was growing every moment deeper and deeper, they were in the midst of the woods, and the wind whistled through the bare branches, which swayed and rocked in the storm, making the scene more dreary, and seeming to Kate to clap their hands in exultation at their dark, gloomy situation. It was not light enough to read any longer, so she returned the "Harper." She first, however, had the curiosity to notice the name written on the cover, Joshua Carter, and thought what a homely name. Then she leaned back in her seat, and dwelt on the gloomy prospect before her, feeling faint and tired as well as lonely and forlorn. She heard those round her say there was now no prospect of even reaching D—, where they could get something to eat, till midnight. Some one else said that there was no wood, and the fire was almost out, and he didn't know but what they should freeze, and a little child began to cry bitterly for a drink of water. Poor Kate began to feel worse and worse. She dreaded the idea of being all night in the car alone, though surrounded on all sides by men, some of them with coarse, disagreeable faces, and breaths smelling strongly of liquor. There were but two other women in the car, and they both had some one to care for them. How she wished her father had come with her, or that she had somebody to speak to. The gentleman who had occupied the seat in front of her and had lent her the magazine, had left his seat and was walking thoughtfully up and down the car. Presently, to her surprise, he came and took the seat beside her, and said, abruptly:

"Are you alone?"

"Yes."

"This must be a very unpleasant situation for a young lady travelling alone. We may be here all night, and even if we reach a place where we can get refreshment by midnight, without a protector I am afraid you will fare but poorly among such a crowd of hungry men. If you will allow me, I shall be very happy to see that you are taken care of, and be of service to you in any way I can."

Kate felt that under his protection she could not but be safe, and his face inspired her with entire confidence in his honor and goodness of heart. So she thanked him, told him she did feel very lonely, and should be glad to have some one to protect her, for though it was very foolish, she felt afraid without any one to speak to, even. His face showed that he appreciated her frank trust in him. After awhile he drew her into conversation, and whether it was his quiet, deferential way of listening to what she said, or the singular ease and grace with which he himself talked, Kate soon forgot her timidity in talking with an entire stranger, and one so dignified, almost stern looking, and was chatting away with him almost as if he were an old friend, while her low, merry laugh really cheered those near her.

With so delightful a companion the time passed quickly. The little lamps were lighted, but their flicker only lighted those near them, while all the rest were in deep shadow. The fire having all gone out, the car was so cold that though Kate drew her cloak round her she could not help shivering. Her protector had relapsed into silence and was looking dreamily out of the window, but happening to look at Kate he saw that she was very cold. Quickly taking off the large, gray travelling-shawl he wore, he was going to wrap it round her. Kate remonstrated.

"You need it yourself, sir. I am not so very cold."

He smiled, and saying "I am sorry I didn't think of it before," put it over her shoulders with a quiet firmness that was not to be resisted, so she luxuriated in its warmth all the rest of the way.

Everybody in the car became very sleepy and quiet, and seemed resolved that they would make themselves as comfortable as possible under the circumstances. Kate was very tired, and laughingly telling her companion that the force of example was too much for her, and that he should see what a wonderful talent she had for sleeping, she had prepared for a nap. The pillow that he made for her out of the shawl, keeping it from falling back by supporting it with his hand, was so comfortable that she soon fell asleep. The light from the lamp above fell full on her face as she lay there, resting as quietly as if in her own little room at home, and she looked so pretty that I cannot resist the opportunity for telling you of it. Her bonnet had half slipped off, and the gentleman beside her, having placed his arm round the top of the seat to keep the shawl under her head, in moving her head in her sleep she had thrown it back till now it was unconsciously resting on his arm, her warm cheek almost touching his hand. Our faces are truer tell-tales of our characters in sleeping than when we are awake, and Kate's now was so unconsciously sweet and childlike, and the abandon of her posture so winning, that I hope the stranger may be pardoned for not taking his arm away, and for the admiration with which he sat looking at her.

She had slept two hours or so, when a sudden motion of the car awakened her. On opening her eyes and discovering her position, she blushed and immediately sat up very straight, to make up for it. But the gentleman was talking with some one opposite, and seemed so unconscious both of her misdemeanor and her expiation of it, that she flattered herself he hadn't noticed at all that she was resting on him. In a few minutes he turned his head.

"What are you awake? I'm happy to inform you then, that we have started again, and have now the delightful prospect in view of supper in the course of an hour or so."

It was about twelve when they reached the village of D— and stopped for refreshment. The hungry passengers immediately set off for the public house, fortunately but a little way off. A thundering knock at the door roused the landlord, who was at first quite frightened by the sight of so many people at that time of night. He let them in, however, and promised to do the best he could for them. When supper, such as it was, was fairly announced, there was such a rush and scrambling for places that Kate fully realized what it was to have some one to take care of her. Her protector also won her gratitude and admiration, not only by providing for her, but for a poor Irish woman, who, coming in late, would have been obliged to go without any supper at all if he had not given up his place to her, saying that he could wait as well as not; but the obsequious waiter found a place for him though he could not for her. Never, it seemed to Kate, had bread and cold him tasted half so nice, because, perhaps, she had never been half so hungry; and as they all left the table it was delightful to see how refreshed and good natured, not to say benignant, everybody looked.

As there was a prospect, now that they had got through the worst drifts, and it had stopped snowing, of reaching Boston by morning, the passengers took the cars again, and were soon on their way. The storm was over, the morning was bright and clear, and the sunrise casting its rosy glow on the pure snow, Kate watched it with her eyes kindling with enthusiasm, while her companion filled up the measure of her delight by replying to her in his clear, low voice, Everett's exquisite description of a sunrise, seen as they saw it, from a car window. They were approaching Boston, and at last descried Bunker Hill Monument.

"Do you live in Boston?" asked the gentleman of Kate.

She told him in her frank way that she did not, but was going to visit some friends of hers, the Hamiltons, of B— Street. An expression of surprise on his face made her ask if he knew them.

"Why, yes,—they are friends of mine."

"How delightful!" And she immediately began to speak in the warmest terms of Mrs. Hamilton and Bella, whom she had seen two years before. After a pause she said: "Robert Hamilton I don't know at all, but I don't think he can be like his sister. Shall I like him, I wonder?"

Her face said plainly, "I don't expect to."

"I can't tell," said he, gravely, "but I hope so."

"Why?"

"Because I am sure he will like you."

Kate colored a little.

"On the contrary, I don't expect he will deign to notice me at all; and I imagine him to be such a piece of perfection and propriety that for my part, I'll own I've taken a great prejudice to him. I can't bear that sort of people. I haven't seen him since he was a boy, and I suppose he has altered in his looks since then. Is he handsome?"

There was a very comical expression about the stranger's mouth as he answered:

"I thought that was always the first question young ladies asked about a gentleman. My opinion and yours, probably, would not agree, so I shall leave you to judge for yourself."

She was just going to say she had heard he was, when they approached the depot, and her attention was diverted, so she forgot it. He took out his watch; looking at it, he said that the train would leave in half an hour for New York, and owing to their being delayed so long he should be obliged to take it, instead of stopping a few hours in Boston as he had intended to do. He should be happy though to get her a carriage and see to her baggage for her, unless she expected her friends to meet her at the depot. Kate thought since she did not come yesterday they would not expect her till to-day at noon, and so should be very glad if he would do so. Her benefactor, as she mentally called him, not thinking the name Joshua Carter a very romantic one, arranged everything for her, and then when she was seated in a carriage, came to the door to bid her good-by, while the driver was fastening on her baggage behind. He had been so kind, rendering her every attention so delicately and politely, and making the time that would otherwise have been so tedious, not only tolerable but delightful by his conversation—of course I would not dare to intimate that his fair face and full, rich voice had any attraction for her—that she felt sincerely sorry to say good-by, and to think they might never meet again. She told him so, thanked him warmly for his kindness, and hoped that if he should ever come to P—, where her home was, she should see him. He bowed, assured her that she owed him no thanks, but that they were due from him alone, and he should never forget the pleasure he enjoyed by being "snowed up in the cars," and then with a warm pressure of the little gloved hand she extended to him, they parted, and the carriage drove away.

Mrs. Hamilton was one of those warm-hearted, motherly women that put you at your ease at once. Bella was a sprightly, entertaining girl, very pretty, with graceful, "taking" manners, and withal a good deal more heart than appeared on the surface. She was a year or two older than Kate, and having seen a good deal of society was more young-lady-ish; but they were soon on the most confidential terms with each other, after the manner of girls the world over. After the first surprise of the meeting was over, and Kate had delivered the thousand and one messages from home, with which she had been charged, she told them about her kind protector, prudently reserving, however, all her enthusiasm on the subject till she and Bella should be alone. I had forgotten to say that she found that the formidable Robert was from home and not expected for a week or more, and that secretly she was much rejoiced at the intelligence.

Mrs. Hamilton made the girls retire early, being sure that Kate must be very tired. Kate had a delightful room given her, with a nice little dressing-room opening into Bella's room, from which arrangement they promised themselves much pleasure. Bella was sitting in Kate's room by the fire, watching that young lady while she let down her hair.

"What beautiful hair you have, Kate—so glossy and wavy. I couldn't help noticing how smooth it looked this morning when you took your bonnet off, and you had been riding so long in the cars too. By the way, didn't your kind protector tell you his name, or give you his card, or something?"

"No, and I don't wonder, it's so homely! But I saw it on the 'Harper' he lent me—Joshua Carter. Did I tell you that he knew your family?"

"Joshua Carter! What that is funny! Why, he is a particular friend of Robert's! Short, isn't he? and rather stout?"

"O, no; tall, fine looking!"

"I always thought him short. Blue eyes, and light hair!"

"No, indeed! He has dark eyes, that look right into you somehow, and his hair is dark, and he has one of those flexible, finely cut mouths, that are so rare you know, and so expressive. You ought to see him smile, Bella."

"I never minded Mr. Carter's mouth, I'm sure. But you needn't contradict your elders, Miss Duncan, for he certainly has light eyes, and he isn't a bit handsome. I've seen him twenty times at least."

"Then you haven't a particle of taste. He's what I call splendid. And then he talks so! He makes you forget yourself entirely; and such a deep voice he has! If there is anything I admire in a man it is a deep voice. But what I liked him best for, is that he is a thorough bred gentleman. You should have seen how kind he was to a poor Irish woman where we stopped at D—, and he has such a quiet way of doing everything."

Bella leaned back in her chair and laughed outright.

"The fact is, Kate, Mr. Joshua Carter has bewitched you, it's perfectly plain. You're in love with him, and 'bore is blind' you know. He is only a rather common-place looking person, gentlemanly enough, and Robert says there is a great deal in him, but I have never found it out."

Kate had a mind to be provoked, but it wouldn't do, for Bella's merriment was too catching, so at last she joined in. She persisted, however, that it must be another Mr. Carter; for he was so far from common place that if she ever wrote a novel she should certainly have him for the hero.

"Be the heroine yourself then, and marry him in the last volume. Do put me in as a heartless flirt, and let me have the pleasure of refusing him first though. I don't doubt it would do him good to be jilted. Good-night." And Bella went to her room.

The first week flew by wonderfully quick, as it always does when we enjoy ourselves, and Kate did so thoroughly. One day, as she sat in her room writing home, she heard an unusual noise down stairs, and in a few minutes Bella came running into her room with the news that Robert had come, and she must put up her writing and come right down stairs. As they entered the parlor together, Robert Hamilton was standing by the fire, with his back to them, but as Bella said, "Robert, Miss Duncan," he turned, and Kate uttered an exclamation of surprise. It was her friend of the cars! He, however, for his part, seemed not surprised at all, and bowed with a quiet smile of recognition.

"It gives me great pleasure to see you again, Miss Duncan."

Bella stared in astonishment, first at one and then at the other. But as she heard Kate's "Why, it's Mr. Carter!" the truth flashed upon her, and she cried:

"I see now! So, Robert, you were Kate's protector in the cars! If that isn't delightful—capital—grand! And she never knew it,—told me his name was Joshua Carter—saw it on his 'Harper'! Didn't you know who she was?"

Mr. Hamilton glanced with an amused expression at Kate, she was dumb with amazement.

"Not till just a little while before we parted, and then from what she had just said, I was afraid she would not be pleased to know that I was her companion."

"Well, I never heard anything so charming!" said Bella, who had not minded the last part of his reply, which indeed had been meant for Kate. "I thought your friend Joshua Carter must have changed wonderfully from the glowing description she gave me. So fascinating, handsome, and such dark eyes! O, it's too funny!"

"I am willing to confess, Miss Duncan," said Robert, "that I cannot justify myself in not at once introducing myself to you, but I didn't want to revive your 'prejudices' then, against me."

"O, Robert, you ought to have heard her, what she said. I told her she had certainly fallen in love with Mr. Carter, she got so enthusiastic, and she—"

There is no knowing where she would have stopped, for her eyes were sparkling with amusement and mischief at Kate, whose face was crimson with vexation, if her brother, with a delicacy and tact which Kate appreciated, had not interrupted her by saying that he had a letter up stairs for her in his valise and would get it, and at once left the room, to the great relief of at least one.

Kate was in a highly uncomfortable state of mind; very indignant that Bella should have told what she had said, and very much vexed with herself, as she remembered how freely she had expressed her opinion of Robert Hamilton to herself. "At least," she said to herself, "it was very gentlemanly in him not to tell me who he was before I had made such a fool of myself. And if he flatters himself that I have fallen in love with him after what Bella told him, I will just show him his mistake."

So summoning up her pride, she assumed towards him a degree of reserve and indifference, that was unlike the frank, impulsive, girlish Kate she was, as possible. At dinner, Bella took a malicious pleasure in teasing her, and asked her brother how that delightful Mr. Carter's name—with a mischievous glance at Kate, who preserved a very dignified air—came on the "Harper."

"It was his book; he gave it to me to read in the cars, because there was a particular piece in it which he wanted me to see."

"It is rather amusing that Kate should have made the mistake," said Mrs. Hamilton, "but it was perfectly natural too, and Bella you shan't laugh at her any more."

So Bella forbore in future any allusion to it, to the relief of all concerned. Kate's reserve and hauteur, being so foreign to her disposition, gradually melted away; but Robert Hamilton, to whom they were more natural, thinking she still had the same opinion of him that she had expressed in the cars, and not wishing to presume on any services he had rendered her, or the slight acquaintance he had with her then, treated her with uniform politeness but with distance.

In the meantime, her merry, winning ways, and the charming freshness of her character, made her a great favorite not only at the Hamiltons, but with all those she met in society. There were many gentlemen whom Kate saw very frequently. Hardly an evening when they were at home but they had callers, and just because, without making the least effort to please them, Kate felt, and could not help seeing that most of them admired her, and courted her society, she didn't care for them in the least. Robert Hamilton never complimented her, but treated her always with the most perfect politeness, seeming to be indifferent whether she liked him or not, and never obtruding his attentions on her, so she in her feminine perversity, was at first piqued, than attracted by it. So what with changing her mind on the subject half a dozen times a day, it came at length that Robert Hamilton was continually in her thoughts, which is plainly a very dangerous state for a young lady to be in. One thing, however, discovered an unexpected bond between them. There was a poor protégé of Mrs. Hamilton's dying of consumption, whom she used to often go and see. She was so patient, and even joyful in her pain, and had such simple, earnest faith in her Saviour, that Kate, who too was a Christian, delighted to be with her. One evening Bella expressed her astonishment that Kate should like to go there so much; such a little stived-up room; and she didn't think the sick girl very interesting. Kate answered, in a low voice:

"O, Bella; I love her because she loves Christ! It makes me better to be with her."

Bella made no reply, but Robert looked up from his book, and as Kate met his earnest, kindling gaze at her, it told her that there was one tie of sympathy between them, the noblest and highest.

When two months had passed, there came the dreaded summons home from her father, saying they could spare her no longer, and should expect her the next week on Thursday. There was great lamentation when the Hamiltons knew that she must go. Kate was sad to leave them all, sadder on many accounts than she chose to show. There had been planned a grand moonlight sleighing-party for the next week, Wednesday, and Bella declared that Kate must go, even if she were to desert them all in such a heathenish manner the next day. They were to go in single sleighs about thirty miles out of the city to a friend's house. Bella had been invited by Mr. Hale, a gentleman friend of hers (Kate had her suspicions about this "friend," by the way), and Kate, to her indignation, had been invited as soon as the party was proposed, by a Mr. Brooks, a cousin of Bella's, whom she utterly despised for his foppish, dandified ways, and his self-assurance, at the very moment when she saw Robert approaching her for the very same purpose. She had no excuse to give, and was obliged to accept the invitation or else stay at home; but she consented with a bad grace.

Wednesday evening had come. Kate dressed herself in a most becoming blue silk, and tried to look pleased, but was in reality most disconsolate, both at the prospect of a tete-a-tete ride with Mr. Brooks and because she found that Robert was not going; but coming down into the parlor she found Bella in her merriest mood. It was a cold night, and Mrs. Hamilton insisted on their putting on such a number of cloaks and shawls that they could hardly move, and stood laughing at their own rotundity. In the midst of the mirth Robert came in, and said to Kate:

"Miss Duncan, I have just received a note from Mr. Brooks, saying that he has had a telegraphic despatch from S— that his father is very sick, and he must start for home at once. He wished me to apologize to you for not coming, and regrets it exceedingly. Now will you go with me? My sleigh will be at the door in five minutes." Kate's face brightened.

"O, I'm so glad!—not that his father is sick of course, but because he can't go. I don't like him, and I had much rather go with you," she said, with sudden frankness, and then half blushed at herself for saying it.

"I thought you were not going, Robert?" said Bella, "didn't care about it."

"I have changed my mind," said he, quietly.

The sleighing was perfect—the night glorious. Kate was in the highest spirits, and fairly bewitched with excitement and pleasure. The wind blew her hair in curls from out of her little blue hood, her eyes sparkled and danced in the moonlight like two stars, and her cheeks were glowing with the red, rich color. Her companion entered as fully as she into the spirit of the ride, and Kate's laugh rang out merry and clear, in unison with his deep, manly one. His reserve, his coldness, disappeared. And as he talked with all the earnest and unconscious grace of manner that had so charmed her at first, or his whole face grew bright with a smile as he listened to her gay, quick sallies, she was entirely swayed by the power and fascination he had over her.

"We shall be there in half an hour. Our horses fly as though they were winged."

"O!" she exclaimed, "I'm so sorry. It seems as if I could ride forever!"

"Kate, would you ride forever with me?"

The sudden depth and passion in his tone made her turn her head quickly away, and sobered while it thrilled her. Her cheek was burning now, and she was quivering, but not with cold.

"Kate, answer me. I mean that I love you—with my whole soul I love you, and would have you for my wife!"

There was a moment's silence, then Kate turned her face to him, and meeting his eyes with a loving trust shining in hers, said:

"Yes, I do love you, and I will be your wife."

Kate went home next day, and was not "snowed up" or delayed on the way at all, yet for all that, the same gentleman sat by her side and took care of her that had done so before, and more than that, seemed as anxious to reach P—, and see her father and mother as she did. In about a year from this time, a delightful event took place, which made them one for life.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, JERSEY CITY, N. J.

JERSEY CITY, STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

M. M. BALLOU, Esq.,—Dear Sir,—The subject of my present series of sketches, drawn expressly for your Pictorial, is a place of rapidly increasing importance as connected with the interests of the Empire City, it being the point of convergence for the great lines of travel to the west and south, and the entrepot of the English line of steam communication with the eastern continent. The stranger, visiting Jersey City for the first time, is forcibly struck with the transition appearance of the place, and this fact is not less forcibly impressed upon the mind of one who sees it after the lapse of but a few years. The advent of the Erie Railroad; the location of the depot of the Cunard steamers, together with the rapidly increasing amount of travel over the great, and, I might say, the only line of southern transit, have urged on the march of improvement in such an unprecedented manner, that the transient visitor scarcely recognizes the place as he passes through its streets. Under these circumstances, it will not appear surprising that I have found it difficult to select material for illustration. There are as yet no striking public edifices to arrest the eye and ornament the city, although she promises much for the future; and the scenes of to-day are so rapidly giving way to the improvements of the morrow, that my sketches will only serve to show your readers of a year hence, not what Jersey City is, but what it was. They will serve a valuable purpose, however, as a reminiscence of the past, with a glimpse at her future, which is represented by the magnificent depot and ferry houses, now in the course of erection, and which are illustrated upon the opposite page. I well remember when an old wind-mill standing upon a narrow point of land which jotted out into the Hudson River from a background of low, wet, marshy ground, with a collection of a dozen or less squalid, ruinous frame buildings, represented all of Jersey City, and I have often regretted since that I did not preserve a sketch of the scene, as a memento with which to compare its more modern appearance. The regret is vain, however, yet it will serve to show that the present sketches may, like good wine, improve by age. A glance at the history of the place, will convey a more vivid idea of its growth than any words of mine, and I hasten to give the best I have been able to obtain.—There is no doubt that the river once flowed completely around the three islands which now constitute the more elevated points of Jersey City and Hoboken. However that may be, at the time of the early settlement of the Dutch, two of these were connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus, and this peninsula, then called Paulus Hook (the Arseck Houck of the natives), was granted by letters patent to Abraham Isaacson Plank, by Sir William Kieft, director-general of the Dutch West India Company, and his council of the Province of New Jersey, in 1638. In 1698, it was conveyed by Plank's heirs-at-law, to Ido Cornelisse Van Vorst, in whose family it remained until 1804, when Cornelius Van Vorst, one of his descendants, conveyed it to Anthony Dey. The amount of land sold by Mr. Van Vorst was the whole of the city east of a line drawn from Morgan Street, about the centre of the block between Washington and Warren Streets, to a point striking the Morris Canal at Van Vorst Street. The boundary was a ditch, but as this was rather indefinite and frequently involved disputes and misunderstanding, a surveyed line was established. The compensation was an annuity of $6000, the purchaser having exclusive control of the land, ferry privileges, etc. After a few years, however, the legal heir of Van Vorst sold his whole right and title to the property for the sum of $40,000, retaining the old homestead, and a large amount of real estate which was then in Harsimus, but which is now embraced within the city limits. The old manor-house, one of the oldest buildings in the State, is still standing, and is an interesting relic of past times. It stands upon the site of the residence of the first patroon.—In the year 1804, the property changed hands several times, and on the 10th of November of that year, "The Associates of the Jersey Company," were incorporated by the legislature of the State, and the whole of Paulus Hook was laid out into blocks and squares, and sub-divided into building lots. A map was made of the new city, and on all old deeds, the lines are located by "Mauguis Map." In 1838, an amended charter was obtained from the legislature, which incorporated all that part of the township of Bergen formerly called Paulus Hook, and all the inhabitants within its limits were declared a body corporate by the name of "The Mayor and Common Council of Jersey City." In 1839, a supplement was passed, extending the area of the city to embrace what was then called Harsimus, and in 1840, Hudson county was created, which embraces Jersey City. The new court-house was erected in the town (now city) of Hudson, about a mile from the ferry, and here are also situated the offices of county clerk, surrogate, etc., etc. In 1802, Major Hunt and family, John Murphy and wife, and Joseph Bryant, numbering thirteen persons all told, constituted the whole of the inhabitants of Paulus Hook. They occupied one house with its out-buildings, which was kept as a tavern for the accommodation of travellers crossing the ferry. In 1825, the number of taxable inhabitants was 118, of whom only 36 were freeholders. In 1829, there were 1025 inhabitants; in 1840, 4090, and in 1850, 11,437, while the census of 1855 shows that they had increased in five years nearly twofold, or numbering 21,000 souls. This rapid increase is unprecedented, except perhaps by the city of Brooklyn, and is owing entirely to the juxtaposition of the Empire City and the facility of access thereto. In fact the increase of the census of Jersey City has been in exact ratio with the increase and development of the ferry privileges. When Major Hunt kept the tavern in 1802, the means of crossing were confined to skiffs manned by rowers, with a pair of sculls each; the next advance was the employment of pirogues, or periaugas (a small craft, with two masts and a lee-board). These were followed by double steam ferry boats, built under the immediate superintendence of Fulton himself, and were called respectively the "York" and the "Jersey." These in time gave way to the "George Washington" and "Richard Varick," and they in turn to others, until at the present day we have a handsome fleet of first class boats, unexcelled for ferry purposes, comprising the "New Jersey," the "Hudson," the "Philadelphia," "Colden," "Arresseck" and "Daniel S. Gregory." The latter is probably the finest boat of her kind in the world. She is 183 feet long, 32 feet beam, and 12 1-2 feet depth of hold. Her cylinders are 40 inches diameter, with a stroke of 11 feet. The average time in crossing is four and a half minutes; the distance, a little over one mile.—This ease of access to, and intimate connection with the city of New York has had the natural tendency to draw to Jersey City a host of manufacturers, who avail themselves of the limited taxation and other facilities of the place, to make here what finds a market in the Empire City. More than one-third of the inhabitants do business across the water, and morning and evening, a continuous stream of passengers throng the boats and pour through her streets, and this living stream so rapidly augments that increased accommodations have been found necessary from time to time, until the ferry and railroad companies have united in the erection of the immense depot and ferry house represented on the next page. The incipient step to this undertaking was the taking a space equal to about ten acres from the river, which was done by docking and filling in with the mud and dirt dredged from the river. This alone cost $140,000; the cost of the buildings is estimated at $60,000 more; making a sum total of $200,000. The main building or depot, will be of brick, except about 180 feet, which is built over the water, and is of wood. The entire length of the building will be 500 feet, by 103 feet wide; the height of the roof is 43 feet, exclusive of a cupola which runs the entire length and serves to admit light and ventilate the interior. The roof is formed of one entire arch, without any central support, and is made of corrugated galvanized iron, which forms a finish both outside and inside without painting. The front of the depot on Hudson Street (shown in the engraving) will be 125 feet in width, two stories high, with handsome towers at the corners. The second story will be devoted to the offices of the assistant superintendent, freight agent, conductor, and other officers and agents of the company. The cars will run into the building on five different tracks, and the boat will come a sufficient distance under the water front to shelter the passengers in passing from one to the other. On each side of the depot are two slips, with handsome and commodious ferry houses for the accommodation of ferry passengers, and they are so connected with the depot, that in case the "car boat" should not be in the slip, railroad passengers can take either boat without exposure to the weather. Altogether, the arrangement and plan of the building reflects great credit upon the architect, Mr. Joh. Male, to whom, together with Mr. James W. Woodruff, the gentlemanly assistant superintendent of the N. J. Railroad, I am under many obligations for information, etc.—The view of Jersey City given on the preceding page, was taken from on board of one of the ferry boats, and gives a very fair impression of the appearance of the place on approaching it from the New York side. One of the most prominent objects is the new depot and ferry houses above ows."—Passing up this street and turning to the right at the first corner, you have before you the busy scene represented in another of the small cuts; a scene which many hundreds of your readers will recognize as the rear of the N. J. Railroad Depot, and the terminus of the Erie Railroad. The constant arrival and departure of trains; the coming and going of innumerable express wagons; the transfer of freight and passengers, and the hurrying to and fro of the numerous employees of the companies, make this point an attractive object to the most cursory observer, while the shrill whistle of the locomotive, and its hoarse cough as it starts upon its journey, or "backs and fills" in the making up of trains, mingled with the lowing of cattle and various noises emanating from the stock cars; the ringing of bells; the rattling of wheels; the shouts of the newsboys and noise of the busy hummers from the adjacent workshops, form a chaos of sounds which fill the ear with convincing proof of the activity of the scene. The New Jersey, the Erie, the Morris and Essex, and N. J. Central Railroads, all have their termini here, and nearly one hundred trains arrive and leave within twenty-four hours.—While the want of space prevents my speaking of the Morris Canal, with its constantly moving freights of coal from the mines of Pennsylvania; the manufactories of all kinds which contribute to the wealth, and add to the importance of the city; the introduction of gas to light her streets, and other kindred improvements, I cannot pass her last and most important undertaking without a brief notice. I refer to the introduction of water and sewerage.—In March, 1857, the legislature passed an act "for the appointment of commissioners in relation to supplying Hoboken, Van Vorst and the city of Jersey with pure and wholesome water." The first commissioners were Edwin A. Stephens, Edward Coles, Dudley S. Gregory, Abraham Van Boskerck and John D. Ward, and they were empowered to appoint engineers, cause surveys to be made, etc. On the 22d of July of that year they secured the services of Wm. S. Whitwell, who was one of the chief engineers on the Boston water-works, and he immediately commenced the work of examination, drawing plans, making estimates, etc., of various sources which had been spoken of. After the proper investigation, it was decided to bring the water from the Passaic, at Belleville, a distance of eight miles, and operations were at once commenced. The water is raised from the river into a reservoir, by means of a steam pump of a large part of its garrison made prisoners of war. It was at this point that Sergeant Champe, in his pretended desertion from the American army for the purpose of capturing Arnold and thus saving the life of André, embarked on board of a barge and escaped to New York, though hotly pursued by a party of dragoons. Other than these, Jersey City has no important historical reminiscences to repay the time spent in their search.

MONTGOMERY STREET, JERSEY CITY, LOOKING WEST.

VIEW OF JERSEY CITY, N. J., FROM THE RIVER.

NEW DEPOT OF NEW JERSEY RAILROAD AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY, JERSEY CITY.

I am very respectfully your artist,

NEUTRAL TINT.

THE SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITION TO FLORIDA.

During the latter part of February, an exploring expedition was sent from Williams College to Florida, under the charge of Professor Chadbourne. The Pittsfield Eagle gives a brief account of the operations of the expedition. On arriving at St. Mary's, the party separated, part taking the schooner for Key West and Cuba, and the other remaining at Fernandina to explore Northern Florida. Prof. C. was with the latter division. The Eagle says: "He reports it successful in collecting numerous and valuable specimens of birds, shells, serpents, crustacea, etc., only limited in quantity by time for packing and ability for transporting; also a store of knowledge that can no where else be obtained, and the acquaintance of several southern gentlemen, enthusiastic in pursuit of this science, which, of itself, will be no small benefit to the society. Sub expeditions were made in North Florida. A couple of adventurous fellows took a week's tramp to Okelinknee Swamp, and procured a 'gopher.' They visited a planter, who with his thousand slaves, was a devoted naturalist. On his plantation was a house containing five hundred birds—such as could be placed in proximity—and forty negroes were employed in tending them. Here also were some rattlesnakes of large size. A skeleton of one was 7 1-2 feet long, thus obtained: the hunter saw a smooth, round hole, near a log, and stopping to look in, the snake, already coiled, made a spring at his face, which he avoided by a quick movement. He killed and 'dissected and anatomized it.' He experimented on another to see how long it would live without food and drink; it died at the end of nineteen months and eight days."

COURT HOUSE AND JAIL OF HUDSON COUNTY, N. J.

described, as they now appear, in process of erection. It will be seen that there are five slips, two on each side of the railroad slip, in the main building. The Cunard docks are seen to the right, together with two ocean steamers, while on the extreme right, the spire of the Presbyterian Church is a prominent landmark. This church, of which I have given a front view in one of my smaller sketches, is an object of considerable interest, it having originally stood in Wall Street, in the city of New York. When at the call of mammon the edifice was taken down to make room for more profitable buildings, the stones, timbers, etc., were marked and numbered, taken across the river, and erected on the present site, where it now stands, the perfect embodiment of its former self. Upon a tablet over the main door, is the following inscription:—"Presbyterian Church, erected Anno Domini MDCCCLXIV." In another of the small illustrations I have given a view of Montgomery Street from the ferry. This is the principal thoroughfare. Commencing at this point, and running westward the entire length of the city, it continues on over the marshy grounds to Bergen hill, crossing which, (passing through the city of Hudson), it at length merges into the turnpike road to Newark, over the "Jersey mead-great power, and after traversing the meadows in iron pipes, is received into a large reservoir on Bergen heights, from whence it is distributed through a multiplicity of mains to the several cities. A careful calculation has been made, and it is estimated that the reservoir is capable of supplying two millions of gallons every twenty-four hours. The introduction of water into manufactories, stores and dwellings, together with an efficient system of sewerage; the advantages of gas and many other valuable features of domestic economy, render Jersey City a desirable place of residence, while the facilities for manufacturing and ease of transit, make it attractive to the mere business man, and the course of the city must for many years to come, be onward and upward.—Paulus Hook was fortified with a small stockaded block-house during the Revolution, which was attacked by Major Lee, with a small force, and

VIEW IN REAR OF RAILROAD DEPOT, JERSEY CITY.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

BY PEREGRINE.

At the Spencer House, where the traveller calls;
Where the haut ton local stays;
Where the summer tourist lingers months,
And the man of business, days;
Where the planters with wives and daughters come
To sell, and fill, their "crops;"
Where the vivantes indulge in wine or malt,
And the maidens in milder "hops;"

Where the Southern belles and beauties throng;
Where the pleasure-seeker revels:
Where the gourmand feasts, and the connoisseurs find
A cure for the bluest devils;
Where the tables would well compare—if tried
By a gastronomic jury—
With these that Parker and Taylor set,
Or Baroum, in Old Missouri;

There came a Hoosier, all the way
From the State of Indiana,
With a newly-wedded, flax-haired bride,
Whom he always addressed as Hannah.
He had said to his dad, on leaving home:
"If it costs me every cent, sir,
I'll live like a lord at the best hotel."
So he went, of course, to the Spencer.

And as they sat, and ate, and gazed
At the richly-furnished tables
With their massive plate, it almost seemed Like a dream of the Eastern fables.
And they gourmandized as if possessed
Of the action, common but funny,
That the boarders must nearly kill themselves,
To get the worth of their money.

Now the cook was a Frenchman, deeply skilled
In dressing fowl, flesh, or fishes,
Who would get on the bill his foreign names
For very domestic dishes.
At last said the bride, in tones of love
More warm than approved by Plato,
"Let's try some of this"—and she read the name
In French, of a baked potato.

They ate. "I vow that's nice!" said John;
"But of that that dog-gone waiter
Hadt' called it 'pum de tere,' I'd swear
'Twas only a roasted tater."
"Why, yes," said his rib, who ate as if
A dozen couldn't suffice her,
"Tis a little like tater, to be sure,
But then, 'tis a great deal nicer!"

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GUILLOTINE IN FRANCE.

BY JAMES A. GIRARDIN.

SELDOM do we speak of the guillotine, without attributing this invention of punishment to Joseph Ignace Guillotin, doctor of medicine, born at Saintes, one of the departments, in the year 1738. It is an error; it is curious enough to know the circumstances which brought into France the adoption of this terrible machine.

The National Assembly was occupying itself to reform our penal system; it had just proclaimed upon this occasion as a principal basis of its labor, the equality of punishment for all classes of citizens, the abolishment of tortures and useless punishments. On the 10th of August, 1789, Dr. Guillotin, moved by the most laudable sentiment of philanthropy, proposed to substitute to the different modes of punishment then in vogue for the condemned to death, the decapitation reserved for the nobles—they used to burn, hang and quarter the villains. This proposition was, that hereafter, all persons condemned to death should be beheaded, and that the decapitation should take place by the effect of a simple mécanisme.

The debate which took place upon the subject commenced on the 1st of December following, which was signalized by an unhappy movement oratoire of the doctor himself. Answering to a few objections, he said, with a triumphant air, after having exposed the inconsistencies attached to the ordinary mode of punishment (hanging):

"Well, with my machine I can make your heads jump in the twinkling of an eye, without your having the time to perceive it."

A loud laugh from the whole assembly put a stop to the debate. Among those laughing was more than one head destined some day to make the trial of this same instrument, just then unknown, which produced this explosion of mirth.

It does not appear that Dr. Guillotin, who was speaking with so much assurance of "his machine," had even prepared a model—but it is almost certain that he was a stranger to the construction of this instrument, which was adopted three years afterwards. But his surgical burlesque of enthusiasm had given to Peltier, chief editor of the journal called the "Actes des Apôtres," the occasion for a few epigrammatic verses, inserted in his journal, upon the "imitable machine of Dr. Guillotin, proper to cut heads off, and called after his name, Guillotine." It was thus that this terrible instrument received by anticipation and derision, the name of the doctor who had but given an idea.

The new penal code, adopted the 21st day of September, 1791, established the principle of beheading, but does not explain the mode of execution.

A man by the name of Peltier having been condemned to death on the 24th day of January, 1792, it was necessary to determine how the execution should take place. The minister of justice, Duparte-Duterte, and the department of Paris, were each asking instructions from the Legislative Assembly, and communicating a note with the observations of the public executioner, upon the inconveniences of decapitation by the sword, and upon the accidents which might take place. There is no mention in this note, of the machine which had made so much noise three years before. But as the new law not having indicated the sword or the axe, or the block, it was natural to suppose that they had in view the adoption of some mode of execution analogous to the one proposed by Dr. Guillotin. The Legislative Assembly sent the examination of the question to a committee, which itself thought to consult M. Louis, secretary of the Academy of Surgery. On the 20th of March, the committee presented a report, and the same day the Assembly decreed that the mode of execution proposed by M. Louis should be adopted throughout the kingdom.

The consultation of M. Louis is annexed to the decree; it establishes the principle upon which reposed the construction of the guillotine, and traces the plan of the instrument just as it exists to this day. This consultation offers this peculiarity, and that is, it makes no mention of Dr. Guillotin, and no allusion to his pretended machine. At this epoch, the doctor does not even seem to have been consulted; his popularity, altogether accidental, had already vanished—the Constituent Assembly having adjourned the preceding fall, he, not having been re-elected, had returned to his primitive obscurity, and rumor had it that he too had become one of the first victims of his own invention. It is an error. Dr. Guillotin, it is true, was incarcerated during the reign of terror, for having, it was said, repelled with indignation, expressed in language too strong, the proposition which was made to him to direct the construction of a triple guillotine. Released at the end of 9th Thermidor, he continued to live in Paris, esteemed by a small circle of friends, but profoundly afflicted of the fatality which was withering him away and rendering his very existence an object of curiosity. He died on the 22d of May, 1814, aged seventy-six years.

The result of researches that have been made of ancient engravings which have been found, go to show that this instrument is not a modern invention, but that this mode of execution was common on the continent in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and a "Voyage in Italy," published in 1730, by Pere Labat, describes the guillotine perfectly under the name of mannaia, and represents this mode of execution as reserved to persons of a certain rank; but it had fallen into disuse and been forgotten so long, that when it was exhumed by Dr. Guillotin, it was a thing entirely new. But after all, and leaving aside the merits of the invention, which does not belong to them, it was neither Guillotin nor Louis who constructed the instrument which was definitively adopted.

The Legislative Assembly having adopted the proposition of M. Louis, he immediately commenced preparing a model, and with the authorization of the minister of finances, demanded of Sieur Guidon, who had the furniture of bois de justice (timber of justice), an estimate of its construction. Guidon estimated the labor at five hundred francs, and fault being found at the exorbitant price asked, he answered that he could not do otherwise, as his workmen exacted enormous wages because of the prejudice which existed against the object in question. Other contractors submitted lower bids, but with the express condition that their names should not be made public, and that they should not even be obliged to sign any contract whatever;—strange susceptibility, when we think that that canonized guillotine became at a later day the delight of the population of Paris, and that the delight was carried so far as to make this instrument of death an ornament for women and a plaything for children!

Meanwhile, a man by the name of Schmitt, of Strasbourg, having offered to construct the machine for nine hundred and sixty livres, corresponded with M. Louis. It was this Schmitt who became the inventor as well as the constructor of this instrument definitively adopted. In consequence of his bid having been estimated too high—"seeing the real value of the machine does not exceed three hundred and twenty-nine livres, the sack (or bag) included, destined to receive the head,"—it was judged that five hundred livres was a sufficient remuneration, as eighty-three would be required, one for each department; and it was decided at the same time that the preference should be given to Schmitt, "as the inventor." Schmitt refused to furnish the requisite furniture at this price, but was nevertheless recommended to the good will of the authorities, as the inventor of the decapitating machine; "and as the furniture of the departments were on the eve of being given to another contractor, he either took or threatened to take out a 'brevet d'invention'" (patent). We do not know how the debate upon this question terminated, for the 10th of August came and momentarily overthrew the question of right and property; it is probable that the question of right and property and invention of the guillotine were retrenched by force of circumstances against Schmitt.

In the meantime the condemned were accumulating in the different prisons of the kingdom, and the authorities of the departments reclaimed "their machines to decapitate with such an impatience, that many among them would ere long repent." At last, on the 17th of April, 1792, after many delays, a trial of Schmitt's invention took place under the direction of Samson, at Bicetre, on several corpses. The result of this experiment was so satisfactory, that orders were immediately given to execute, on the following Monday, the unfortunate Peltier, who had been, ever since the 24th of January preceding, under sentence of death.

This execution, which was in all probability the first one of the kind, but took place on the 25th of April, it seems, as far as we can judge by the journals of the day, to have excited in the public mind but little interest. In another execution which took place on the 27th of July of the same year, 1792, a swelling of the grooves in the wood, in which were to slide the cleaver, stopped its regular descent; this accident produced a certain sensation, and from this moment the grooves were trimmed with metal.

While the machine had been put in activity, the mauvais plaisants (or idle talkers) wanted to give it the name of "la petite Louison," after the name of M. Louis; but the pleasantry of the journalist Peltier had found more partisans, and the machine took officially, universally and ironically, the name of guillotine, from the name of Dr. Guillotin, who did not deserve such a disgrace.

Such was the creation of this terrible instrument, which caused such frightful abuse during the troubles of the Revolution. It is not advancing a ridiculous paradox in maintaining that the guillotine was one of the principal causes of the insensate fury which presided at its employment; the ferocity brought on the use, and the use brought on the abuse, and a large number of people were sent into the other world, because they had under their hands a procedure so handy to decapitate them.

Such was the invention of this terrible instrument, which, during the French Revolution, decapitated some of the most illustrious heads of France, from Louis XVI., down to the rabble of Paris. Perhaps no instrument was ever invented of the kind, that in so short a time after its introduction, did so much mischief. Robespierre, Danton, St. Just, Couthon, Santerre, Marat, and a host of other revolutionists, perished by the same instrument with which they had despatched their unfortunate king, nobility, and a large number of the clergy. May God spare France from another such revolution!

FLEETING CHARACTER OF THE VOCALIST'S FAME.

Both Braham, the greatest of all English singers, and Madame Vestris, accomplished as an actress, singer and dancer, have gone to their rest. The memory of those who have excelled in such arts as Braham and Vestris shone in, is like a dream. However great and justly won, the reputation of a great singer fades away every hour after his voice has ceased to ring in our ears; and the fame of a great dancer decays from the earth as soon as she can no longer feast our eyes with the fascinations of her movements. The present generation speaks of Jenny Lind as unrivaled in her art, but thus our fathers spoke of Catalini, and thus their fathers spoke of Madame Mara—and Catalini is to us now little more than a dream, while some of our readers will, perhaps, be asking us who Madame Mara was. She was, in the days of people with whom we have conversed, chief of all existing singers; and so indisputable was her supremacy that in her old age, after Catalini had been hailed as the queen of song from France to Italy, from England to Russia, Madame Mara, reflecting more on her past triumphs than on her advanced years, came from her retreat to drive from the field the presumptuous young woman who aspired to wear the wreath which she had determined to resign only with her life. Hers was a melancholy fate. She appeared on the stage. She sang the songs which used to thrill with rapture the hearts of all nations; but her failure was complete. Her voice was but the skeleton of that rich voice by which she had won her reputation, and her friends could only pity the infatuation which had blinded her to the fact that it is of the very nature of old age to impair the musical powers as well as all other powers. She retired forever, passing to the grave in complete obscurity.—Lycæum.

WEEDS GROW Apace.

There may be 130 flowers having seed-vessels on a single plant of groundsel, and in each seed-vessel there are 50 seeds. Thus one groundsel is father to 6500 sons, more than there are of visible stars in the firmament. Many of these settle where they cannot live; many exist only to be eaten by birds. It is not meant that all seeds should produce plants; very many are as much bread to the birds as seeds of corn are bread to us. If, however, by an accident, every son to which a thriving groundsel seed is parent, grew up, thrived, and produced new seed in the same proportion—an impossible assumption—the descendants of a seed of groundsel in the second generation would exceed in number 40,000,000; the telescope itself has not enabled us to see so many stars. Chickweed is less prolific; though, indeed, even that may produce as many as 500 seeds upon each plant. But then look at the red poppy. It can yield 100 flowers from one root; and from each flower can develop no less than 500 seed; 50,000 may, therefore, by chance be the number of its offspring. Black mustard and wild carrot produce families of magnitude about equal one to another. One may, when in perfection, produce 200 flowers with six seeds in each, the other 600 flowers, with two seeds in each. One dandelion root may have 12 flowers, while each dandelion flower yields 170 seeds. The seeds of one sow-thistle may number 25,000. One plant of stinking-chamomile may yield 40,000, one plant of may-weed 45,000 seeds.—Household Words.

COUNT THEM.

Count what? Why count the mercies which have been quietly falling in your path through every period of your history. Down they come, every morning and every evening, as angel messengers from the Father of lights, to tell you of your best friend in heaven. Have you lived these years, wasting mercies, treading them beneath your feet, and consuming them every day, and never yet realized from whence they came? If you have, Heaven pity you! You have murmured under afflictions; but who has heard you rejoice over blessings? Do you ask what are these mercies? Ask the sunbeam, the rain-drop, the star, or the queen of night. What is life but a mercy? What is the propriety of stopping to play with a thorn-bush, when you may just as well pluck sweet flowers and eat pleasant fruit? Happy is he who looks at the bright side of life, of providence, and of revelation. Who avoids thorns, and thistles, and sloughs, until his Christian growth is such that if he cannot improve them, he may pass among them without injury. Count mercies before you complain of afflictions.—Relig. Telegraph.

HAPPINESS OF WORKING-MEN.

The situation or social position of the poor—and by that word we mean the laboring population—is by no means so deficient in the means of happiness and comfort as many are led to believe. "The mechanics," says Lord Byron, "and working classes who can maintain their families, are, in my opinion, the happiest body of men. Poverty is wretchedness; but it is, perhaps, to be preferred to the heartless, unmeaning dissipation of the higher order's." A popular author says:—"I have no propensity to envy any one, least of all the rich and great; but if I were disposed to this weakness, it would be a healthy young man, going forth in a morning to work for his family, and bringing them home his wages at night."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

APOSTROPHE TO THE SUBTERRANEAN RIVER, OTSGARAGEE CAVE, NEW YORK.

BY IRVING MONTAGUE.

Holl on, thou dark, mysterious tide, roll on!
 Thy thunders only reach us from that shore
 From whence thou pealest up thy endless song;
 From whence thou'rt heard—but seen, ah, nevermore.

Thy wavelets gush—we hear their cooling splash;
 Thy urn is emptied into depths profound;
 Thy ripples murmur, and we list the dash
 Of thy mysterious cataract underground.

Holl on, thou tide of endless song, roll on!
 Thou swell'st a psalm in a lofty dome;
 Thou fill'st old Nature's organ with thy song—
 Thou peal'st an anthem through the darkened tomb.

But whence thou com'st and whither goest—in vain
 For us to ask thy subterranean wall;
 Earth's mighty dome reverberates back again,
 And only echo answers when we call.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

BY ELLIEN ALICE MONTAGUE.

TINKLE, tinkle, tinkle, went the bell at the shop-door, and Uncle John hastened up to attend to the customer, leaving the parlor door ajar. We were plain people, and were very glad to have a parlor, even though it was back of a shop; and what a comfort it was to Uncle John to sit in that room during the long winter evenings, with those who loved about him, and only leave them when the tinkle, tinkle announced some one in the shop.

"Well," said Mrs. Uncle John, a quiet, respectable little body as you would meet anywhere, "who could venture out on an errand such a night as this? My, my! how the rain comes down the chimney!"

Patter, pish—crack! went the rain and the embers together, and the pures flew out of the fire into Cousin Millie's lap as she sat before it, with her faithful lover, Holme Brae, beside her.

"It is a wild night, truly," said Uncle John, in the shop, "and a hard one to be abroad in."

"Yes, indeed," was the answer, in a weak, tremulous voice, "hard to be abroad at any time and think that there is no place in the wide world with loving hearts to welcome me."

"Some poor wanderer," said Millie, rising and going up into the shop. By-and-by she returned, bringing down with her an old man, weary and wet, and placed him in her chair before the fire.

"A stranger, aunt," she softly said to Mrs. Uncle John. "They would not receive him at the inn, and we could not turn him away, you know."

The old man stroked the pretty hand that was busy removing his dripping coat.

"God bless you!" said he. "How happy must the father of such a good girl be."

Millie turned to put away the old man's coat, and I whispered to him:

"Please don't speak of her papa to my cousin Millie; she hasn't a father."

Millie came back with an old coat of Uncle John's, and my thoughtful little tongue was silenced. It was Millie who mixed a tumbler of hot punch for the wayfarer, and made him drink it, when he declared he could not eat; and Uncle John, Mrs. Uncle John and Holme Brae, watched her with shining eyes, as she moved around with her light, graceful step, and her sweet face expressive of pitying tenderness. When she sat down, after seeing his wants attended to, there was silence for a while. The presence of the stranger threw a restraint over all; and it must be that he noticed it, for he said, from the arm-chair in the warm corner where Millie had placed him:

"Please don't mind me. I am very grateful to be privileged to sit here among you all, good people, and in the presence of that good girl—God bless her!"

So after a while they resumed the conversation his entrance had interrupted, and I sat in my little chair beside the stranger, and was led by him to talk of those before us. With the ready communicativeness of a child who finds an attentive listener, I told him how the good man sitting opposite us, although every one called him Uncle John, was only uncle to Millie, and no relation at all to me; but he had always pitied my poor deformed body, and when my father and mother died, he brought me here, and said that he and Mrs. Uncle John would be parents to me. "That the young man talking to Millie was Holme Brae, who loved her with that noble love we read about in stories; and he was rich and Millie poor; but his father, who was as proud as he was rich, would not let him marry Millie, and Millie would not marry Holme Brae without his father's consent."

"Alas! dear child!" exclaimed the old man, "must that sweet girl be unhappy? Ah, if I were rich!"

"But Millie might have married him once," I continued. "She would have been a rich woman if her grandmother hadn't died without making her will. For Millie's mother was a lady; and when she married Uncle John's brother, who was ever so far beneath her, her family wouldn't look at her. It was only when she was dying that her proud mother forgot her pride in her sorrow for her child, and she came to her and forgave her. When she died, her mother took the little Millie and gave her father money to go off to America, India, or some other country where persons became rich, and told him if he ever was wealthy he could come back and claim his child. He went away and was never heard of afterwards. Then Millie's grandmother brought her up like a lady; but she was determined, she used to say, that she never should disgrace herself, or them, by a mean connection. So when Millie was eighteen, she went on a visit with her to Mr. Brae's, Holme's father. The young people loved each other, and they would have been married, if one morning the old grandmother had not been found dead in her bed, and the will she was going to sign in Millie's favor, was of no benefit to her now. A cruel, haughty aunt of Millie's got the property; and when Mr. Brae learned that Millie was portionless, he broke off the intended marriage between her and his son. It was then, in her heavy trouble, Uncle John sought his niece and gave her a peaceful shelter under his roof. But Holme Brae was true to her, and he would marry her in defiance of his father's commands, but Millie would not hear to it; and this was the last time she would see him for three years, for he was going abroad to travel."

"Hush, my dear," said the old man, "let me hear what she says."

"Urgo me no more, Holme," said Millie. "I believe no marriage happy that a parent's sanction does not bless. My dear mother, though she was rich in her husband's love."

"Ay! she was rich in her husband's love!" exclaimed the old man, rising and sinking back into his chair again. "She was rich in her husband's love, Millie, and he in hers. Millie, my dear, dear child!"

He arose—he extended his arms and she was folded in them, clinging to him, murmuring often as she drew back her dear head from his bosom to look him in the face:

"My father—my father!"

"Yes, yes—your father, my own Millie! Your father, after fifteen long years, holds his child to his heart. Come here, John," to his brother, holding out his hand to him. "Do you not recognize me?"

Uncle John wiped his eyes.

"I do, Robert; but you are sadly changed."

He sat down again, his daughter occupying my seat, her head on his knee.

"How often have I dreamed of this!" he said, softly, as if speaking to himself; "dreamed of being at home in my own country, and my Millie beside me. Thank God! I am not dreaming now. I am blessed in a loving child. And is he worthy of you, my dear?" to Millie, and looking at Holme Brae. "But you must be, young man, if she loves you."

The dignity of his manner as he addressed Holme, presented a strange contrast to the almost childish display of poor Uncle John's ecstasy at the restoration of his brother, whose quiet little wife was vainly attempting to soothe him.

"Dear sir!" Holme exclaimed; "my Millie's father, persuade her to be my wife!"

"No, my lad," he gravely said. "The girl is right in refusing you. If you truly love her, you can wait until you are free to marry her. But leave us for to-night, if you please. I have much to say to her. Come to-morrow to bid her farewell."

Holme went away to the inn, attended by Uncle John and Mrs. Uncle John, and I sat in the shop, leaving Millie alone with her father. When Uncle John came back, he said Holme could do nothing but talk of the strange return of Millie's father, and what a lofty way he had with him; in fact, he felt an awe of him. Millie, hearing Uncle John's voice in the shop, called us down again, and said that she had been telling her father of her happy life at her grandmother's, and they had planned something since.

"You know, dear Uncle John," said Millie, smiling, but it was a sad smile, "how gratefully I have always felt my dependence on you; but now, with my father's protection, I can go to London and find employment there, and please God, we will be happy together. I will be with my dear father, and I trust he will be with me."

"Yes—we will be very happy, dearest," said her father.

Uncle John persisted, with tears in his eyes, against this determination; they never should leave him; he had enough for them all. But Uncle John's heart was larger than his means, and Millie knew it; so she said nothing could change their intention.

It was a beautiful sight to see Millie kneeling for her father's blessing, and receiving it before they parted for the night. We were up early on the next morning, but Millie's father had anticipated us. He was seated in the little parlor, reading, when we came down. He was a fine-looking old man, and Millie strikingly resembled him.

Millie's heart was heavy at the prospect of parting with Holme Brae, and when he came to bid her good-by, she could not repress her tears.

"Cruel Millie," said Holme, reproachfully; "what pain you inflict upon me, when it lies in your power to make me happy. Say but the word, Millie, and we never more will be parted."

"My resolution never can be altered, Holme," she answered, mournfully.

"But it may be, Millie," said her father. "If I told you to marry Holme Brae, would my command influence you?"

"No, sir," she said, firmly. "I love Holme too well to marry him under our present circumstances."

"But your objections, dear child?"

"Are too weighty to be removed," she answered.

"However weighty they may be, they would be light if put in the scale with twenty thousand pounds. Millie, my dear child," taking her hand and placing it in that of Holme Brae, "tell your lover if twenty thousand pounds will make you acceptable to his father, they are yours, my girl! For Robert Wilkes was not idle for fifteen years. Tell him so, Millie; tell him your father has come back a wealthy man, and claims his child as he promised to do!"

And while we were all looking at each other in joyful and half-incredulous surprise, the vision, the beautiful vision—alas! it was but a vision—faded away, and in place of the happy morning, with Millie's wealthy father returned to make her the happy wife of Holme Brae, it was still the wild March night, the weary stranger dropping asleep in the corner, and Millie, with a sorrowing heart, bidding her lover a last farewell. For, dear friend, my imagination, as I sat there, had woven the blissful scenes I have related. Poor Millie was still fatherless, and the old man was nobody's father that I knew of—only a wayworn wanderer, sheltered for the night under our roof.

Years have gone by since that night. When next Millie saw Holme Brae, he was bringing home a bride. She was very beautiful, even more lovely than Millie—and she was rich; would not that alone make her beautiful in the eyes of the money-loving many? My hand was in Millie's as the bridal train dashed by, and she crashed it so violently in hers that I would have cried out in pain, were it not for the pale face that looked down at me. O, it was hard after that to see the pale presence of grief in that fair young face! But she bore up against her sorrows, and cheered the declining years of Uncle John and his wife.

They have now been dead some years. Millie and I keep the shop together, and we are happy in some degree. The night before last, we were sitting by the fire together, recalling bygones, and I told her for the first time, of the air-castle I had built so many years before, when the wanderer was sheltered at our fireside. Tears gushed from Millie's eyes as I concluded, and she murmured, regretfully:

"It might have been."

With a joyful heart I add—Et Erat.

Yesterday, the successful member was chaired. That member was Holme Brae. How every cheer for Holme Brae was caught up and shouted over the town! Proud ladies waved their handkerchiefs for him and wore his colors. Holme Brae was a widower now. It was a lovely evening. The lively strains of the band announced the procession coming down the street. What a lively sight it was! the banners, the music, the crowds of rejoicing people—for Holme Brae is the people's friend. Home aloft on the shoulders of freeholders, seated in the chair decorated with flowers and his own colors, came Holme Brae.

Millie stood at the door with me, for her fond heart gloried in seeing him honored. His smiling eyes wandered over the crowd, and rested on Millie as she stood in the shadow of the doorway. Their glances met, the first time for many years; his hat was lifted from his head, and an obeisance, reverent as to a queen, made to his early love. The gay procession moved on.

Last night Holme Brae was in our little parlor. This morning he and Millie were married. The joyful tears that blind my eyes prevent my writing more. And O, what bliss to feel that, in place of "it might have been," I can whisper in dear Millie's ear:

"Et Erat."

POLYTECHNIC MUTINEERS IN PARIS.

The enormous number of one hundred and twenty-five students have been expelled from the Polytechnic School for a mutiny. They gave a beating to the adjutant, who had reported their conduct to the commanding officer, and when charged with their offences they boldly declared their intention to stand by one another. The emperor, it is said, was rather opposed to this sweeping measure of severity which has been taken, but yielded to the representations of Marshal Magnan, with whom the Polytechnic School is not a favorite. The Nord of Brussels gives the following details of the circumstances which led to the dismissal of the second division of the school:—"The pupils of the first year, last elected, being animated by a singular spirit of equality, and not wishing to oppose or exceed each other in the examinations, resolved among themselves some time ago, and even engaged in writing, to allow twenty-five of the cleverest pupils chosen among them to study for their promotions, while the others did merely what was strictly necessary. This compact of utter idleness fell into the hands of an adjutant of the school, who laid it before the heads of the establishment. It was at one moment in contemplation to punish some who were suspected of being the ringleaders, but this idea was not carried into effect; not the less, however, was a conspiracy got up against the adjutant, and carried into execution. During Saturday night, the pupils rose from their beds, and drawing down their nightcaps over their faces, cut holes for their eyes and mouths, so that it was impossible to distinguish them. Sure of not being recognized, they seized on the adjutant on whom they wished to be revenged, and inflicted on him such a beating that he was much injured, and it was with the greatest difficulty that he got out of their hands. As it was found impossible to discover the real delinquents, it was decided to expel the whole division."

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballo, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 50,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
 No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

HIGH CONSTABLE JOHN H. BULKLEY, CHIEF OF POLICE, PHILADELPHIA.

We present on this page a finely engraved portrait of the gentleman whose name leads this article, and who has been for sixteen years connected with the police department of Philadelphia, drawn and engraved expressly for the Pictorial. For the period above named, Mr. Bulkley, with a brief interval, has had the entire control of all important detective matters connected with his department. Such duties were of course no sine-cures in a city much changed from the influx of vicious characters from the moral purity and precision which distinguished it under the old Quaker supremacy. In the month of July, 1841, the subject of our sketch was first appointed by Mayor John Swift as captain of the north-western division of the night watch of the city, and his first entrée into public life was thus to a position requiring the most active and energetic vigilance. Very shortly after, however, a thorough re-organization of the police department was determined upon by the incoming administration under Mayor John M. Scott. The scheme was carried into effect, and Mr. Bulkley arose to the post of second lieutenant, which he filled to universal satisfaction for three years, and was then re-appointed by the succeeding municipal official, Mayor Peter McCall. After still another re-appointment by Mayor Swift (who himself for the second time assumed office), he was in 1849 directed to assume the title of lieutenant. We say the title, because he had for years before actually fulfilled the duties of that position without credit. This last promotion was to the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of James Young. The Hon. Joel Jones was the next mayor of Philadelphia, and a complete change of officers was the order of the day, but no competent substitute could be found to supply the lieutenantcy, and by universal consent Mr. Bulkley was allowed and requested to act as the controlling head, but obliged, as a sort of compromise, to re-assume his title of second lieutenant. This continued until his re-installment by Mayor Charles Gilpin immediately after his election. Then came the passage of the act of consolidation, by which the various districts and suburbs of Philadelphia were united under the simple designation of the "city." The great reform movement took place, and Robert T. Conrad was elected as the first executive officer. High constable Bulkley now devoted himself to his peculiar duties as the chief directing agent of the police force of Philadelphia. In affairs requiring physical strength or bodily exertion, it was not his province to mingle, but in the fine details, the admirable classing, and the acute detective operations necessary to secure great ends, his talents shone forth conspicuously. With instruments to mould at will, and order at pleasure, he, the main spring, could accomplish by far the greatest amount of labor by mental exercise. To recite particular instances of achievements would be to extend our article beyond reasonable limits, but the criminal dockets will tell of many successes. Under Mayor Vaux, the present incumbent, High Constable Bulkley maintains his position with credit, and still exhibits the same unflinching vigilance. An instance will well illustrate this. During the recent investigation into the Burdell murder in New York, he considered it his duty, as the murdered man was once of Philadelphia, to pay some attention to the matter. He discovered that in times past the life of Dr. Burdell had been threatened by a man with whom he was at enmity, but whose whereabouts were unknown. Was not that man likely to have been the murderer? The inquiry was started, and the country scoured to ascertain the probability of such a fact. The suspected individual was found at last, but in prison, and his alibi was at once established. The result of course was of little importance, but the incident serves to exhibit the vigilance which is continually exercised by the subject of our sketch in his professional career. In private life High Constable Bulkley is modest and unassuming, but with the phrenological organs of firmness and secretiveness largely developed. These two characteristics are essential to his position. His friends are many, and his enemies none, save those who through his influence have suffered for their misdeeds. The responsibility attached to a position like that which the subject of our sketch has occupied for years is very great, and the man who fills it acceptably to his fellow-citizens must assuredly be possessed of abilities of a very high order. Nor are the reputation and the emoluments thus earned at all commensurate with the duties discharged. The incumbent of such an office must look to higher sources of reward—his own consciousness of having done his duty, and his whole duty, must be his recompense. Necessarily he makes enemies—the enemies of society of course his, and others even, for the administration of strict justice is always attended by some hardships.

JOHN H. BULKLEY, CHIEF OF POLICE, PHILADELPHIA.

FAIRMOUNT, MILTON, MASS.

The annexed view of Fairmount, in Milton, from Mount Neponset, on the Dorchester side of the Neponset River, was drawn expressly for our paper by Mr. Hill. We have seldom witnessed more energy, enterprise and taste than has been displayed in building up this place. Less than one year ago, where now we behold this truly beautiful village, was but an unimproved territory. This has been done mainly by associated effort, and is a most successful result of Yankee skill and modern enterprise. The name of Alpheus P. Blake has been given us as one who is entitled to much credit in devising and carrying forward this enterprise. Hon. Daniel Warren, D. B. Rich, John N. Brown, and S. S. Mooney are among the active members of this association. This village is fast becoming one of the most popular and delightful in the suburbs of Boston. The Real Estate and Building Company are about to commence extensive operations in this vicinity in the way of building, ornamenting and improving the property which is contiguous. The erection of a female college on the elevation in the distance is under consideration. From the site where it is proposed to locate this institution, a view of the surrounding country may be had from ten to twenty miles in every direction, presenting a variety of scenery that is very romantic and beautiful. At the base of the hill, as exhibited in the cut, is the Neponset River, which furnishes a favorable place for boating. The New York Central Railroad passes on the opposite side of the river from the village. The first house on the right in the foreground is owned by F. F. Muller the organist. The next to the left is occupied by C. F. Gerry and family. Mr. Gerry has long been known as an artist of rare merit, and one of the most successful teachers of drawing in New England; while his wife, formerly Martha A. Clough, stands in the front rank of the young writers of America, and will, doubtless, be recollected by many of our readers as the author of "Pauline," a $500 prize tale, published in the "Flag of our Union" several years ago. Still further to the left is the residence of George W. Currier, who has superintended the erection of most of the buildings comprised in this village. Those admiring the truthful, both in nature and art, will be well paid for a visit to Fairmount. The villages in the environs of Boston have always been noted for the romantic beauty of their sites, and the taste exhibited in the dwellings, and this becomes more and more apparent as persons of culture are forced out of the city by the enlarged space required by its commerce.

PICTURESQUE SINS.

Many are the personages once held to be picturesque who are now seen to be mere scarecrows; powdered gentlemen of fashion, who founded their own reputations on those they had ruined; who could first insult the wife, and then "pink" the resentful husband; highwaymen, who rode to Tyburn-tree decorated with the fivers of the fair; duellists, who were knives in disguise, and compelled men to stake lives that had the sterling ring of manhood against their own brazen counterfeits; fools, who affected Byron's faults, without a touch of his genius, and disdained the world that they neither comprehended nor improved. Touching these, the delusions of society have long ago ceased, and they are now either abhorred or despised. Their successors will share the same fate. May we not learn from experience that whatever ruses counter to moral worth is ugly, and that in reality there is no such thing as a picturesque sin!—Wendell Marston.

VIEW OF FAIRMOUNT, MILTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE FIRST SPRING SHOWERS.

BY MARY C. ORANNIS.

Softly falls the early rain
Over russet hill and plain:
Waking from the silent earth,
Bloom and verdure into birth!
How like love, the gentle showers
Come to glad expectant hours:
Touching springs of life again,
Stirring every pulse and vein,
Till each blade and bursting flower
Tells the beauty of thy power!
Like warm tears of penitence,
Washing out each old offence:
Softening o'er the arid heart,
Till fair buds of promise start—
And above hopes withering,
Joyful reigns a second spring!

Type of Love's expanding power,
Seen in opening leaf and flower!
Type of mercies flowing free,
That forever blest shall be!
Type of trust in darkest days,
Ending in triumphant praise!
Type of God's perennial spring
Of Hope's heavenly blossoming:
Come the warm, reviving rain
To our waiting earth again!

SORROW'S DISCIPLINE.

The quickened seed o'ppressed the thorn,
The weed, the worm, the blight:
While vigorous leaf and ripening corn,
Successive, cheered the sight.

What gave so soon the harvest pride
To life's unfolding years?
The heavenly husbandman replied,
"The seed was steeped in tears!"—MRS. SIGOURNEY.

BEAUTY.

An eye's an eye, and whether black or blue,
Is no great matter, so 'tis in request;
'Tis nonsense to dispute about a hue—
The kindest may be taken as a test.
The fair sex should be always fair; and no man,
Till thirty, should perceive there's a plain woman.—BRAXN.

PASSION.

A night of fretful passion may consume
All that thou hast of beauty's gentle bloom;
And one distempered hour of sordid fear
Print on thy brow the wrinkles of a year.—SHERIDAN.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

We again seat ourselves in our editorial arm-chair with the most innumerable kind of a bow to our legion of readers. How pleasant it is to address such an army, and to receive, as we constantly do, congratulations and kind words from those we may never meet in this world, but whose good wishes we treasure in our "heart of hearts."..... A Western correspondent asks us what novelty there is in the way of art here. Well, the Athenaeum gallery has opened with a fine collection of Allston's paintings, and the magnificent water-color drawings gathered at great expense by the late Mr. Dowse, of Cambridgeport. The exhibition is the finest we remember. Page's "Venus rising from the Sea" has also been on exhibition—but the least said about it the better. The attitude is fantastic, and the coloring, "orful." The idea of representing Venus as very homely and ill-shaped, is certainly original, however. .... The spring toilets of the ladies are dazzling, and they set their hoops for beaux in the most expansive manner. One well-dressed lady will occupy the entire breadth of the sidewalk in Washington Street. .... The Rabbits have a tradition that twelve bushels of chit-chat were rained down into Paradise for Adam and Eve to amuse themselves with, of which Eve picked up twelve, and Adam only three. But to confess the honest truth, we must own that there are as many male gossips as female in this talkative world of ours. .... A writer proposes to make sour apples sweet by fertilizing the trees with molasses. That reminds us of the theory about producing silk by boiling mulberry leaves—one of the latest canards of the day. .... The Irishman's definition of nothing was most excellent. He said it was a "footless stocking without a leg." .... Women enjoy their "rights" very extensively in France; they are hostlers, barbers and ploughwomen. .... "I resolve," says Bishop Beveridge, "never to speak of a man's virtues before his face, nor of his faults behind his back." A golden rule, which, if universally adopted, would in one stroke banish flattery and defamation from the face of the earth. .... In a garden at Flushing, Long Island, New York, there still remain two of the oak trees under which George Fox, the founder of the society of Friends, held a religious meeting, in 1672. We have stood in the shade of those trees, and mused upon the virtues of this departed sectarian. .... There is an editor out West so handsome and fascinating, that he is obliged to dress in disguise, and carry a club to keep the ladies at a distance. If we can obtain a daguerreotype, we shall certainly publish his portrait. .... We are afraid that after what has been written and said on the subject, the life of a farmer is not properly appreciated. Were one third of the population that are now engaged in other pursuits, to turn their attention to agriculture, it would be better for all concerned. .... A gentleman in New York advertises for a wife, in one of the New York papers. He wants one "that understands housekeeping, and has not been in a boarding-school." We fear it will be difficult for him to find such a rara avis. .... In one of the Cherokee settlements, a few years ago, a young Indian beau was convicted in a case of breach of promise, and sentenced to pay the disappointed young lady "a yellow feather, a brooch that dangled from his nose, and a dozen con skins!" On hearing this, the Cherokee belle immediately sprang up and clapped her hands, exclaiming, "Now me be ready to court again!" .... We are certainly a fast people. A short time since, a young gentleman from these parts reached a Western settlement on Monday, surveyed his land on Tuesday, built a house on Wednesday, went a courting on Thursday, got married on Friday, moved home on Saturday, and, with his wife, went to church on Sunday. .... The most striking case of absence of mind we remember reading of, was that of the first Lord Lyttleton, who was upset in a boat at Hogley, and it was recorded that he sank twice before he recollected that he could swim. .... The richer the nature, the harder and slower its development. There is a capital illustration of this in Frazer: "Two boys were once of a class in the Edinburgh Grammar School—John, ever trim, precise and leader; Walter, ever slovenly, confused and dolt. In due time, John became Baillie John, of Hunter Square; and Walter, Walter Scott, of the universe. The quickest and completest of all vegetables is the cabbage."..... That was a cool reply of a tailor to a gentleman who complained of the fit of his new coat. "I beg pardon, sir, but the coat must fit, for the measure's right, and we always cut on a geometry principle." Very conrolling to a man with a bag on his back, and fifty wrinkles under each arm! .... Dr. Dewey once said, in speaking of ladies' dresses, "The dress of women is undoubtedly the cause of bad health, consumption, etc.; but as they prefer death to wearing tight slippers and warm stockings, and leaving off tight corsets, there is no hope of reforming them."..... Swift beautifully exemplifies the distinction between pride and vanity—the vain man's being in the opinion of others; the proud man cares not a button what others think of him. Swift thus makes the discrimination:—"I am too proud to be vain!"..... An ancient writer says, in reference to the custom of leading books, that "to lead a book is to lose it; and borrowing, but a hypocritical pretence for stealing, and should be punished with death."..... The vernal season is again strewn flowers in our path—and as we inhale their fragrance, we recall what has been said by gifted writers of their charms. "He who does not love flowers," says Ludwig Tieck, "has lost all fear and love of God;" and another German author defines woman as "something between a flower and an angel."..... Our friend, Captain Robert Josselyn, has been singing the praise of "the girl with the calico dress." Josselyn is a true poet, and, like the German Koerner, has wielded the sword as well as the pen."..... It is ill-luck with the Russians to tell a man he is looking remarkably well. If you don't wish to offend him, you must say, "My dear fellow, how very ill you are looking to-day!"..... Sir John Bowring tells us that to every decade of life the Chinese attach some special designation—the age of 10 is called the "opening degree;" 20, "youth expired;" 30, "strength and marriage;" 40, "officially apt;" 50, "error knowing;" 60, "cycle closing;" 70, "rare bird of age;" 80, "rusty-visaged;" 90, "delayed;" and 100, age's extremity."..... Some few weeks ago, on the occasion of the birth of a prince at Naples, forged proclamations of a political amnesty were posted all over the city by thousands. That shows at least how active and well-organized are the secret societies. Before a great while, King Bomba may be forced to take refuge in the Castel Nuovo, of which we lately gave a representation in the Pictorial. .... Some people are "more nice than wise" about their eating; but we can't say we admire the extent to which the Chinese carry their indifference to the quality of their food. The long-tails eat and enjoy dogs, rats, mice, monkeys, snakes, and unhatched ducks and chickens. .... A woman lately made a complaint against her husband for maltreating her before one of our police judges. "What pretext did he have for heating you?" asked his honor. "No pretext at all, yer honor, and your honor's honorable honor, as it place the court—it was a big club he bate me with, the blaggard!"..... Devisme, a celebrated gunsmith of Paris, is said to have invented an explosive bullet, which kills and rends to pieces, lions, tigers, elephants, whales, or any creature shot with it. It may be so, but we rather suspect Mr. Devisme has been drawing the long bow. .... Baron Humboldt is busy with the fourth volume of his "Cosmos," though he has far passed the usual term of life. .... The expedition in search of the sources of the Nile, which promised such great results, has been dissolved by the rascality of Egypt. .... An officer of the garrison at Metz lately laid a wager of twenty-five louis with some of his idle comrades, that he would kiss a certain beautiful young lady of the city as she came out of church, in the open street. He set about executing his purpose, but shame and remorse seized him, and he addressed the innocent object of his bet, saying, "Twenty-five louis are staked on your cheek, miss. Will you authorize me to gather them, or will you condemn me to lose them?"—"Not at all," replied the young lady; "but you must add twenty-five more from your purse, making fifty, and bestow the amount on the poor."..... A curious affair happened at Naples, a few nights since. The queen dreamed that her august husband, King Bomba, has been assassinated by one of his servants, and awoke in great terror. His majesty, who has faith in dreams, instantly ordered a muster of all the domestics; and the queen, identifying one with the assassin of her sleep, the poor fellow was instantly dismissed. This act of justice (?) was followed by twelve prayers repeated three days in succession, and with other religious observances. "Un-easy lies the head beneath the crown."..... One of the latest squibs appears in the shape of an advertisement in a New York paper—"A good-looking young man of agreeable manners desires a situation as a coachman in a wealthy family with marriageable daughters." On the other hand, another advertisement appeared, saying, "Wanted, a coachman. None need apply who is not old, ugly and deformed, and badly pitted with the small pox. Address No.—Fifth Avenue."..... "Ollapod," in the Knickerbocker Magazine, once said, "Rosy lips are but the glowing gateways of pork, beans and cabbage." Why, we always thought ladies and birds of paradise never ate anything. .... The Baltimore Sun recently advertised for "three steady men to carry the Sun." Rather scorching work, we should think. .... We like fine writing when it is properly applied—so we appreciate the following burst of eloquence in one of our exchanges:—"As the ostrich uses both legs and wings when the Arabian coursers bounds in her rear—as the winged lightnings leap from the heavens when the thunderbolts are loosed—so does a little negro run when a big dog is after him."..... An officer, who was in the old Florida war, told us, the other day, that he found horse-meat excellent—that is, the flesh of young colts. Dog meat was far superior, and an officer who was engaged in the Withlacooche expedition, had a fine, fat dog, which he killed, and refused five dollars for a hind quarter. This may be worth remembering when dog-killing times come round. .... One principle of the Mussulman creed, and an excellent one, is that every person should have one trade. It should be thus, the world over. .... A Western editor offers the following original plan for populating a town:—"Let the roads be so had up to the very outskirts, that if a stranger succeed in getting into it, he will abandon any notion of getting out." We know a good many new settlements which seem to be conducted on this principle. .... A lady at a ball once asked Henry J. Finn what he thought of her daughter. "She is charming," he replied; "a very pearl."—"And what do you think of me, Mr. Finn?"—"Why, madam, you are mother of pearl."

MODERN ATHENS.

The rapid growth of Athens will give some idea of what the land and city of Minerva are capable. An inland town, with none of the advantages of seaport, with scarcely a road leading into the interior, and but a few years the seat of government, the population has already mounted up to more than 30,000 souls. The city is not only well laid out, but well built also, besides the royal palace of pure Pentelic marble, abounding in beautiful structures, among them the university, with a corps of forty professors, and from 700 to 800 students. Few people, indeed, take deeper interest in the cause of education. Besides the grand university, there is a prosperous military school at Athens, a naval academy at Syra, and an agricultural college in Argolis, to say nothing of the large female schools at Athens, under the superintendence of Dr. Hill, an American, numbering several hundred pupils. Nor is the education of the masses neglected. At the last report, more than 400 common schools were already fully organized, with 30,000 pupils, six years of age and upwards. There are also in the city of Athens alone, not less than thirty newspapers and periodicals, among them several dailies, all conducted with ability and prosperous. With such evidence of prosperity, such enterprise, an inheritance so rich, and a love of liberty so unconquerable, who can doubt, under the genial influence of full, perfect national independence, the future prosperity of Greece!—N. O. Picayune.

Choice Miscellany.

SWISS CLERGY.

If I were a clergyman, I should like to be a Swiss; and if I were a Swiss, I should like to be a clergyman—with his pretty house and garden, always close to the church, and generally in an elevated situation; conspicuous, like himself, above those whom it is his lot to enlighten and direct. In a country where there are so few avenues open to certain income, combined with certain consideration in society, it is very natural that the clerical profession should be eagerly sought; particularly by young men who may likewise have a desire for more mental cultivation than it might otherwise be in their power to attain. Nevertheless, there are difficulties in the way, which, unless in some degree modified, will, in all probability, gradually diminish the number of desirable candidates for ecclesiastical situations. The education requisite includes a term of fourteen years; and when admitted into orders, they often remain for as many more as suffragans, on an income of five hundred francs (£20 per annum). The removal, by death, or change, of the minister they may serve, brings them no nearer filling his place; which is subjected to the choice of other older ministers, all of whom, in rotation, have the privilege of changing three times, before they are irrevocably planted. And whilst they are thus endeavoring to better themselves, the poor suffragan has, for the prime of his life, no other prospect than perhaps changing his humble situation for a worse. The livings are from sixty to eighty, one hundred, and one hundred twenty pounds a year.—Benson.

LAMARTINE.

Standing on the steps of the Hotel de Ville, with the waves of an angry multitude surging up fiercely towards him, the orator waved them proudly back, and sending forth his sonorous and practised voice among them, excited their curiosity, riveted their attention, and stilled their passions. In parliamentary warfare, however, mere impassioned speaking is not enough. They who undertake to make laws for a great people look more for breadth of thought, steadiness of views, and stability of personal character, than for an artificial rhetoric and poetical figures of speech. Louis Napoleon soon discovered Lamartine's weak side, and ceased to fear his opposition. By a few plain, strong words, implying in the speaker an iron will and indomitable courage, he totally neutralized the effect of Lamartine's rhetoric. When he rose in the National Assembly, he greatly reminded all historical students of the first appearance of Cromwell in the British parliament; not that there was an exact resemblance, but that both possessed that peculiar quality which, when a man speaks, rivets the attention of his listeners, partly through apprehension, partly through the desire to penetrate the dark problem of his character. From the day on which Louis Napoleon was elected president of the Republic, Lamartine's reputation began to wax pale and dim.—Louis Napoleon, by J. A. St. John.

THE FRENCH BARD.

Beranger, who is now in his seventy-seventh year, has just completed the continuation and revival of his autobiography. It is to be published within a year after his death, in one volume, each page being full and solid as to composition, so that the whole work, including a hundred songs never before printed, may be sold for five francs. If printed in the usual Paris fashion, with a rivulet of type meandering through a meadow of margin, it would probably extend to a dozen volumes. The old poet desires to be read by the million.—New York Times.

New Publications.

BOSTON SIGHTS AND STRANGER'S GUIDE. Boston: James Munroe & Co. 1857. 18mo. pp. 225.

A very valuable little work, elegantly printed and illustrated. It describes all the remarkable places and buildings of our city and the environs, the monuments, institutions, cemeteries, places of amusements, in a word, everything about which a stranger is curious to obtain information.

BOSTON BOARD OF TRADE.—The third annual report of the Board of Trade, Isaac C. Bates, Secretary, forms a large and handsome 8vo volume of 670 pages, and contains a vast amount of valuable commercial information, embracing a digest of the revenue laws and the forms of custom-house business. The typographical execution is very creditable to Messrs. George C. Rand & Avery, the printers.

WAYERLEY NOVELS.—GUY MANNING. Household Edition. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 2 vols. 18mo.

The appearance of this perfect and gem-like edition has revived all the enthusiasm for Scott's incomparable novels, while a new generation of readers are taking their first draughts of enchantment from this unfading source. We learn with pleasure that the publishers are pressed to fill their orders.

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF SCOTLAND, VOL. VI. By AGNES STRICKLAND. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857.

Miss Strickland's historical works have become standard. The volume before us continues the story of Mary, Queen of Scots, always interesting, however oft repeated. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

ISABELL, THE YOUNG WIFE AND OLD LOVE. By JOHN CORDY JEAFFRESON. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 1 vol. 12mo.

A deeply interesting domestic story, wrought up with great dramatic power. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

THE CHILD'S BOOK OF NATURE. Three Parts in One. By WASHINGTON HOOKER, M. D. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1 vol. 4to.

An admirable treatise on plants, animals, air, water, light, heat, etc., liberally illustrated with fine wood engravings. It is adapted to the capacity of children from six to nine years of age, and would be a capital school-book. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

READING WITHOUT TEARS. New York: Harper & Brothers. Small 4to.

A very pleasant mode of learning to read, prefaced by excellent hints to parents and teachers. The engravings are very attractive. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

ARTHUR MERTY'S OR, MEMOIRS OF THE YEAR 1793. By CHARLES BROCKEDEN BROWN. Philadelphia: M. Polock. 1857. 2 vols. 12mo.

This novel is perhaps one of the most powerful and thrilling which the author ever wrote. The ravages of the yellow fever in '93 supplies him with a groundwork, on which he delineates lifelike portraits with thrilling effect. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

DRAMATIC SCENES. With other Poems now first printed. By BARRY CORNWALL. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 368.

Barry Cornwall would never have succeeded as a writer for the stage, nor did he ever attempt it; yet the dramatic form adopted in these sketches gives effect to some of the finest poetry he has ever written. The purity and grace of his lines, their freedom from all effort and turgidity, commend them to the lovers of a school of writing which is fast passing away.

SCANDAL. By Mrs. J. T. BICKFORD. Boston: Shepard, Clark & Brown. 1857. 12mo. pp. 394.

A very well-constructed story, with dramatic dialogue and fine portraiture of character. Its title indicates its purport—and that is, to expose the consequences of the atrocity of one of the most flagrant sins of society.

NEW MUSIC.—Russell & Richardson, 291 Washington Street, have published—Minuet, for the piano, by C. A. Adler; The New England Gulls Polka, by P. S. Gilmore; La Violette Polka Mazurka, by Charles Faust; Album Lirico, by A. Bendelari; Rosalie, the Prairie Flower, by Wurzel, and Oonjohm, by Mendelssohn.

Editorial Melange.

PRIZE OFFER.—A smart little country paper in New York State offers a "dish of sour crout for the best original tale, and a dozen red-hot pancakes with 'lasses on for the best original poem."

A letter from St. Petersburg says:—"The imperial government has just raised the town of Kiahka, situated on the frontier of China, to the rank of a chief town of a district. This place is the most active for the land trade between Russia and China, and since the late events, its importance has considerably increased. Kiahka will henceforth have a Russian military commandant and civil governor."

lowest rate. Sample copies sent when desired.
Published every Saturday, by M. M. BALLOU,
No. 20 Winter Street, Boston

MAN OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

ABORIGINES OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

As the aboriginal inhabitants of South Australia are fast disappearing before the advance of civilization, it becomes deeply interesting to preserve some records of their peculiarities and appearance. The portraits on this page are from recent photographs, and have been engraved with the utmost nicety, thus preserving the actual traits of the originals. The lady has certainly the advantage in point of looks, the gentleman presenting too close a resemblance to an aged ape to rank as an Apollo. Naturally, the natives wear no clothing; but, if any article of dress be given them, they are proud to array themselves in it. The manner in which they wrap a blanket around them, fastening it over one shoulder, is very graceful. The women are exceedingly susceptible to gay colors—the nature of the sex is the same in all climes—and accept a bright pocket handkerchief, or a few beads, with as much delight as an English girl would receive a Parisian bonnet, or a souvenir from Howell and James's. The greatest passion of the aborigines is revenge; and, even if one of them dies a natural death, they fling spears at one of his friends until blood appears—hence their universal hostility to the white man. They can never forget nor forgive the atrocities perpetrated upon them by some of the early settlers, who at one time used to hunt them down like wild beasts, and fire at any they came upon, however inoffensive they might be. The features of the aborigines are not pleasing, being very coarse. Their lips are thick, with flat noses and low, receding foreheads. They are not, generally speaking, tall or well made, neither are they particularly strong. Their going about in such numbers alone makes them dangerous. The number of aborigines is not great, and it is steadily decreasing. Several tribes have already wholly disappeared. Many efforts have been made to protect them, and to induce them to adopt settled and industrious habits, but with various success. Schools have been established by the government, but the young people almost invariably, when passing out of childhood, throw off their clothes and return to their native haunts and habits. A few girls become house servants, but they are easily induced to leave for the woods. Of late there has, however, been a somewhat important change. The impossibility of obtaining a sufficient number of white shepherds and laborers caused many stockkeepers to offer good money wages to the natives, instead of merely giving them food and clothes, as was before the custom, and to adapt the service to their feelings. The result is said to have been very generally beneficial. They show little inclination, or rather considerable dislike, for manual labor; but they make very good butkeepers, are careful and gentle as shepherds, and make excellent stockkeepers; and large numbers are now so employed, as well as in wool-washing, and other work connected with sheep and cattle farming.

MODERN CHINESE WAR JUNK.

The picture of a war junk of the first class on this page will surprise those who have not studied the progress which the Chinese have made within a very few years. Good judges will pronounce the hull of this vessel a really fine model; there is only just enough nationality about it to identify it. The sails and rigging are Chinese enough, but otherwise it is not a craft that a European would disdain to sail or fight. Recent accounts inform us that the Chinese have learned to fight as well as build their ships well, and have shown extraordinary valor in their naval engagements with John Bull. Twenty years ago their ships of war were short, misshapen masses of timber, quaint and ungainly in appearance, almost unmanageable, and the wonder to seamen of other nations how a craft of the character of the junk was able to make headway, or combat the dangers and intricacies of the sea and coast. Since then the progress of naval architecture in China has advanced far beyond what the people of that country might have been given credit for; and, though still carrying out their eccentric tastes in the more prominent features of their vessels, the shipping of the present day is of excellent and seaworthy character. In the place of the deep-waisted craft of former times, with head and stem forming nearly a half-circle, they have now vessels in which this peculiarity is greatly modified and in some vessels entirely dispensed with. In the lorchas, snake-boats, smuggling craft, pirate junks, and other boats peculiar to the China Seas, the lines of the vessels are of the most beautiful character, and they exhibit the greatest speed in all their movements and performances. The armament of war-junks, twenty years ago, consisted principally of matchlocks, mounted on the rails of the bulwarks; at the present time, the junks of the first class carry guns between decks, like our frigates, and of a calibre that has astonished the officers of the British ships now in their waters, many of the guns taken being larger in bore and weight of metal than any we manufacture in this country. Great improvements have also taken place in the material of their sails, and in the general handling of their vessels. But one great peculiarity in the regular legitimate Chinese junk, outliving all other improvements and advances, is the large eye in the head-boards of the vessel, without which the Chinese firmly believe that no vessel can see how to sail.

WOMAN OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

CHINESE MODERN FIRST CLASS WAR JUNK.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM { VOL. XII., No. 22—WHOLE No. 319 08
6 CENTS SINGLE

EDWIN BOOTH, AS "SIR GILES OVERREACH."

We present on this page a full length portrait, drawn expressly for our illustrated journal, representing the popular young tragedian, Mr. Edwin Booth, the heir to his father's fame, in the character of Sir Giles Overreach in Massinger's play, "A new Way to pay old Debts," a character which his father almost made his own, for seeing the elder Booth in this role, no man of taste could endure another's representation of Sir Giles, during his lifetime. Well do we remember the lurid glare which the genius of that great actor diffused over this whole part—how completely he identified himself with the poet's creation, how electric were his bursts of passion, how convulsive the dying agonies of his baffled ambition, greed and hate, how his form so completely filled the eye, his tones so monopolized the ear, that the entire audience forgot time and place and surroundings, and were the spell-bound thralls of the mighty enchanter. Time has not obliterated our memory of the elder Booth's acting. It is among those things which are dagger-retyped upon the mind, never to be effaced. We remember him at the culminating point of his powers, and afterwards when his star had nearly touched the horizon, and only shone at times with a fitful brilliancy. We confess it was with more surprise than pleasing anticipation that we saw the announcement that a son of this great man, and that son a mere youth, was about to attempt in this city, where his father was so well known, so well appreciated, and so well remembered, the chef-d'œuvre of that father's delineations, knowing full well that a comparison must infallibly be instituted. We were well aware that young Mr. Booth came hither heralded by a brilliant reputation earned elsewhere, but we were not sure that it rested on a firm basis. At any rate, the ordeal was severely trying. But it was undergone, and it was a triumph. The verdict of a Boston audience stamped with its signet a reputation proved to be sterling. The triumph was a legitimate one, for as we have more than once had occasion to remark, it is no advantage to an artist to bear a great name. It simply assures him a first hearing, but it taxes his powers to the utmost. We Americans are no believers in hereditary greatness, and we judge more severely the heir of a great man than one who comes before us with no such prestige. Edwin Booth was thus, we will not say harshly, but rigidly tried. He was expected to come up to a high standard, and he met the requirement. There was something in his appearance, much in his tone and style, which reminded us of his father, and showed that he had been a close student of that excellent model. But the resemblances were natural. A clever mimic would have given us a much closer imitation of the elder Booth. An actor of talents, but not genius, now no more, based his whole style on mimicry of the elder Booth, and was to a degree successful in his profession in consequence. Before seeing him, we had feared that herein lay the secret of Edwin Booth's success. But a single scene dissipated the error, and his splendid personation of Richelieu, a character that his father never performed, showed young Booth to be possessed of original genius of the highest order. He possesses, too, some physical qualifications in spite of which his father succeeded, as did the older Kean. His figure is better, and he has an eye we never saw equalled for brilliancy and fire. His voice is rich, melodious, powerful, and held in perfect command. He has not the common fault of young actors, with powerful organs, he never "makes Rome howl" in furious outbursts. He never strains his lungs to their utmost capacity, but prudently keeps within the limits of his powers, knowing that the concentrated tones of passion are frequently far more effective than their highest fury. He is graceful in gesture, and has a facile play of features. Of his mental qualifications for the highest rank upon the stage we cannot speak too highly. He has evidently studied the characters he delineates profoundly, and exhibits a thorough appreciation of the authors whose interpreter he claims to be. A brief but faithful apprenticeship has given him a mastery of all the details of his profession, so that he has little of that crudity noticeable in the efforts of those who have assumed the highest range of delineation without passing over the intermediate steps. Only such deficiencies are apparent as belong to youth, and a brief period of professional service—a little longer familiarity with the stage will overcome these. That the youthful recipient of so much honor as has been bestowed on him is modest and unassuming is the surest guarantee of his future greatness. The reliable critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette has, we think, well summed up his qualities and characteristics in the following passage:—"To our mind he possesses every requisite granted by nature to his father, and in addition he has a better stature, and the finest eye we remember to have seen for many years. It is an eye which speaks, and a single flash in many of his characters seems to render words almost useless. He is of medium height, and has that awkwardness in his gait peculiar to early manhood, which will improve as he advances in years. His facial expression is easily moulded by his will, and his gestures are graceful and appropriate. His voice is rich, powerful and flexible, and he manages it with all the skill of a veteran, never gasping for breath, and never exerting himself to a degree when it would seem that he was upon the brink of exhaustion. In his most violent bursts of passion, he seems to keep something in reserve, and there is no perceptible evidence of fatigue in his acting, while the great charm of his style is its entire freedom from that rant, which actors at times adopt either to hide their deficiencies or to win the applause of the groundlings. Mr. Booth does not play for applause—he has studied his characters, and attempts to become the embodiment of the author's heroes, using his own good judgment in developing the varied phases of their emotions, and bringing out all the beauties of their language. The points he makes—many of them new—come naturally. He does not prepare his audience for an effect by the heaving of his bosom, or by muscular twitchings and turnings, like so many telegraphic messages to the gallery to prepare for a sensation, but his words and actions blend so closely that the point is made and his auditors are warned to applause by the vigor with which he attains it." Mr. Booth's professional career may be related in a very few words. He made his first appearance in this city at the Boston Museum, in the insignificant character of Tresselt, in Richard III., his father playing the hunch-backed tyrant. Afterwards as an attaché to various dramatic companies, he studied his profession carefully, gradually rising in grade from one part to another. It was in California that his genius was first recognized, and he began to take rank as one of the most promising actors on the stage. During a theatrical campaign in Australia he was equally successful. On his return to the United States he performed at the West and Southwest, everywhere warmly welcomed and heartily sustained. In New Orleans he closed a splendid engagement in a blaze of triumph, receiving an ovation such as is rarely granted to even the veteran favorites of the public. His performances at the Boston Theatre were a series of triumphs. Though a cold storm was raging on his opening night, a large audience assembled to greet him, and his reception was all that his warmest friends could desire. The impression produced on that first night was deepened at every subsequent appearance, and he left us an established favorite, with the best wishes and hopes of a Boston public for his future. Mr. Booth comes before the world at an auspicious hour for himself, just when the prejudices against the stage are being dissipated and the best classes rallying to its support, thus instituting a healthy body of critics and friends to give it tone.

MR. EDWIN BOOTH, AS "SIR GILES OVERREACH."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN:

—OR—

THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXI.

VILLANY DEFEATED.

AFTER supper, the Jew resumed the coarse garment which concealed his plain, though handsome dress of black velvet, and which he always laid aside when he entered the presence of Abi, and returned to the shop, where Mizar had remained during his absence. When he recalled to mind that Clarence Harleigh had promised to call in the course of the evening, to look at the opal, he remembered that it had not yet been returned. He, therefore, sent Mizar to procure it, that it might be in readiness for Harleigh's inspection whenever he came.

It was eight o'clock when the boy returned with it, yet Harleigh had not made his appearance. The Jew was impatient at his delay, for he had concluded in his own mind that he would make a confidant of him, relative to what had befallen Alice the preceding evening, and that there was reason to fear a note that she had sent early in the morning to her friends had fallen into unfriendly hands, and would prove the means of betraying to Falkland her place of refuge.

"Half past eight," he murmured to himself, "and still he does not come."

The minutes, one after the other, crept slowly away, without bringing him the Jew most desired to see. Another half hour had passed, and it was nine o'clock, the time he was accustomed to leave his shop and pass an hour with Abi, who, in the apartment, entirely cut off from all out-door communication by those rooms surrounding it, as well as by the massive walls on every side, ventured to play the harp and sing to him some of those stirring and sublime songs recorded in the Old Testament.

Now, after bolting and barring the door, he remained a few minutes, hoping that Harleigh might yet come. The wooden shutters outside of the windows had been previously closed, though through many a chink gleamed the light burning in the shop.

"Mizar," said the Jew, "remain here half an hour longer. If any one knock at the door, inquire who is there. If the answer should be Clarence Harleigh, admit him, and then call me."

"And if it shouldn't be the gentleman by that name?"

"Let the door remain fastened, and call me."

Only a few minutes after he was gone, some one knocked at the door. Mizar rose and went towards it, to inquire, as he had been directed, who was there. Before he had time to do so, the knocking was repeated louder than at first, and was immediately succeeded by a violent struggle. Soon came a wild and piercing cry, when, for a few moments, all was still. Then there was a sound of voices, low though earnest, and at the same time a dull noise, such as might be made by dragging a heavy weight. The boy stood almost stupefied with terror, till the sounds, which rapidly receded, were heard no more.

Nothing of all this had reached the secluded apartment, where the Jew and Alice sat listening to Abi, who, at the request of the latter, was playing on the harp a few low, sweet strains. When, therefore, the massive door was suddenly swung back, and Mizar burst into the room, pale and trembling, their first thought was, that Falkland had discovered the retreat of Alice, and expected that the ruffians in his employ were pressing closely on the boy's footsteps. Abi, hardly knowing what she did, made a sign to Alice to conceal herself behind the curtains which draped the walls.

"O, my master," exclaimed Mizar, "come quickly and see what has happened!"

"They haven't come for her, then?" said Abi, pointing to Alice.

"No, no," replied Mizar; "but I'm afraid that the gentleman is murdered."

"What gentleman?" inquired Abi. But Mizar did not hear her question, for, as she spoke, he closed the door, and followed his master to the shop.

Aseneth, too, who had been alarmed by the disturbance, came from her chamber and entered with them.

"There is too much reason to fear that he who knocked at the door was Clarence Harleigh," said the Jew, when Mizar had described to him what he had heard.

They now listened at the door, and finding that all without was silent, the Jew cautiously opened it. A thick, heavy mist was falling, and the eye could not penetrate the gloom.

"Bring a light, Mizar," said the Jew, "that we may see if any one dead or wounded is lying near."

Seeing that the boy hesitated, Aseneth took a lamp, and stepping out at the door, held it in such a manner as to render visible whatever object might chance to be near. The insinuating mist, which had now been falling several hours, had rendered the ground soft and yielding, and footprints of different sizes, grouped together in a confused, irregular manner, were the only vestige of what might have been, as it had appeared to Mizar and Aseneth, a mortal struggle.

"It might have been nothing more than some street rioters, such as are often abroad," said the Jew, "and who, if one of their comrades was wounded, without doubt, took him away. I am heartily glad that my fears respecting Clarence Harleigh are not realized. Come, Aseneth; it is useless to look any longer."

As she was about to enter, she thought she heard voices at no great distance. Listening a moment, she found that she was not mistaken, and that they were rapidly drawing nearer. In her haste to enter, her feet slipped, and she fell across the threshold. By the time she had risen, those she had heard coming were close at hand. She had entered and succeeded in closing the door, when it was forcibly thrust open, and three men rushed into the room. One of them Aseneth at once recognized as her treacherous guide.

"Ah, my delicate lily-face, you have found your way home!" said he, addressing her. "The young Puritan, I suspect, hasn't been here yet to let the bird out of the cage. If not, we will save him the trouble."

"If," said the Jew, "as I judge by your words, you are he who conducted my servant to a different place from where she wished to go, and then caused her to give the written message entrusted to her care to one who had no right to receive it, I advise you to be content with the mischief you have done, and not to seek further to annoy her or others."

"When your advice is wanted, I will ask for it," replied Corkle. "Don't you say so, Skellum?"

"Ay, ay," was the answer, "and if the old extortioner wouldn't have his crazy old house pulled down about his ears, he had better lose no time in showing us where he has hid the little Puritan of the russet cloak. Be quick, and take your choice," said he, turning to the Jew.

"I shall not aid you in compassing your iniquitous purpose."

"Then we'll press this youngster into our service," said Skellum, at the same time seizing Mizar by the arm with no gentle hand.

"What shall I do?" said the boy, casting a frightened look towards his master.

"Forbear to answer any questions," was the reply.

"We've ways of our own to make him speak," said Corkle.

"Come, we are wasting time," said Skellum, tightening his grasp on Mizar's arm, while, regardless of his cries and his struggles to free himself, he commenced dragging him towards the door communicating with the back part of the house.

"What do you there?" was suddenly demanded in loud tones.

Skellum desisted, looked round, and coolly surveyed him who had spoken, who stood in the door-way.

"That is our concern—not yours," he then said.

The next moment, an exclamation of joy burst from the lips of Aseneth, for close behind the stranger she beheld Clarence Harleigh.

"May the God of our fathers be praised!" said the Jew, fervently; "who has sent us deliverance when we were well nigh ready to despair."

"Don't be too certain of that," said Corkle. "The iron-handled broadsword may have as much virtue in it as the jewelled rapier."

"If you will tell me the meaning of what I see," said the stranger, addressing Corkle, who had, in his appearance, less of the bravo than the two others, "perhaps the matter may be settled without having recourse to either of the weapons you have named."

"If you will make it appear by what right you catechise me," he answered, "I may possibly satisfy your curiosity."

"I cannot say that I have any right, except what belongs to common humanity."

"A virtue I shouldn't object to practising, if it were not almost always sure to empty the purse instead of filling it."

"If golden arguments are what are needed to persuade you, here are a handful of them;" and taking some broad gold pieces from his pocket, he held them in such a manner that their amount could be readily estimated.

"What say you, Skellum, and you, Mat?" said Corkle. "Are you in a humor to be won by such shining arguments as you see in the gentleman's hand?"

"Not I," answered Skellum, "that is, if they are to pass from his hand into yours; for past experience tells me that while on their passage, they will be changed into dull copper, or, at the best, a few bits of silver. Besides, there is more sport in earning the money than in having it."

Corkle approached him more nearly.

"Let the young one go," said he. "I have something for your private ear."

The boy lost no time in escaping to a distant part of the room, the moment he found himself at liberty.

"The truth is," said Corkle, in a voice too low to be heard, except by Skellum, "this is my own affair; Falkland has nothing to do with it."

"Nothing to do in the affair of Russet-Cloak?"

"I care nothing for Russet-Cloak. It's the beautiful Jewess I am after. I once saw her, and I don't believe there's another face so fair as hers in all Christendom. I thought the old Jew had sent her off, but this morning, in seeking to do Falkland a good turn, a note fell into my hands intended by Russet-Cloak, as you call her, for her Puritan friends, which showed me that I was mistaken."

"Well, it is all one to me. There'll be as much fun in carrying off the little Jewess as the little Puritan."

"But we mustn't attempt to carry off either of them now. We must wait till the coast is clear. Suffer yourself to be persuaded by the gold so freely offered by him with the steeple-crowned hat, and I will do the same. 'Twill be an easy way of earning it. But what has become of Mat? We must hear what he has to say about it."

During the foregoing colloquy, Clarence Harleigh and the Jew had been in earnest conversation; and when, at the moment Corkle ceased speaking to Skellum, a shriek was heard from the adjoining apartment, almost at a single bound he reached the door. He was in season to obtain a glimpse of a young girl, pursued by the ruffianly Mat at the moment she entered the passage leading to the closet, which has been mentioned in another chapter.

She reached the closet in time to enter and close the door, though, in her haste, she made no attempt to fasten it, nor did she observe that a Persian scarf thrown carelessly over her shoulders had fallen to the floor at the moment of her entrance. It was of a light though rich fabric, with a deep embroidery of gold, the sight of which was so tempting in the eyes of her pursuer, that he stopped and picked it up. This delay, trifling as it was, saved her.

"Hold, on your peril!" exclaimed Harleigh, springing forward, as the man was in the act of opening the door.

If he heard, he did not choose to obey, and with a cry of exultation, echoed by Skellum, who, spurning the attempt of Corkle to restrain him, was hastening to join him, he swung it open. The interior of the closet, however, presented precisely the same appearance as it had the preceding evening. The look of blank astonishment depicted on the countenance of each of the ruffians, might on a different occasion excite mirth; now, the predominating emotion in the mind of Harleigh, as well as of the Jew, who had described to him the retreat of Abi, now shared by Alice, though he had not mentioned the name of the latter, was one of devout thankfulness.

"I should almost believe that my eyes had played me false, if it weren't for this," said Mat, holding up the scarf.

Meanwhile, Skellum was eagerly examining the closet, to ascertain by what means she had made her escape.

"Let him satisfy himself," said the Jew, seeing that Harleigh and the stranger regarded him with looks of impatience. "There is no danger of his discovering the manner of her egress."

"If I hadn't tried the thickness of these walls last night," said Skellum, who soon gave up his search as hopeless, "I would try what a few well-aimed blows would do."

"As the trial seems to have been satisfactory," said Harleigh, "you may as well go now."

"And leave that scarf behind you," said the stranger, addressing Mat, who was about to tie it round his waist, after the fashion of a sash, such as we read in romances, is worn by the brigand chief, or the pirate captain, and above which is always seen protruding a formidable array of pistols, and knives of the most approved cutlery.

"We shall do neither the one nor the other, unless we please," said Skellum, answering both for himself and comrade.

"That's what we want," said Mat.

The stranger's only answer to this was taking possession of the scarf, which he did with perfect ease, a feat that evidently raised him in the estimation of all three of the wretches, who had been inclined to believe that the conciliatory manner he had previously adopted towards them was the result of timidity.

"You prefer to remain here a while longer?" said Harleigh, again addressing Skellum.

"Yes," he replied, sullenly, "and you needn't trouble yourself about it, if we do."

"Very well," said Harleigh. "We will, in the meantime, see what can be done to procure an escort for you."

"He means the police," whispered Mat.

"Yes, and that little impish-looking Jew stands ready to go at a moment's warning," said Corkle.

"The little coward, he is afraid of his own shadow," said Skellum. "When I was holding him by the arm, he trembled as if he had an ague fit."

"That may be, but if left to himself, he will thread his way through every lane and alley of the city, when it is too dark for him to see his hand before him."

Corkle then turned to Harleigh and the stranger, and said, aloud: "There's no use in trying to frighten us,—that is no easy matter; but if the gentleman will be so obliging as to let us try how we shall feel with a few of those gold pieces he showed us in our pockets, I will go away quietly myself, and use my influence to persuade the others to follow my example."

"It is too late now," said the stranger; "I'm no longer in the vein. When I offered you gold, I didn't take you for the miscreants you have proved yourselves to be. You have already annoyed these inoffensive people with your presence, much too long—longer than this gentleman and myself would have permitted, had it not been that we felt indisposed to engage in a brawl with such fellows as you, especially beneath a peaceable and respectable roof."

After having waited a minute or two, finding that they seemed disposed to maintain their ground, he made a sign to Mizar. The boy understood it, and at once prepared to obey. The ruffians, however, appeared to think it best to make good their retreat, which they did, with muttered threats, among which the words "We shall yet have our revenge; the old Jew doesn't know what there is in store for him!" could be distinguished.

After leaving the shop, as they passed a little dark court, of which the house and an out-building belonging to the Jew formed two of the sides, Corkle said in a whisper: "The dumb witness that lies there will make it go hard with the old Jew."

CHAPTER XXII.

HARLEIGH AND ALICE MEET.

THE stranger stood in the doorway till the sound of their receding footsteps had died away. He then, having closed the door, turned to Harleigh.

"If I heard aright," said he, "your name is Clarence Harleigh."

"That is my name."

"And mine is Edward Elliston."

"One that I shan't be likely soon to forget," said Harleigh, cordially offering him his hand, "for it is to Edward Elliston that I owe my liberation from prison."

"I imagined," said young Elliston, with some embarrassment, "that after the precaution which had been taken to prevent it, the name of the person couldn't transpire."

"I couldn't suffer myself to be the recipient of so signal a favor without making an effort to discover the author of it," replied Harleigh, "though, after all, I must confess that it was revealed to me by what may be termed chance, rather than by any exertion of my own. But why should you wish to conceal what has made me so much your debtor?"

"I hardly know, were I to attempt it, as I could offer any very logical reason for so doing, and will, therefore, only say, that I was sincere in the wish that it should not be made known."

"You didn't care to make my acquaintance, is the only way I can interpret your reluctance," said Harleigh, smiling; "but if you had any graver reason for wishing to avoid me, chance, or Providence, if you will, seems to have overruled your intention by bringing us together at this time. Perhaps, however, you came here with the knowledge that a young girl under the protection of a lady by the name of Elliston, whom I suppose to be your mother, found refuge here last night from a crew of desperadoes?"

"Am I so fortunate? I had consumed the whole day in vain efforts to trace her, and was returning home, thoroughly discouraged, when, on hearing the cries of the lad, I entered."

"I am already so much a debtor to you both," said the Jew, who had thus far stood silently by, "that I can hardly venture to ask of you anything more; yet, if you could be persuaded to remain here till daybreak, we should feel comparatively safe. But I don't ask you to stay in this mean, uncomfortable place. Will you permit me to send word to Abi, my granddaughter, and the young damsel who is with her, that I will bring with me two gentlemen, who have shown themselves to be our friends in the hour of need, to spend an hour or two in their company?"

It was a proposition which neither of them felt in a humor to decline, and Harleigh, having no suspicion that the "young damsel," who had several times been alluded to by the Jew under that appellation, was Alice Dale, was not deterred from giving his consent on account of the promise exacted by Mr. Walworth.

"Don't mention the names of the gentlemen," said the Jew, to Aseneth, who, having listened to the message she was to deliver, turned to leave the room. "It will be a pleasant surprise to our fair guest when she finds that one of them is Edward Elliston."

"And still pleasanter," said Elliston, who was not aware that her name had not been mentioned, "to find that the other is Clarence Harleigh."

When the door was thrown open, which disclosed an apartment such as, in splendor, might have been supposed to compare with those of Aladdin's palace, they were both surprised, after witnessing so much apparent poverty, though they were not ignorant of the shifts which the Jews were obliged to have recourse to, in order to save their wealth from the rapacity of those who, in many instances, did not blush to call themselves Christians. Harleigh, who was in advance of Elliston, stepped back, that he might enter before him.

"The meeting of friends should precede that of strangers," said he.

Elliston, not knowing exactly how to construe this, hesitated a moment, but finding that Harleigh still held back, he entered the room, saying, as he did so, something about the greater pleasure being reserved for the last, the meaning of which was, of course, enigmatical to Harleigh.

Alice, the moment Edward Elliston stepped inside the door, rose and went forward to meet him.

"After all my fears, then, to the contrary," said she, "your mother received the billet I sent her this morning?"

"No; we hadn't received a single word of intelligence in any shape whatever. My finding you here was entirely unexpected."

Harleigh was so surprised at seeing her, whom he thought so far distant, and in the midst of a scene of so much magnificence, that he was almost inclined to doubt the evidence of his own senses, and to believe that he was under the influence of the magic spells of some enchanter. Even if it had been so, he would hardly have cared to be disenthralled, for all the doubts and misgivings which Mildred Daeres and Falkland had succeeded in inspiring him, as respected the constancy of Alice, were, for the time being, forgotten.

As he stood behind Edward Elliston, Alice did not at first see him, and when, as if suddenly roused from a dream, he stepped forward and pronounced her name, she too forgot that the machinations of Falkland and Mildred, as made known to her, previously to her leaving America, by Silas Watkins, must have given him cause to distrust her. Her heartfelt joy at seeing him, which she made no effort to disguise, went far to remove many of those doubts which, though reluctantly admitted, he had been unable to overcome.

When the surprise and excitement of the meeting between her and Harleigh had somewhat subsided, the thoughts of Alice reverted to the opal. Possibly, Harleigh might not know that she had lost it. At any rate, she felt determined, before he took leave, to seek an opportunity to tell him all she herself knew respecting its loss. While these thoughts were yet in her mind, the Jew, taking it from a small casket, handed it to Harleigh.

"Your motive in calling this evening," said he, "was to examine it. You may not find a better opportunity than the present."

As Harleigh took it, he could not forbear looking towards Alice, but though her color heightened, her eyes, which for a moment met his, did not droop. Having examined it, Harleigh returned it without speaking.

"You find it to be the same once in your possession?" said the Jew.

"Yes."

Alice who had been attentively watching him, saw that a shadow was resting on Harleigh's brow. Rising precipitately from the divan, where she was sitting by the side of Abi, she approached him.

"You knew that I had lost that opal, before you came here this evening—did you not?" she inquired.

"I knew that you had parted with it," he replied, gravely.

"You couldn't think that I gave it to Falkland?"

"He has said so, and publicly, too."

"And you believed him?"

Her voice faltered, for in confirmation of her words, the expression of his countenance every moment grew graver and more stern. She paused a short time to recover herself, and then with an earnestness and directness that made every word tell, she related those incidents connected with the loss of the opal, as far as they were known to herself. Her voice, her countenance, her manner, all conspired to give what she said the stamp of truth.

"Are you satisfied?" said she, with a smile, when she had finished.

She hardly would have ventured to ask this question, had she not seen by the clearing away of the clouds that had darkened his brow, the import of what she might expect for an answer.

"I am not only satisfied," he replied, "but am heartily ashamed of having wronged you by paying the slightest heed to those who attempted to deceive me. I have only to ask your forgiveness."

"Which is quite unnecessary, as you know that I am not one of those who hold malice. And now I have a request to make."

"Before you name it, I promise that it shall be granted."

"It is only that you will not seek to deprive Abi, who has been very kind to me, of the rare and costly gem, which, when you gave it to me, I thought to retain as long as I lived; for her claim to it is stronger and still more sacred than mine."

"It was my intention," he replied, "to purchase it of the Jew, and restore it to you."

"You cannot doubt the pleasure its restoration would give me under different circumstances; but the opal belonged to Abi's mother. It was her last gift to her child."

"And for this reason she values it?"

"I cannot describe to you how much."

"It would be next to sacrifice, then, to take it from her."

"When, by a few inadvertent words on my part, she was led to suspect that it was once in my possession, she generously offered to waive her prior claim to it, though I could not but see that parting with it would cost her much pain."

In the meantime, the Jew and Edward Elliston, who were seated at too great a distance from Harleigh and Alice to hear what passed between them, were busily engaged in conversation. Elliston's attention, however, was not so entirely absorbed as to prevent him from seeing that Abi was not only very beautiful, but what, on account of the difference of sex, appeared to him somewhat singular, that she bore a striking resemblance to a gentleman he once saw at his mother's residence, some six or seven years previously. Had it been twice that time, the impression his looks and appearance made on his mind was so deep and vivid, that it still must have remained in all its original freshness.

Her eyes, he particularly noticed, had not the "dazzling sparkle of the Jewish, or Italian black," though by candle-light, and the distance he was seated from her, he was unable to discover their true color. When, however, she raised them suddenly, he saw that they were full of the same brilliant, or, as he thought to himself, glorious light of those of the gentleman in question, and made him seem to his youthful imagination as if belonging to a superior order of beings.

The reserve which his mother maintained respecting him heightened his curiosity, and served, on retrospection, to enhance the excellence of his personal and mental qualities. That his mother and the gentleman had been warm friends, and that he had forfeited her friendship by entering into what she considered an unsuitable, not to say disgraceful matrimonial connection, was the most he could ever learn concerning him, and this was told him by one of his sisters.

As, from time to time, Elliston ventured to examine the countenance of Abi more closely, he was convinced that the general resemblance was exact, differing in nothing, save that superior softness and delicacy which must ever distinguish the features of an eminently handsome woman, the same as a certain freedom and boldness of contour are the indispensable characteristics of true manly beauty.

Edward Elliston had never till now seen a young girl who appeared to him at all comparable with Alice. He even imagined—as the phrase is—that he fell in love with her at first sight. The truly noble and generous traits of his character were, hence, placed in a strong light, when, to save her from the pain and anxiety which a knowledge of Harleigh's imprisonment would have caused her, he secretly effected his release. He now began strongly to suspect that he had been deceived as to the nature of his sentiments towards Alice, and that, compared with those with which the beautiful and fascinating Abi had inspired him, they might with more propriety be placed in the category with those that bear a closer affinity to what may be termed a brotherly regard.

Before Alice had resumed her seat on the divan, Elliston found opportunity to inquire of her if she had heard Abi mention her father.

"Several times," was her answer. "He is not now living."

"Did she tell you his name?"

"Yes, Charles Rushton."

"And that was all she said about him?"

"No; she told me that he wasn't a Jew, and that, after her mother's decease, he lived mostly on the continent."

"Charles Rushton you say his name was?"

"Yes."

Elliston repeated the name to himself. He was certain that he had heard his mother mention it more than once, though she had always refused to tell him the name of the handsome stranger who had so strongly excited his curiosity and made so deep an impression on his mind.

Time passed away so pleasantly, that when, after an absence of a few minutes, the Jew returned to the room, and told them that the morning was breaking, all present heard the announcement with as much surprise as regret. Harleigh and Elliston rose. They must no longer delay their departure.

"Your uncle," said Harleigh, addressing Alice, "will forgive us this involuntary meeting."

"Which must not be made a pretext," said she, "to break the promise he exacted."

Before Harleigh had time to reply, they were joined by Edward Elliston.

"I will hasten home," said he, to Alice, "and will return in my mother's carriage, by the time it is light, as far as the next street, to which, as the Jew informs me, you can obtain ready access, by means of a gate back of the house."

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE ARREST.

It was two hours after midnight, when Falkland, thoroughly roused from a troubled sleep, rose, and having trimmed the lamp, stirred up the fire and sat down before it. He had, as agreed between him and Corkle, the evening previous, sent Redding his valet to the Jew's, and as he had not yet returned, he had reason to believe that there had been no remission on the part of his confederate. He looked anxious, pale and haggard, and started at every noise. At last, light and cautious footsteps were heard in the passage. Then came three low knocks at his door, which, after an interval of half a minute, were followed by three more.

"It is Corkle's signal," said he, rising and unfastening the door.

Neither of them spoke till Corkle had entered and the door was again secured.

"I've been waiting for you, what has seemed to me an age," Falkland then said. "How does the business prosper?"

"Well."

"Redding—is he cured of his curiosity?"

"Yes, and his silence secured, if the cure and the security can be effected by cold steel. You look pale."

"Well I may. I've passed a wretched night."

"Haven't you slept?"

"Yes, such sleep as might sprinkle the frost of fourscore years on a man's head in a single night. My dreams were full of horrible sights and sounds. Even now they haunt me."

"The fresh morning air will take such foolish conceits out of your head."

"Will it soon be light?"

"Yes; the waning moon has risen. It was in its last quarter before this business was thought of."

"May I dare venture abroad?"

"Dare venture abroad!" repeated Corkle, in a sneering tone. "Yes, if you wouldn't draw suspicion on yourself."

"But it seems to me that everybody I meet will read the deed I've consented to in my eye."

"You think that sitting mewed up here all day will carry with it an air of innocence? You are mistaken. 'Twill be the reverse of that."

"I wish I hadn't meddled with the matter. The least sound startles me. Not long before you came, the noise made by a half-starved rat, as I afterward found it to be, nibbling at some bones Redding left by his plate when he ate his supper, made a cold sweat start to my forehead."

"You thought it was his ghost, I suppose; but as giving bones a second picking was a piece of economy he would have despised when living, you might have been certain he wouldn't have taken to it after he was dead, inasmuch, if all be true I've been able to gather on the subject, the same habits cleave to a man that walks after he is dead, as adhered to him when living."

"I wish I could carry as light a heart in my bosom as you do, Hark! Didn't you hear a noise?"

"Yes, the same that may always be heard at this hour. See, the morning light begins to shine in at this east window. The citizens are astir."

"It isn't the same as is always heard. There are footsteps on the stairs; they are bringing the body here."

"There you are mistaken. It hasn't been found yet."

"Not found?"

"Of course not. How could it be seen in the dark? Come, it is time that you were abroad, making loud and earnest inquiries for your valet."

"His name would stick in my throat like Macbeth's amen."

"Say that you sent him to the Jew to pay a hundred pounds, and haven't seen him since."

"Was the body left there?"

"Where do you mean?"

"In the little dark court you spoke of."

"Yes, and the bond you had the good luck to get hold of in the morning is lying close by. It cannot fail to be seen."

"And suspicion will fall on him—I mean the Jew?"

"There can be no doubt of it."

"I would that it might be otherwise. He never did me any harm."

"You should have thought of that before. There's no help for it now, unless you feel disposed to shift the burden of the crime on to your own shoulders, or it may be on to mine. But I've a way to manage that, and you won't dare do it."

"I shan't attempt it."

"It won't be well for you if you do. Come; if we stay chattering here much longer, you'll have the sun staring you in the face, before the fresh morning air has time to take that hangman's look out of it."

"Nothing will take that away. It will betray me. Go without me, Corkle. You can tell the story better than I can, and besides, you will know how to put a bold face on it."

"I shall do no such thing. The part you have to perform isn't one to be done by proxy."

"Well, I'll go."

"You show some sense now. But remember, we musn't be seen together. If we are, it may be the means of bringing suspicion on us both."

Before it was fairly light, the Jew was left alone with his household. Mizar opened the shop-door, and was about to arrange the booth outside, where he was accustomed to stand during the day to attract customers by praising his wares, when the ground, only a few steps distant, which was trampled by those engaged in the struggle that had caused him so much alarm, drew his attention.

On examination, the appearance of the muddy soil showed that, commencing at this spot, some heavy weight had been dragged along, near the front of the building, and thence to the entrance of the court to which Corkle had alluded as he passed it with his comrades. Further than this, the darkness prevented him from seeing; nor was his courage equal to groping his way through the gloom, in search of the ghastly object which he believed was there concealed; for, as is usual in such cases, imagination conjured up a thousand visionary horrors, still more appalling than could have been produced by the reality. He, therefore, returned quickly to the shop, and made known to his master what he had seen.

"May God forbid," said the Jew, much alarmed, "that the body of a murdered person should be found on my premises! It will bring ruin to me, and to all under my protection."

Aseneth had now risen, and as directed by the Jew, took a lamp that had not yet been extinguished, and followed him and Mizar into the court. By holding the light close to the ground, the marks were still traceable, though owing to the superior hardness of the soil, they were much fainter than where they commenced. They terminated at the further side of the court, near a pile of rubbish, but contrary to their fears, they found no one, either murdered or wounded. There was a small pool of blood, however, near the edge of which lay a piece of folded paper, crumpled and defaced by many a sanguinary stain. This the Jew took up, intending to examine it when they returned to the house, thinking it might prove the means of discovering who the person was who had evidently been foully dealt by, or of detecting the perpetrators of the deed.

On closer inspection, they found that the pile of rubbish had been disturbed, and Mizar, in obedience to the command of his master, commenced removing a portion of it, to see if anything was concealed beneath it. He had made but little progress in his task, when, hearing voices, he and the others looked round, and beheld several men standing at the entrance of the court, one of whom, distinguished by the customary badge of his office, they knew to be a magistrate.

"I arrest all three of you, in the king's name," said he, advancing towards them.

"For what reason?" said the Jew.

"You, on a charge of murder, and these your servants as accomplices."

"Who accuses me and my innocent servants of so foul a crime?" demanded the Jew.

"I am not here to answer questions," said he, "but it will be no harm to tell you that your accuser is a gentleman by the name of Gilbert Falkland."

"And whom does he accuse me of murdering?"

"It is hardly necessary that you should be told that it is Redding his valet, whom he sent to you last night to discharge a debt of a hundred pounds, for which you held his bond."

"I didn't see Redding last night, nor has the debt been paid."

"What is that you have in your hand, old man?" said one of the constable's assistants.

"I cannot tell. I found it lying on the ground, and I have not yet had opportunity to examine it."

"I will save you the trouble," said the constable, taking it from him, and unfolding it, he held it to the light, and after some trouble, chirography of whatever description being something of a puzzle to him, he succeeded in deciphering it. "It is Gilbert Falkland's," he added, "which he gave you for the hundred pounds."

"That cannot be," replied the Jew.

"It can be, and of itself would be sufficient evidence of your guilt. It is plain, that to regain possession of it, after it had been paid, urged you to commit the crime."

"The debt hasn't been paid, and, of course, I never gave up the bond."

"See for yourself."

The Jew turned pale as he looked at it, for it was, or appeared to be, as the man had said, a bond for a hundred pounds, written by his own hand, and signed by Gilbert Falkland.

"It looks like the bond," said he, "but it must be a forgery. I saw the true one no longer ago than yesterday morning, which I will show you, if you will go with me into the house."

"All in good time, but first you may as well point out where you have concealed the body of the unfortunate valet."

"I am innocent of his death, and unable to do what you require."

"I see that you are too cunning for me," said the constable; "perhaps your accomplices will prove more manageable."

But he found that threats and promises were alike thrown away on both Aseneth and the boy. They could not by either be prevailed on to implicate their master, by admitting a false accusation to be true.

made his appearance. After returning home, he had discovered that the scarf belonging to Abi, which he had compelled the ruffian who was pursuing her to give up, and which, for present security, he had folded into a small compass and put into his pocket, was still in his possession. Seeing that the entrance of Elliston diverted attention from himself, the Jew spoke to Aseneth.

"Where is the key," said he, "of the back entrance that leads to the gate opening into the next street?"

She answered by placing her hand on her pocket.

"Watch an opportunity, and give it to Edward Elliston. Last night he learned the secret of the door, which will admit him to Abi's retreat."

What passed between them occupied so little time as to be unnoticed, and as the Jew went to a small drawer, which he unlocked, and then drew thence a bundle of papers, his captors gathered round him, and gave Aseneth opportunity to obey her master's request. Placing the key in Elliston's hand, she said, quickly:

"It opens the back door by which Harleigh and Alice Dale went out from here this morning. Abi is where you saw her last night. She knows nothing of what has happened, and my master has no one but you to look to for her protection."

"Tell him to fear nothing on her account. I will see that she is cared for, the same as if she were my sister. But what is the meaning of what I see?"

Aseneth briefly informed him of what had taken place, after he left them.

"But He, who is ever present," she added, "knows that our master and we his servants are guiltless of the great crime laid to our charge."

"Falkland is your accuser?"

"Yes. Redding his valet is missing, and there is reason to believe that he was murdered last night, even at our door."

As Elliston stood listening, happening to look down on the floor, he saw several bloody foot-prints, not fresh, as if made by either of those who had just entered, but so perfectly dry that hours must have elapsed since the imprinting of the ensanguined marks. Part of them were faintly and imperfectly traced, so much so that their true size could not well be made out. The imprint of two alone, near the door, presented a clear and unbroken outline. It needed only a glance, on the part of Elliston, to show him that they were made by a foot much larger than that of the Jew, or either of his servants. Without drawing the attention of those present, he measured the foot-prints, and made a memorandum of the result.

The Jew, having satisfied himself that the bond which Falkland gave him for the hundred pounds was not with the papers where he had always kept it, he turned to the officer who had arrested him.

"I am ready to go," said he; "but let him who has dug for me and my servants this pit, take heed lest he himself fall into it."

As, in going towards the door, he passed near Elliston, he looked at him, and emphatically pronounced the name of Abi. Elliston answered only by an expressive look, which the Jew rightly interpreted.

Alice and Abi had parted with many fond regrets, softened by a secret hope that they should, ere long, meet again. Abi, with the opal clasped in her hand, which Alice could not be persuaded to take from her, as soon as she was alone, threw herself on a pile of cushions. Her thoughts dwelt on Harleigh and on Alice, though most of all, she hardly knew why, on Edward Elliston. Sleep stole upon her, in the midst of these pleasant musings, and the hours which to him, her only relative, and to those who had so faithfully served him and her, were so full of anguish and fear, were to her, for a time, like shadows, brightened now and then with the dawn of a golden dream, but soon lost in utter oblivion.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A WALRUS ATTACK.

The engraving on this page represents a boat's crew in the Arctic regions attacked by walruses. These animals are not naturally ferocious, and rather fly from man than seek to assail him. When sporting in a floe, they post a faithful sentinel upon an iceberg, to warn them of the approach of danger. But when hard pressed, they become angry, and are then formidable antagonists. In our picture, only one of these marine monsters has received his coup de grace from a boarding pike in the hands of a stalwart mariner. The other sailors are defending themselves with tomahawks, while an officer amidsthips is preparing to discharge his carbide point-blank at the head of the most formidable of the group. The towering ice-peaks that rise in the background give an aspect of savage grandeur and sublimity to the exciting scene. The female walruses exhibit a remarkable affection for their young, and often brave death in defending them. When they wish to avenge themselves on boats, or to defend themselves, they fling their young behind, and swim stonily for the boat. The walruses yield an ivory harder, more compact and whiter than that of the elephant, excellent oil, while their flesh is much esteemed. Although their numbers have suffered considerable diminution, they are more plenty on the western coast of Spitzbergen than in Baffin's Bay, Behring's Strait, or any other part of the Arctic seas, except, perhaps, the Isle of Bears. These marine monsters are larger than an ox, and sometimes make a formidable encounter.

BOATS ATTACKED BY WALRUSES, ARCTIC REGIONS.

The constable's assistants, therefore, by his direction, went busily to work; some of them overturning the pile of rubbish, to see if the missing man was buried beneath it, while the others undertook to search the old dilapidated out-house, which was soon found to afford no place of concealment. The only thing of consequence that rewarded their search, was a piece of velvet, to which was attached some tarnished gold lace, and which the keen eyes of Mizar at once detected to be of the same color and quality as a doublet he had seen worn by Falkland, and which, after it had become a little defaced, he had probably transferred to his valet.

"Now," said the constable, "all three of you have the privilege of refreshing yourselves with a morning walk towards Newgate."

"I beseech you," said the Jew, "to first suffer me to make search for the bond. Gilbert Falkland and I had dealings together, yesterday morning, when I saw it among other papers. It will detain you only a few minutes."

"Well, have your way, and search for it, but it will be labor lost, as you will find."

The hope entertained by the Jew of finding it was not very sanguine, for he was nearly satisfied in his own mind, though he dared not give utterance to what he thought, that Falkland had found means to surreptitiously obtain possession of it.

They had scarcely entered the shop, when Edward Elliston

JAPANESE WRESTLERS.

We present on this page two very vivid pictures, representing Japanese wrestlers. The first showing them in training, the second, wrestling within a tent erected expressly for this purpose. They are bulky, but not unwieldy individuals, for they are as famous for their activity as they are for their size. The nobles of the empire keep these men for their own amusement and that of the public, much as Roman gladiators were entertained of old. Their whole lives are spent in developing their muscle, their strength and their skill. The ring within which they encounter is formed by bundles of manilla, and a wrestler is vanquished if thrown within the ring, if forced out of it, or if made to disturb the circle by his antagonist. They are fierce fellows, and death not unfrequently happens in the arena. In the "Americans in Japan," an abridgement of the government account of Perry's expedition, we find a graphic account of the wrestlers at Yokohama, in the Bay of Yedo. The attention of the commodore and his party was suddenly riveted upon a body of monstrous fellows who came tramping down the beach like so many huge elephants. They were professional wrestlers, and formed part of the retinue of the Japanese princes, who keep them for their private amusement and for public entertainments. They were twenty-five in all, and were men enormously tall in stature and immense in weight of flesh. Their scant costume—which was merely a colored cloth about the loins, adorned with fringes, and emblazoned with the armorial bearings of the prince to whose service each belonged—revealed their gigantic proportions, in all the bloated fulness of fat and breadth of muscle. Their proprietors, the princes, seemed proud of them, and were careful to show their points to the greatest advantage before the astonished spectators. Some two or three of the huge monsters were the most famous wrestlers of Japan, and ranked as the champion Tomi Cribbs and Hyers of the land. Koyanagi, the reputed bully of the capital, was one of these, and paraded himself with conscious pride of superior immensity and strength. He was brought especially to the commodore, that he might examine his massive form. The commissioners insisted that the monstrous fellow should be minutely inspected, that the hardness of his well-rounded muscles should be felt, and that the fatness of his cushioned frame should be tested by the touch. The commodore accordingly attempted to grasp his arm, which he found as solid as it was huge, and then passed his hand over the enormous neck, which fell, in folds of massive flesh, like the dew-lap of a prize-ox. As some surprise was naturally expressed at this wondrous exhibition of animal development, the monster himself gave a grunt, expressive of his flattered vanity.

JAPANESE WRESTLERS IN TRAINING.

After this, the commissioners proposed that the commodore and his party should retire to the Treaty House, where they would have an opportunity of seeing the wrestlers exhibit their professional feats. The wrestlers themselves were most carefully provided for, having constantly about them a number of attendants, who were always at hand to supply them with fans, which they often required, and to assist them in dressing and undressing. While at rest, they were ordinarily clothed in richly adorned robes of the usual Japanese fashion; but when exercising, they were stripped naked, with the exception of the cloth about the loins. A circular space of some twelve feet in diameter had been inclosed within a ring, and the ground carefully broken up and smoothed in front of the building. As soon as the spectators had taken their seats, the naked wrestlers were brought out into the ring, and the whole number being divided into two opposing parties, tramped heavily backward and forward, looking defiance at each other, but not engaging in any contest, as their object was merely to parade their points, to give the beholders, as it were, an opportunity to form an estimate of their comparative powers, and to make up their betting-books. They soon retired behind some screens placed for the purpose, where all, with the exception of two, were again clothed in full dress, and took their position on seats in front of the spectators. The two who had been reserved out of the band, now, on the signal being given by the heralds, presented themselves. They came in from behind the screens, and walked slowly into the centre of the ring. Here they ranged themselves, one against the other, at a distance of a few yards. They stood for a while eyeing each other with a wary look, as if both were watching a chance to catch their antagonist off his guard. As the spectator looked on and beheld these overfed monsters, whose animal features had been so carefully and successfully developed, and as he watched them, glaring with brutal ferocity at each other, ready to exhibit the cruel instincts of a savage nature, it was easy for him to lose all sense of their being human creatures, and to persuade himself he was beholding a couple of brute beasts thirsting for one another's blood. As they continued to eye each other, they stamped the ground heavily, pawing with impatience, and then stooping their huge bodies, they grasped handfuls of the earth, and flung it with an angry toss over their backs, or rubbed it impatiently between their palms or under their shoulders. They now crouched down low, still keeping their eyes fixed upon one another and watching each movement, and in a moment they had both simultaneously heaved their massive frames in opposing force, body to body, with a shock that might have stunned an ox. The equilibrium of their monstrous persons was hardly disturbed by the encounter, the effect of which was but barely visible in the quiver of the hanging flesh of their bodies. As they came together, they had flung their brawny arms about each other, and were now entwined in a desperate struggle, with all their strength, to throw their antagonist. Their great muscles rose with the distinct outline of the sculptured form of a colossal Hercules, their bloated faces swelled up with gushes of red blood, which seemed almost to burst through the skin, and their huge bodies palpitated with savage emotion as the struggle continued. At last one of the antagonists fell with his immense weight upon the ground, and being declared vanquished, he was assisted to his feet and conducted from the ring. These wrestlers are often so immense in flesh, that they appear to have lost their distinctive features, and seem enfolded in masses of fat. Their eyes are barely visible through a long perspective of socket, their heads are almost directly set upon their bodies, with only folds of flesh where the neck and chin are usually found, and from their herculean size are capable of great strength. Altogether they form a curious feature in Japanese life, and, as we have said before, are regarded with high favor.

THE WRESTLING TENT.—A JAPANESE NATIONAL SPORT.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

VERSES SUGGESTED BY A LIKENESS.

BY WILLIE E. FAVOR.

Words are weak the thoughts to utter
Born when scanning this fair face;
My poor heart can only flutter
Like a bird in airy space,
When the hunter's fatal dart
Pierces to its beating heart.

But the arrows from the quiver
Of these dear, enchanting eyes,
Flash like white pearls from the river:
And they give as sweet surprise
As on desert wanderers' eyes
Elin's wells and palm-trees rise.

And the thought that comes with hoping,
Though the fair face is withdrawn,
Lingers still—life's future sloping
To a green and sunny lawn;
And my heart, with joy elate,
Frames the sweet thought's final fate.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE MENDICANT CHILD.

BY EMMA CARHA.

"WHAT an offensive looking little creature that child is!" exclaimed Mrs. Carnes, giving a contemptuous glance toward a little pale girl who stood near the glowing grate in her friend's, Mrs. Stevens's, large parlor, with her tiny red hands outstretched toward the fire and her eyes bent on the flowers of the rich rug at her feet. "I declare," she continued, "I don't see how you can bear to use such familiarity with such distressed-looking objects. Anything for me but soiled faces and tattered-demon costumes. Question such specimens of humanity till doomsday and they would always tell you the same story,—dead father, sick mother, and half a dozen juvenile brothers and sisters to feed."

Mrs. Stevens did not answer her morning caller, but lifting her eyes from the careworn face of the child, she bent on her heartless acquaintance a look so full of meaning that Mrs. Carnes made no further remark concerning the little beggar who had just given a gentle rap at the side door, and when it was opened by Mrs. Stevens, who was standing near, had timidly asked for a piece of bread. The kind-hearted Mrs. Stevens saw that the child's features looked benumbed, and that she had the appearance of having been long in the cold; so inviting her to come in and warm her, she threw open the parlor door for her to enter, as that fire was the nearest to where she stood. As the remarks of Mrs. Carnes fell on the child's ear, she raised the corner of her tattered shawl and passed it to her eyes, and then saying, in a whisper, that she was warm enough now, she turned to go, but Mrs. Stevens gently took her hand, saying:

"Stop, little girl, you have not told me your name yet, neither have you partaken of anything to eat."

"I don't feel hungry now, ma'am," answered the child, glancing at Mrs. Carnes and trying to smooth the muscles of her face; but her effort proved vain, for as the kind hostess took her hand, she burst into smothered sobs of grief, and it was several minutes ere she could restrain her tears.

"Why, la! what a silly little thing that is," remarked Mrs. Carnes, rising and moving towards the door. "If she takes what I say so much to heart, why I think I will leave." And after a few complimentary remarks the morning caller passed out to her carriage, while the beggar child remained on the little low ottoman where Mrs. Stevens seated her when she waited on her visitor to the door.

"What is your name, my dear?" asked Mrs. Stevens when she returned to the grate, and had given a quick pull to a silken cord that dangled against the wall near by.

"Julia, ma'am," answered the girl, looking around to see if any one was present but themselves.

"That is a very pretty name," said Mrs. Stevens, "and Igness you are a pretty good little girl," she continued, as if to draw the child into conversation and cause her to forget the previous remarks of Mrs. Carnes. "Have you a father?"

Julia remembered the words of the morning visitor and she hesitated to answer, while her face flushed to a deep crimson, and then a moment later, when she saw the kind expression that beamed on the face of her interrogator, she answered, while her lips trembled:

"I had a father a little while ago, but we lived in a damp house and father took cold and was very sick, and then one day he kissed us all and went to heaven."

Julia tried to crush back her tears, but scarcely was the sentence finished when her voice became choked, and she burst into fresh grief as the recollection of former scenes came over her. Mrs. Stevens tried to soothe her, asking no more questions, but telling her that she had some nice little dresses that her little girl used to wear, which she should give her after she had eaten her breakfast. Ere the child had time to answer, the parlor door was gently opened by Jenny, the nursery girl. As she stepped near the grate to inquire the wishes of her mistress, she gave a pleasant glance at the child, who returned her look with an expression that showed they had met before. Mrs. Stevens noticed the glances exchanged, but made no remark concerning them; she only said:

"Jenny, you take this little girl into the dining-room and give her a good breakfast, and while she is eating it you return to me."

The nursery maid bowed respectfully, and then taking Julia by the hand she led her from the room. How the beggar child's eyes sparkled as she saw the glistening plate that had not been removed from the sumptuously furnished breakfast table in the well-warmed dining-room!

"The kind lady that lives here is very rich!" she exclaimed as she looked around. "O, how poor mother would cry if she should see all these nice things! She always cries when she goes into rich folks' houses."

Jenny's lip trembled, and she raised the corner of her white apron to her eyes; but she did not speak, and a few moments later Julia was drinking warm milk from a silver cup, while before her on the white breakfast plate was spread a variety that would be tempting to an epicure. And now the girl returned to the parlor in compliance with her mistress's request.

"Do you know that child, Jenny?" inquired Mrs. Stevens.

"Yes ma'am."

"Can you tell me anything concerning the history of the family?"

"Well, not much, ma'am. The first time I saw the poor child was at the beginning of winter. One night when it was growing quite dark, I was coming up the street from my sister's and I heard a child crying in a dark court that led off to some little dingy houses, and as I stopped and listened she came up to me and asked me to show her where her mother lived. After questioning her awhile I found out the name of the street, and then I turned and went back with her. She had got lost and had strayed a great way from home, but I was never sorry that I went with her, for I think I have been more contented with my lot ever since."

"Then you found her parents very poor, Jenny?" asked Mrs. Stevens, seeming to be very much interested.

"Yes, ma'am, poor indeed; and her father so sick that he has since died and left her mother with three little children dependent on her—Julia is the eldest. O, ma'am, it would 'a' made your heart ache to see them as I did!" And here Jenny commenced to draw a verbal picture of the scene; but Mrs. Stevens interrupted her by saying:

"Why didn't you tell me of this before? Perhaps I might have been of service to them this cold winter."

"You have been of service to her, ma'am," replied the girl, modestly; "but knowing how kind-hearted you are, I did not like to trouble you with any more cases of sorrow, for it is a hard thing to be obliged to see suffering and know that you can't help everybody."

"But you say I helped Julia's parents. How did I help them?"

"You only helped the mother and the children, ma'am; for the father died a few days after I went there, and then one day when I called in to see if they still lived in the rickety little tenement, I found Mrs. Larson, Julia's mother, working a beautiful skirt, and there was some nice sewing on the table too; so I asked her if she would like to get sewing to do, and then I told her my mistress put out a great deal of sewing, and I thought I could get it for her to do. O, ma'am, you ought to have seen how thankful she was, and she pressed her thin white hands to her face as if she was afraid she would show too much joy at the prospect of getting work."

"Then the embroidery and fine sewing that I gave you to get done you carried to her to do?"

"Yes, ma'am, for Mrs. Martin, the one that used to do your nice work, has a fine, strong husband to bring everything she needs into the house to her, and all the money you ever pay her goes for finery, so I thought it was better to give the work to poor Mrs. Larson, and let her have the money to buy bread for her children."

"That was perfectly right, Jenny; but you should have told me that such a family needed help. But didn't the poor woman tell you anything of her history?"

"No, ma'am; she don't seem to like to talk much, so I have never asked her many questions."

At this moment the parlor door was gently opened, and Julia's meek blue eyes looked in on her benefactress.

"Thank you, ma'am," she said, timidly, and then added with a slight tremor in her manner, "Please, ma'am, I didn't eat all the cake. Would you be so kind as to let me take the rest of what is on the plate and give it to my mother? Perhaps it will make her feel a great deal better to have some nice cake: it made me feel a great deal better."

Mrs. Stevens drew her costly handkerchief from her pocket and pressed it to her eyes, and then answered:

"Yes, darling, you shall have some cake to carry to your mother. But tell me the name of the street where you live and the number of your house, Julia."

"The folks in the street call it Mud Lane, but mother says I must not call it so, for it is only low-minded persons that call it so; and since she told me that I call it the same name she does, Fowler's Court, and we live up two pair of stairs."

Mrs. Stevens drew a little memorandum-book from her pocket, and lifting a heavy gold pencil from a slender case on the table near, she traced a few lines in the book, then turning to Jenny, she said:

"Take Julia to your chamber now and dress her in a new suit of clothes; take them from among those that Lizzie wore last season, they will fit her better; and then give her that dark blue woolen plaid dress, and other little articles that you will know how to select, and when you have her curls brushed and she is all dressed, lead her into the parlor again. I shall want to see her."

"Yes, ma'am, I will do all as you desire," answered the girl, while her face was all of a glow with pleasure; and taking Julia by the hand she led her to a neatly furnished chamber adjoining the nursery.

Scarcely had the parlor door closed when another door on the opposite side of the room was opened, and Mr. Stevens stepped from the library to the parlor, and after greeting his wife with a kindly smile, he was about passing into the hall and from thence into the street.

"Alvino," spoke the wife, rising and going to his side, "I want to talk with you a moment."

"Well, be rather brief, dear, for I ought to have been at the office before this; but I was not aware it was so late."

Mr. Stevens seated himself by the glowing grate, and the wife drew a chair near him, and then laying her head on his, she said:

"Husband, I am afraid our dear little Lizzie will never be any better. Every day I can see that she talks less and seems more feeble."

Mr. Stevens's face grew pale and a deep sigh welled up from his heart, then pressing his wife's hand, he said:

"We must summon another physician, Eliza."

"No, husband, Lizzie does not need medicine. I think a gentle, loving, little companion would do her more good than anything a doctor could give. She is very lonely, shut up as she must be from this frosty air with no one around her but those who cannot sympathize in a child's plays. I think she ought to have a companion—some little girl about her own age, that will be kind and willing to bear without retaliating any little nervous remark she may make."

"Well, wife, of course you are at liberty to do as you please, but this seems like a novel idea to me. Where can you get such a child as you want? for all children are more or less irritable; and you know that our little Lizzie has always been such a pet that it would almost kill her to be spoken to unkindly."

"I have thought of all the disadvantages as well as the advantages," returned the wife; "and the conclusion I have come to is that Lizzie's disease is curable, and that we must obtain for her a companion of about her own age."

"Where can you get one, Eliza? Few parents would be willing to part with a child of Lizzie's tender years."

"I know it, husband; but one came to the door this morning that had such a sweet voice and pleasant manners that the first look she gave me seemed to penetrate to my heart. By inquiry I learned that her father died recently and left her mother with three little children to support; and now, husband, so interested have I become in this child, that if I could get the consent of the mother, I should like to adopt her little daughter. Her support would be but a small item to us; and O, how happy it would make our dear little girl to have such a playmate to love!"

"Why, Eliza," said the husband, smiling faintly, "you are getting enthusiastic. You say she is a strange child that came to the door to ask for bread; why, she may be the daughter of very vicious parents, and if you should adopt her she might cause you many hours of sorrow."

"Never, husband; never was a child of her angelic expression possessed of vicious parents. Such modesty and affection as she has shown bespeaks her teacher to be of a high order."

Mr. Stevens did not answer the last remark, for light footsteps were now heard in the adjoining room, and in another moment Julia stood before them, but so different did she look now from what she did a half hour previous that Mrs. Stevens, ere she was aware, exclaimed, "How beautiful!" But on this morning's scene it does not suit our purpose to dwell. We will pass to the next day about the same hour, when Mrs. Stevens's carriage drew up in a narrow court where were located some half dozen houses whose only purpose seemed to be to offer a partial protection to the shivering inmates and to enrich heartless landlords.

When Mrs. Stevens dismissed Julia the previous day, she told her to inform her mother that she should call on her the next morning, so the appearance in the narrow court of such an equipage as the one owned by Squire Stevens did not create that surprise it would have done had not Julia delivered her message correctly, and then added a description of the interior of the large mansion as far as it was seen by her while being led from room to room by Jenny. Mrs. Stevens alighted from the soft cushions of her coach and was met at the outer door of her comfortable home by the little mendicant of yesterday, whose face was wreathed into a broad smile of welcome as she guided her benefactor up the narrow winding stairs to the dark room occupied by her mother. As the low door to the chamber was thrown back, Mrs. Stevens discovered in the further corner of the room a narrow bed, and on being led to it by the child she saw that a thin, pale cheek was pressed against the soiled pillow. A moment later the invalid raised her hand and gently grasping that of Mrs. Stevens, she said:

"Heaven bless you, madam! If the prayers of a widow and her orphans can save you from affliction you will never know sorrow. I feel that I can never feel grateful enough for the benefits you bestowed on me yesterday." And then clasping her thin hands together, she burst into a paroxysm of grief as she continued: "Had it not been that my children were suffering for bread I would not—I could not have hidden Julia go into the streets in quest of food. But O, I could not lie here and see them die of hunger, while I knew there were those in this great city who, did they know of our distress, would gladly relieve us!"

"You are under no obligation to me for any little favor that I may have done you," replied the kind-hearted Mrs. Stevens, "so we will not speak of these things now—we will wait till some other time when you get a little stronger. I will now tell you my errand here to-day, and then I think I can procure for you a more comfortable tenement, in a court leading off from the street where I live."

The invalid closed her eyes for a moment, and then opening them she pressed the little one that rested on her arm to her bosom, saying:

"Gladly would I leave this gloomy place; but alas! I cannot pay for a better home."

"O, don't let the payment of the rent of the little tenement of which I have spoken annoy you in the least, for I will become responsible to the owner," and then she added, with a pleasant smile: "He is my husband, and will rejoice as much as I to have some one living there who can do our family sewing, for Jenny Gray tells me you have been my seamstress all winter, though it was unknown to me at the time. But I must not make my stay too long, so I will just say that I have a little girl about the age of your little Julia, who is a very delicate child, and I should like to obtain your little daughter to spend a few weeks at least with us, to be company for Lizzie. When you get into the little cottage back of us you will be so near that she can run in and see you every day; and if she is a good girl—and I doubt not that she will be—either you or she shall lose by doing us the favor."

Reader, did you ever see a mother with the last ray of hope almost crushed from her soul, and then in a moment, as if by magic, see a gleam of prosperity arouse her dormant energies to activity? If you have, then you can in fancy picture to yourself the effect of the words that the benevolent Mrs. Stevens uttered to the invalid. So sudden was the transition from woe to joy, that although Mrs. Larson had strength to raise her form to an almost upright position, her emotion was too great for her to give utterance in speech. At length the overworn mother, leaning once more on her pillow, said:

"Excuse me, madam, if I appear weak and childish; for this sudden passing, mentally, from intense darkness to the maintenance of my helpless children in the future, to broad rays of hope that they will be comfortable, has almost overpowered my reason."

But we will dwell no longer on the scene we have introduced, for in a few moments Mrs. Stevens placed in the hand of the destitute one a sufficient sum of money to make her and the little ones around her comfortable, and then promising to see that everything was speedily arranged for her removal, she took the little Julia by the hand and returned to her carriage. This interview had confirmed the previous opinion of Mrs. Stevens that Mrs. Larson had not always been in indigent circumstances; and yet she had too much delicacy of feeling to question her or her child for the present.

When Mrs. Stevens arrived home she gave Julia into the care of her faithful nursery-girl, telling her to take her to the bath-room, and after being bathed and her curls brushed, to dress her neatly in another suit that Lizzie had once worn, after which she would take her to the presence of her own child. Mrs. Stevens would not have had to order the bath had not the suffering mother been an invalid; but if those who would condemn the appearance of Julia after being dressed so nicely the previous day, could change situations with the destitute mother, perhaps they might realize that there are situations in life where even the necessities for a bath are difficult to be obtained. When the little Julia was again led into the presence of Mrs. Stevens she could no longer repress her joy, but going timidly to the side of her benefactress, she said:

"I love you, ma'am, almost as well as I do my own dear mother, and I know that I shall love little Lizzie too, that Jenny has been telling me about." And the beautiful child raised her white arms as though she would fain wind them around the neck of her who had dealt so kindly with her.

"Come here, darling," exclaimed Mrs. Stevens; and taking the child by the wrist she lifted her to her lap, and while her jewelled arms clasped the tiny figure of the former mendicant, she pressed her lips to her forehead, and the gladness with which that caress was received more than paid the kind-hearted mother of Lizzie for all she had bestowed.

A month passed away, and there was a marked improvement in the health of the rich man's child, for she now began to be interested in the fancied beauty of the misshapen dolls that the happy little Julia manufactured; and in company with her pet companion she began to perform various gymnastics that without the inventive genius of Julia she would never have known. Another month passed, and Lizzie was no longer confined to the nursery for the lack of sufficient strength or energy to roam from room to room, but now she could skip and dance with her healthy little companion; and together they enjoyed healthful walks even in the keen air of the first months of spring.

Late one afternoon in the beginning of the May following the above events, Mrs. Stevens threw a shawl carelessly over her shoulders, and passing a few steps down a narrow court leading to the rear of her house, she entered the neat little house of Mrs. Larson, and after a half hour's stay and a few introductory remarks, she said:

"Mrs. Larson, when you were in feeble health I said nothing to you concerning your past history, but now when you are well and comfortably situated, excuse me if I am inquisitive. That you were always in indigent circumstances every day convinces me more and more is not true. And now, if it is not asking too much of you, I should like to know something of your past history."

"It would be ungrateful in me not to gratify you," answered the one addressed; "and yet to make the past known can be of no benefit to me now, but I will tell it to you in a few words. I was married very young, and at the time of my marriage uniting my husband's property with mine made us wealthy; but still Edward was not contented, and before we had been married a year he sold all belonging to us, and with the proceeds of the sale we started for Australia, but before we reached there the vessel was wrecked and we lost everything but our lives. The ten years of suffering and poverty that I endured in a foreign land I will not detail now; but during this time I could not prevail on Edward to return to our native city. Each year he thought the next he should retrieve his fortune. But at length hope departed, and with but a trifle more than enough to pay our expenses we left Australia, hoping once more to join those we loved. During our absence we have often written to my mother and sister whom we left in my native city, but not a line have we ever received from them in return, nor do I know that they are living; for since I have been here I have written to other friends residing in the same place, and they tell me that mother left there some eight years ago in company with my sister, who was married and went away to dwell. We should have gone directly to my native inland city, but when we arrived here my husband's health failed rapidly, and—and—"

Mrs. Larson's emotion at this point of her narrative choked her utterance; and now, reader, we will not take up the conversation between the two friends, but will hasten on to a scene enacted a few days later. Mrs. Carnes was Mrs. Stevens's guest again, and in continuation of previous remarks, the visitor said:

"Well, Mrs. Stevens, I must say that was a novel idea taking a child from the midst of squalid poverty and raising her to the companionship of your only child. I guess the little mendicant was born under a lucky star."

"There is nothing like fancy in making choice of companions," returned Mrs. Stevens, pleasantly; and then added, as she stepped across the parlor and gave a sudden pull to a silken cord: "Although you have heard me speak of Julia often since she has been an inmate of our family, I think you have not seen her since the morning she made me the first call."

In another moment Julia entered the room, and for some time Mrs. Carnes did not speak, and then calling the child to her she took her on her knee and inquired her name.

"Julia Larson," returned the child.

"That was the name of my only sister, who perished on board the Leon on her way to Australia," returned Mrs. Carnes, with a look of sorrow on her face that seemed out of place on the features of one who was usually so light-hearted, and then after another moment she added: "And I declare, she looks as sister did too."

"It is not strange that she should," remarked Mrs. Stevens, "for she is your sister's child."

A few words more of explanation and Mrs. Stevens and Mrs. Carnes took their way to the cottage in the court. The meeting of the sisters we will not attempt to describe, nor the joy of the aged mother when she, whom she had mourned as being lost on board of that fatal ship, was once more restored to her arms. No letter from Mrs. Larson had ever reached the mother or sister from the time she left her home to the present hour. In Mrs. Larson's absence a wealthy aunt of her husband's had died, and her property now came into the possession of the widow and her children.

Mrs. Stevens had often heard the light-spoken but not unkind-hearted Mrs. Carnes say that her only sister was lost while on a voyage to Australia, and when she heard the history of little Julia's mother, and mentally compared her features with those of Mrs. Carnes's she felt that the mendicant child was the wealthy lady's niece. From this time Mrs. Carnes was more guarded in her speech, while, although Mrs. Stevens did not adopt her little favorite, she felt repaid for what she had done by the restoration of her own child to health.

THE FLEA MARKET.

One would think it were easy enough to procure troops of fleas and to train them to perform; but it appears that neither is an easy matter. It is not easy to procure a lot of able-bodied fleas, and it is not every sort of flea that will do. They must be human fleas; dog fleas, cat fleas, and bird fleas are of no use—they are not lively enough, nor strong enough, and soon break down in their training. Human fleas, therefore, must be obtained; and our friend has created a market for them. The dealers are principally elderly females, who supply the raw material. The trade price of fleas, moreover, like the trade price of everything else, varies, but the average price is three pence a dozen. In the winter time it is six pence; and, on one occasion, the trader was obliged to give the large sum of sixpence for one single flea. He had arranged to give a performance—the time arrived—he unpacked the fleas—one whose presence could not be dispensed with was gone. What was to be done? The vacancy must be filled. At last an ostler, paying the manager's distress, supplied the necessary animal, but he required sixpence for it, and sixpence he got. Fleas are not always brought to market in phial bottles. A flea proprietor told us he got all his best fleas from Russia, and that they came over in pill boxes, packed in the finest cotton wool. These fleas were big, powerful, and good workers. When our friend in Marylebone makes his annual tour in the provinces, his wife sends him weekly a supply of fleas in the corner of an envelope, packed in tissue-paper. She is careful not to put them in the corner where the stamp goes, as the post-office clerk would, with his stamp marker, at one blow smash the whole of the stock.—Dickens's Household Words.

MUSIC.

Music has not the same charms for all ears. It is not an art which requires to be cultivated, for a correct appreciation of it. There is a spontaneous outburst of natural melody which touches the soul of every created being, but this is not the harmony in which the excellence and delight of opera consists. This harmony is the production of an artificial combination of sounds founded upon natural principles, but so intricate in their arrangement, and so scientifically accurate, that the individual who has not made the art his special study, or who has not acquired sufficient delicacy of taste by hearing repeatedly the best illustrations and examples, is very likely to be disappointed with operatic performances, though conscious himself of his subjection to the influence of sweet sounds. Even Dr. Johnson, whose moral organization was certainly not less perfect than his critical acumen and great mental grasp, had no ear for musical refinement. When asked to admire a concerted piece, very difficult of execution, his reply was characteristic of this defect in his aesthetic education. "I wish," said he, "it had been so difficult as to be impossible." There are others who have felt the same when listening to the difficult music of some of our orchestras.—Philadelpia Ledger.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

GLEN AUBRA.

BY CHARLES FARRER.

Mysteries are rife—Even now in this, the wise,
The glorious noonday of enlightenment,
Though all around conspires to open our eyes,
And make the crooked plain—though we consent,
May boast our modern lore, and wonder oft
That there be any wonders now-a-days—
Yet simple men, with shallow pates and soft,
See many mysteries in life's every phase.
And oftentimes, too, men of deeper mind
Scratch their wise heads in wonderment resigned.

Glen Aubra, then I sing! Mysterious spot,
That ever puzzles each deep mental power,
We only know thou art—not where, nor what:
Villages or villages, mansion, hall or tower.
Ne'er longed the hero for his fount of youth,
Ne'er wished brave knight in fight to wield his brand,
Ne'er sought the earnest student after truth,
Ne'er sighed the lover for his mistress' hand,
More anxiously, more earnestly, than we,
Glen Aubra, long to know and learn of thee!

Thou hast, we know, a master—Yet 'tis he,
Fancy will oft assure us, is a myth.
To us he is, like thee, a mystery;
'Tis true he bears the illustrious name of Smith,
And we are told his sponsors christened him
After the noble "Father of his land"
But whether he be small and weak of limb,
Or large and stout, or six feet high does stand—
A princely man, above the common lot,
Or one of humble carriage, we know not.

But this we do know. It is understood
He is a widower past the prime of life,
And for a guardian meet of his small brood
Of children, looks around to find a wife.
Thou dost the stranger our attention claim;
For if with truth speaks Madam Rumor's voice,
He invades our circle with hymeneal aim,
And our loved Nettle makes his darling choice.
Thou makes our curiosity, and we,
Glen Aubra, seek in vain to learn of thee!

But if thou art a mystery so deep
That we in sooth thy charms may never see,
This charge do we, Glen Aubra, bid thee keep:
If lovely Nettle thy fair mistress be,
Her shelter be thou from life's tempests wild,
Thy skies for her shine ever pure and clear,
For her float sweet perfumes on zephyrs mild,
Brighter thy flowers bloom her heart to cheer:
Bid all thy beauties vie with friendly strife,
To grace her loveliness and bless her life.

And thou, mysterious man! Glen Aubra's lord—
For whom fate still demands from us a thought:
Heed, we beseech, our earnest, parting word,
And may thy life with happiness be fraught.
Let our dear Nettle ever have thy love,
And cherish hers, which thou shalt thus command:
Strong as the lion, gentle as the dove,
Steadily protect, yet rule with loving hand—
And by affection crowned a sovereign,
Reign mildly thus, the Monarch of the Glen!

RULES FOR HOME EDUCATION.

The following rules are worthy of being printed in letters of gold and placed in a conspicuous place in every household:

1. From your children's earliest infancy, inculcate the necessity of instant obedience.
2. Unite firmness with gentleness. Let your children always understand that you mean what you say.
3. Never promise them anything unless you are quite sure you can give them what you say.
4. If you tell a little child to do something, show him how to do it, and see that it is done.
5. Always punish your children for wilfully disobeying you, but never punish them in anger.
6. Never let them perceive that they vex you or make you lose your self command.
7. If they give way to petulance or ill temper, wait till they are calm, and then gently reason with them on the impropriety of their conduct.
8. Remember that a little present punishment when the occasion arises, is much more effectual than the threatening of a greater punishment should the fault be renewed.
9. Never give your children anything because they cry for it.
10. On no account allow them to do at one time what you have forbidden, under the same circumstances, at another.
11. Teach them that the only sure and easy way to appear good is to be good.
12. Accustom them to make their little recitals with perfect truth.
13. Never allow of tale-bearing.
14. Teach them self-denial, not self-indulgence, of an angry and resentful spirit.—Home Illustrated.

OCCUPATION OF THE AGRICULTURIST.

No man is so high as to be independent of the success of this great interest; no man is so low as not to be affected by its prosperity or decline. Agriculture feeds us; to a great degree it clothes us; without it we could not have manufactures, and we should not have commerce. These all stand together, but they stand together like pillars in a cluster, the largest in the centre, and that largest is agriculture. We live in a country of small farms and freehold tenements; a country in which men cultivate with their own fee-simple acres, drawing not only their subsistence, but also their spirit of independence and manly freedom from the ground they plow. They are at once its owners, cultivators and defenders. The cultivation of the earth is the most important labor of men. Man may be civilized, in some degree, without great progress in manufactures, and with little commerce with his distant neighbors; but without cultivation of the earth, he is, in all countries a savage. When tillage begins, other arts follow. The farmers, therefore, are the founders of human civilization.—Daniel Webster.

ST. LOUIS GATE, QUEBEC, CANADA.

QUEBEC AND MONTREAL.

In Vol. IX. of the Pictorial, we presented several spirited sketches of different locations of interest in both of the above cities, and from the pencil of the same artist, Mr. Kilburn, whose fidelity requires no vouch. We now continue the series, which will prove, doubtless, particularly acceptable at this season, when the attention of the travelling public is turned northward. The drawings from which our engravings are made, were all taken recently on the spot, and expressly for the Pictorial. As we have, on a former occasion, given a pretty full description of both cities, it is not necessary to recapitulate their principal features.—The first view is of St. Louis gate; its architecture is faithfully depicted, as well as the characteristic figures and vehicles of the locality.—The next picture depicts one of the Martello towers on the far-famed plains of Abraham. There are four of these towers of a similar structure, and they served as outworks for the defence of the city.—The St. Johns gate, that through which one passes to the plains of Abraham, is the subject of our third engraving. It is represented as seen from without.—Quebec is associated with both our colonial and revolutionary fame, and, at the hazard of repeating a "twice-told tale," we will venture to refresh the memories of our readers by a repetition of the military events to which we refer.—The capture of Quebec, in 1759, was the most brilliant and important event that took place during the French war; it gave the death blow to the French power in America. The command of the important expedition against Quebec was entrusted to Gen. James Wolfe, a young officer who had distinguished himself at the capture of Louisbourg. The army, amounting to 8000 men, landed in June, on the island of Orleans, below Quebec.

almost incredible enterprise was effected in the night; and by daylight, September 13, the army was formed and ready to meet the enemy. The battle which took place, is thus described by Mr. Goodrich, in his History of the United States. "To Montcalm, the intelligence that the English were occupying the heights of Abraham, was most surprising. The impossibility of ascending the precipice he considered certain, and therefore had taken no measures to fortify its line. But no sooner was he informed of the position of the English army, than he perceived a battle no longer to be avoided, and prepared to fight. Between 9 and 10 o'clock, the two armies, about equal in numbers, met face to face. The battle now commenced. Inattentive to the fire of a body of Canadians and Indians, 1500 of whom Montcalm had stationed in the corn-fields and boshes, Wolfe directed his troops to reserve their fire for the main body of the French, now rapidly advancing. On their approach within forty yards, the English opened their fire, and the destruction was immense. The French fought bravely, but their ranks became disordered, and notwithstanding the repeated efforts of their officers to form them and renew the attack, they were so successfully pushed by the British bayonet, and hewn down by the Highland broadsword, that their discomfiture was complete. During the action, Montcalm was on the French left, and Wolfe on the English right, and here they

The city of Quebec stands on a rock, at the confluence of Charles and Iroquois Rivers; it is naturally a place of great strength, and was defended by a force of 10,000 men, under the command of Gen. Montcalm. Gen. Wolfe had to contend with immense difficulties, and after having failed in several attempts to reduce the city, he conceived the bold project of ascending, with his troops, a steep, craggy cliff, of from 150 to 200 feet, by which he would reach the plains of Abraham, south and west of the city. This both fell in the critical moment that decided the victory. Early in the battle, Wolfe received a ball in the wrist, but binding his handkerchief around it, he continued to encourage his men. Soon after, another ball penetrated his groin; but this wound, although much more severe, he concealed, and continued to urge on the contest, till a third bullet pierced his breast. He was now obliged, though reluctant, to be carried to the rear of the line. General Monkton succeeded to the command, but was immediately wounded, and conveyed away. In this critical state of the action, the command devolved on Gen. Townsend. Gen. Montcalm, fighting in front of his battalion, received a mortal wound about the same time, and Gen. Jennezerger, his second in command, fell by his side. Wolfe died in the field, before the battle was ended; but he lived long enough to know that the victory was his. While leaning on the shoulder of a lieutenant, who knelt to support him, he was seized with the agonies of death; at this moment was heard the distant sound, 'They fly, they fly.' The hero raised his drooping head, and eagerly asked, 'Who fly?' Being told that it was the French, 'Then,' he replied, 'I die happy,' and expired. 'This death,' says Professor Silliman, 'has furnished a grand and pathetic subject for the painter, the poet, and the historian; and, (considered as a specimen of mere military glory), it undoubtedly is one of the most sublime that the annals of war afford. Montcalm was every way worthy of being the competitor of Wolfe. In talents, in military skill, in personal courage, he was not his inferior. Nor was his death much less sublime. He lived to be carried to the city, where his last moments were employed in writing, with his own hand, a letter to the English general, recommending the French prisoners to his care and humanity. When informed that his wound was mortal, he replied, 'I shall not then live to see the surrender of Quebec.' It was at Quebec, also, that the gallant Montgomery fell, during the war of our Revolution.

MARTELLO TOWER, PLAINS OF ABRAHAM, QUEBEC.

ST. JOHNS GATE, QUEBEC, CANADA.

Richard Montgomery, a major general in the army of the United States, was born in the north of Ireland, in the year 1737. He possessed an excellent genius, which was nurtured by a fine education. Entering the army of Great Britain, he successfully fought her battles with Wolfe, at Quebec, in 1759, on the very spot where he was doomed to fall, when fighting against her, under the banners of freedom. After his return to England, he quitted his regiment, in 1772, though in a fair way of preferment. He had imbibed an attachment for America, viewing it as the rising seat of arts and freedom. After his arrival in this country, he purchased an estate in New York, about a hundred miles from the city, and married a daughter of Judge Livingston. He now considered himself as an American. When the struggle with Great Britain commenced, as he was known to have an ardent attachment to liberty, and had expressed his readiness to draw his sword on the side of the colonies, the command of the continental forces, in the northern department, was entrusted to him and Gen. Schuyler, in the fall of 1775. By the indisposition of Schuyler, the chief command devolved upon him in October. He reduced Fort Chamblée, and on the 3d of November captured St. John's. On the 12th he took Montreal. In December he joined Col. Arnold, and marched to Quebec. The city was besieged, and on the last day of the year it was determined to make an assault. The several divisions were accordingly put in motion, in the midst of a heavy fall of snow, which concealed the enemy. Montgomery advanced at the head of the New York troops along the St. Lawrence, and having assisted with his own hands in pulling up the pickets, which obstructed his approach to one of the barriers he which is perhaps unequalled in any other American city. And, although the prospects from the land side are not quite so imposing, they are all agreeable; and that from the Cote des Neiges road (which crosses the spur of the mountain that overlooks the city) is, taken altogether, one of the finest in this part of the world. The population of the city is about 65,000, and the number of inhabited houses about 8500. It is divided into nine wards, and is municipally governed by a mayor, aldermen and council, elected by householders who pay an annual rent of forty-five dollars or upwards, or persons who own real estate producing that amount of rent annually."

SPEED OF STEAM VESSELS.

"What will ultimately be the sustained and working speed of steamships?" asks an essayist. When railroads were first thought of, a speed of ten miles an hour was all that was anticipated; yet a sustained speed of sixty miles, and a working speed of forty miles an hour, have been attained. Steamers, of course, can never compete with railways in speed, because the resistance of the atmosphere and wheel friction is much less than that of water; but the speed of steam vessels has been gradually increasing. In the early government mail steam packet contracts, nine miles an hour was the stipulated speed. It was afterwards increased to ten miles an hour. The working and paying speed is

MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, MONTREAL, CANADA.

was determined to force, he was pushing forward, when one of the guns of a battery was discharged, and he was killed with his two aids. This was the only gun fired, for the enemy had been struck with consternation, and all but one or two had fled. But this event probably prevented the capture of Quebec. When he fell, Montgomery was in a narrow passage, and his body rolled upon the ice, which formed by the side of the river. After it was found the next morning among the slain, it was buried by a few soldiers, without any marks of distinction. He was thirty-eight years of age. He was a man of great military talents, whose measures were taken with judgment, and executed with vigor. With undisciplined troops, who were jealous of him in the extreme, he yet inspired them with his own enthusiasm. He shared with them in all their hardships, and thus prevented their complaints. His industry could not be wearied, his vigilance imposed upon, nor his courage intimidated. To express the high sense entertained by his country of his services, Congress directed that a monument of white marble, to his memory, should be placed in front of St. Paul's Church, New York. The remains of Gen. Montgomery, after resting forty-two years at Quebec, by a resolve of the State of New York, were brought to the city of New York on the 8th of July, 1817, and deposited, with ample form and grateful ceremonies, near the aforesaid monument in St. Paul's Church. The widow of the hero was living when his remains were translated to New York, and from the windows of her residence on the Hudson, she beheld the steamer, freighted with the precious dust, draped with American banners, float down the noble river to its final resting-place. In the long roll of revolutionary glory, Montgomery stands recorded as the bravest of the brave.—Our remaining views are in the city of Montreal. The Merchants' Exchange, on St. Sacrament Street, is a well-planned and commodious structure, with a pleasing but unobtrusive exterior. St. Andrew's Church, also delineated, is a fine building. The ecclesiastical edifices of Montreal are numerous and famous for their fine architectural appearance.—Our last view presents the Post-office, at the corner of Great St. James Street and Rue St. Francois Xavier. It is a fine stone building, and like all the public buildings in Montreal, an ornament and credit to the city. A portion of the Cathedral of Notre Dame is embraced within the compass of our view.—"Montreal," says Mr. Hunter, in his excellent guide-book, just published by J. P. Jewett & Co., of this city, "being at the head of tide navigation, her local advantages for the purposes of trade are numerous. The completion of the Grand Trunk Railroad and the ocean line of steamers recently established between Montreal and Liverpool, has added greatly to its commercial importance. From whatever side the city is approached, it is one of much interest. If from the St. Lawrence, the splendid towers of the cathedral, the tall spires of Christ Church, St. Patrick's Church, and several others, the elegant front of the Bonsecours Market, and the long ranges of cut stone buildings which front the river, form at once a tout ensemble

ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH, MONTREAL, CANADA.

usually five or six miles an hour less than the experimental one. A steamer, without any cargo on board, going over the measured mile in smooth water, is very different from the same steamer, deeply laden, crossing the Bay of Biscay or the Atlantic Ocean. The Persia, however, on her recent quick passage from New York to Liverpool, must have averaged thirteen miles an hour for two hundred and sixteen successive hours. This may be considered, then, as the standard at present of sustained profitable speed of ocean steamers. Take the fastest steamer now afloat, and she would, if unladen, and in smooth water, without any wind, tide or current, to overcome, run at the rate of upwards of eighteen miles an hour. Now, when it is considered what is the resistance which water must offer to a ship, and that the speed of a brisk wind is only fifteen miles an hour, the triumphs already achieved in ship-building are, indeed, something marvellous.—London Journal

POST-OFFICE, MONTREAL, CANADA.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

I SIGH FOR THE ABSENT.

BY BLANCHÉ D'ARFOIS.

I sigh for the absent!
O, when wilt thou come?
My heart is a wanderer—
Thou art its home.

I'm waiting, love, waiting,
The tide's drifting by;
Thy footstep is wanting,
I linger and sigh:

I sigh for the absent!
O, when wilt thou come?
My heart is all lonely,
And thou art its home.

Home, thou art dearer
When tempests assail!
Love, thou art nearer
When bosoms bewail!

O, I am lonely,
My heart is with thee:
And with thee only
It ever may be.

Warm glows the fireside
To welcome thee home;
Love is the wanderer—
When wilt he come?

They whisper thou faded
When I was away:
Tarry, O, tarry
One brief, fleeting day!

Give me thy blessing:
No more will I rove;
Tarry, O, tarry—
Thee only I love.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LOVE AS A PHYSICIAN.

BY ESTELLE GRAY.

IN the environs of Paris, a short distance from Morefontaine and Ermenonville, stands a pretty country-house, carefully built and tastefully ornamented; the traveller in passing stops to gaze upon it with pleasure, as one would behold an abode where seem to dwell comfort, peace and happiness. This residence had neither the appearance of a chateau nor the luxury of a villa; it was not a farm, still less a cottage; it was a citizen's house, but had served as a retreat to an artist, and the inspirations of talent had passed by there; for persons who cultivate the arts have a secret of giving a charm to the most simple things. The house of the painter, the garden of the poet, the pavilion of the musician, all unpretending as they may appear, always have an aspect that the rich capitalist can never attain to in his sumptuous property. And what more beautiful residence could you choose, if you would fly from the noise of the city, than the country situated between Morfontaine and Ermenonville?

Morefontaine! delightful place, where so many sovereigns have come to lose the cares of royalty, and seek beneath its shade some hours of quiet, repose and happiness! Ermenonville! whose name recalls the great writer, the celebrated philosopher, and whose tomb is for the French, and for the stranger, a goal for pilgrimage.

Thus it was with joy that the poet retired to this charming dwelling all the attractions of which I shall not attempt to describe, because description gives but a faint image of the reality. I will only say that nothing was wanting which in the country could add to the happiness of life. There was a pretty drawing-room, with a piano; a large hall, with a billiard-table; a beautiful garden, with grottoes, and shady spots; a pond of water, and all that was necessary for fishing; for it is not wise for those living in the country to renounce all that can embellish or charm life. The true sage, it is said, is he who uses everything yet abuses nothing.

Delvigny left the city, after having lost a wife whom he almost worshipped; though still young, he could not be consoled for the loss of her whom he hoped to have had for a companion and friend until the end of his days. This will prove to you that there are still some husbands who regret their wives. True, he was a poet, and that exalts the imagination.

A son was the only pledge that Hymen had left to Delvigny, a son beautiful as his mother, and who promised to have also her gentleness. The little Adolphe was the idol of his father, who already resolved to make him a celebrated artist, and saw upon his forehead all the indications of science, genius and art. With a little willingness, there is nothing so easy as to find these indications in one's children and one's friends. But death, which so often deranges our projects, did not permit Delvigny to accomplish his plans for the education of his son; the poet died three years after his wife, leaving only to watch over the little Adolphe two good aunts, who had left their province to come and nurse him during his illness.

Behold, then, a little boy of five years of age, left to the care of two old women, one of whom has only a passion for sweetmeats, the other a very decided inclination for the "game of the goose."* Do not think by this that the child will be unhappy; on the contrary, his two aunts cherished, watched over and idolized him. For the sake of the little Adolphe, his Aunt Ursula sometimes forgot to eat sweetmeats, and his Aunt Babette neglected her favorite game.

* A French game, with which Americans are not acquainted.

Delvigny had left to his son a yearly income of a thousand crowns; this was considerable for a poet; each aunt possessing the same, and all that would one day come back to Adolphe. He would then be sufficiently rich to live happily, and need only trouble himself to drive away from his heart all wicked inclinations, all ambition, and finally to be contented with the lot fortune had granted to him.

The two good aunts educated the little boy like a girl. They did not allow him to read Greek history, for fear he would have a taste for war; they kept from him Roman history, fearing that he might imbibe ferocious and savage fancies; they did not give him mythology, because the history of the gods and goddesses seemed to them too scandalous; and they would not allow him to take drawing-lessons, because it would be necessary that he should copy from models.

These gentlewomen still suppressed a crowd of things which they judged as useless or dangerous for little Adolphe; but in return, the pretty little boy learned to sing, and to read in some old books very well. He could do needlework, wind silk, and make netting. Finally they early inculcated the love of sweetmeats, and the game of the goose.

Meanwhile Adolphe grew larger. He was as beautiful as a Cupid, gentle as a girl—or rather as a lamb (for all girls are not gentle); he cast down his eyes when any one looked at him, and blushed when spoken to. He was neither very learned nor very industrious, but instead, he adored sweetmeats, and willingly passed an hour or two in playing the game of goose with his Aunt Babetto, and laughing like a little fool when she fell into the prison or the well. The two old aunts were enchanted with their pupil.

"He is a jewel, a true cherub," said they. "He knows how to be happy, for happiness is composed of ignorance rather than of knowledge."

Adolphe had attained the age of eighteen years without ever going abroad, except with his aunts to take a walk in the environs. These good aunts believed that their beautiful nephew would thus pass his life, without ever having other thoughts, other ideas or desires. They had never loved—only the game of the goose and sweetmeats; this they thought constituted happiness.

But one day there was a festival in the village of Ermenonville; a peasant had spoken a few words before Adolphe, and he prayed his aunts to take him to it; they consented. They could not foresee that at a village fête the mind of their pretty boy might be filled with new thoughts. The good La Fontaine says: "One cannot think of everything."

Adolphe opened his eyes with astonishment upon seeing the people, the shops and the dancing; but he was still more astonished as he saw so many pretty and lively young village maidens. He suddenly cast down his eyes, with emotion, trouble and pleasure before a little face so sweet, so interesting, and so beautiful, that it seemed to be rather the ideal creation of a painter than the work of nature.

This charming face was that of Clotilda, and Clotilda was only a little peasant girl, the daughter of a poor but honest laborer. She was the only support, the only hope of her old father; she worked diligently day and night, having the whole care of the house; and when upon the day of the fête, she put on her red calico dress, her only adornment, and took the arm of her old father in hers, then the young girl was as happy as a queen. It is probable she was more so.

Adolphe, after casting down his eyes before the pretty girl, raised them again, and ventured to gaze upon her pure and lively face, the sight of which had caused him such emotion. By a singular chance, Clotilda looked also at the same time at the beautiful young gentleman who was near her. Love has many such chances.

Clotilda blushed also and sighed, without knowing why; but the most innocent girl can sigh; the principal thing is that she does not know the reason why. Adolphe would not go away from her. He did not wish to dance, as the little peasant could not, on account of leaving her father. Some however urged her to take part in the pleasures of the day. Adolphe, upon hearing this, hastened to invite her to dance with him, saying that he would find some one to take care of her father. This was not managed badly for a young man brought up to wind silk.

Clotilda tremblingly accepted his hand. During the dance they exchanged a few words; but Adolphe learned only that her father was named Dumont, and was very poor. Clotilda ascertained that her partner was called Adolphe Delvigny, and that he was rich. The young girl sighed again more deeply than before. Perhaps this time she knew why.

The dance continued a long time; that is to say, Adolphe recommenced it several times with his pretty dancer, whom he had had the courage to secure. Meanwhile the festival drew to a close; the two aunts wishing to return home, led away the young man, who was accustomed to obey them. But as he left Clotilda, he turned his head frequently to look at her again, each time the little peasant girl did the same also; and it was no longer chance that made her thus act.

The next day Adolphe could eat but little breakfast, and still less dinner; he seemed sad and restless; he did not wish to do anything, even refusing to play with his aunt her favorite game, and to eat some sweetmeats newly made.

"This poor child is certainly sick," said his two aunts, and they overwhelmed him with questions: "Where dost thou suffer, my dear? What is the matter? What is it thou wishest?"

To all these questions Adolphe only replied:

"I do not suffer. Nothing is the matter with me. I am not sick."

"Then why art thou so sad?"

"I do not know."

"Why dost thou not wish to taste some of these sweetmeats?"

"Because I have no appetite."

"O, thou art certainly sick, my dear child!"

Several days passed away, and Adolphe had visibly altered; his eyes had no longer their former brilliancy, he had lost his color, and languor mingled with sadness had replaced his habitual gaiety and petulance. The two good aunts were much distressed, and consulted a physician, the most noted one in the environs. The physician examined the young man, felt his pulse, looked at his tongue, struck him upon his back, and then shaking his head, murmured:

"It is astonishing! There is nothing the matter with him."

"And yet, sir, he will die, for he has evidently changed," said his Aunt Ursula, weeping.

"He can no longer eat, or sing, and does not wish to play anything!" said Babetto, carrying her handkerchief to her eyes.

"There must be then a secret cause," said the doctor.

"Why does he not tell it to us—to us, his aunts, who love him so dearly, and who will not refuse him anything?"

At the expiration of a few weeks Adolphe became so feeble that it was necessary for him to keep his bed. His aunts constantly asked him if he wished for anything; but no, he wanted nothing; only he often inquired when the festival of Ermenonville would return again.

"In a year," they told him.

Then the poor boy would sigh, and say to himself:

"In a year—it is a long time! Shall I go there then?"

But the physician one day heard his patient ask the customary question, and quickly inquired of Adolphe what he had done at the festival, and he replied, in broken accents:

"I danced with Clotilda Dumont."

The physician immediately sought the two aunts, and said to them, as he rubbed his hands together:

"I believe I have discovered the secret which undermines the health of your nephew."

"O, good doctor, you will save him then?"

"No."

"Why no?"

"Because it is not I who can save him; it is a young girl in Ermenonville, named Clotilda Dumont."

"What do you say, doctor?"

"That your nephew is in love with this young peasant, and it is this passion that preys upon him, and will lead him to the tomb, if he does not marry the one he loves."

"Our nephew in love!—go away, doctor! it is impossible! He has seen only us—"

"I know very well that he is not in love with you, but bring Clotilda Dumont here and you can cure your nephew."

The two aunts silently regarded each other for a moment, but while Adolphe suffered they could not long hesitate. The next morning, as the doctor and the aunts were seated beside the bed of Adolphe, visitors were announced. It was Clotilda, who had come with her father, at the invitation she had received, yet without knowing why it had been given; but who stood silent and trembling upon finding herself in the chamber of the young invalid.

As Adolphe perceived the little peasant, he attempted to spring towards her—then fell back exhausted, but his heart beat violently, and his eyes sparkled once more with their former brilliancy.

"I was not deceived," said the doctor to the aunts; "your nephew was love-sick, and this passion as treated by homeopathy, could be cured by love alone."

The two aunts would make any sacrifice for their nephew's happiness; they asked of the old Dumont the hand of his daughter for Adolphe, and then presenting the pretty girl to the invalid, said to him:

"She will be thy wife as soon as thy health is restored."

He rapidly recovered; for love-sickness departs as speedily as it comes.

THE DUSSELDORF GALLERY.

We regret to learn that Mr. Boker, through whose public spirit and love of art we have for many years enjoyed the pleasure of studying the Dusseldorf pictures, in consequence of his recent domestic infelicities, purposes to close the Dusseldorf gallery, and will probably send the pictures back to Europe. This collection, the finest in America, has cost Mr. Boker over two hundred thousand dollars, and we shall regard it as a public calamity, if the country is deprived of these great works. O, that we were an Astor, that we might purchase the entire collection to-day, and throw it open to public exhibition, without money and without price! As it is, we can only protest against the loss of the beautiful works of the "industrious Mr. Dusseldorf."—N. Y. Mirror.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

[There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.]

[Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.]

[Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!]

[It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.]

[In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.]

[It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.]

[Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.]

[Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.]

[Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 75,000 copies!]

[Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.]

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial]

RADIMIR, THE PRIEST OF MOSCOW.

BY WILLIAM O. PATON.

THE hour of evening had extinguished the last reflection of the sun, upon the domes and spires of the holy city of Moscow, and shadows, the grave monitors of rest, usurped the infected air which her trembling citizens were breathing; but rest was not in their hearts, nor shut their eyelids. Each moment, all felt, might be the signal of their doom, by means of the dread contagion which swept off human life by hundreds every day, since the Russian soldiery had returned from the Turkish wars. Wakeful and weary and wan, they brooded over the curse which had fallen upon them.

Not the least solicitors of the inhabitants were the priesthood, who hourly were besought by the masses for some charm against the plague, as if their prayers alone could avert it. Pity for the unfortunate mingled with fear for their own safety, should the depopulation continue—the bloody fate of the unavailing physicians causing the clergy to shudder lest they too should die as unseasonably.

The priest Radimir Molka paced rapidly his apartment, now muttering prayers to the saints, now soliloquizing upon the pitiful ignorance and deplorable rashness of the distracted people, as ever and anon he saw them rushing through the streets in terror, grief, or wrath, on errands of new butchery and pillage.

"O thou St. Nicholas! genius of our land, vouchsafe some means of redemption to thy servant—even to me, Radimir Molka, though to obtain it for thy people my life be paid as a forfeit. My brain grows wild! Let me kneel for counsel from above."

He knelt before a crucifix awhile, then suddenly arose, crossing himself wildly, and exclaimed:

"Thanks, holy Maria, for thy vision! If they must die by my hand, this hand so often clasped by them in purest love and friendship—he it is!—though in their sacrifice I die a double death, and survive the agony but to die another."

His brain had turned with excess of anguish, and he now believed himself inspired by Heaven to slay the two beings he loved best on earth—Allena Stofel, a young lady of rank, who entertained a reciprocal attachment for him, though the vows of his order forbade their marriage;—and Alexius Menza, his dearest friend, a captain in the guards. Their forms had flitted through his bewildered fancy as he knelt before the crucifix, and the horrid conviction had fixed itself on his brain, that their death by his hand would rid Moscow of her pestilential visitation! Even now as he gazed, half stupefied, from the casement, loud knocks were heard at the door below, and men were clamorous for his appearance. He descended to them.

"Help, holy father!" they implored. "What may we do? Our wives and children, all we love, perish about us each moment! O give us some aid. Will not God stay this curse? Speak to us."

"Comfort is from above, my children," said Radimir. "He will relieve you. But now I have had a revelation from on high. Depart and rest in peace. Within two days the plague will cease. I am commissioned for the work. Home, now, and humble yourselves before the goodness of the Almighty. Be patient and you shall know more ere long."

They knelt and crossed themselves before him. He gave them a benediction, and they parted and obeyed him.

Through the long hours of the night he watched and prayed in madness, and the dim eye of early morn found him still upon his knees, moaning and in tears.

"Alas, Allena!—alas, Alexius! But Radimir will soon follow you. We shall die for men and become immortal, even as the son of Paradise himself! And then, beloved Moscow, the color of health shall glow on thy fair cheek, and the invisible gorgon that destroys thee shall be confounded."

Robing himself hastily, he passed forth to the house of his brother, Alorf Molka, an apothecary, in another quarter of the metropolis.

"How now, Radimir, so early here?" asked his brother. "This atmosphere is most infectious in the morning."

"Brother," said the priest, looking wildly upon Alorf, "the way has come at last."

"The way! What way? You speak strangely. You are not well. You are pale. You have worried too much about the people's calamity."

"Silence, brother," said Radimir, his finger upon his lip. "I am commissioned by the Holy Virgin to save our people. I had a vision last night. I did not come simply to tell you this, but to ask of you the subtlest drug that you have, the deadliest foe to human life. I have use for it. Refuse me and I will seek it elsewhere."

Alorf looked mournfully upon his brother and still hesitated.

"Is it for yourself?" he asked.

"No—not for me," said Radimir.

"Swear that you will not take it and I will give it to you."

"I swear it!" said the priest.

Alorf went to a medicine case and gave Radimir a small vial.

"There it is. But, brother, do nothing rash. You are fevered and ill."

"Tush, brother," said Radimir, at once going to the door. "Day after to-morrow and we shall meet again, and Moscow will clap her many hands with joy. Follow me not. Farewell."

"He will recover from this agitation when nature commands him to sleep," mused Alorf, when Radimir had gone. "At least he will do no harm, I think."

As the priest passed through the streets, hundreds paused and asked his blessing, which he gave, but commanded them not to stay him, for he was on a holy errand.

Perhaps never before in the history of popular superstitions was so much ignorant fanaticism at work as at the time of the plague of 1771 in Russia. The frenzy appeared in various destructive forms, and menaced the life of even the empress herself, whom the frantic populace for a time believed to have the power to remove the plague if she would.

At the period of which we speak, she had come to Moscow for the expressed purpose of staying the evil by wise measures, and the disaffected nobles of the realm fermented the false suspicions of the rabble for the furtherance of their own regal plans.

Unconscious of the danger which threatened her from the subjects whom she governed with wisdom and real affection, the fearless Catherine entered her palace with great pomp, and subsequently visited freely the princely houses of the nobility, as well as the poorest quarters of the ancient city, to see what might be done most effectually for its health. On one of these visits, she met the priest, Radimir, then on his way to the house of Allena, and marking his wild air and the attention he attracted from the people, bade him stop.

"Whither goest thou, holy father?" said the empress, in the midst of her splendid retinue.

"God before the empress!" replied Radimir, sternly, and was passing on, when soldiers seized and detained him.

"Art thou mad, priest?" asked Catherine, surprised, "not to tarry when we speak to thee?"

"I am commissioned by the King of kings," answered he, boldly, "and go to save your subjects."

"Destraught!" said Catherine to her nobles, in a tone of compassion, observing the frenzied gaze of Radimir, which glowed fiercely at restraint.

"Stay me not, imperial mistress," said he, "and in two days I will cause, by God's help, the pestilence to cease."

"Let him pass," commanded Catherine, sadly; and he went his way; and the imperial cortege swept on, the empress smitten sore at heart with the different phases of wretchedness which she saw. "Madness seems to afflict them all!"

A calm demeanor was Radimir's when he reached the house and entered the presence of the Lady Allena.

"You are pale, dear Radimir," said she, tenderly. "Your labors are too great. Will you have some wine?"

Without reply the frenzied man gazed fixedly at her, and then placing his hand upon her snowy shoulder and pointing to the sky, he said:

"Beautiful and pure one, heaven is made for such as you!"

"I would I dared think so," replied Allena, with a timid glance at Radimir. "But my thoughts are too much of earth."

"It is well to have worldly affections, dearest," said the madman, toying with her hair, "if in loving those around us we do not forget our love to God."

"But you know I have dared to love you, Radimir—to you I have confessed,—and that my thoughts rebel against the barrier of the church which frowns upon the marriage of a priest. This, I know, is an offence to Heaven, and with such thoughts how can I ever go there?"

"Sweet Allena, I will tell you the way," said Radimir, kissing her beaming forehead. "We shall be yet united, for God has said it to me in a holy vision. Would you be willingly the means of saving Moscow from the plague?"

"Ay, would I," returned Allena, "most willingly, at any sacrifice of mine. But why do you ask? I am powerless to do it."

"Would you save your countrymen—is your love strong enough—and thus, by facing death, win a crown in heaven?"

"Gladly, gladly," said Allena, firmly. "But how can I be of use?"

The priest crossed himself and turned his eyes thankfully to heaven.

"Bring me the wine, Allena, that you may pledge your faith."

It was brought; and pouring out the libation, Radimir, unperceived by her, emptied the vial his brother had given him into the glass.

"Pledge, beloved Allena, to Moscow and to God!"

"Willingly would I die for Moscow and for God!" she murmured, and drank to the last drop.

"Within an hour, Allena, you will be in heaven."

"In heaven? How wild you speak and look to day. In heaven? You cannot mean that."

"I was commanded to sacrifice thee, in a vision of the night, O angel of my soul!" exclaimed Radimir, "to save our city. Death is on thee, but immortal life will be given thee in an hour. Then, Allena, you will be beyond the stars, and there we will meet again and be united forever. O pulse of my heart, farewell! I cannot stay; I have other work to do, and speedily. Commune with God while you yet live. Bless me for this deed; for by it paradise is made surely thine."

He folded her in one long, last embrace, kissed her pale cheek and speechless lips passionately, and rushed from the house. Mute with grief, astonishment and horror, her brain reeled, and Allena Stofel sank lifeless to the floor. On the steps of a temple, soon after, the delirious priest was seen haranguing a multitude, holding on high a poniard. Its hilt forming a cross, he held it up and they bowed before the sign.

"The work of salvation is half done, O citizens!" he shouted, his hair streaming wildly in the wind, and his eyes glaring with bright, prophetic meaning; "have faith, and stay your rude hands from deeds of violence. I alone can save you. To-morrow the scourge will be powerless!"

Mighty shouts from the benighted rabble greeted him as he disappeared. A splendid jeu in honor of the empress, at the house of Alexius Menza, who, though but a captain of guard, had by immense wealth and distinguished service become popular and intimate among the highest in the land. Appreciating this sign of loyalty, the empress deigned to be present, and the balls displayed a dazzling sight, with the crowds of the nobles of Moscow.

While Catherine was conversing with Alexius, surrounded by lords and ladies, sounds of a great tumult without reached their ears, and in the midst of the clamor, the form of Radimir suddenly appeared among them. The courtiers drew back with instinctive dread at his aspect, and the priest stood now by the side of the imperial Catherine, and of his friend, Alexius, unabashed.

"Well, man," said she, with a smile, "have you saved my people yet?"

Radimir answered her not, but turning to the confounded Alexius, thus addressed him:

"Alexius Menza! you know that the blood which flows through your heart is dearer to me than my own. But Heaven demands of me to make a twofold sacrifice for the good of Moscow. Who shall question the mysterious justice of the Most High! Dost thou?"

"Assuredly not!" said the astonished captain.

"Then die!" cried Radimir, suddenly plunging the poniard into his breast, where it remained quivering.

Alexius fell to the floor, and while all around were stupefied with amazement for the moment, the priest rushed to a window and called to the multitude below:

"Come in, come up, delivered men of Moscow, and see what sacrifice has saved you!"

In another moment the priest was seized; but the precaution was superfluous, for the fanatical masses now thronged in, overbearing all opposition, obedient to the call of Radimir. For a moment the self-possession of Catherine forsook her, but Radimir spoke words of re-assurance, though still held back by the guests.

"Fear not mighty mistress of Russia; these are your loyal vassals, who have come to see how Radimir was willing to slaughter his best friend for Moscow's good."

The awe and quiet of the rude throng told Catherine at a glance that the priest was sincere. But still she looked about her for explanation of the bloody mystery. The mob was so dense that it was impossible for any guest to escape.

"Silence!" commanded Catherine, stamping her foot. "The dying man would speak!"

"Not only for the good of Moscow, but for that of all Russia, has death thus come to me," said Alexius, supported upon his knees by others. "I die a merited death, great empress; for though the people were innocent of the knowledge, treason has been busy in my house to-night."

"Treason?" exclaimed Catherine. "Speak on."

"Fell and demand her pardon, all you who have plotted with me her death to-night, or a word from Radimir will set the rabble on you that I name, and they shall tear you to pieces like wolves!"

Some eight or ten conspirators here threw down their swords despairingly at the feet of Catherine, and knelt.

"They would have made the people sanction their course in the event of your death, which I only assented to, from pique at un-rewarded services. But happily, my friend has saved you, and the blood now pouring from my bosom, pours, sinless as oft on the battle-field, from repentant Alexius!"

With a dying effort the unhappy man freed his arms from those about him, and fell forward, kissing the feet of the empress.

"Unfortunately," said she, in tones of deep commiseration; "accident alone withheld your just reward. Friends—those of you who are my friends and loyal subjects,—seize these would-be assassins and bear them securely to my palace.—But stay;—my patriot priest and prophet," she resumed, advancing to Radimir; "was this man your friend?"

The intense excitement of the hour had restored the reason of the priest, and realizing all that had passed, without word, he flung himself upon the body of Alexius.

"Answer me, priest," demanded the empress; "was he your friend? and if so, why did you slay him?"

"The frenzy of my grief, great Catherine, at the sufferings of my countrymen, inspired me with the belief that Heaven required some mighty sacrifice from me. In a vision I saw pass before me, Alexius, my friend, and a lady whom I loved. These, thought I, must die by my hand to avert the scourge. I loved to the imagined will of Heaven—accomplished it, alas!—but knew of nothing more."

"But Heaven's hand was in it, my friend, or the greater scourge of civil war would have blasted our fair empire, at my death. But who was the other whom you slew?"

"The Lady Allena Stofel. She died willingly for Moscow."

"Not so," said Alorf, stepping from the throng to the side of his brother. "The potion I gave was harmless, for I feared you might do mischief. She lives."

"Surely this is a night of strange events!" exclaimed the empress, surveying all around her with a brave calmness which struck awe and admiration into the hearts of all. "But, good people, disperse, and take these traitors away. Their doom shall be thought upon hereafter. Let the priest and his brother attend us to the palace. A good night to all!"

And the undaunted genius strode forth and passed in safety home.

It needs only to be said that the conspirators received their reward in gloomy Siberian exile. Alorf became the court physician, with a princely income. The plague soon ceased before the measures of the empress. The priest, Radimir, in time was made an archbishop, through the grateful influence of Catherine; and Allena passed a holy and happy life, the superior of a monastery, looking ever forward to that genuine church of God, where kindred souls, like hers and Radimir's, unite in bliss, and are never kept asunder by mere forms.

COL. JOHN T. HEARD.

Our artist, Mr. Barry, has produced, from a fine photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, a very correct and lifelike portrait of John T. Heard, Esq., of this city, a merchant of wealth and good position, a gentleman of high social and political standing, and present Grand Master of Masons in Massachusetts. Mr. Heard is a native of Boston, was born May 4, 1809, educated at the common schools of Ipswich, Mass., from the age of four until fourteen; and subsequently at the Lexington (Mass.) Academy, then under the preceptorship of the well-known, genial-hearted, talented, upright, and somewhat eccentric Rev. Caleb Stetson. At the close of 1825, he entered the counting-room of his step-father, John W. Trull, Esq., and devoted himself earnestly and closely to business pursuits. During the period of his minority, his leisure hours were employed in scientific studies and polite literature—a wise and profitable appropriation of time, not infrequently wasted by many young men in frivolous or hurtful pursuits, and one which exhibits its lasting good effects in the solid attainments and ornamental accomplishments which distinguish Mr. Heard among his brother merchants. Mr. Heard's early sympathies and associations were democratic in politics; and his business observation and experience led him quite naturally to take an interest in the prominent doctrines of political economy, which have been so largely discussed by political parties for the last twenty-five years. And hence he quietly and assiduously addressed himself to an investigation of the important subjects of banking, insurance and revenue. The results of his inquiry were, from time to time, communicated to the public, through the newspaper press, in well-considered, logical, effective and graceful articles, that always commanded respect, and sometimes exercised an important influence in the decision of the questions discussed. Strikingly was this the case, when, some few years ago, a wild clamor was raised against the mutual system of insurance and guarantee capital, as being unsound and dangerous. The leading and effective champion of the system was Mr. Heard; and in his able articles upon the subject, published in the Boston Post, he displayed a depth of research, and a power of argument, that compelled his opponents to succumb. In this way, we find him strongly identified with the support of public measures of democratic policy, and a democrat in principle and practice, though never a political partizan. His first vote for president was cast for General Jackson, in 1832, and since that time he has always voted for the presidential candidates of that party. He has served from time to time upon important committees in that organization, and freely contributed his means to help defray the necessary outlays of his political associates. In grateful recognition of his able and consistent support, the party have, from time to time, presented his name as a candidate for city, county, State and national offices, and have in return availed themselves of the strength which his honorable reputation and ability have given to their ticket. In this way he has been the Democratic nominee for mayor of the city, for the State legislature, and for Congress; and though unsuccessful by reason of the strength of the opposing party, yet often running ahead of his party ticket, in consequence of his personal merits. In 1851, he was commissioned as senior aide-de-camp to Gov. Boatwell, which gives him by courtesy the permanent title of colonel, and was subsequently proposed by the Democracy of Suffolk for governor's councillor, but defeated upon the plea that he was a "hunker democrat." This objection reflected no dishonor upon him; and such are the matations in human affairs, that some of those who made the objection then, now covet such a reputation for themselves. Col. Heard commenced his masonic career in 1845, in Columbian Lodge, one of the oldest and most esteemed bodies of that order in this community. He applied himself with zeal to the study of the traditions and ritual of the order, in search of the bright gem of truth among its mysterious allegories. As might have been expected, his advancement was rapid, and in 1854, he was elected Master of Columbian Lodge, after serving in the various subordinate offices.

COLONEL JOHN T. HEARD.

A full and valuable history of this lodge, compiled with great care, and written in a graceful and attractive style, signalizes his connection with that body. Col. Heard's history makes a handsome octavo of some six hundred pages, and was published for private distribution alone, in the year 1856. He served the Grand Lodge in the office of Grand Marshal for two terms, and in December, 1855, was elected Senior Grand Warden. In December, 1856, he was elected to his present office of Grand Master, by a unanimous vote. This extraordinary manifestation of the esteem in which he is held by his brethren, is worthy of remark; and we are informed that the zeal and energy with which he discharges the manifold duties devolving upon him in this capacity, elicit the hearty commendation of all who are associated with him.

A GOOD MAN'S WISH.

I would rather when I am laid in the grave, that some one in his manhood should stand over me, and say, "There lies one who was a real friend to me, and privately warned me of the dangers of the young. No one knew it, but he aided me in time of need. I owe what I am to him." Or would rather some widow, with choking utterance, telling her children, "There is your friend and mine. He visited me in my affliction, and found you, my son, an employer; and you, my daughter, a happy home in a virtuous family." I would rather that such persons should stand at my grave, than to have erected over it the most beautiful sculptured monument of Parian or Italian marble. The heart's broken utterance of reflections of past kindness, and the tears of grateful memory shed upon the grave, are more valuable, in my estimation, than the most costly cenotaph ever read.—Dr. Sharp.

THE LATE DR. KANE.

Right Rev. Bishop Thomas M. Clark, of Rhode Island, pays the following just and eloquent tribute to the late Dr. Kane:—"A young man brought up in luxury, courted by the affluent, at an age when all the pleasures of the world have their fondest attraction, in response to the call of science and humanity, voluntarily exiles himself from family and friends, and for two long winters lies down night after night to sleep and dream in the silent solitude of the frozen Arctic. Enduring patiently and even cheerfully the absence of every comfort, every resource, every solace, which makes our daily life seem desirable; forgetting his own sufferings in ministering to abler-bodied men than himself; banishing by force from his own mind all tormenting fears for the future, that he might be able to cheer his desponding associates; bending his slight frame without one murmur to the most laborious tasks; humbling himself to the meanest drudgeries; year after year he thus labors and endures, quietly hiding his time of release. While I speak, there rises before me the picture of a vast ocean of ice and snow, silent, still, quiet as the grave; no living thing breaking its dead monotony; no bird or insect fluttering in the air; no flower or shrub or tree opening its leaves there; no life, no movement, no noise, not even the rush of waters, not even the mean of the sea, or the crack of melting ice, to disturb the stillness. The months roll on, and there is no morning, no noonday, no evening; only the dim silver light of the moon and stars, and the wild coruscations of electric fires, irradiate the gloom. In the midst of this crystal desert, there lies a small, black speck, a little framework of timbers, and down there, underneath the deck of that frail barque, I see the young man, with his sick companions groaning in their berths by his side, a dim lamp swinging overhead, and the atmosphere reeking with nauseous odors, quietly writing his journal, and in the intervals saying some cheerful words to his suffering friends. Before he lies down to his rest, I see him kneeling in prayer, commending himself and his fellow exiles to the God who never slumbers, thanking Him for their continued preservation, and asking a benediction upon the dear absent ones at home. At last the hour of release comes, through dangers and toils which the wildest fiction never conceived; he finds his way back to his own land, and the heart of a grateful, admiring nation, leaps to greet him. Foreign countries unite to honor him, and the pulse of the world is quickened at mention of his name. But only for a little season are we allowed to detain him here below; the blood which Arctic frost could not congeal now begins to ebb; the fire of life burns low, and at last the sad tidings reach us, that in one of the sneny islands of the tropics, the heroic spirit of this young man has broken from its feeble tenement, and he is numbered with the illustrious dead. Again the heart of a nation responds in sympathy; the honored remains are returned to the home of his youth—soldiers and citizens watch over the coffin through the still night; as he once kept vigil in the Arctic snows—and then, amid the tolling of bells and wail of trumpets, that body is laid in its resting-place."

THE STEAM YACHT "EMPEROR."

The fine vessel delineated on this page, as under a full head of steam and press of canvass, is a craft of no ordinary importance, being a gift from the British government to his majesty the emperor of Japan. The English government can be generous to those whom they wish to conciliate, as well as relentless to those whom they wish to crush. In this case, Parliament voted the sum of fifty thousand dollars to build and equip this yacht—a liberal appropriation for a mere pleasure-vessel. The "Emperor" is a wooden vessel of three hundred tons burden, built by the Messrs. Green, of Blackwall, from designs by Mr. Crewe, of that establishment. She is an elegant model, of beautiful lines, magnificently fitted out by Messrs. Smart, of Finsbury; and propelled by engines of 60-horse power, made by the Messrs. Penn, of Greenwich. Her speed is satisfactory; and the completeness of everything connected with this most gratifying compliment to the foreign potentate reflects great credit on all concerned in her construction and outfit.

THE YACHT "EMPEROR," PRESENT FROM THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT TO THE EMPEROR OF JAPAN.

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

* One copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SNATCHES OF AUTUMN REVERIES.

BY IRVING MONTAGUE.

I sit and dream long hours away by thee,
O, brooklet, with the flowery margin free!
I watch the trout banners from the trees
Float down thy tide, and dream—there goes my life!
A gale-palated bark of golden hue,
With rosy morn wide-beaming joy around.
How gaily glides the fairy pinace on!
Anon it drifts in by-streams, tangled up
With the dense brushwood of the ignoble mass;
Ah, now 'tis rushing on with maddening glee!
A huge wave has capsize it—it has sunk!
Ye scarce can view it, glittering in its shroud—
The trailing algae that has borne it down.
And such is life! Dragged down unto the grave,
The charnel algae of our fate enwinds us,
Till scarce enough is left to tell that we Once floated on the stream of time so fair.

WATCHING WITH JESUS.

O, thou, who in the garden's shade
Durst wake thy weary ones again,
Who slumbered at that fearful hour,
Forgetful of thy pain—
Bend o'er us now, as over them,
And set our sleep-bound spirits free;
Nor leave us slumbering in the watch
Our souls should keep with thee!—WHITTIER.

"IT IS FINISHED."

It is finished!—glorious word
From thy lips, our suffering Lord!
Words of high, triumphant might,
Ere thy spirit takes its flight.
It is finished!—all is o'er:
Pain and scorn oppress no more.—BULFINCH.

VIRTUE AND PASSION.

As fruits, ungrateful to the planter's care,
On savage stocks inserted, learn to bear,
The surest virtues thus from passions shoot,
Wild nature's rigor working at the root.—POPE.

POESY.

A dreamless renown
Of light is poesy. 'Tis the supreme of power:
The might half slumbering on its own right arm.—JOHN KEATS.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

It must certainly have been a relative of our friend, Mrs. Partington, who gave the following account of a fashionable dinner:—"It was splendid, but my seat was so promote from the neck-backs, that I could not ratify my appetite; and the pickled cherries had such a defect on my head, that I had a motion to leave, when Mr. B. gave me some bartsborn resolved in water, which bereaved me.".....Col. George Shoemaker, who died in Pottsville, Pa., in 1842, was the father of the hard coal trade in this country—the first to introduce anthracite coal to the notice of the Philadelphians. He mined a quantity of coal, and loading it in wagons, carried it at great expense to Philadelphia. Like all new experiments, it was scouted at at first; and the experimenter, after disposing of two loads, which barely covered the cost of transportation, gave away the remainder to persons, who probably thought they were conferring a favor on the donor by accepting it. And now millions are made annually by that same coal trade. ....In Peter the Great's workshop, in Holland, was found this inscription, "Nothing too little for the attention of a great man.".....There are many inconsistencies in civilized society. A dog is accounted mad when he won't "take something to drink," and a man insane when he takes too much. A financier remains "respectable" with a fortune that don't belong to him, while a beggar is made a criminal for purloining a piece of meat. ....How simple was the origin of Yale College. Bancroft says, that ten worthy farmers, in 1699, assembled at Branford, and each one, laying a few volumes on the table, said, "I give these books for the founding of a college in this colony." What grand results have flowed from this humble source!.....We are certainly in a reading age. The number of new works which issue from the English and United States presses alone, it would puzzle a man of but ordinary abilities to remember by name—but to read them would require a steam process of no small power. ....How much may be and is being done this very minute! It is the first and last with thousands; and while multitudes are rejoicing "because a man is born into the world," as many are sobbing farewell, as they take their last look at the face of the dead. ....Our old friend, Major Carboy, was much pestered with inquiries about his health, and finally lost all patience. One of the most assiduous inquirers one day sent his servant to ask how he was, to whom he answered, "Tell your master, with my compliments, that I am pretty well this morning, and shall continue so for twenty-one mornings to come." This stopped inquiries from that quarter. ....An unlucky dramatist, whose tragedy and comedy had both been rejected by Miss Laura Keane, remarked that he was wholly at a loss to account for it. "For no one can say," he observed, "that my tragedy was a sad performance, or that there was anything to laugh at in my comedy.".....Queer things come to light in ransacking the annals of old times. Robert, of Oloucester, says that Queen Effrida used to whip her step-son Edward with "wax tapers," so that when he grew up he "hated the sight of a candle." Few certainly would make light of such a flagellation. ....Some writer calls the press the "artillery of thought." It is not a bad idea, although many of the gunners fire blank cartridges. ....A woman in North Street, in this city, a few days since, in a quarrel with her intemperate husband, accused him of drinking up his pickaxe, one day, and his saw and horse the next. We should call this decidedly "hard drinking." ....The season for European tours has arrived, and all the world is thronging abroad to employ the summer in seeing fine scenery; and yet we will venture to say that nine-tenths of these pleasure-immigrants have not seen the Niagara, the White Mountains, the Catskills, or the great lakes—scenery unsurpassed on the globe. How foolish some of these people will feel when asked in Europe to describe the glories of their native land!.....Just twenty years ago, Louis Napoleon was lodging at the Washington Hotel, New York. But it will not do to add, "Little did he dream of occupying the position he now fills!"—for he even then believed that he would one day sit on the throne of France. ....It is said that the race of golden-haired women are dying out in Paris. Or are they only dying out?.....The poor Chinamen sent bent on war with England. We must keep up a strong force in the Chinese seas to guard against the consequences of their confounding Brother Jonathan with the other "outside barbarian," John Bull. .... "Learn to labor and to wait," is advice that should be impressed on the minds of every young American. Courage, labor and patience will accomplish everything—impatience and indifference spoil everything. .... Young Edwin Booth has played a most brilliant engagement at the Boston Theatre—the mantle of his father has descended on his shoulders. He is not alone successful in those parts in which he had the opportunity of studying his father, but in such a difficult character as Richelleu, which his father never played. .... Vulgarly has been described as unsuccessful affectation, in contradistinction to fashion, which is successful affectation. .... The loudest outcries against the sin of money-seeking arise from those who have been most successful in the worship of Mammon. Emile de Girardin, Ponsard, young Dumas and Barriere, have all become rich, yet they have all written against money. It is not "sour grapes" with them, but is it not a desire to keep others off the track?..... Do not confine your reading to books, but peruse men also. .... Lord Napier said, in a recent speech at the festival of the St. George's Society, in New York, in speaking of the relations between this country and Great Britain, "By an easy exercise of frankness, of mutual forbearance and indulgence, no question can arise between our countries which will not admit of an easy and equitable settlement." Such language from the representative of Great Britain will be repeated with pleasure, and give satisfaction on both sides the water. .... During a recent performance of the Lavel troupe, in Havana, some young bloods were so delighted with the dancing, that they not only threw bouquets, but their hats upon the stage. The commissary of the police sent for their bats; he wished to ascertain what blockheads they belonged to. .... The last secret revolutionary society discovered by Louis Napoleon's foxxy police, in Paris, is called the Bons Enfants (Good Children). The Boston Post says, "The Bons Enfants will probably be whipped, banished or guillotined, to re-appear some future day under some other name, and be again whipped, banished or guillotined, unless the mail shirt of the emperor prove useless against some Plancher's pistol-shot."..... Ten couples were married lately in a Western town, and all the brides were named Hannah. Quite a Hannah-mated scene!..... The women are vindicating their rights bravely. It is stated that the Greensborough, N. C., Messenger, a religious newspaper, is edited and published by Mrs. Frances M. Bumpard, and printed wholly by females, even to the press-work, which is done by a negro woman. .... The New York Observer and the New York Evangelist newspapers blame the Rev. Dr. Bellows on account of his presence at the "Dramatic Fund Dinner," and for his idea of reconciling the stage and the pulpit. Since the stage is a "fixed fact," influential clergymen and laymen can do a great good in directing its admitted power. There is no reason why the stage should not be an ally of the pulpit. Its revival in modern times was associated with religion. .... Mr. Ten Broeck, the great American turkman, has been astonishing the natives of Florence, Italy, by driving a light buggy-wagon through their slippery streets eight in hand! His speed so affrighted the police, that they waited upon him with a prohibition to limit himself for the future to four horses, as royalty itself never aspired to more than six, even with the aid of postillions. We must confess that we like to see Young America waking up old foggy Europe once in a while. .... If three miles make a league, how many will make a national convention?..... Washington Irving is very kind and liberal to his relations. It is said that he has made over the copyright of his "Life of Washington"—a fortune—to one of his nephews. .... One of Dwight's New York correspondents lately gave quite a flowery description of some professional ladies on the platform at one of Thalberg's concerts. He says:—"In the centre sat four prima donnas, Parodi, Angri, Patti and Johannsen, each arrayed in a different style—Parodi, like an angel, all in white; Angri, magnificent as a dahlia, in dark red; Patti, like a fresh, pretty buttercup, in yellow brocade; and Johannsen, like a moss-rose, in delicate pink."..... Who ever thought of there being any connexion between roast beef and morality? The discovery is due to the editor of the Bellows Falls Argus, who says, "Some think the great cure for immorality is education. In our opinion, the only antidote is high wages. It is hard for a man to support a family and be honest at six shillings a day. There is many a person who now passes for a saint, who would be one of the biggest scamps in the world were his income reduced from roast beef to No. 3 mackerel. .... We really hope we shall have no such weather this summer as we had in June, 1842. In that month and year four or five hundred sheep perished of cold in Genesee and Livingston counties, New York. .... The New Orleans Picayune says "most of our terrible fights and murders occur on Sundays." Sundays, in New Orleans, are observed as holidays by a large portion of the inhabitants. .... Names often lead to queer mistakes. A little girl in New Utrecht, Long Island, recently called on a lady with the following message:—"Ma wants to know if you would lend her your life-preserver. She is terribly sick with the fever, and the doctor thinks she must die—so she wants to borrow your life-preserver, and see what good that will do."..... The late Rev. Mr. Choules was a great admirer of gardening. In one of his addresses, he said:—"I wish that we could create a general passion for gardening and horticulture. We want more beauty about our houses—more to attach us to our homes. The scenes of our childhood are the memories of our future years. Let our dwellings be, in the language of a late cultivator, 'the playthings of childhood and the ornaments of the grave; they raise smiling looks to man, and grateful ones to God.'"..... Old Kingsbury, of New Hampshire, was remarkable for his dry humor. As he passed a rye field, one day, a lawyer espied him, and accosted him with "What makes you carry your head stooping on your breast, Friend Kingsbury? You see me! I carry mine erect and upright."—"Squire," answered Kingsbury, "look at that field of grain! The full ears hang down like mine; but the empty heads stand up like yours." He was troubled with no further remarks. .... "Do you read novels?" said a gentleman to a young lady, the other day. "Yes, sir."—"Have you ever read Ten Thousand a Year?" pursued the inquirer. "No, sir, I never read so many as that in all my life," was the innocent reply. .... Chester is the oldest city of England. According to Sir Thomas Elliot, it was built by a great-grandson of Noah!..... A paragraph in one of our foreign exchanges states, that in Germany, the seeds of the grape are fast coming into use as a substitute for coffee. Why not cure clover and call it tea?..... There is a man in New Orleans who has worn the same blue coat and sugar-loaf hat for the past ten years. Though somewhat eccentric, it is admitted that he is a man of steady habits. .... A New York auctioneer lately indulged in the following little bit of the pathetic: "Gentlemen, if my father or mother stood where you are, and didn't buy those boots—those elegant boots, when they are going for one dollar—I should feel it my duty, as a son, to tell both of 'em that they were false to themselves, and false to their country!"..... In the little town of Everton, near Liverpool, England, there is a cast-iron church one hundred and nineteen feet long, and forty-eight feet wide.

I have heard words struck out, when two minds of equal strength, but of unequal quality, came in contact, that were as rough and burning with gold, as any fragments of quartz smitten from the jagged ledge by Californian's hammer. Truths are set free which were never "thought out" by the speaker; felt by him, in their full profundity—but which he would be the last one to realize, should he attempt the task of their analysis.—The Cragon.

Conversation may have all that is valuable in it, and all that is lively and pleasant, without anything that comes under the head of personality. The house in which, above all others I have ever been an inmate of, the life and the spirit and the joy of conversation have been the most intense, is a house in which I hardly ever heard an evil word uttered against any one.—Gusses at Truth.

Choice Miscellany.

UNPERCEIVED AGENTS.

Let the reader sum up the influences that meet in the room where he sits with our paper in his hand. There in that room is, first, the atmospheric air, with its oxygen, azote, carbon, hydrogen and various gases. There is the light, with its green, yellow, scarlet, violet and various component elements. There is gravitation, connecting that room with every orb of immensity, one cord of which binds it to the sun, another to the moon, another to the planets and satellites, and others still to the most distant stars which twinkle on the mantle of night. These cords of influence, meeting and twining into a complicated network, now pervade the very space where the reader peruses this article, thus connecting him, by invisible ties, to the whole framework of nature. There, besides, is electricity, magnetism, galvanism, and how many more agents we know not. An electrical machine would reveal electricity; a magnetic needle, magnetism; and a galvanic battery, galvanism. Yet none of these powerful agents around you make you sensible of their presence, except as you learn the fact by the discoveries of science. In the same room your mind exists, with its world of interests and sympathies, and the minds perhaps of your family and friends. Each one has in this same space, the passions, hopes, fears, loves, hatreds, aspirations, revulsions, and all the elements of distinct organic and spiritual life. Still the mind of each is a sanctuary where the others cannot obtrude, except so far as he shall admit them to share the secrets of his bosom. Each is destined to an immortality of life; and each has hopes that grasp the infinite realities of a life to come, and connect them with the throne of God.—New York Chronicle.

A WESTERN PREACHER.

A young man had occasioned some trouble by his disorderly conduct, and at length Cartwright reproved him personally and sharply, and said, "I mean that Young man there, standing on the seats of the ladies, with the ruffled shirt on;" and added, "I doubt not that ruffled shirt was borrowed." The young man was greatly incensed, and threatened to whip the preacher. Upon this, Cartwright went up to him, and said, "We will not disturb the congregation by fighting here; but let us go out into the woods, for if I am to be whipped, I want it over—for I do not like to live in dread." They accordingly started for the woods; but they had not proceeded far, when an involuntary motion of Cartwright's hand to his side so alarmed the rowdy that he took flight, under the supposition that the preacher was feeling for a dirk and intended to stab him. Cartwright started in pursuit, but did not overtake the fugitive, who was subsequently ducked in a pond by the other rowdies. Cartwright's reflections on this adventure are curious and worth quoting. "It may be asked," he says, "what I would have done, if this fellow had gone with me to the woods? This is hard to answer, for it was a part of my creed to love everybody, but to fear no one; and I did not permit myself to believe any man could whip me till it was tried; and I did not permit myself to premeditate expedients in such a case. I should, no doubt, have proposed to him to have prayer first, and then followed the openings of Providence."—Sketches of Western Preachers.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

M. Charles Maurice, the French journalist, in his "Historic Anecdotes," relates the following:—"A man had been condemned to death during the pro-consulate of Lyons, and on the day of execution there were twelve in the cart. In such cases, whether it was out of refinement or cruelty, from indifference, or to render the beheading more easy and prompt, the miserable men were placed under the scaffold, so that the blood of the victims fell upon them. Eleven had been executed, when the assistants, oblivious of the number, began to take the machinery to pieces, the crowd looking on whilst the twelfth remained below, without power to speak or move—indeed, half dead with horror. Among those present, however, one man noticed him; he was a butcher. Creeping up to the cart beneath the scaffold, he took a nightcap out of one pocket, and a knife out of the other; then putting the one on the prisoner's head, with the latter he severed the cords that bound his hands behind his back, and taking him by the arm, walked away with him, as if it was some one faint with the terror of the spectacle. Nobody took notice of them. Dragging the victim along, rather than leading him—for the poor man had lost almost all consciousness—he at length got him into a coffee-house, where he was soon brought to himself.

New Publications.

GAUT GURLEY OR, The Trappers of Umbagog. A Tale of Border Life. By D. P. THOMPSON. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 320.

This story will be warmly welcomed by thousands, whose only complaint against the author is that he has written too little. His "May Martin," "Green Mountain Boys" and "Hangers" gave him an enviable reputation, and the present story will be as popular as any of its predecessors. It is a wild, thrilling narrative, but perfectly true to New England character and New England scenery.

PANORAMIC GUIDE FROM NIAGARA FALLS TO QUEBEC. By WM. S. HUNTER, JR. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 66.

An admirably digested guide-book, which ought to be in every traveller's hands who takes the route described. It is full of excellent engravings, including some panoramic pictures on an original plan.

CHARACTERISTICS OF WOMAN. By MRS. JAMESON. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857. 18mo. pp. 487.

A beautiful "blue and gold" diamond edition, uniform with Longfellow and Tennyson, of a book that has become classical and dear to the popular mind and heart. In its new form this charming book will run anew a conquering career.

THE AMERICANS IN JAPAN. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 12mo. pp. 415.

This admirable abridgment of the government narrative of the United States Expedition to Japan under Commodore Perry, has been executed by Robert Tomes. It is liberally illustrated, well printed, and must have a vast circulation. For sale by Redding & Co.

FACTS NOT GENERALLY KNOWN. By DAVID A. WELLS. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 432.

This is a popular hand-book of facts not readily accessible in literature, history and science. It is indexed for convenient reference, and contains a vast mass of curious and valuable information. For sale by Redding & Co.

AMERICA AND EUROPE. By ADAM O. DE GUROWSKI. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 411.

This work is by an intelligent and educated foreigner, who has resided a long time in this country, and who is in a measure fitted to institute comparisons between the old world and the new. He speaks, on the whole, favorably of this country. His tone, however, on many questions, is far too dictatorial, and many of his opinions appear to be reflected rather than original. For sale by Redding & Co.

NEW PLAYS.—The last numbers of French's Standard and Minor Drama, published by Samuel French, 122 Nassau Street, New York, embrace "The Golden Eagle," or, "The Privileged of '76," dramatised by J. B. Howe, from one of our Novellists; "Crossing the Line," "Rory O'More," "The Last Days of Pompeii," and "Ben the Butcher."

Published every Saturday, by M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

THE WRESTLING SCENE, IN SHAKSPEARE'S PLAY OF "AS YOU LIKE IT," SCENE 2, ACT 1.

[For description, see page 349.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 6, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. 6 CENTS SINGLE. } Vol. XII., No. 23.—WHOLE No. 311.

A TRIP TO CANADA.

Until within a few years the intercourse between Canada and the United States was limited to commercial and trading men, very few more tourists penetrating into the interior and exploring the broad northern region beyond the chain of lakes and rivers, in search of novelty and interest in manners and beauty and peculiarity of scenery. It was partly owing to the lack of cheap and rapid means of travel that we were so unneighborly, not because in Canada there were not abundant objects of attraction. The want having been remedied, a tide of pleasure-travel flows annually northward, and the reflux brings us friends and visitors from the great British colony. We enjoy now not only a reciprocity of trade, but a reciprocity of feeling, and exchange courtesies and products with equal frequency. As the season for pleasure-travelling has now arrived, we have thought a word or two respecting Canada might not be amiss, accompanied by a series of illustrations of the scenery. These will serve, perhaps, to induce many of our readers who are wavering as to what point of the compass they shall direct their pleasure-seeking steps to elect in favor of the region under notice. Canada is of vast extent, one and is of the brightest of the colonial gems that deck the crown of Queen Victoria. It was formerly divided into the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, but the whole country is now united politically, distinguished into Canada East and Canada West, which are separated from each other by the river Ottawa. The entire length of both Canadas is from 1200 to 1300 miles, and its average breadth (from north to south) from 200 to 300 miles, comprising an area of about 357,822 miles. Canada West (formerly Upper Canada) is somewhat uneven in its surface, but presents few of the romantic features which particularly distinguish Canada East (Lower Canada), where nature has spread a banquet for the eyes of the lovers of the picturesque and striking. In Canada East are vast forests, wide-spreading meadows, immense lakes, deep, broad and rapid rivers, mountain ridges, and rich pasturages. An endless succession of charming or romantic scenes woo the eye of the traveller as he wanders through these regions of enchantment. And even in winter these scenes are not without their charm. "After a heavy fall of snow, succeeded by rain, and a partial thaw, a strong frost coats the trees and all their branches with transparent ice, often an inch thick, weighing on them so heavily that in a tempest whole forests are laid prostrate, with tremendous noise and uproar. Nothing, however, can be imagined more brilliant and beautiful than the effect of sunshine, in a calm day, on the frozen boughs, where every particle of the icy crystals sparkle, and nature seems decked in diamonds." This phenomenon is often exhibited by our New England woods in winter, but it is neither so brilliant nor so common as in Canada. The province is named from the Indian word Kanata, signifying a collection of huts, which the early European discoverers mistook for the name of the country. Sebastian Cabot has the credit of having discovered it in 1497, but the first European settlement was made by Jacques Cartier, a Frenchman, at St. Croix Harbor, in 1541. Cartier sailed up the river St. Lawrence and bestowed on it the name it still bears. In 1608 the French made a permanent settlement at the spot on which Quebec now stands, the country being called New France. From this period till 1759 the French continued to occupy the country though terribly harassed by the hostility of the Indians, particularly by the fierce and warlike Mohawks. Then came that splendid military achievement, the capture of Quebec, by the English general, Wolfe, fully described in our last number. This was followed, September 8, 1760, by the surrender of the entire country to the British. During the American Revolution, our troops made a gallant though unsuccessful attempt to capture the strongholds of the British in Canada. In 1794, by an act of the British parliament, a legislative council of twenty-three members was appointed to assist the governor. Seventeen years after, the division of Canada into two separate provinces took place, and the first parliament of Upper Canada met at Niagara, September 17, 1792. In 1820, dissensions, chiefly of a political and financial character, began to arise between the house of assembly and the executive government in Lower Canada, which went on from year to year, increasing in intensity and malignity, deepened by the natural prejudice of the French and English colonists, the former considering their interests opposed to those of the latter, until finally a crisis arrived. The spirit of discontent extended to Upper Canada, where it began to manifest itself in 1834, the causes being substantially the same as those of Lower Canada. At last matters were brought to an issue in the latter country, by the arrest of two popular leaders in 1837. They were rescued by their friends and adherents. Warrants were issued for the arrest of others; the peasantry in the districts of Chamblay and Grand Brulé took up arms, and after some sharp fighting, were defeated by the military. Similar scenes were simultaneously enacted in Upper Canada, where the British government were in bad odor. The insurrection here, also, was suppressed, but not until martial law was proclaimed. As these events are of comparatively recent occurrence, they are doubtless familiar to the majority of our readers. The result of these proceedings was the reunion of the provinces, which took place in 1840, under the title of the United Provinces of Canada. The upper province, or Canada West, is settled principally by emigrants, and the descendants of emigrants from Great Britain and Ireland. There are also large numbers of loyalists from the United States, who sided with Great Britain during the revolutionary war, a mixture of all nations and their descendants, and in particular localities there are large settlements of Pennsylvania Dutch, and other persons from the United States scattered over the country. In Lower Canada, or Canada East, the majority of the inhabitants are of French origin, mostly descendants of settlers from Normandy, established in the colony previous to 1759, to whom they still bear, in many respects, a close resemblance. The population of Canada West, in 1851, was 952,004, that of Canada East, 890,261. In the total population there were 695,945 Canadians of French origin. We have spoken of the attractive scenery of Canada. Tourists should by no means omit to visit the Carillon falls of the Ottawa, a series of rapids twelve miles in length. Then there are the Chaudiere, which are six miles in length. Les Chats is another striking series of rapids or falls, formed by the river breaking, at high water, over the rocks in thirty-three distinct shoots, spreading across the river to a width of four miles. We present on page 357, a striking view of the Falls of Montmorency. The grandest water scenery in Canada, is on the Saguenay River, which enters the St. Lawrence about a hundred and thirty miles below Quebec. The last sixty miles of its course exhibit some of the most sublime scenery in the world, and no one who has a true love of nature in his heart should fail to visit it. The banks vary in height from 500 to 1500 feet, frequently perpendicular, and in many cases even overhanging the stream. It is a remarkable feature of the river that in such places it is nearly as deep in the vicinity of the shore as in the middle. Near its mouth its depth is over 3000 feet. The Indian name, "Chi-contimi, (deep water)" is strikingly correct. In the summer, excursions are frequently made to this river from Quebec in steamboats, and it is a jaunt which the tourist in Canada should by no means omit. In this rapid summary of striking features we have not mentioned Niagara Falls, because every one visits them as a matter of course, who has a soul to appreciate the grand and sublime, and because they belong as much to the United States as to Canada.

BATISTE, AN INDIAN PILOT, STEERING A STEAMER
DOWN THE RAPIDS OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

STEAMER DESCENDING ONE OF THE RAPIDS OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

[Continued on page 356.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN: —OR— THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXIV.

UNSUCCESSFUL APPEAL TO MRS. ELLISTON IN BEHALF OF ABI.

EDWARD ELLISTON was at a loss to decide as to the manner he could best redeem the promise he had made to protect the friendless and beautiful Abi. He had several times almost come to the conclusion to beg his mother to afford her a temporary asylum, which, when he recalled to mind the intolerance with which she regarded those who belonged to any religious sect differing from her own, he was induced to abandon. Something must be done, however, and that quickly, for the morning was rapidly wearing away.

"My mother must consent to receive her; common decency demands it. It will only be paying a debt of gratitude for the protection afforded to Alice," he said to himself, after once more revolving the matter in his mind.

He knew she was in her room, and he at once sought an interview. He was a little discouraged by seeing that she looked very pale, and that her countenance bore the stamp of a stern and rigid composure, which, judging from former experience, he knew indicated a mood most unfavorable to his suit. Having a kind of vague suspicion as to what caused this state of mind, he was convinced that argument or reason would be alike lost on her, and decided at once to appeal to her feelings.

"Alice," said he, "has told you how kindly she was treated by those who gave her shelter?"

"She has," and she compressed her pale lips, after the utterance of these two monosyllables, more tightly than before.

"There is now an opportunity to return her kindness," said he. An impatient gesture of the hand, which he understood as a signal to say no more on the subject, was the only answer she deigned to make. He had, however, made up his mind to do what he believed justice and humanity demanded, and was not one, more than his mother, to be readily turned aside in his endeavors to perform a deliberately formed purpose.

"Mother," said he, "you must hear me. Jeduthun the Jew—" "Speak not of him. I could have almost prayed that Alice Dale might die, rather than she should have been placed under obligations to him, or any one connected with him."

"Jeduthun the Jew," said he, having waited calmly till she had finished speaking, "has this morning been arrested on a charge of murder. The accusation is a false one, as I am fully persuaded, and Abi, his grand-daughter, whom Alice has doubtless described to you, being deprived of a protector, I promised to see that some safe and honorable retreat was provided for her, till he, to whose protection she has a natural claim, is at liberty. Unfortunately, I know of no such place as I have mentioned, except beneath this roof."

"Edward Elliston, how dare you even hint at such a thing?"

"Common humanity emboldens me."

"A blight and a curse would fall on me and mine, should I suffer Abi Rushton to enter my dwelling."

"I can see no reason for its being productive of so disastrous a result."

"It may be best," said Mrs. Elliston, after remaining silent a few minutes, "to give you an explanation. You remember a gentleman who called on me six or seven years ago, whose name I refused to tell you?"

"I do."

"It was Charles Rushton, Abi Rushton's father. He was the son of my step-mother, and had ever been as an own brother to me from the time when we first met. He married Miriam, the only daughter of Jeduthun the Jew, and from that moment, my sisterly affection for him was turned to hatred. For years we never met. After a time, his business required him to go to France, and thinking that my anger towards him might have passed away, he called on me, and requested me to receive his wife and daughter into my family, during his absence."

"And you refused?"

"Yes, and with a bitterness and scorn equalled only by my hatred to the accursed race with which he had allied himself. I did more. I invoked Heaven's malediction on myself, and on those dearest to me, if I ever permitted his wife or his daughter to have a home beneath my roof."

"What was his answer?"

"He had none to give. He turned away from me, sorrowfully, and in silence, and I never saw him again."

"If you would avert the malediction, you say you invoked, how can it be better done than by the exercise of that Christian spirit which teaches us to deal kindly and mercifully with the erring, and to speak comfortably to those who are despised and oppressed?"

"The words have been spoken, and to forfeit them would cause the curse to fall on me and mine. Even were it not so, it would be of no avail to recall them with my lips, as long as the bitterness which caused them remains in my heart."

"You surely would not seek to cherish the bitterness you speak of?"

"I might, were it a fitting time, point out to you why I should do so, but you might not see it, if I did. Your mind has not yet arrived at a state to see clearly what appears plain to me and others."

Edward thought it best not to reply to this, lest it should be in a manner less reverent than he thought was consistent with the respect due from a child towards a parent. Before leaving the room, he merely remarked, that since she denied Abi an asylum, he must seek for one elsewhere. At first, he had intended to represent to his mother that there was every reason to believe that Abi's religion was the same as her father's had been; but when he came to hear the peculiar nature of the objection to receiving her, which influenced her most, he knew it would be of no avail.

When the immediate excitement produced by the refusal of his request had had time to wear off, he felt that it would be almost impossible for him to accomplish his purpose. To the few with whom his mother was on terms of intimacy, he concluded that it would be worse than in vain to apply. The coldness and austerity assumed by them from a sense of duty, their intolerance towards those whose religious opinions differed from their own, strengthened by the wild, not to say fierce enthusiasm of the speakers at their secret conventicles, who did not hesitate to cite the cruelties practised by those of old under Joshua, and other warlike leaders, against the Assyrians and Moabites, as worthy of imitation, would leave little scope for the exercise of true Christian charity.

Meanwhile, the gentle and beautiful Abi lay in the calm, unbroken sleep which, some hours previously, had stolen over her. One arm was almost hidden beneath the profusion of her coal-black tresses, while the other, the hand still clasping the opal, looked like a piece of exquisite sculpture, as it rested on the rich purple cushions. A rich color tinged the smooth, oval cheeks, and from the lips, red and fresh, and slightly parted, the breath stole as softly as perfume from a rose.

Suddenly she started from her recumbent posture, and listened. She could not, she thought, be mistaken, for though all was then silent, it certainly was the sound of loud and strange voices which had roused her from sleep. Without moving from the place where she was, she still continued to listen. It was not long before she heard some one speak close to the door which opened into her apartment, though in a voice so low she could not distinguish what was said. She thought it must be Aseneth, and was about to rise and open the door, for she found she had slept a number of hours, when she was prevented by hearing some one utter a fierce imprecation, which was immediately succeeded by the report of a pistol. Then followed what appeared to her a violent, though short struggle. She neither dared speak, nor open the door, when a voice, which she was certain was Edward Elliston's, pronounced her name.

"Is it Edward Elliston who speaks?" she ventured to say.

"Yes," was the answer. "Open the door. You now have nothing to fear."

She obeyed, and beheld Edward Elliston and Clarence Harleigh.

"What has happened?" she inquired. Then adding quickly, in a startled voice, she said to Elliston: "You are wounded?"

"Very slightly," he replied, looking at his hand, which was partly covered with blood. "One of the villains fired at me, but missing his aim, the ball only grazed my hand. Unfortunately, he, as well as his associate, made his escape, which, had Mr. Harleigh arrived a minute sooner, might have been prevented."

Leaving to Edward Elliston the melancholy task of informing Abi of the imprisonment of her grandfather and the two servants, it will be necessary to say, by way of explanation, that on entering the back door by means of the key given him by Aseneth, his attention was attracted by a noise which appeared to proceed from a small room used by the Jew as a counting-room. Cautiously unclosing the door, he saw a man endeavoring to force the lock of a small drawer. Through an opposite door, standing at the outside entrance of the shop, he could see another man, apparently on the look-out, for the purpose of giving the alarm should he see any one approaching. It was he who fired the pistol, and then darting into the street, ran; while Elliston, springing forward, endeavored to prevent the other's escape. In this he was unsuccessful, though he succeeded in wounding him severely in the arm with his rapier.

"There is room for hope," Edward Elliston said, when he had related to Abi what had taken place, and this assurance was all the consolation he had it in his power to offer.

For the present, it produced but little effect. The sad intelligence seemed to bewilder and stupify her, and time was needed to restore sufficient tone to her mind, to enable her to derive comfort from the assurance. Elliston drew Harleigh aside.

"I came here this morning," said he, "to restore the scarf belonging to Abi, which, through forgetfulness, I had retained in my possession. My doing so was providential, I think I may say, as otherwise I might not have known of the Jew's arrest. Since then, I have vainly been endeavoring to find some place where she can remain in honor and safety till her grandfather's release."

"Cannot such a place be found in some family among her own people?"

"It is hardly right to say her people. Her father wasn't a Jew, and Alice, from some remarks Abi made to her, is certain that he had taught her to believe in his own faith. If no other place can be found, I suppose they must be applied to."

"I think Mrs. Selwyn will be willing to receive her," said Harleigh, after a few moments' reflection.

"Mrs. Selwyn is your sister?"

"Yes. She has nothing of the Pharisee about her, causing her to hold at a distance all who do not agree with her in every point."

"I have heard of her, and if the friendless girl could be placed under her protection, nothing better for her could be desired. Will you see your sister, and speak to her about it?"

"I can, though I think the better way will be to take her by surprise, and let the girl plead her own cause. There will be more eloquence in one look of that beautiful face, and in a single tone of her sweet and musical voice, than in all I should be able to say, however earnest my appeal to her sympathies."

"I am afraid that she will think us too presuming."

"I don't believe there will be any danger of that. If there should be any blame, I shall take care that it is cast on me. Will you remain here while I go and procure a conveyance?"

"That will be unnecessary. The carriage I came in is close at hand."

What had passed between them, was now communicated to Abi, except that they forbore to tell her that Mrs. Selwyn had not been apprised of their intention. She had not, till thus reminded of it, thought of her friendless and helpless situation, so absorbed was she in the great sorrow which had fallen upon her; but now that her mind was directed to the subject, she thankfully and eagerly acceded to the proposition, and at once made preparation to leave, what no longer seemed a home.

Without entering into the details, we will only say that Harleigh did not over-estimate Mrs. Selwyn's benevolence and liberal-mindedness, and that she took Abi by the hand, and welcomed her to her home as kindly as if she had been her own sister.

CHAPTER XXV.

A DANGEROUS ACCIDENT.

A HEAVY, lumbering coach, drawn by a pair of sleek, well-conditioned horses, which was moving slowly along one of the fashionable streets of the city, seemed to particularly attract the attention of two men, who for some time had been lounging at the corner of an alley by which the street was intersected.

"That's it," said one of them.

"Are you certain?" said the other.

"Yes. Don't you see that the body of the carriage is bottle-green,—that the horses are iron-gray, and that there isn't a speck of gilding about carriage or harness? Anybody might know that it belonged to a straight-laced Puritan."

"It is easy enough to tell that, but there's more than one straight-laced Puritan in the city who owns a coach and two horses."

"There—what do you think now?"

This question was elicited by the sight of a young and lovely face which for a single moment appeared at one of the carriage windows, apparently from having recognized some one in a house near by.

"I think you are right," was the answer. "Russet-Cloak's face is one of those which is not easily forgotten."

"You understand your part of the game?"

"Yes. I am to be on the ground in season to lend my assistance—that is, if you do your part of the business so that it will be needed."

The other now hastened a few paces forward, so as to be a little in advance of the carriage, which was still moving at a snail's pace, though the pampered horses were evidently impatient of the restraint. The man commenced crossing the street, and when directly in front of the horses, drew a large silk handkerchief from his pocket, which, heedlessly and unwittingly to all appearance, he flung full into the face of one of the animals, which had the effect to frighten both. They immediately commenced plunging and rearing, so as to become totally unmanageable, and before any of the street-passengers had time to interfere, the carriage struck against the curbstone, and was overturned with a heavy crash. At the same moment, the horses, with a sudden bound, freed themselves from the pole of the carriage, and darting madly forward, were almost instantly out of sight.

A strong, resolute-looking countryman, who was the first to reach the broken vehicle, with some difficulty forced open the door. There were two ladies inside, the one whom the man had called Russet-Cloak, being young and very lovely, and will be recognized as Alice Dale; while the other, whom the countryman, who had succeeded in opening the door, at first sight imagined to be dead, was Mrs. Elliston. This, too, was the thought of Alice, who, though much frightened, had, with the exception of a sprained wrist, escaped unharm. By this time, Clarence Harleigh had come to their assistance, who had seen from the window of a house close at hand what had happened.

"Alice, are you hurt?" were his first words; and being satisfied on that score, he sternly commanded a man who was somewhat obtrusive in the offer of his services to stand back.

He then directed the countryman to assist him in carrying Mrs. Elliston to the house where he had witnessed the disaster.

"Keep close to us, Alice," said Harleigh. But the man whom he had rebuked for his officiousness had already stepped in between them, so as to prevent her from complying with his request.

The next moment, the crowd, which the accident had attracted to the spot, had closed round her, from which she tried in vain to extricate herself. Being thus hemmed in on every side, she could see nothing of Harleigh, so that even if she could have freed herself from the entanglements of the throng, confusedly pressing around her, she would have been at a loss where to go.

"Can you tell me, sir," said she, speaking to a decently-clad man who stood near her, "where they have carried the lady who was in the carriage with me when it was overturned?"

"You were in the carriage, then?"

"Yes," and she repeated the question she had already asked.

"I am sorry to say I cannot," was his answer.

"I can," said the man who from the first had showed himself so officious, "and with your permission, will, with much pleasure, conduct you to where you will find your friends."

Not knowing that he was the same person whose obtrusiveness had been checked by Harleigh, she having at the time been engrossed with attending to Mrs. Elliston as not to observe him, she accepted the offer of his protection, though there was something in his appearance which did not please her.

"Hold fast by my arm, then," he said, "and if these knives don't choose to fall back and give their betters a free pass, I will give them a lesson in manners, which they won't soon forget."

"When I have a mind to take a lesson in manners," said a man whom he roughly pushed aside, "I shan't take it of one of Gil Falkland's lackeys, without giving him one in return;" and to show that he meant as he said, he gave the man a sharp clip across the shoulders with his quarter-staff.

Alarmed at this, and still more at finding that the man who had offered her his aid was in the employ of Falkland, she let go of his arm, and endeavored to make her escape.

"I would give you a taste of my rapier," said he, at the same time seizing hold of a portion of Alice's dress, "were it not that I have this lady under my protection."

"Release me—I beg that you will," said Alice, in violent agitation.

"Rapier or no rapier," said he who had dealt the blow, "as you seem to have undertaken to protect the lady against her will, you shall have further proof of the virtue of this oaken cudgel, if you don't let her go."

The earnest and elevated tone of voice in which this was said, as well as the words themselves, served to indicate to Harleigh the place where Alice was to be found, who had, as he imagined, till after he had assisted to place the still insensible lady on a couch, entered the house with them.

The sight of Harleigh proved to be more efficacious than the threats of him with the quarter-staff. Immediately quitting his hold of Alice's dress, and taking advantage of the momentary diversion of the attention of her self-constituted champion, he succeeded in losing himself amid the swaying and shifting crowd, by the time he reached the spot. The exclamation of joy uttered by Alice, at Harleigh's appearance, would of itself have showed her sturdy defender that she had no reason to distrust him as a protector even had he not known him to be a gentleman of honor and irreproachable reputation. He now showed his good will by preceding Harleigh and Alice, and rendering their egress from the crowd easier and less annoying than it otherwise would have been.

"You have my thanks, good friend," said Harleigh, "for your voluntary service, and if you will accept it, it will give me pleasure to order you a good dinner."

"A dinner I have had already at my good dame's father's, from off as good a sirloin as there was in the market; and as for thanks, I hardly deserve them for doing what, if left undone, would have so lowered me in my own opinion, that I shouldn't have liked to look my wife Margery in the face again for a twelvemonth."

"It appears to me," said Harleigh, "that your looks and voice are familiar to me."

"Likely enough, for you have seen me once, I am certain."

"So am I, but when or where, I've no recollection."

"Do you remember that the king graciously admitted me to his presence, at Whitehall, not many weeks ago?"

"Yes, yes—I remember it well," said Harleigh, with some difficulty repressing a smile, as he recalled to mind Hendrick Dykes and the carefully preserved currycomb.

"Why, if I'd been a prince," said Hendrick, with great animation, "the king couldn't have treated me better. He told me—I wish I could say it in the same kind and pleasant way that he did—that Speedyfoot, the hazy mare I let him have, was the means of saving his life, when a dozen dragons were pursuing him. That and more he said to me, which made me proud and happy, and Margery wouldn't exchange the silk gown he ordered to be sent her for a queen's crown. He stole right into our hearts, and will keep there as long as we live."

They had by this time reached the steps of Mrs. Selwyn's door, where stood the countryman who had assisted Harleigh in removing Mrs. Elliston from the broken carriage and carrying her into the house. He proved to be a friend of Hendrick's, who had come to the city in company with him and his wife Margery. Having a second time received the cordial thanks of Harleigh, to which were added those of Alice, they took leave, equally pleased with themselves and with those who had shown themselves so ready to appreciate their services.

Alice was met at the door by Mrs. Selwyn and by Abi. Tears came to the eyes of the latter, and her voice trembled with emotion, as in a few words she alluded to the great sorrow which had fallen upon her since they parted.

A surgeon and Edward Elliston, who were immediately sent for, had now arrived. On examining the patient, it was found that the skull was so badly fractured it was necessary that a portion of it should be removed. All thoughts of her being carried to her own home were, therefore, for the present abandoned. By the time the operation was over, which was successfully performed, Alice found that her wrist, which she had imagined to be only slightly sprained, was much swollen and began to be excessively painful. On applying to the surgeon, she had the felicity of being told by him, after he had prescribed the usual remedies, that it might be several weeks before her hand would be of any use to her. This would render it impossible for her to bestow on Mrs. Elliston those numerous little attentions which she otherwise would have done, although a reliable and experienced nurse had been promptly sent for by Edward.

"I will supply your place, dear Alice, as far as I can," said Abi. "It will prevent my thoughts from dwelling so constantly on him whom I am not allowed to minister to."

Thus, by a combination of painful circumstances, Harleigh and Alice, Mrs. Elliston and Abi were brought together under the same roof. The promise made to Mr. Walworth by Harleigh was a second time unintentionally broken, while Mrs. Elliston, still in a state of insensibility, was waited on and watched over with the tenderest care by her to whom, in the hour of deep affliction, she had refused her aid and sympathy.

CHAPTER XXVI.

AN UNEXPECTED WITNESS APPEARS AT THE JEW'S TRIAL.

THE next session of the Old Bailey having been close at hand, at the time of the Jew's arrest, the day for his arraignment soon arrived. The strict search which had been made for the body of the valet had proved unsuccessful, a circumstance which, in the minds of many, told against the prisoner, as it was generally thought that he could, if he had been so minded, point out the place of his concealment.

Early in the day, crowds of people, consisting of almost every degree, were seen hastening to the place of trial. A host of witnesses had been summoned in behalf of the prosecution, while there were none, except Clarence Harleigh and Edward Elliston, Alice and Abi, who had anything to testify which would be favorable to the prisoner. What little they would be able to say, was unhappily of a nature so general and indirect, that it would be of no value, except as corroboratory evidence. The careful measurement of the bloody footprints, made by Edward Elliston, which differed in shape and size from those of the Jew, or either of his servants, though more to the point, would not be sufficient to outweigh the still stronger evidence which could be produced against the prisoner.

The circumstances which went to erminate the unhappy and friendless man, it is unnecessary to recapitulate. It is enough to say, that they were such as to make the opinion universal that he would be convicted. A few witnesses for the prosecution remained to be examined, when a billet was put into Harleigh's hand.

"If you are a friend to Judah the Jew," it said, "come without delay to the house directly opposite where he used to live, where you will see a person who will give you such information as you and some others may think worth hearing."

The billet was without signature, and written in a clerly hand. Merely saying to Edward Elliston, who sat next him, that he had received information which would make it necessary for him to leave a short time, Harleigh, having with some difficulty worked his way through the crowd, hastened to the house designated.

Before he had time to knock, the door was opened by a middle-aged woman.

"Follow me," said she, when he had entered, and she led the way up a dark, narrow staircase, and thence through a long and winding passage. At its termination, she opened a door. "Enter," said she, and then, without another word, withdrew.

He obeyed, and found himself in a comfortable looking bed-chamber, where, seated in a deep, stuffed chair, was a young man, so thin and pale, that his appearance was almost ghastly.

"You don't recognize me?" said he.

"I do not," was Harleigh's answer.

"I am not certain that you ever saw me before to your knowledge, though I've often seen you."

"I've no recollection of ever having seen you till now."

"There are those who will know me, and who would rather meet a famished wolf in their path than to see me. I am, or was Gilbert Falkland's valet."

"Do you mean him supposed to have been murdered?"

"I am he."

"This is indeed strange and most unlooked for. Judging by your pale looks, and the deep scar on your forehead, you have been near death's door."

"Within a single step, as I am told by those into whose care I fell."

"Were you found where the would-be murderer left you?"

"I was beset by more than one, and after lying like one dead for hours, for I have since learned that faint streaks of day were glimmering in the east, life but not reason returned. The master of the house where I now am, who was preparing to start on a journey, had risen earlier than usual, and the light which gleamed from the door, which he opened to see what the weather was, must have attracted my attention, for I succeeded in reaching the doorstep, where I fell. The man had already closed the door, but while stopping to fasten it, he heard the heavy fall, and what he thought sounded like a groan. He opened the door, and with the assistance of a servant, carried me into the house. A Jew surgeon was procured, who dressed the wound on my forehead, and another, which he considered more dangerous, in my side. He gave it as his opinion that there was hardly a possibility of my recovering, yet, as while there is life there is hope, no means were left untried. When it became known to them that their neighbor who lived opposite was charged with the crime of murder, and that, from some of the circumstances attending it, I must be the person supposed to be murdered, they determined for a while to keep silent on the subject, while, if possible, they increased their efforts for my recovery. If successful, it would not only save one of their people, who had hitherto been deemed irreproachable, from suffering the extreme penalty of the law, but if he were guiltless—and they believed that he was—it would be the means of entirely exonerating him, and of fixing the crime on the real perpetrators."

"You were insensible all this time?"

"Yes. Had it not been so, their precaution would have been unnecessary, as I could have cleared the Jew and his two servants, who, I understand, if he is found guilty, will be tried as his accomplices, from all participation in the deed. When I first came to myself, I was so weak that my medical attendant wouldn't suffer any questions to be asked me. In a few days, however, I began to mend rapidly. My strength and my memory returned together, and by degrees I recollected all that happened to me the evening Falkland sent me to the Jew's, up to the moment I was struck down by the blow on my forehead. But of that hereafter. This is the second day of the trial, I understand."

"It is."

"How far had it proceeded when you received the billet I sent you?"

"Only two or three more witnesses for the prosecution were to be examined, when the court will adjourn till to-morrow morning."

"It is supposed that the Jew will be capitally convicted?"

"As the case stood when I left, no one who knew how slight the evidence was, which could be given by the four witnesses summoned to appear in his favor, would entertain a doubt to the contrary. Now, we hope it will be different."

"Yes—I shall be there to-morrow, to give in my testimony."

"Are you able? Can you endure the necessary excitement and fatigue?"

"My physician has given his consent—reluctantly, it is true."

"Your written deposition, you know, will answer."

"Yes, but I prefer to be there in person. The sight of me, whom they suppose dead, will strike the real criminals with such consternation, that their guilty looks will enforce all I shall have to say. My motive in sending for you, was to request you to make the arrangements for my appearance with such secrecy that no one not already in the secret will have any suspicion that I am living, till I am ready to give in my evidence."

Harleigh expressed his willingness to comply with his request, and promised to call again in the evening, that they might talk over the matter, and have everything settled between them.

The court-house was, if possible, more crowded than the day previous. Falkland was present, and now that it appeared to him certain that suspicion would not be directed towards those who committed the crime (for he was aware that the evidence for the defence must necessarily be extremely slight), he, unconsciously perhaps, assumed a bolder and more confident air.

Corkle and his two confederates were likewise there, and though they carefully kept apart, they could not forbear, occasionally, telegraphing each other with looks and signs expressive of satisfaction, now there no longer appeared to them to be a doubt that they should escape without even the shadow of a suspicion of having dipped their hands in human blood.

After the opening argument for the defence, Harleigh was the first witness who was called. When he had finished the little he had to say, after exchanging a few words with the prisoner's counsel, in a voice too low to be heard by any one except by themselves, he left the room by a private door, just back of the witness-box. Elliston in the meantime had been called to the stand. He had little to add to what Harleigh had said, and when he had withdrawn, a chair was placed where he had stood. Before the spectators had time to express to each other the curiosity and surprise occasioned by this proceeding, Harleigh entered by the same door he went out at, a short time previously, with a man leaning on his arm, whom he conducted to the chair that had been placed on the stand.

The man seemed weak and agitated, and was very pale, an appearance which was heightened by the almost crimson hue of a newly cicatrized wound on his forehead. At sight of him, Falkland started, and a sudden flush overspread his countenance. For a few moments, he found it impossible to control his agitation, and his first impulse was to attempt, while the attention of those present was drawn towards Redding, to leave the court-house.

"It will look as if I were guilty," he said to himself, after a moment's reflection, and the half formed intention was therefore abandoned.

His thoughts, however, continued to be in such a whirl, that he could not recall the circumstances of the dark affair, as related to him by Corkle, with sufficient clearness to remember if anything said or done in the hearing of his late valet, by the assassins who waylaid him, was of a nature to implicate himself. His own name, he thought, might have been mentioned in his hearing, previously to the dealing of the stunning blow, which, he had been assured, was enough to deprive his victim of life, as well as consciousness, even without the addition of the deep wound in the side.

Falkland looked furtively towards Corkle, who, he could see, had a restless, uneasy look, and that he cast stealthy glances towards the door, as if meditating his escape. Skellum, as well as his associate, appeared more impassive, the former, in a particular manner, preserving a stolid expression of countenance, though within the short space of time that had elapsed since Redding's entrance, he had succeeded, by a scarcely observable retrograde movement, in sensibly shortening the distance between himself and the door. Neither of them knew that measures had been taken to prevent, for a given time, the egress of any person whatever from the house.

From the first moment of Redding's appearance, there was a striking change in the countenance of the prisoner. His head, which had been bowed in hopeless despondency on his breast, was raised to its natural position, and his dark eyes, which lighted up with a brilliance almost dazzling, were for a few moments raised to heaven, while the words of Holy Writ, "Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power," seemed, unconsciously, to fall from his lips.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

CITY OF QUEBEC.

Let us now proceed to notice the illustrations which accompany our text. The first engraving, on the first page, is a portrait of Batiste, a well-known Indian pilot, steering a steamer down the rapids of the St. Lawrence. He is a man of great nerve and skill, and it requires both to perform this dangerous service. The traveller in Canada, if he be at all timid, will have his nerves sorely tried as he makes the passages of the rapids. The long "Sault" (leap), as it is called, is a continuous rapid of nine miles, divided in the centre by an island. The usual passage for steamers is on the south side, though the north side, formerly considered too dangerous, is now proved to be practicable. The rapids pour furiously along at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and of course the steam is shut off when the vessel enters them. The waves roar and dash angrily on all sides of her, as she strains and labors in the current, still sliding downward. Great nerve, force and precision are required in piloting, so as to keep the vessel's head straight with the course of the rapid; for if she diverged in the least, presenting her side to the current, or "broached to," as the nautical phrase is, she would be instantly capsized and submerged. Hence the necessity for enormous power over her rudder; and for this purpose, the mode of steering affords great facility, for the wheel that governs the rudder is placed ahead, and by means of chain and pulley sways it. But in descending the rapids, a tiller is placed astern to the rudder itself, so that the tiller can be manned as well as the wheel. Some idea may be entertained of the peril of descending a rapid, when it requires four men at the wheel and two at the tiller to ensure safe steering. Here is the region of the daring raftsmen, at whose hands are demanded infinite courage and skill, and, despite of both, loss of life frequently occurs. On the same page will be found a graphic view of a steamer making the descent of the "Lost Channel." The second engraving on page 357 exhibits the rapids near the "Cedars," on the St. Lawrence, with a number of rafts struggling with the furious waters. The rafts of timber form a highly interesting feature to the traveller as he passes along the river side. On each a shed is built for the accommodation of raftsmen, some of whom rig out their huge, unwieldy craft with gay streamers, which flutter from the tops of poles. Thus, when several of these rafts are grappled together, forming, as it were, a floating island of timber half a mile wide and a mile long, the sight is extremely picturesque; and when the voices of these hardy sons of the forest and the stream join in some of their Canadian boat songs, the wild music, borne by the breeze along the water, has a charming effect. Myriads of these rafts may be seen lying in the coves at Quebec, ready to be shipped to the different parts of the world. These rafts are particularly noticeable in our general view of the city of Quebec, of which, in the last number, we gave several interior views. In the foreground of this picture, is an Indian family, their frail birch bark canoe contrasting with the full-rigged ships and the large steamers gliding before the city. A glance at the engraving will show how commanding a position the city of Quebec occupies. Quebec, until recently the capital of United Canada, is situated on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, in latitude  $46^{\circ} 48'$  north, and longitude  $71^{\circ} 15'$  west, from Greenwich. It was founded by Charlevoix, in 1608, on the site of an Indian village, called Sadacoma. It is the second city in British America, and has a population of more than 45,000. The form of the city is nearly that of a triangle, the Plains of Abraham forming the base, and the Rivers to the Plains of Abraham. Quebec was taken by the British and colonial forces in 1629, but restored to France in 1632; and was finally captured by Wolfe in 1759, and, together with all the French possessions in North America, was ceded to Great Britain at the peace of 1763. Quebec, including the city and suburbs, contains 174 streets; among the principal of which are the following:—St. John's Street, which extends from Fabrique Street to St. John's Gate, in the Upper Town, and is occupied chiefly by retail stores; St. Louis Street is a handsome and well built street, extending from the Place d'Armes to the St. Louis Gate, and is occupied principally by lawyers' offices and private dwellings; D'Auteuil Street faces the Esplanade and the ground where the artillery are drilled, and is an elegant street, mostly of private dwellings; Grand Adlee, or St. Louis Road, outside St. Louis Gate, and leading to the Plains of Abraham, is a pleasant and beautiful street, on which are many elegant villa residences; St. John's Street, without, is also a fine street, occupied by shops and private dwellings. The principal street in the Lower Town is St. Peter's, on which, and on the wharves and small streets that branch from it, most of the banks, insurance companies and merchants' offices are situated. There are also several fine streets in the St. John's and St. Roch's suburbs. The appearance of these quarters of the city has been much improved since the great fires of 1845; the buildings that were then destroyed having been replaced by others of a very superior description. The Citadel, on Cape Diamond, is one of the most interesting objects to visitors; and those who are desirous of seeing it should make application to the town mayor, at the main guard-house, from whom tickets of admission can always be obtained by persons of respectability. The area embraced within the fortifications of the Citadel is more than forty acres. The line of fortifications, enclosing the Citadel and the Upper Town, is nearly three miles in length, and the guns with which they are mounted are mostly thirty-two and forty-eight pounders. There are five gates to the city, three of which, Prescott, Palace, and Hope gates, communicate with the Lower Town, and two of which, St. Louis' and St. John's gates, communicate with the suburbs of the same name. About three quarters of a mile from the city are four Martello towers, fronting the Plains of Abraham, and intended to impede the advance of an enemy from that direction. The second engraving on this page presents a general view of Kingston, C. W., a stirring place of great importance, situated on the St. Lawrence River, at the head of Lake Ontario, about 200 miles southwest of Montreal. This place was called by the Indians, Cataracqui. A settlement was begun by the French, under De Courcelles, as early as 1672. The

CITY OF KINGSTON, C. W.

St. Lawrence and St. Charles the sides. It is divided into two parts, known as the Upper and the Lower towns. The Upper Town is strongly fortified, and includes within its limits the Citadel of Cape Diamond, which is known to be the most formidable fortress in America. The Lower Town is built upon a narrow strip of land which runs at the base of the cape and of the high ground upon which the Upper Town stands, and the suburbs of St. Roch's and St. John's extend along the River St. Charles and fort, which was finished the next year, was called Fort Frontenac, in honor of the French count of that name. This fort was alternately in the possession of the French and the Indians, until it was destroyed by the expedition under Colonel Bradstreet, in 1758. In 1762, the place fell into the hands of the English, from whom it received its present name. Kingston is one of the most important military posts in Canada. It is one hundred and ten miles from Cobourg, and contains about 11,000 inhabitants. The splendid structure represented in the last engraving on this page, is the Victoria Bridge, that crosses the St. Lawrence, two miles wide, at Montreal. This magnificent work is now in the process of construction. In the whole history of engineering, there is nothing like so truly gigantic an undertaking. When finished, it will be not only among the greatest wonders of America, but of the world. This structure will contain twenty-five arches, of the uniform span of two hundred and forty-two feet. The tube is iron, the rest solid masonry, including the piers jutting into the river on either side, each about half a mile long; the centre arch will be sixty feet from the water level to the floor of the tube, which is twenty-five feet high and eighteen feet wide. It is calculated that each buttress will have to bear the pressure of seventy thousand tons of ice, when the winter breaks up and the large ice fields come sweeping down the St. Lawrence. Hence the necessity for such buttresses being peculiarly designed for the purpose of effecting the disruption of those formidable assailants, and hence the necessity for the personal supervision of the work by Mr. Stephenson himself. How insignificant seem many of the most celebrated engineering works of antiquity beside an achievement of this nature. What a pigmy would even the Colossus of Rhodes be, compared with the centre arch of Stephenson's colossal Victoria Bridge! For the use of the fine engravings of this series, we are indebted to the enterprising publishing firm of John P. Jewett & Co., of this city. They are specimens of the numerous beautiful illustrations of a work they have just issued, called "Hunter's Panoramic Guide from Niagara Falls to Quebec. By Wm. S. Hunter, Jr." without which no traveller should think of visiting Canada. It has, in addition to many smaller cuts, a folded panoramic view of the St. Lawrence, 12 feet long, taken from a bird's eye point of view, showing the whole course of the river, with the rapids and islands, the villages and cities on its banks, etc. With this in hand, the voyager need ask no questions; he will be sure to identify every point of interest. The letter-press is pointed and lucid, and embraces every important fact connected with the places mentioned, fully answering the need of the tourist.

VICTORIA BRIDGE—MONTREAL

THE WILD HORSE.

Troops of wild horses are found on the plains of Great Tartary, and also in several parts of South America. In neither, however, can we recognize an original race. The horses of the Ukraine and those of South America are equally the descendants of those who had escaped from the slavery of man. The Tartar horses are fleet and strong, but comparatively of an ordinary breed. Those of South America retain almost unimpaired the size and form of their European ancestors.

In no part of America was the horse known until he was introduced by Europeans; and the origin of the horses of Tartary has been clearly traced to those who were employed in the siege of Azoph, in 1057, but which were turned loose for want of forage. All travellers who have crossed the plains extending from the shores of La Plata to Patagonia, have spoken of numerous droves of wild horses. Some affirm they have seen ten thousand in one troop. They appear to be under the command of a leader, the strongest and boldest of the herd, and whom they implicitly obey. A secret instinct teaches them that their safety consists in their union, and in a principle of subordination. The lion, the tiger and the leopard are their principal enemies. At some signal intelligible to them all, they either close into a dense mass and trample their enemy to death, or placing the mares and foals in the centre, they form themselves into a circle, and welcome him with their hoofs. In the attack their leader is the first to face the danger, and when prudence demands a retreat they follow his rapid flight.

In the thinly inhabited parts of South America, it is dangerous to fall in with any of these troops. The wild horses approach as near as they dare; they call to the loaded horses with the greatest eagerness, and if the rider be not on the alert and have not considerable strength of arm and sharpness of spur, his beast will divest himself of his burden, take to his heels and be gone forever. The horses of the Pampas are like the common description of the Spanish horse, but rather stronger. They are of all colors, and a great number are piebald. When caught, they will kick at any person who goes behind them; and it is also with great difficulty they can be bridled and saddled; however, they are not vicious, and when properly broken in, will allow children to mount by climbing up their tails. In mounting, it is necessary to be very quick, and previous to dismounting, it is proper to throw the bridle over one side of the head, as the horses always run backward if one attempts to hold them by the bridle when it is over the head.

These horses possess much the form of the Spanish animals, from which it is said they sprung; they are tamed, as has been

STEAMERS DESCENDING LOST CHANNEL, LONG SAULT RAPIDS

The wild horses are captured by means of the lasso, a missile weapon used by every nation of the United Provinces and Chili. It is a very strong plaited thong, of equal thickness, half an inch in diameter, and forty feet long, made of many strips of green hide, plaited like a whip-thong, and rendered supple by grease. It has at one end an iron ring, above an inch and a half in diameter, through which the thong is passed, and this forms a running noose.

When the Guacho wants a horse for himself or for the traveller, he either goes with a lasso to the corral, and selects those who on the preceding day had for the first time been backed, or scampers across the plain and presently returns with an nowilling or subdued captive. When the services of the animals have been exacted, he either takes them to the corral and feeds them with a small quantity of maize, if he thinks he shall presently need them again, or once more turns them loose on the plains. The rude inhabitants of the plains of South America have no stables, no fenced pastures. One horse is usually kept tied at the door of the hut, fed scantily at night on corn, or at other times several may be enclosed in the corral, which is a circular space surrounded by rough posts driven into the ground. The mares are never ridden or attempted to be tamed, but wander about with their foals wherever they please.—Country Gentleman.

LOCOMOTIVE EXPERIENCE

Riding on the engine of an express train is exciting business. We made intercession with the powers that be, the other day, and secured a passage for a distance of ten miles on "the machine." It is interesting to watch the track ahead, and imagine yourself going down the bank from some obstruction. You look at the steam-gauge and wonder if a hundred and ten pounds of steam is a safe quantity. As the speed increases, the sway of the engine attracts especial notice. Every little roughness of the track is felt, and the machine goes knocking about from side to side, with force enough to tear the rails from the ties. The flat ribbon of rail, extending so far before you, seems utterly insufficient to hold the vast, ponderous weight of iron upon it. For relief from the terrors you have conjured up, you turn to the engineer and venture a remark. He does not look around, his hand is on the lever, his eye steadily fixed on the track. Just then the fireman rings the bell for a crossing. You can see it swing, but in the crash and thunder of your progress you hear no sound, and then you think that the engineer perhaps did not hear your voice. The fireman is constantly busy. He piles up the wood in easy distance and then "stokes." As the dry sticks are cast in the furnace, the devouring flame seizes them with fierce avidity, eats into their substance, penetrates their pores, and tears them to pieces almost in a moment. It is an awful fire, unlike any you ever witnessed. You take another look at the track and gain a new sensation, for wherever the rail is a little settled, the engine sinks down upon it, and it seems as if the wheels and trucks were giving way, and the whole machine about to crush down in one fatal smash-up. These are daylight observations, but the night is the time to enjoy a locomotive ride. The light from the engine-lamp extends only two or three rails forward—beyond that all is darkness, and you go plunging on into the black unseen before you, without a possibility of a forewarning of any danger. You can see the switch lights, or that of another locomotive, but a log or a drunken man may be on the track, or a rail may be broken, and you none the wiser, until with a crash you meet your doom.—Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

RAPIDS NEAR "THE CEDARS"—RIVER ST. LAWRENCE

seen, with far less difficulty than could be thought possible, and although their's is the obedience of fear and enforced by the whip and spur, there are no horses who so soon and so perfectly exert their sagacity and their power in the service of man. They are possessed of no extraordinary speed, but they are capable of enduring immense fatigue. They are frequently ridden sixty or seventy miles without drawing bit, and have been urged on by the cruel spur of the Guacho more than a hundred miles, and at the rate of twelve miles an hour.

The wild horses of Tartary, although easily domesticated, materially differ in character from those on the plains of South America. They will not suffer a stranger to join them. If a domesticated horse comes in their way, unprotected by his master, they attack him with their teeth and heels, and speedily destroy him. They rapidly submit, however, to the dominion of man, and become perfectly docile and faithful.

The natural disposition of these animals is not ferocious; they are only high-spirited and wild; and though superior in strength to the greater part of animals, yet they never attack them; and if they are attacked by others, either disdain them or trample them under their feet. They go also in bodies, and unite themselves into troops, merely for the pleasure of being together, for they are not fearful of, but have an attachment for each other. As herbs and vegetables are sufficient for their nourishment, they have quite enough to satisfy their appetite; and as they have no relish for the flesh of animals, they never make war with them nor with each other; they never quarrel about their food, they have no occasion to ravish the prey of another, the ordinary source of contentions and quarrels among carnivorous animals. They live in peace, because their appetite is simple and moderate; and as they have enough, there is no room for envy.

As all parts of Europe are at present peopled, and almost equally inhabited, wild horses are no longer found there, and those which we see in America were originally European tame horses, which have multiplied in the vast deserts of the country. The astonishment and fear which the inhabitants of Mexico and Peru expressed at the horses and their riders, convinced the Spaniards that this animal was entirely unknown in these countries; they therefore carried thither a great number, as well for service and their particular utility, as to propagate the breed. M. de la Salle, in 1685, saw in the northwestern parts of this country, near the Bay of St. Louis, whole troops of these wild horses, feeding in the pastures, and which were so fierce that no one dare to approach them.

FALLS OF MONTMORENCY

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SPRING.

BY ELLEN M. GALTINE.

The long and gloomy wintry months are over,
Sweet Spring resumes her regal throne again;
Soft springing grass the hills and valleys cover—
Welcome, fair empress, to thy broad domain!
On hill and plain thy warm and glowing fingers
Are swiftly loosing Winter's icy chain,
Where, stern and cold, the grim old monarch lingers,
Reluctant to resign his stormy reign.

I see the waving of thy golden tresses,
The dazzling beauty of thy smile divine;
In the south wind I feel thy soft caresses,
And joy exultant fills thy heart of mine.
In grove and glen ten thousand flowers are blushing
Beneath the radiance of thy sunny eye;
From tiny throats ten thousand songs are gushing,
Filling the air with joyous melody.

Freed from the chains of Winter's stern dominion,
The soul, bowed down with weariness and gloom,
Rises aloft on faith's triumphant pinion,
To the blest land of never fading bloom.
To that fair clime, where reigns the spring eternal,
Whose bending skies are ever soft and bright;
Whose flowery fields are ever fresh and vernal:
Where all is bloom and fragrance, joy and light.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WEEMATOO, THE INDIAN PRINCESS.

A TALE OF MT. WACHUSETT.

BY FRANCES M. CHESEBRO'.

MT. WACHUSETT, now a famous resort of pleasure-parties and lovers of fine scenery, overlooks a panorama of beauty of great extent, comprising cultivated farms, beautiful country villages, miniature lakes, and rippling streams, even affording an occasional glimpse of the waters that border our coast. From the top of the mountain you command an unbroken view on either side, intersected by no higher land, and in fertility and beauty of scenery this eminence has justly obtained a worthy distinction among the other mountains in New England.

Two hundred years ago this mountain, then called "Wachusett Hill," was the home of mighty tribes of Indians, and the abode of their powerful sachem. In the year 1644, Nashacowan and Wassamagin, two chiefs, and leaders of the tribes living in the vicinity of this hill, appeared before the governor, desiring to be received under his protection and government. They were made acquainted with the articles drawn up for their mutual protection, and freely assented to them. Then presenting the court, as was customary on such occasions, with gifts of wampum, they received in turn a testimonial of the friendly league that had been ratified, and proceeded joyfully to their homes.

About this time, John Eliot commenced his labors among the Indians of Massachusetts, having prepared himself for the task by a thorough knowledge of the language, gained by becoming a pupil to one of their own number. After a few years of wonderful success in his efforts to teach the simple truths of Christianity, other kindred spirits became interested with him in the work, and aided him essentially in his labors. Among the latter was a young man, a personal friend of Eliot, who had gained the confidence of the governor and court by his ready intellect and active service in the young colony. He, too, had given his time to gain a knowledge of the Indian dialect, and was often employed as a messenger to carry verbal communications from the white settlements to the Indian camps. He had previously studied medicine, and was considerably versed in his profession, which, with his other practical qualities, made him a most servicable person for the peculiar circumstances surrounding him. To him was entrusted, in 1650, a most important message from the governor of Massachusetts to the tribes living on and about Mt. Wachusett.

It was on a warm September day that young Talbot found himself following the narrow track that led him up the acclivity of the hill to the tent of Wassamagin. He had been accompanied on his journey by trusty white guides, but they had remained at the dwelling of a white settler at the foot of the hill, in what is now the pleasant town of Princetown, and the young man was left to proceed unattended up the mountain. The day was warm and cloudless, and as the sun began to descend behind the lofty grand hill, a quiet and beauty seemed to settle upon the landscape that were not unnoticed by the traveller. As he wound his way along the narrow footpath, he listened in vain to catch a sound that would indicate that the deep mighty forest that enveloped him was the abode of human life. Occasionally a squirrel surprised him by darting across the track, and the trees were full of the music of birds, carolling their evening songs.

About half way up the mountain, striking off from the main path, was the tent of Wassamagin. As Talbot approached it he was surprised at the strange silence that reigned around him. He saw groups of Indians reclining upon the ground, unarmed, and in loose garments, idling away the twilight hours, while in other circles, earnestly talking in low subdued voices, were Indian squaws and maidens. As Talbot neared the tent he was saluted by an Indian who was acting as doorkeeper to the abode of his sachem. Addressing him in his own language, the stranger requested to be conducted to Wassamagin.

"We no admit white man. Pretty Weematoos, bright Weematoos, is dying. No power can save her. Doctors do no good to pretty Weematoos. She die."

This, then, was the cause of the silence that pervaded the scene. A holy awe and reverence stole over the young man as he noted the sad, sympathizing faces clustered around the wigwam of the chief. He spoke again, and this time his words gained him a ready passport.

"I am a doctor; I may help your pretty Weematoos. Let me go to your chief."

He was at once conducted into the presence of Wassamagin. In one corner of the wigwam, on a couch of green boughs and leaves, covered with a soft fawn skin, reclined the Indian princess, the only daughter of the lordly chief. Her father knelt by her side with his face buried in his hands, and his low, bewailing cry, half suppressed for fear of disturbing the sick maiden, touched the heart of the young man with a more than common sympathy. The Indian conductor softly approached his chief and roused him from his grief. He raised his head, and seeing a white stranger in his tent, strove to summon his dignity, and rose to approach him.

"Wassamagin gives thee greeting," said the chief, extending his right hand as a token of the friendly league subsisting between the white man and his tribe.

"I come from the governor," said Talbot, "bringing a message to you; but let not my business intrude upon your grief. I am a physician, somewhat skilled in medicine, and crave the favor of exerting my power in your daughter's behalf."

The chief shook his head mournfully, and said:

"No help for Weematoos. The Good Spirit is angry with Weematoos. Weematoos die."

"The Good Spirit is never angry with his children. He afflicts them in mercy," said Talbot, approaching the couch where the sick maiden reclined.

One glance at Weematoos convinced the young man of the nature of the disease that was so sorely afflicting the maiden. A hot fever was burning on her brow, and her parched lips were like burning coals. She was delicious, and occasionally her wild, incoherent cries rung through the wigwam, and brought every Indian on to his feet outside the tent. Taking the hand of Wassamagin, Talbot besought him to entrust his daughter to his care.

"The Good Spirit will surely bless my efforts. Only trust in Him, and me as his messenger, to restore your beautiful child to life."

The chief no longer resisted this appeal. Talbot instantly despatched one of the Indian attendants for a vessel of cold water from a spring further up the mountain. With this he bathed Weematoos's brow and parched skin; and taking from his travelling-satchel a few simple medicines, he administered them to his patient. The tent was hot, and the atmosphere impure. He ordered the doors to be thrown open, and apertures to be made to admit fresh air. With the application of a few of nature's restoratives the sick girl began to show signs of improvement.

The night came on, and Wassamagin and Talbot together watched over the couch of Weematoos. During the intervals of rest that came to her, the chief questioned his guest as to his healing power, and desired to be further instructed in the new doctrine of the Great Spirit. John Eliot had visited the tribes about this mountain and had awakened an interest in his preaching in the simple hearts of the red children. There was a mystery connected with the new truths, and this, together with what now seemed to be the wonderful healing power of Talbot, caused him to be regarded by Wassamagin as a being of superior origin and destiny.

The still hours of the summer night passed away, and with the morning light came the joyful tidings that Weematoos was saved. Her fever was allayed, her reason returned, and the crisis of danger passed. As the sun rose above the glorious old mountain, Talbot and the sachem knelt before the couch of the maiden, and together blessed God for the success that had attended his efforts. Wassamagin besought the young man to remain his guest until Weematoos should be wholly restored to health. Talbot consented, and for a fortnight remained an honored guest of the great sachem.

Leaving the Princess Weematoos surrounded by her numerous faithful attendants, Wassamagin, accompanied by young Talbot, repaired to the place appointed for the council, to meet there his own and neighboring tribes, to execute the business contained in the message from the governor. There had been some serious depredations made by the Indians from this vicinity, and the former pledge was to be again read and renewed, as a reminder of their treaty and a warning to any who might hereafter forfeit this sacred bond. The council chamber was an open space in the forest. High maples and towering oaks towered above them, and a soft green carpet of grass and moss was at their feet. The summer breeze wafted to them the fragrance of the pine and the sweet fern, and below them lay an unbroken, uncultivated country, with an occasional corn patch and scattered hovel bordering upon forests, while the beautiful lakes and streams lie embosomed in nature as she came from the hand of her Creator.

Talbot appeared before the assembled tribes leaning upon the strong arm of Wassamagin. A murmur of jealousy ran through the ranks of the young warriors. The rumor of Weematoos's deathly sickness, and the strange manner in which she had been rescued, had gone throughout the camps, and a thrill of jealous indignation seized the young men as they foresaw the favor that might come to Talbot for this service rendered to their chief. Among the rebellious ones was Onatona, the son of the sachem who dwelt on the east side of the mountain, and who for many years had been a devoted admirer of Weematoos. His suit had been but partially favored until within a few months, when she had yielded to his wooing, and was now his affianced bride. Wassamagin raised his voice and proclaimed to the assembled tribes his strong adherence to the former pledge, then in words of eloquence spoke of the great favor he had received from the stranger.

"White man come to my tent. The flower of our tribe, the red rose, Weematoos, was dying. No power could save her. White man came—sent by the Great Spirit—and Weematoos lives. Break the treaty at your peril. Wassamagin's anger and curse fall upon each head that harms my guest or breaks one clause of the sacred pledge."

The assembly dispersed, and Talbot returned to the tent of Wassamagin. Here they were greeted by Weematoos, who, leaning upon the arm of her favorite attendant, came up the path to meet them. Her cheek was yet thin from the effect of her late illness, but a healthy, vigorous life flowed in her veins, and her step had gained somewhat of its elasticity. As she came forward to meet her father and his guest, Talbot thought he had never seen so graceful a figure, so noble a mien connected with such sweetness and beauty of features. Her whole bearing betokened her origin. She was indeed worthy the name of princess.

Having saluted her father with a kiss, Weematoos modestly touched her lips to the hand of his companion, who had extended it as a sign of welcome. They entered the tent and sat a long time together conversing on the events of the day. Weematoos listened with a beating heart to the words of her father as he rehearsed for her hearing each circumstance of the council. Her cheek grew hot and red with excitement as she learned of the rebellion that ran through the ranks of the younger portion of the tribes. She retired apart, leaving the sachem and his guest together, to think upon the strange events of the day. She sat under the shadow of an oak, and with her beautiful head resting against the trunk of the tree, meditated long and earnestly. She was aroused from this position by a call to hasten in and preside at the coming repast, after which she pleaded weariness, and bidding them good night, retired from their presence.

After the council had broken up, and the chiefs and older men had proceeded to their homes, a band of young warriors loitered away by themselves, waiting till the evening shadows should come to screen them from view, that they might repair to their secret haunt. There were twelve of these noble young chiefs, tall, athletic, and proud of bearing, and as they sat together, their eyes flashing with jealous revenge, they presented an imposing picture of rude, uncultivated nature roused to revolt and rebellion. Onatona was the first to speak. With fire flashing from his eyes he called upon his comrades to aid him in his work of revenge. The white man had come among them, and by necromantic power had restored Weematoos to life. He had sat a favored guest at Wassamagin's board, and had wrested from him the affections of his affianced bride. Weematoos had frowned upon him when last they met. He then vowed revenge. It should fall upon the head of the white man.

A murmur of applause ran around the circle, and each clasped the other's hand as a pledge that they would aid in the work of vengeance. While they sat thus, consulting with each other on some feasible plan to effect their purpose, a slight rustling of leaves caused them to start and look out into the darkness. A figure glided down the path to their secret retreat and stood in their midst. They sprang upon their feet, and stood speechless, waiting for the intruder to speak. Throwing off the heavy blanket that wrapped her slight form, Weematoos revealed herself to the astonished group. Her words were addressed to her affianced lover, Onatona.

"Think, Onatona, to gain the hand of the red rose by this work of revenge? The white man is Weematoos's preserver. The good spirit sent him to bring back the life that was waning. The white man is Wassamagin's friend. Let Onatona touch but one hair of his head and the red rose blooms no longer for him. The white man's God will help her revenge his wrong. Weematoos desires a promise from Onatona."

Filled with surprise at the appearance of the maiden in their midst, and horror-stricken that their plans should reach the ear of their chief, Onatona gave the desired pledge, but only as a plea to induce Weematoos to return to her home, with her fears allayed. The sudden appearance of the chief's daughter in their secret haunt so surprised the party that for five minutes no one spoke. Onatona was the first to break the silence.

"Shall the white man escape the red man's revenge, and our wrong go unavenged? Weematoos plays false to her lover. The white stranger has stolen the heart of the red rose."

Then crouching down together upon the ground, they took up the broken thread of their plan, and with fresh vigor worked at its completion. There were plenty of loose, disorderly Indians among the tribes that for a paltry bauble would act as spy upon the movements of the white man. One of these persons had been sent to the tent of Wassamagin to learn if possible the plans of young Talbot. At this stage of their conference the messenger arrived, bringing tidings that on the morrow he would repair to the house of a white settler at the foot of the mountain, there to confer with the guides who accompanied him on his journey.

They then were in possession of the necessary information for the effecting of their purpose. It was decided that on the following day a messenger, purporting to be from Weematoos, should repair to the dwelling of the white man and request Talbot to meet her at a rendezvous a mile distant, on the night of that day, in order to receive intelligence of great import to his life and safety. The messenger was to call at the appointed hour and conduct him to the place of meeting, and deliver him into the hands of the young warriors, Onatona himself craving the privilege of inflicting the fatal wound. At a late hour the little company separated, to meet again at the same hour on the following night.

When Weematoos left the presence of the young warriors, she did not return immediately to her father's tent, but glided around the brow of the hill, until she supposed the sound of her footstep could no longer be heard; then taking another path, she retraced her steps, and walked cautiously along till she reached a part of the woods thickly covered with low underbrush. With her hands she tore away the tangled shrubbery and gained for herself an entrance into the narrow mouth of a cave under the projecting hill. Then crawling upon her hands and feet along the passage, she found herself in a hollow cavern, or artificial retreat, almost directly under the spot where the young Indians assembled.

This strange place was known only to the house of Wassamagin. It was scooped out from under the hill many years before, as a place of resort for the chief and his private friends during a time when feuds existed between the tribes in that vicinity. It was used also as a place for private conferences, and was arranged so as to gather the particulars of the movements of the tribes who were wont to assemble in the then secret haunt now occupied by the young revolvers. At one time Wassamagin was secreted in this cave for ten days, and Weematoe had often heard her mother, who had since died, relate how she, inspired with true woman's courage, went each night to the spot to take to her husband chief his daily food.

With a beating heart Weematoe listened to the plan renewed after her departure. She remained here until after the family had dispersed, then hurried through the darkness to her father's tent. She threw herself upon her fawn skin couch, and overcome by weariness and fatigue, she soon fell asleep. When she awoke the following morning, to her great surprise the sun was shining into the apartment, and the busy sounds without the tent convinced her that she had overslept her usual hour for rising. In a moment all the terrible events of the past night came to her mind. Springing hastily upon her feet, she hurriedly arranged her simple toilet, and hastened out to confer with Talbot before he should leave on his day's journey. What was her distress to learn that he had departed an hour before, leaving a message for her, to the effect that during the following week he should again appear at the tent of Wassamagin to bid her farewell previous to his final departure.

Now Weematoe saw that she was too late. Her preserver's life was in danger, and in her anxiety for him she took no thought of herself or of the obstacles that clustered thickly in her way, but at once began to devise some measure to put to nought the plan of her jealous lover. All the day she sat meditating this scheme, and when night began to throw heavy shadows in the deep forest, she took with her her trustiest servant and started for the house of the white settler.

Having arrived near the dwelling, she secreted herself, and sent forward her messenger, placing in his hand a single ornament, a gift from Talbot, as a surety that she herself was awaiting him. Soon the servant returned bringing Talbot with him. He had received the former message purporting to be from Weematoe, and was striving to solve the mystery, when he was again summoned to her presence. Addressing her in her own language, he desired her to explain why, in her delicate health, she had sought him, almost alone and exposed to countless dangers. Weematoe's only answer was a request that he would, without a moment's delay, prepare to follow her whither she might lead him. Talbot looked into her face and scanned it long and earnestly, thinking he might discover some trace of her disease yet lingering about her, some fresh attack of delirium; but he saw nothing but a calm resolute determination, and placing his hand in hers, he freely consented to follow her. They commenced their route back in a different direction from the one usually frequented. Weematoe instructed her guide to take the circuitous path leading to the right, that would necessarily carry them far out of the direct course. This she did that they might not encounter the party who a little later would be assembled at their appointed rendezvous.

When they began to ascend the hill, Talbot saw that they were on the opposite side of the mountain, and their way lay through an unfrequented region. After a three hours' journey, Weematoe dismissed her guide, and with her companion proceeded to the entrance of the artificial cave. Talbot, more than ever involved in mystery, could only follow her, trusting to her friendship and fidelity. When within the narrow enclosure, Weematoe explained to him the cause of this strange proceeding. She begged of him to remain there until she should give him the word of release, assuring him that each night at a stated hour he would find food placed in the narrow entrance to his prison house. Talbot was greatly impressed with the danger Weematoe had passed through for his safety, and begged to be permitted to accompany her home to Wassamagin's tent. Weematoe calmed his fears by assuring him that she possessed a charmed life, and was safe among friends or enemies. She had nothing to fear, for revenge was not to fall upon her head, but upon her preserver's.

Days passed away, and Weematoe found opportunity to supply her prisoner with daily food. Rumors in the meantime had gone out that the messenger sent by the governor was missing, and no clue could be gained of him. The white settler, whose guest he had been, became alarmed, and despatched a hasty communication to the governor. Soon there came a message to Wassamagin demanding the safe return of Talbot, requesting one of their own number, the son of a chief, to be reserved as hostage until his messenger should be restored to him.

Wassamagin had been absent from home since the day following the council, and on returning had barely time to learn of the sudden disappearance of his guest before he received the communication from the governor. He immediately despatched men in all directions to summon the tribes together in council.

On the following day there was a large assembly convened to listen to the words of the powerful chief, and to learn what new cause had thus suddenly brought them together. Onatona was there with his faithful band of associates. Wassamagin rose and laid before the assembled tribes the message he had received from the governor, and demanded of them the person of young Talbot.

He harangued them with words of fiery eloquence, reminding them of the solemn treaty, and threatening them with his anger if they failed to comply with his request.

After this speech a dead silence reigned among the assembled tribes. No one of that great concourse of people could give any clue to his disappearance. During this unbroken silence, the sounds, at but a little distance, of crackling logs could be heard, and all eyes were directed to the spot from whence proceeded these sounds. A cry of surprise and joy echoed through the forest as the ranks separated to admit inside the circle the princess Weematoe and her preserver. Walking to the side of her father, she motioned her companion to take his stand by her. She raised her silvery voice, and said:

"Weematoe delivers up her prisoner into the hands of Wassamagin."

Weematoe then proceeded to relate to her father, in the presence of the awe-struck assembly, the train of complicated events that had transpired. After dwelling in full upon each circumstance connected with his rescue, omitting nothing save the place of concealment, she turned toward Onatona and said:

"Weematoe throws to the wind the oaths that bound her to Onatona. The red liver is false. He would destroy the messenger of the Good Spirit, and the preserver of Weematoe's life. The red rose no longer unfolds its blossom on the bosom of the false betrayer."

Then turning to her father, Weematoe expressed her intention of accompanying the white man to his home, to learn of him the truths of the new religion, and to serve him in return for the gift he had bestowed upon her. She would be the white man's sister, and in his home he further instructed of the Great Spirit, then she would return and teach her own people.

Wassamagin gave his consent to Weematoe's request, and directed the revolvers to be removed for punishment. In consideration of the fact that they were sons of chiefs, and members of high families, whom it would be bad policy to offend, he mitigated their sentence, which ordinarily would have been death. Then the assembly broke up, and through the different forest paths each group wended their way home.

Soon after this, Talbot proceeded on his journey homeward, accompanied by Wassamagin and Weematoe, where the latter remained as an honored guest and pupil in the house of John Elliot. She soon after adopted the costume of the white women, and became greatly beloved and revered for the beauty of her character and the great service she had rendered Talbot. A few years later she became the wife of Talbot, whom she loved and served with all the ardor and fidelity of her princely nature.

Weematoe lived many years, a happy, faithful wife, and her descendants are now among the inhabitants of our New England, and they boast with great pride and satisfaction their lineal descent from the noble Indian princess, the daughter of Wassamagin, the beautiful Weematoe.

(Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.)

A GLANCE AT THE RUINS OF PÆSTUM.

BY FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

THE ruins of Pæstum are the columns of Hercules to most of the tourists who visit Italy. The road and the environs have not been of the safest at certain periods. This bad reputation and the more real danger of the malaria still keep a certain number of travellers aloof, even among those who make a professional study of the country. So many persons now-a-days traverse Italy with impunity, that people are beginning to recover from the effects of this bugbear of brigands. As for the fevers, sometimes mortal, you are exposed to contracting at Pæstum, it is most prudent not to visit it during the heat of summer, to avoid sleeping there during the day, and particularly not to remain there after sunset. A direct road leads from Naples to these admirable remains of antiquity, passing through Nocera, la Cava and Salerno.

The coach stops at an isolated house. Almost in front of this dwelling are seen at a short distance the ruins of a temple, said to be a temple of Ceres. But you hasten to reach the two great temples situated further off, and, in proportion as you approach them, you experience a greater and more tremendous emotion, one of those profound emotions, so rare in life, like what you feel on beholding for the first time St. Peter's or the Coliseum, and which are the glory of art, since great monuments springing from the hands of men cause an excitement similar to that inspired by the grand spectacles of nature. The temple which first presents itself is well fitted to justify this enthusiasm by the imposing simplicity and severe grandeur of its ruins, the finest and best preserved of all those of Pæstum. This temple, called that of Neptune, is a large parallelogram, with its six columns on each face, and fourteen on the side, comprising those of the angles. These thirty-six columns, elevated on three steps, form in the periphery a continuous portico in the space left between them and the walls of the cella. They appear to be more massive than those of the Parthenon and Temple of Theseus at Athens. They have no base, are fluted and conical, the upper diameter being a third smaller than the lower. What gives the architecture of the Temple of Neptune a peculiar character is the great projection of the two principal pieces of the capital: the plinth, a large square block sustaining the architrave, and the echinus, a moulding placed immediately below the plinth. This projection and this great volume of capital, admirably crown the massive shafts of the columns and confer to give them a just proportion of elegance. The Temple of Neptune belongs to the fine epoch of Greek art, whose style and taste, at a certain time, spread not only through Greece and Asia, but Italy and Sicily, just as, at a later epoch, the ogival architecture invaded at once a considerable part of Europe. The Posidonium of Pæstum is the Parthenon at Athens, with a robust air, but with less elegance and richness.

At a short distance from the Temple of Neptune are the remains of another great monument, designated by the name of Basilica. Of a much less elegant aspect, it seems, at the first glance, to be constructed on the same system. Still there are essential differences: the shafts of the columns, instead of being conical, are swollen. The firm and pure design of the capitals of the Temple of Neptune has lost here its character of strength and beauty. The plinth has the same projection, but the moulding beneath has not the same happy curve—it is flattened, and seems as if crushed by the weight of the architrave.

Besides the temples, there are at Pæstum traces of amphitheatres, a circus, and other monuments, and remains of walls, in some places eighteen feet thick, and defended, at intervals, by towers. There have been also found traces of aqueducts abutting on the city side, bounded by the mountains. The difficulty of procuring drinkable water must have been felt from the first, by the inhabitants of Pæstum; and we are tempted to ask ourselves how the first colonists could have chosen a situation so unfavorable in this respect, on the banks of the Salsum, a little rivulet with petrifying waters, which, after having skirted a portion of the walls, mingles with the brackish and sulphurous waters of the Accius. The plain of Pæstum was doubtless less marshy in antiquity than at present; but Strabo remarked of it in his day that it was unhealthy.

Nothing is sadder than the appearance of individuals attacked by malaria after a sojourn. A few buffaloes wandering in the marshes, numerous reptiles, and flocks of pigeons whirling about the ruins, or seeking a shelter there from the incessant pursuit of birds of prey, are the only inhabitants of this man-forsaken region.

In presence of these monuments, stamped with such a character of greatness, you ask what manner of people constructed them and left behind such durable monuments of their artistic taste; but the writers of antiquity say nothing of these ruins. Only, the greater part of the Latin poets vie with each other in celebrating the fields of roses cultivated at Pæstum and their double harvest in each year. The roses of Pæstum were known to the whole Roman world; they make a part of the Anacreontic baggage, and perfume the inanity of little notes.

This flower, consecrated to Venus, was probably brought to Pæstum by the Sybarite colonists who fled thither when Sybaris succumbed under the rivalry of Cronona, five hundred years before the Christian era. It was they, doubtless, who embellished it, and carried to a high degree the arts of Greece, a colony of which they were. Pæstum was then called Posidonia, from a Greek name indicating its consecration to Neptune (Posidon), and it was one of the principal cities of Lucania. Towards the epoch when the Samnites declared war on the Romans, the Brutians and Lucanians attacked the Hellenic colonies in Italy. Posidonia fell into their power. But while the primitive inhabitants and the Greeks were struggling against each other, a more formidable enemy, the Romans, prepared to subject them all. Pyrrhus, summoned by the Greeks to their succor, was vanquished, and the Romans made themselves masters of Posidonia, and changed its name to that of Pæstum, a primitive name perhaps, whose altered form is extant on ancient medals. Endowed with municipal institutions, the city of Pæstum showed itself faithful to the fortunes of Rome, and aided her with ships and money. Still it preserved its ancient reminiscences. Every year, at a certain epoch, the inhabitants consecrated a day of public mourning to the loss of their independence.

From this time till the reign of Augustus, history is silent with regard to Pæstum. From the age of Augustus to the invasions of the Saracens, an interval of eight centuries, is the same silence. The latter, forced in 915 to pass over to Africa, surprised Pæstum in the night, sacked it, and almost entirely destroyed it. In 1080, the Norman, Robert Guiscard, completed its ruin; he demolished the buildings, carried off the columns, ransacked the ruins, and transported their rich spoils to Salerno to adorn the church of St. Matthew. His pious zeal was more fatal than the pillage of the Saracens. After so many trials Pæstum could do nothing but languish. The canals were neglected, stagnant waters invaded the soil, sand banks raised by the sea, impeded the course of the little rivulets and contributed to their expansion. The inhabitants, deprived of potable water, and tormented by maladies produced by the foul air of the marshes, decided, in 1580, to abandon this accursed city entirely, and established themselves at Capaccio. After their emigration the ruins of Pæstum remained unknown for more than a hundred and fifty years. In 1745 Baron Joseph Antonini for the first time called the attention of Europe to them in his history of Lucania, published at Naples. At last, in 1793, they were measured and carefully drawn by Mr. Delagardie, an architect and pensioner of the French republic at the school of Fine Arts at Rome. He, and a young Englishman who was interested in his enterprise, were obliged to sleep on beds which had been abandoned since 1580.

It is to be regretted that intelligent excavations are not made on the site of Pæstum; they would doubtless be interesting to the history of art. But tourists visit the ruins, and artists never weary of drawing and painting them; many among them have died of fevers they have contracted there. Many in this region where the roses spring, have been cut down by the exhalations of the soil, from the first colonists to those who have established themselves there in our own days. What a sad subject of thought is the strife that man has to sustain here below against a nature always severe and often hostile and fatal.

CHURCH OF THE PILGRIMS, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

BROOKLYN, LONG ISLAND, NEW YORK.

M. M. BALLOU.—DEAR SIR:—What and how to write of the subject of my present series of sketches, drawn expressly for your Pictorial, is a query which, up to the moment of commencing this letter, has remained unanswered in my own mind, and I assure you that I sit down to solve it with considerable hesitation. To describe the city of Brooklyn, either historically, geographically, municipally or pictorially, is a task of no ordinary character, and requiring much greater space than I can hope to occupy in your paper. So indissolubly is she united to the city of New York—so intimately connected in all her interests and feelings with her neighbor, that to speak of her individually would be to write the biography of one of the "Siamese Twins." Growing with her growth, and strengthened with her strength, she stands side by side with the Empire City in the march of improvement and rapid development, so characteristic of the American people. The idea of her absorption by her more gigantic sister is by no means an improbable one; indeed, while I write, the subject is being debated in the legislative halls of the State, and it may be that ere this reaches you, the "City of Brooklyn" will be no more. Whether this result be immediate or not, such is her manifest destiny; and I leave the task of writing her biography to other and abler pens than mine. The material—for much of which I am under obligations to Mr. Spooner, of the Evening Star—is before me, and is replete with interest to the antiquarian and historiographer, as well as to the general reader; but to give even the most concise epitome of it would require the scope of a volume, and I am compelled to forego the endeavor. A glance at the appearance which she presents to the eye of the visitor for the first time, may, however, be of interest, and serve to explain my sketches. Brooklyn, as your readers are well aware, is situated on the Long Island shore of the strait which connects Long Island Sound with the Bay of New York, and opposite to the Empire City. This strait, called the East River, is crossed by numerous ferries, which keep up a continued communication with all parts of the two cities, the boats passing to and fro with their loads of passengers and vehicles every few minutes through the day, and each half hour of the night. The principal ones are the Fulton, Wall Street, South, Hamilton Avenue, Catherine, Jackson, and Peck-Slip Ferries, which, until recently, were in the hands and under the control of rival companies; but within a short time past the more prominent ones have been merged into "The Union Ferry Company," and the monopoly of the traffic which this throws into their hands, and the consequences thereof, have created a local excitement calculated somewhat to affect the interests of the city of Brooklyn. The large view on the next page presents but a limited idea of the extent of the water front of the city, much less of the vast expanse embraced within her limits. It was taken from the foot of Wall Street, New York, looking rather diagonally across and up the East River, towards Williamsburgh and Bushwick, which towns have been recently absorbed by their more powerful neighbor, and form component wards of Brooklyn. The extent of this front, following the low-water line, is nearly ten miles, a very limited portion of which is embraced in the sketch. I have endeavored to give, however, the most striking points which arrest the attention of the observer in crossing the Fulton Ferry, as well as a faint idea of the busy scene presented by the surface of the river, with its multitude of crafts of all shapes and sizes, from the packet-ship of vast proportions to the scow with its load of mud dredged from the docks, to be emptied into and swept seaward by the swift current of the river.

It will be seen that a portion of the city on the right of the picture is quite elevated, being built on what is termed "Brooklyn Heights," some seventy feet above the level of the river. This may be called the "west end" of the city; and the magnificent view of New York and its expansive harbor, the clear, bracing air, and other inherent advantages, render it a delightful place of residence. Landing on the Brooklyn side, the interest is changed, not lost, in the hustle and activity of the crowds which, arriving by each successive boat, pour through the main thoroughfare to their respective destinations. Fulton Street, a portion of which is represented in the picture below, is the principal avenue of the city, and is a steep, crooked street, extending from the ferry across the city. It forms an exception to the greater proportion of the other streets, which run at right angles, and are generally about sixty feet wide, and shaded with trees. The omnibuses, which formerly ran through Fulton Street, have been superseded by cars propelled by horse power, which run in all directions, from Greenwood, on the south, to Green Point, on the north of the city; and the constant arrival and departure of the ferry-boats and cars, with the transfer of passengers to and from each, renders that portion of the street which I have sketched a very active and bustling scene. Brooklyn is a remarkably well-built city, and contains many handsome public buildings, some of which have, from time to time, appeared in the pages of the Pictorial. The most prominent among these is the City Hall, situated on a triangular park, bounded by Fulton, Court and Joralemon Streets. In its style and appearance, it bears a resemblance to the City Hall, of New York. It is built of white marble, and cost about $200,000. The Navy Yard and Atlantic Docks have each been represented to the readers of your journal from various points of view. I have given a general view of the former, from the foot of Grand Street, New York, in which is shown the two large ship-houses, with some of the vessels and hulks awaiting repairs or preparing for service. The receiving ship, North Carolina, one of the largest vessels in the United States Navy, is seen on the left of the picture. Brooklyn contains some sixty-six churches, many of which are remarkable for their beautiful architectural style and finish. The Church of the Pilgrims (Congregational), whose spire forms a prominent object in approaching the city, is an imposing structure of gray stone, situated on the corner of Henry and Remsen Streets. The Rev. R. S. Storrs is the pastor. The corner-stone of this edifice was laid July 3, 1844, and it was consecrated to divine service with becoming ceremonies, on the 12th of May, 1846. The Church of the CITY HOSPITAL, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Holy Trinity, Grace Church, the Unitarian Church, and the Church of the Restoration, are all of them handsome buildings of brown stone, in the Gothic style. The first named cost $150,000. Dr. Cox's and Dr. Bethune's churches are also of brown stone. Among the public institutions of the city, the Brooklyn Atheneum, situated at the corner of Atlantic and Clinton Streets, South Brooklyn, takes high rank. It has a large and growing library, an excellent reading-room, and, during the season, its course of lectures is an excellent even in the great city opposite. The building is a fine one, and cost $60,000. The city library contains a valuable collection of books. The Brooklyn Lyceum is another institution for the dissemination of knowledge by means of a library and lectures. It is a handsome structure of granite, located on Washington Street, and contains a spacious lecture-room. There is also an institution of a similar character in the Navy Yard, called the United States Lyceum, which, in addition to a large collection of curiosities brought home by officers of the navy, contains valuable geological and mineralogical cabinets. The new City Hospital on Raymond Street, near De Kalb, is a noble institution, worthy of a far more extended notice than I am able to give it. The incipient steps towards its erection were taken at a public meeting held February 17, 1845, and it was incorporated in May, 1845. It languished for want of efficient support until the close of 1846, when Augustus Graham, Esq., a noble-hearted and generous-minded man, came to its relief, and with a donation of $5500 enabled the trustees to purchase a house and fit it up for the reception of patients. Two years afterwards, on the 4th of July, 1848, Mr. Graham announced his determination to donate $25,500 to the institution, provided the citizens of Brooklyn would raise a similar amount. This was never accomplished, and Mr. Graham, after adding $2000 to the amount he had already subscribed, was induced to withdraw his conditions, and the present building was commenced. The location selected was the site of Old Fort Greene, an elevated point in the eastern section of Brooklyn. Mr. Graham himself removed the first sod from the ramparts which he had aided to construct thirty-seven years previously surmounted by a revolving dome, pedestal, etc., for an observatory. There is also a large cabinet of natural history, and an extensive library, for the use and instruction of the pupils. Full courses of lectures are given on the various sciences, besides general lectures to the whole school. Ample accommodations are provided in the boarding department, where young ladies from abroad can find a genuine home, and where every attention is given to their character, manners and habits, as well as to their studies. The institution has existed since 1845 as the Brooklyn Female Academy, and has always been very largely patronized both at home and abroad. The whole number of pupils in the institution the past year was 724. The building fronts on Jerusalem Street, and has extensive grounds attached, which front on Livingston Street. The cost of its erection, exclusive of the grounds, was $85,000. The mayor of the city is ex-officio one of the trustees; G. G. Van Wageningen is president, and Joseph W. Harper is secretary. Of the faculty, A. Crittenden, A. M., is principal, with professors of the natural sciences, mathematics, the French, Spanish, German, Italian and Latin languages; drawing, painting, composition, music and penmanship. This institution appears to have found a high place in public favor, and a few details as to its origin may prove interesting to your readers. As early as January, 1853, Mrs. Packer addressed a note to the board of trustees of the Brooklyn Female Academy, in which she stated that her late husband, Wm. S. Packer, Esq., had entertained the purpose of devoting a sum towards the establishment of an institution for the education of youth. It was her desire, she said, as his representative, to carry out his wishes. The recent destruction of the building of the Female Academy afforded her the opportunity, which she was glad to embrace. "What I contemplate is this," she concludes, "to apply sixty-five thousand dollars of Mr. Packer's property to the erection of an institution for the education of my own sex in the higher branches of literature, in lieu of that now known as the Brooklyn Female Academy." In answer to this proposition, the trustees resolved to dissolve the corporation of "The Brooklyn Female Academy," and the consent of the incorporators was obtained for the transfer of their interests in a Boys' High School, which is now in successful experiment. Application was made and granted for the incorporation of a Girls' Academy, under the name and title of "The Packer Collegiate Institute." Under the date of May 4, 1853, Mrs. Packer acknowledged the receipt of a copy of the act of incorporation.

FULTON STREET, FROM THE FERRY, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

VIEW OF BROOKLYN, FROM THE FOOT OF WALL STREET, NEW YORK.

building itself were a kind of token, or pledge, of the refined and elevated influences to be found within its walls—a pledge, I am sure, the good management of the trustees, with the blessing of a Higher Power, would be able to redeem. While my own hopes are most sanguine, it is doubtless wise to be prepared for disappointment; and I assure the trustees I fully appreciate their hesitation as to the propriety of adopting plans, to carry out its usefulness, and perhaps ultimately jeopard its very existence. I would not have been so decided in favor of Mr. Lefevre's plans, in opposition (I fear it seemed) to those better qualified to judge, had I not first determined to hold myself ready to relieve the institution should it become seriously embarrassed. I hope no such necessity will occur. But if, after a sufficient trial, the income of the institution should be found inadequate to provide liberally for its own expenses, and make also such provision for a sinking fund as to afford reasonable prospect of ultimately cancelling the debt, I will engage to add to my donation such sum as may be necessary for this object, to the amount of twenty thousand dollars." Thus, the endowment of the Packer Collegiate Institute, from the one munificent source of a large heart, will be not less than $85,000. All honor—all praise—all thanksgiving be ascribed, first to Him, whose Holy Spirit inspires to charity and good works, and next, to her, from whose hands flows the beneficence, and out of whose lips distil the gentle words of encouragement, to the cause of female education.—There are many other institutions and objects of interest in the city of Brooklyn, of which I should be pleased to speak, but for the present shall have to forego the pleasure. I shall endeavor, from time to time, to send you sketches of such as your good judgment may think most interesting to your numerous readers. I start, in a few days, on a trip to some of the beautiful towns and cities on the Hudson, and until my return, I beg leave to subscribe myself, with much respect,

Your artist,

NEUTRAL TINT.

U. S. NAVY YARD, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

vicious. The corner-stone was laid on the 11th of June, 1851, and the centre building was completed on the 28th of April, 1852. The entire building was finished in 1854. It presents a front of 200 feet, facing due west on Raymond Street, and stands about 100 feet from the street. It consists of a centre building four stories high, 52 feet wide, 52 feet deep, with an extension back of 30 feet, and two wings, each 74 feet long, 56 feet deep, and three stories high. The base line of the building is 20 feet above the line of the street, and the elevated position of the site secures that great desideratum to such an institution, ample ventilation. The superintendent is Mr. J. E. Nichols, to whose courtesy I am indebted for the facts given above. Another noble institution is the Packer Collegiate Institute, the object of which is to afford young ladies all the advantages for obtaining a thorough and extended course of instruction that young men find in our best colleges. For this purpose, it has all the apparatus necessary for illustrating the natural sciences. Barlow's large planetarium, which was on exhibition at the Crystal Palace, New York, has been purchased for the institution, and the tower connected with the main building is surmounted by a revolving dome, pedestal, etc., for an observatory.

"While I congratulate you," she writes, "allow me to offer my heartfelt thanks for the honor you have bestowed on the memory of my husband, in giving the institution his name." She then renewed the offer of the endowment, $65,000. In a subsequent letter she addressed the trustees in terms so eloquent in the simplicity of an earnest purpose, and so full of affectionate reverence for her husband's wishes, that we may be pardoned for extracting a paragraph from it:—"Gentlemen,—I have already taken the liberty of expressing to some of your board the interest I feel in having a suitable building erected for the institution over which you preside—one with accommodations sufficiently ample to provide for the realization of our most sanguine hopes, and whose style and general appearance would correspond with the character and grade of the school there established. I have thought that it might tell favorably upon the success of the institution, if the

PACKER INSTITUTE, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE EVE BEFORE THE BRIDAL.

BY SARAH A. NOWELL.

Coming through the open portal
Of the future in my life,
Walks a shape—half saint, half mortal—
And she comes to be my wife.
When I lead her to the altar,
Will she weep that she is mine?
Will her murmuring accents falter,
"O, beloved, I am thine?"

When I lead her to the dwelling
Where my mother waits for her,
Will her eyes with tears be swelling?
Will my love her pulses stir?
In the silence gently brooding
On the thoughtful brow of night,
Shall I catch the interlading
Of the spirits in their flight?

Shall I hear, at early morning,
When the birds are singing free,
Mingling with the sounds at dawning,
Mary's voice in melody?
And in hope and love immortal,
Will she be through all my life,
Standing at the open portal,
Bride, beloved, Mary, wife?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE FIRST AND LAST QUARREL:

—ON—

THE FLITCH OF DUNMOW.

A STORY FOR THE NEWLY-MARRIED.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

YE who have just entered into the holy estate of matrimony—who fancy that the quarrels of lovers are the renewals of affection, and indulge in the hope that if you fall out to-day, you can make it up to-morrow, without harm to your happiness—listen to the story of Dunmow and its "Flitch of Bacon."

Though almost as ponderous, the above paragraph is quite as philosophical as the celebrated introduction to Dr. Johnson's "Rasselas," and it contains a moral, as will presently be seen.

Some few years ago, while travelling in the county of Essex, in England, I came to what is there called a four-cross road—one of those places where they used some hundred years ago, to bury suicides at midnight, and then barbarously thrust a stake through the poor wretch's body, to mark the precise spot where he or she who had "burst into the house of life," lay. I was on foot, and anxious to see all that was worth seeing, in order that on my return to New England, I might tell my Yankee friends and relatives something fresh about the peculiarities of Old England. I had set out from London with no settled plan, trusting to chance and circumstances to furnish me with material. I could not have adopted a better plan than pedestrianizing, and I hereby recommend it as the cheapest and the best way of seeing a foreign country.

In the centre of the space made by the junction of two roads at right angles with each other, stood a post with four sign-boards on it, pointing in four different and precisely opposite directions. On these were inscribed the names of four villages, with their distances in miles from that spot. While I was perusing them for the purpose of deciding which would lead me to the nearest tavern, as I was somewhat fatigued, a jolly-looking farmer drove up in his vehicle—half chaise, half cart,—and perhaps perceiving I was a stranger, saluted me thus:

"If yo be gooin' moi weay, measter, joomp in and ride—yo be welloom, zure."

"Thanks, friend," I remarked; "but I don't know what way I am going. Which is the nearest place to this, where there is a tavern where I can get dinner and a lodging?"

"Why, Dunmow; see there on the sign-board—it be six mile from here, and I be gooin' to it."

So I jumped in, and away went the friendly farmer and I, as he expressed it, "cheek by jowl." I mentioned the fact of my having heard of suicides' burials in such places as the one I have just described, and asked if he had known any instance of such interments in those parts?

"Why, measter, I ha'nt, but my feather (he's been dead now these twenty years) saw a man as pizened hisself, buried in the place where I took yo up; and that very sign-post—the bottom on't, lastways—was run thro' his karkiss."

On we jogged, pleasantly enough, and how he stared at me when I told him I was an American, was a caution! He had rather limited ideas of the size of the United States, for he mentioned that he had a "nevoy" there somewhere, and as 'twere loikely I should see 'im, to tell 'im that all the folks at whoam wor peart," by which phrase he meant "pretty well," I believe.

"Here we be," he said, as he pulled up at the door of one of those pretty little rural roadside taverns, which are to be seen nowhere out of England. From its porch issued a rosy-faced, buxom landlady, to whom the farmer consigned me, after saying he would come and "smoke a poipe and drink a mug of yell" with me in the evening.

I've ate dinners before and since then, at your Metropolitans, Tremonts, St. Nicholas's, and other fashionable hotels, but I never ate a meal with such gusto as I disposed of that homely one at the "Jolly Ploughmen"—that being the name of the inn. The tablecloth, on the little round table, was so white—the bread so brown—the butter so primrose-colored—the eggs so fresh, and the bacon such as I never saw or heard of before. And then the jug of home-brewed ale, with its frothy crown—and the rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed landlady, the pink of neatness, presiding over all, and anticipating my slightest want,—I wish I was there now.

"Anything hereabouts that is worth a stranger's seeing?" I asked of Mrs. Pillinger.

"Well, sir," said she, "you be in luck, sure; you might have come here hundreds of times and not have been so lucky. Dear me! to think as you come all the way from 'Merrikee, and be here on Flitch-of-bacon Day, which is to-morrow!"

I was sorely puzzled to know what she meant, and then learned that on the morrow was to be held the triennial festival of the Flitch of Bacon.

"But then, sir," said the good woman, "old Nicoblas Wagner, our parish clerk and schoolmaster, 'll be in here to-night, and tell 'ee all about it; and meantime you can go and see the ruins of old Dunmow priory, and the old church—they be both on 'em hard by."

After visiting these "lions" of the little village, I learned from a volume of local history which lay on the parlor mantelpiece, that several hundred years ago, a gentleman left a sum of money, the interest of which was to be rather curiously disposed of. In order to promote conjugal comfort, he willed that every three years a flitch of bacon should be presented to any newly-married couple who would appear before a magistrate, at the end of twelve months and a day from the time of their marriage, and solemnly swear that they had not wished themselves unmarried, or quarrelled with each other. The claimants, however, I was sorry to see from the Dunmow records, had been very few, leaving it to be inferred that matrimonial felicity, in that part of the world at least, was not quite the thing it was "cracked up to be."

The next morning (and a lovely morning it was), all Dunmow was alive, for from every quarter people both "gentle and simple" kept pouring in. The bells of the little village church rang merry peals, flags streamed from windows and house-tops, and bands of music paraded the streets. The Dunmow Flitch was to be claimed that day for the first time for nine years, and universal curiosity was displayed to see the ceremonies attendant on its bestowal and reception. Men, women and children were attired in their Sunday clothes, and every lad and lass wore bouquets in their bosoms or button-holes. I had little doubt that many of the swains who so gallantly escorted their sweethearts up and down the street, fondly fancied that ere long they, too, should claim the flitch of bacon. I am quite sure of one thing—with all my heart and soul I wished they might get it.

Precisely at ten o'clock, a great shouting in the neighborhood of the old town hall told that the important proceedings of the day were about to commence. The bells rang more merrily than ever, and the flags seemed to wave with increased vigor. As for the band, it was marvellous in what a flurry of excitement it got. The flute and the fife seemed to be trying which should get to the end of the tune first; the trumpet blared frantically; the bassoon bellowed like a bull in laughing hysterics; the fiddlers appeared frantic with merriment; the drums thundered out applause, and the triangles tinkled triumphantly. And little wonder was it that the band especially should grow excited on the occasion, since the matrimonial hero of the day was their own leader and "first fiddler."

The proceedings of the day were, as usual, to be divided into three parts; first, a procession to the parish church, where the parson of the parish was to preach a sermon suitable to the occasion—and I was assured that one text and one sermon had invariably been used, on every recurrence of the festival, from the time of its foundation; the fact was, minister after minister had handed the discourse over to his successor—and so "Wives be obedient to your husbands," and "Husbands love your wives and be not bitter against them," had been the staple of each and every "flitch-of-bacon sermon," from time immemorial. Secondly, a procession from the church to the town hall, where the oath was to be administered to the claimants of the flitch; and thirdly, a procession to the married couple's house, where the flitch was to be delivered to them,—the said flitch to be carried in all three processions, decked with ribbons and evergreens.

The procession was rural and picturesque. First came the constables to clear the way, each in a huge cocked hat, and flourishing his garlanded staff of office; then followed the band, blowing and thumping with all their might "See the conquering heroes come," defiant of grammar and authority; next walked, two and two, the married people of the village; then the lads and lasses, who hoped one day to be married also; and then, borne on a litter formed of boughs and evergreens, ribbons and flags, the claimants of the flitch. They were a right happy-looking couple—he a stalwart peasant—she a pretty and plump young woman, with a bouncing baby on her lap. The husband and wife were cheered with heart and voice, but whenever the mother held up the bouncing baby, you would have thought the cheers and huzzas burst from brazen throats. Following these, came lastly "The Flitch" itself—and what a monstrous side of pork it was!—the fat and lean in it being suggestive of that happy and united state whose twelve months' experience it was about to crown.

I need say nothing more of the sermon than I have done—no one listened to it, for the husband, wife, baby and flitch were the four heads of the discourse to most present—the pig's tail, which was attached to the side of pork and tied with blue ribbon in a true lover's knot, forming an appropriate "amen."

And now the procession moved towards the town hall. Arrived there, the magistrate took his seat, and before him stood the wedded pair. Just as the proceedings commenced, the child set up a tremendous squall, which required all the mother's persuasive powers to quiet. But she bore the annoyance patiently, and to show how mild she could be under the most irritating circumstances, did not once say even "Drat the baby!"

The oath was then administered, and the pair were informed that at the close of the proceedings in the afternoon, the bacon would be delivered to them. They were then exhorted to live in peace and harmony, and once more the procession formed, after each had drank a draught of wine from a silver tankard called "the loving cup," which was never used but on such an occasion.

Before escorting the happy couple to their home, a dinner—which I forgot to speak of—was given by the authorities on "the green," the successful pair sitting on raised seats at the head of the table. And what a substantial dinner it was! Ribs and rounds of beef from mammoth oxen, plum puddings of Brobdignagian dimensions, and gallons of strong ale innumerable. The honored guests, to whom alone wine was served, had their healths drank scores of times, and, I am forced to say, the young husband, when he returned thanks for about the twenty-sixth time, spoke in rather thick tones, and seemed somewhat unsteady on his legs. Candor also compels me to declare that his lady looked exceedingly flushed in the face, and that the baby was ruddy and cross—for it, too, had had its health drank, and squallied its thanks in return; for it did not seem to relish the "tiny drops" of "nicey peey" it had been forced to swallow "for that occasion only."

It was now drawing towards evening, and preparations for the march home were made. Once more the band struck up; once more the officials flourished their staves; once more the happy couple were lifted into their seats of honor, and once more the flitch displayed its huge proportions. But the constables now and then blindly used their staves on the heads of those who impeded their progress; the band played desperately out of tune a very convivial air; the happy pair found great difficulty in keeping their exalted positions; the baby screamed awfully, and the flitch of bacon swayed to and fro, as though it had been a banner borne by a tipsy bearer. In short the entire procession, "like a wounded snake, dragged its slow length along."

Alas! how many a slip is there between the cup and the lip! The truth of the proverb was destined to be proved that day.

The head of the procession had almost reached the door of John Chobbles' cottage, when that gentleman's head came in violent contact with the flitch of bacon, which, in consequence of the reeling of those who bore it on its lofty pole, swung rather too much out of the perpendicular.

"Hang the bacon!" exclaimed Mr. Chobbles, in that unguarded moment.

The exclamation, or execration, attracted the attention of his wife, who sharply nudged him in the side with her elbow, saying: "Never thee mind, Jan, thy head's thick enough to bear it; the bacon 'll be softer when it's biled."

"Fried, you mean," remarked John.

"Biled I said, and biled I mean; 'twould be a sin and a shame to fry such bacon as that; half on't 'ud be fried away."

"I tell 'ee I won't have a bit on't biled, dang my wig if I wool! Let me catch thee putting it in the pot and I'll put 'ee in arter it."

"Jan, you be a fool; if I'd knowed as much afore I married thee, thee might have whistled for I; I wish I'd never seen thee!"

"Well, I wor a fool for turning off Polly Green for such an obstinate gommock as thee be'est. I only wish I wor single again; dang'd if I don't go and list for a sodger to get rid of thee!"

Now it so happened that the parson of the parish was walking close by the side of the litter on which John and his wife were seated, with a Bible in his hand, which he intended to present to them when they reached their house—and heard the interesting conversation I have just reported. He was a good and humane, but strictly just man, and he at once saw that inasmuch as the twelvemonth and a day had not yet expired, nor would until sundown, one hour hence, the conditions on which the flitch was to be given up were not complied with, for both had abused each other, and expressed regrets that they had got married. Had the quarrel taken place in the privacy of their own dwelling, he might not have known it; but here in public had the scandal occurred. So he accompanied the injudicious pair into their cottage, informed them that they had forfeited the flitch, gave them the Bible, and left them to "kiss and make it up," which it is to be hoped they did. The flitch was immediately cut up, and, according to the direction of the authorities, divided among the poor of the parish.

"Ah," remarked Mrs. Pillinger, my landlady, that evening when the affair was being talked over, "it's no more than I thought. John Chobbles was always a stubborn chap; and as for his wife, I always said she'd never 'save her bacon.'"

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Magazine.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 30,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

UNREST.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

As through the murky sky,
Shot by the fiend of storm with rude beliest,
The vivid lightnings fly,
My spirit rages in its wild unrest.

Life's weary battle-plain
Hath in its future dear and darksome strife;
Ne'er may I hope again
To go, a victor, from the field of life.

Delusive hopes, depart!
Long have ye cheated me, but now 'tis o'er;
Locked close within my heart
Is searing grief and care forevermore.

Still through the world I'll roam,
Fanning the fires of gloom within my breast;
Finding a welcome home
Only where dwells the demon, dark unrest.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ROMANCE IN LOW LIFE.

BY MRS. J. D. BALDWIN.

I was but a child when Mickey Fooshane was employed by my uncle, a druggist in New Orleans, as a porter. Mickey was in very truth "a broth of a boy," with a keen relish for beauty, wherever he might chance to meet it, whether in "the bogs of ould Ireland," or on the scorched and dusty streets of the Crescent City, where he first met Biddy Doyle, trotting us "small fry" out for our morning walk, as he trudged whistling up Canal Street, carrying home the market basket and figs for breakfast.

Up to this time, Mickey had had a weary time of it, pounding away from morning till night, save when his employment was occasionally varied by quitting the pestle and mortar to do double duty as store porter and carrying home the ice or market basket; nothing to console him in his loneliness, save the jug of potheen he chanced to provide himself with. Sometimes Mickey would take an extra cup of the mountain dew, when, if eggs were broken or figs mashed by the way, he would reconcile it all with "Hoot! but it's the dirty street was getting the better of me, intirely!" And well do I remember my aunt's horror on one occasion when old black Talbert, who used to drive the gig, crammed with us little folk, to school, was absent, and Mickey volunteered in his stead; from the moment that he lifted the last pinafore in until he stopped at "Morton's Academy," on the Old Levee, did Mick plunge helter-skelter through the crowded streets, flourishing his whip and shouting, much to the scandal of Old Spavin, nussed to and indignant, as a respectable horse should be, at such depravity. But to Mickey's courtship.

I was progressing in books and it's when Mickey first came to my uncle's; and had got advanced into a large text of all the letters, capitals excepted, when he brought me a huge sugar cane as a bribe, and I wrote his first letter to Peggy Meighan, telling her how he was "breathing freedom at every fut of the blessed sod of Ameriky," and binting that the day was not distant when "he would send for her to come and live with her dotin' Mickey."

I wrote it on the kitchen table, while Biddy Doyle sat by, rocking my baby brother to sleep. Sharp as a steel-trap, was Biddy, with a tongue and temper keen as the north wind's edge, yet when it suited her purpose, cool as a mountain's top, firm as its base. It matters not to my story what were the allurement, or how she sped in casting their coil round the susceptible Mickey; suffice it that long before his letter, laden with "ochs" "achs" and devotion, reached Peggy Meighan, he was out of all conceit of her, and speculating seriously of making known his affections to Biddy Doyle, who, by some intuitive perception, seemed to know how the wind was blowing long before. Fortified by an extra potato, he broke forth:

"Bedad, thin, but it's afther lovin' ye to distraction, I am intirely!"

"Whist, will yez?" says Biddy.

"Be the powers, thin, an' it's mesilf's tellin' ye no lie, nt all, at all!"

"Arrah, g'long wid yez!" says Biddy.

"Faix, an' it's in earnest I am, an' sure, an' won't ye believe me?" and Mick gazed down into the dark, lovely eyes of the young girl, who, as if unable to withstand the appeal, answered:

"Yis."

And a proud boy was Mickey Fooshane, as he snapped his fingers, cutting a caper of delight, upsetting a basket of pomegranates, and his unsalaried performance ending with a "Begorra, Biddy, but you're a beauty, intirely; an' it's mesilf would thrash the first sealawag that even looks at ye, I will!"

The next morning, however, before any fresh cobwebs had hooked themselves with the fumes of the potheen in his sprightly brain, he began to think of what he should say to Peggy Meighan, of all this. Calling a council of one, Mickey resolved the matter somewhat after this wise: "Sure, an' may be she's afther forgettin' me intirely. There's Mike Cassidy and Phelim Rafferty, both neighbors' sons; may be never a hap'worth she cares if I ever write to her again."

Then the memory of the pure-hearted, gentle girl, longing for his next letter, came rousing his better nature to discard the unworthy doubt. Mick took another swig; fortified by this, he cogitated a little more to the purpose. "Sure, an' it's nisy to write her that I'm dead intirely, and then she'll take Owen McGarvey at once!" Much inclined to this latter belief, Mickey watched his opportunity, waiting for Biddy's evening to visit her uncle, Tim Cafferty, a butcher, well to do, in Lafayette.

Standing at the corner of Common, Mick watched Biddy scudding along Phillipa Street, then round the State House corner, and into the Lafayette care, when bounding like a rocket, capozing an orange boy and basket, he trotted back to uncle's; and, bringing me a pocket-full of persimmons as a bribe, dictated while I wrote the following letter to Peggy Meighan:

"PEGGY, DARLINT.—Sure, Peggy dear, it's mesilf's dead!—dead as a door nail, this very minnit, an' will never be able to write yez again. Ye've heard of the battle of New Orleans!—well, an' it's there mesilf was shot by a potherin' spalpeen of a black nagur, had luck to him for that same—amin! I was hapin' up cotton bales at the back of the thrinch, when up comes Parkenham and tould him to kill me intirely. Bid them to kape the wake all the same; and tell Father Michael to say a mass for me, seein' I never denied my brogue or my country—and never will. Don't take that ragumullin', Mike Cassidy, but remain a dutiful widdly intirely, for the sake of yer own Fooshane, who's let out of purgatory jist to tell ye I was kilt and berid on Hunker's Hill, where General Jackson kilt Cornwallis, here in New Orleans."

"Yours, dead or livin', MICKY FOOSHANE."

I was folding the letter up, under Mickey's directions, achieved as it had been, under various processes of spelling and erasures, when the kitchen door opened and in walked Biddy Doyle. Coming direct to the table where I was affixing a black wafer to the account of Mickey's death, she asked who it was for. Before I had time to reply, Mick had put in, with his usual glib effrontery: "Only a bit of a line to that rapsallion, Rafferty, that married my sister, Norah—the sealawag!"

And hastily placing the letter in his straw hat, Mr. Fooshane made tracks for the door, thanking me and bidding Biddy good night, nor stayed on the order of his going, till he had mailed his letter in the post-office.

I have said before that Biddy was sharp as a steel trap, and so she was. A something in Mickey's choosing the night of her absence to write his letter, added to his evident reluctance that she should see it, and the haste of his exit, excited her suspicions.

"Sure, Miss Bell, is that thrue—was Mickey only writin' till Padeen O'Rafferty?"

I looked at my little dirty fingers daubed with ink, and Mickey's persimmons, and reddening like a peony, said:

"I don't like to tell. Mickey gave me a whole pocket-full of persimmons."

"Agh, mish! the desavin' spalpeen! But wait a minnit, Miss Bell, an' we'll see!" and diving down into her capacious pocket, she brought up a huge pomegranate and sundry pecans. "My darlint, an' what did ye write for the desavin' sealawag?"

Much, at this distance of time, it shames me to confess that Biddy's pomegranate outweighed Mickey's persimmons, and that, turning to the fly-leaf of my spelling-book, I read therefrom the direction, as carefully pencilled from Mickey's dictation—"Mr. James Kelly, to be given to Mark Flinn for Peggy Meighan, Ballymore, Killecroon post-office, County of Galloway, Ireland."

"Och, wirra, wirra! an' does the togharren think because he's a bit civilized, that he's goin' to desave a dacent girl, jist as if he was a jintleman?" Then bending her tearful black eyes down on my averted face, she turned my head round to the light, that she might search for a comment on her suspicions. "An' I not right? Did he not write to the wee omadon, Peggy Meighan?"

I frankly told her all. When I came to the conclusion of his death at the hands of Parkenham, his wake and message to Father Michael, and lastly his burial and exhumation to indict the letter, she was standing pale, yet with a high resolve flashing in intolerable lustre from her coal-black eyes.

"Have ye iver a bit of paper, Miss Bell?"

"I can get some up stairs." And up we went, my aunt thinking me very diligent over my spelling and multiplication-table, all the time.

Possessing myself of a sheet of foolscap, Biddy fresh trimmed the lamp, and I, at her dictation, informed Peggy Meighan that Mickey Fooshane "was neither dead nor berid," and further, that if she would keep him to his promise she must hasten to New Orleans, else Mick would take another, ending by giving her directions to inquire her way, on landing, to Tim Cafferty's (Biddy's uncle), in Lafayette.

"Now drap this in the post-office to-morrow, Miss Bell, plaze, an' never say a word about it to that desavin' villin, at all, at all."

Time wore on, and the pretty Biddy Doyle continued coy and capricious, huffy and disdainful, much to the uneasiness and evident chagrin of Mickey, who, being no fool, gave perfect satisfaction to my uncle, who had raised his wages; and indignant at what he considered tampering with his feelings, he began to think seriously of breaking with Biddy, and writing to explain (we are at a loss to know how) to Peggy that he was alive again, and her's entirely;—when one night a female, with a coarse straw bonnet and enveloped in a huge cloak, rapped at Tim Cafferty's door, in Lafayette, presenting the letter I had written, as her credential that she was Peggy Meighan.

The next day, much to Mickey's surprise, Biddy waylaid him, and though there was a lurking spirit of malice in her dark eye, still she spoke pleasantly as she said it was useless deferring their marriage any longer, and bid him secure the services of a priest for the next evening, telling him at the same time that as her uncle, Tim Cafferty, would give her a wedding-gown and supper, he might ask any friends he saw fit, to his house in Lafayette.

Renewing his supply in the jug, and plentifully supplied with "tobacky," Mickey, accompanied by the priest, arrived punctual to the hour, at Tim Cafferty's, proud to present to his friends the buxom Biddy, who looked very handsome in the white gown her uncle had presented.

The claret Mickey, with his uncle and their guests, were talking and laughing in high glee, and all going "merry as a marriage bell," when suddenly the back door opened, and a veiled and cloaked female individual entered the room. Slowly scanning the faces of the guests, her eyes rested on the faithless Mickey Fooshane. Flushing back her huge cloak and tattered veil, the pale face of Peggy Meighan confronted our hero, who felt very much, as he afterwards feelingly described, "as though he wished his worst enemy was settin' dogs on him down Downing Street."

"Arrah, ye desaver!—an' is this the way yer thinkin' to bamboozle me, a lanna! You that was kilt an' berid so long, ye grave forsaken omadon! Spake out, ye vagabone, and tell me what ye meant by writin' ye wor dead, will yea?"

"Who is this girl, Mickey? an' what is this about ye bein' dead?" asked Biddy, apparently unconscious how the girl got there to prohibit the bans; while the crestfallen Mickey, with averted face and perplexed look, stood biting his nails, soliloquizing somewhat like this: "Begorra, but the plague is in it intirely! May the—(here he said a bad word) run away wid both of 'em."

Meantime Peggy, with heightened color and flashing eye, indignantly confronted him, turn as he might. Making at last a virtue of necessity, he looked up, and extending his hand, asked:

"An' is it yerself, Peggy?—an' how came ye here?"

Rejecting at first his timid overture towards reconciliation, she answered, tormentingly:

"Faix, an' ye may well ax that same, afther yer vagabone letter, tellin' me ye wor dead, an' only relaxed from purgatory to tell me. Sure an' what are yez doin' here, when yer to be back there at cock-crow!"

While Peggy beset him on one side, and his friends and the priest stood staring on the other, Mickey found himself in a pretty fix, to say the least of it. For a moment he stood irresolute, then bolting for the door, sought to make his escape; but in fleeing Seylla, he but hit on Charybdis, being stopped in his progress by the strong arm of Tim Cafferty, who had interposed his stalwart frame in the doorway. Peggy, meantime, stood wringing her hands, whining, "Och hone, a hone! but he's broke the heart o' me intirely, the desavin' spalpeen, so he has!"

Where there was no chance of being listened to, parley was useless; so putting a bold face on the matter, our hero admitted the soft impeachment, while Peggy, throwing her arms around his white vest pattern, sobbed with greater vehemence than before; and Biddy Doyle, very pale, yet with a bright red spot burning heatedly in either cheek, looked on with black and stony eyes, the quivering of her lip alone indicating how deep, how intense the feeling kept down by a strong effort of the will.

"From the turn affairs have taken," said Father Brady, rising, "I'm thinking my presence will not be needed."

"Hould on a bit; yer riverence may as well set matters right now as any time," spoke out Tim Cafferty.

Mickey, freeing himself from the clasping arms of the determined Peggy, walked to where Biddy was standing, pale and unnoticed in a corner, offering his hand and asking her forgiveness, telling her that "though it nearly broke his heart intirely, he must needs, he supposed, keep to his bargain with Peggy, who it bato him intirely to imagine how she came jist in the nick of time to nab him, bad cess to her!"

Casting a look of withering scorn on the discomfited Mickey, the proud girl laughed a low, tantalizing laugh, as she answered:

"Troth, an' I'm thankful I found ye out in time, ye spalpeen! an' proud to tell ye it was mesilf laid the trap that caught ye!"

An hour later, and Mickey Fooshane was one of the most uproariously merry of all among Tim Cafferty's guests. Father Brady had shook hands with him and Peggy, after pronouncing the benediction, assuring him he was glad to see him made an honest man again.

But Biddy did not die of a broken heart. Going with my aunt, the next summer, across Lake Ponchartrain, she was fortunate enough to take the eye of the second engineer of one of the finest mail boats plying between New Orleans and Mobile. He was a Scot by birth, a widower, owning a pretty cottage and snug farm in the outskirts of Covington. Many years afterwards, when spending the summer in Madisonville, I drove out to Covington, and inquired the way to Biddy's (I beg pardon, Mrs. Templeton's) cottage. I found her much improved in appearance, handsomely dressed, and with books and work-basket before her.

"Do you read, Biddy?"

"Yes, I found it necessary to learn, so as to instruct Mr. Templeton's little girls; my husband himself taught me."

Her brogue and former mincing airs were all gone. I mentioned Mickey, and told her he was still a porter in my uncle's employ, and what with his fondness for mountain-dew and ten pios, he managed no better than might be expected; while Peggy, with her unthrifty ways, and want of neatness and economy, managed rather worse.

A bright glow suffused Mrs. Templeton's fair neck and brow, when I mischievously reminded her of the night I wrote the account of Mickey's death, and request for his friends to keep his wake, and promised my abdicated spelling-book to her eldest urchin, assuring her that she would find the old address, from which we had copied, still there—"Mr. James Kelly, to be given to Mark Flinn for Peggy Meighan, Ballymore, Killecroon post-office, County of Galloway, Ireland."

She laughed merrily while setting a rich cream cheese, grapes, figs, peaches and honey before me. These were hers—her own; and the fine farm, and cows, horse, wagon and house, were all hers; and hers, too, was also the curly-haired wee fairy that answered to the name of "Bell." But she blushed in disdain that she ever bore a part in the story I have tried to tell of her early love affair with Mickey Fooshane.

CAPTAIN J. W. WATKINS.

We present on this page a finely engraved portrait of this gallant son of Neptune, executed expressly for the Pictorial, for the original of which we are indebted to the kindness of an unknown California correspondent. Captain Watkins is popularly known as the "Commodore," a title of courtesy bestowed on him by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, he being the senior commander in their service. Some years since, Captain Watkins was in the merchant service, and for a long while sailed from this port to Valparaiso, South America, in the employ of an enterprising Boston firm, whose entire confidence he enjoyed during the whole time of his service. Captain Watkins has many old friends in this quarter, by whom he is warmly remembered, and to whom, as well as to California travellers, his "counterfeit presentment" will be particularly acceptable. Years ago, the commodore was in the merchant service, between New York and China, and was engaged in a terrific conflict with some of the pirates that infest the China Seas, and are the scourge of commerce in that part of the world; but who almost always meet their match when they encounter a Yankee captain, with a "Yankee ship and a Yankee crew." In his long experience of the ocean, he has passed through a series of adventures, such as chequer the sea-faring, and his "ower true" tales of hardship and peril would fill a volume. If he chose to wield a pen, he might produce a work which would delight the reading public, who are always enamored of nautical adventure, even those of them who have never "gone down to the sea in ships," and who only know the terrors and excitement of the great deep through the medium of print. Commodore Watkins is one of the most popular commanders in the world, and his kind care and attention, his untiring good nature and courtesy, will long be remembered by hosts of passengers. He is now in command of the "Golden Age." The task of a gentleman occupying the position of Commodore Watkins is no easy one, but on the contrary involves great responsibility, and requires a combination of rare qualities. In the first place, as a matter of course, he must be a thorough seaman, versed in the theory and practice of his noble profession; he must possess both prudence and nerve, and he must be also, having the charge of ladies and gentlemen, and being in constant communion with them, a gentleman as well as well as a sailor, though the terms are nearly convertible. With ship, freight and passengers dependent on him, he cannot, when afloat, be said to have a single moment free from care. Even his dreams must reproduce the cares and responsibilities of his waking hours. Then the commander of a passenger-ship frequently has his temper and good nature sorely tried; he is brought in contact often with persons not naturally of the most amiable disposition, and with their little infirmities aggravated by the sore trials of an unwonted sea-voyage. To answer the thousand questions that are addressed to him as the fountain-head of information, the sheet-anchor of safety in trouble, to allay the fears of the timid, to parry the exactions of the presuming, to administer the thousand details of his charge, and while strictly discharging his duty, to win the good will and secure the respect of the parties brought into direct and indirect relation with him, is certainly difficult to accomplish; but when these tests are successfully borne, truly the highest credit is due to the man who sustains them. In these respects, our American captains, as a general thing, have earned a world-wide reputation.

VIEW OF GLOUCESTER, MASS.

We present herewith a general view of the pleasant and thriving town of Gloucester, Essex county, Mass., as seen from the water. This profile view is quite correct, notwithstanding the scale upon which it is drawn, and those familiar with the place will readily distinguish its prominent features. Gloucester is a port of entry, and has and receives a large amount of foreign exports annually, chiefly West India goods, and coal, wood and lumber from the British provinces. Nearly 31,000 tons of shipping are owned at Gloucester. In 1853, forty-one vessels were built here, averaging a little more than eighty tons each. It has a large amount of tonnage employed in the fisheries. The cod fishing business has been prosecuted here for more than a century. From 1765 to 1775, the average annual fleet sent out was 146 vessels, with 5530 tons, employing 888 men. It was occupied as a fishing station as early as 1624, being the first settlement made on the north shore of Massachusetts Bay. The harbor is one of the finest on the coast, and accessible for vessels of the largest class at all seasons. The town is very picturesquely situated, and is handsomely and compactly built. Charming sea views are obtained from many of its eminences. There are a large number of churches here, a bank, a savings' institution, two insurance offices, a gas light, and, we think, three newspapers. It is now connected by railroad with all the principal cities and towns of the seaboard and interior, and a fresh impetus has thus been given to its business activity. It is a very pleasant residence in summer, and in winter the salt air modifies the severity of the season. The scenery on Cape Ann, within the compass of an afternoon's ride or walk of Gloucester, is varied and charming. We know of few places on the coast of the United States where so many attractive elements are combined.

CAPTAIN J. W. WATKINS.

BENEFITS OF WALKING.

Dr. Merwin, in his book on mental diseases, says:—"Lately, I conversed with a veteran in literature and years, whose powers of mind no one questions, however they may differ from him in speculative points. This gentleman has preserved the health of his body and the soundness of his mind, through a long course of multifarious and often depressing circumstances, by a steady perseverance in the habit of walking every day. He has survived, for a long period, almost all the literary characters who were his contemporaries at the time when his own writings excited much public attention; and almost all of them have dropped into the grave, one after another, while he has continued on in an uninterrupted course. But they were men of far less regular habits, and I am obliged to add, of much less equanimity of mind. Yet the preservation of his equanimity has, I verily believe, been insured by the unvaried practice to which I have referred, and which in others would prove equally available, if steadily pursued."—Bee.

THE WIFE OF PETER THE GREAT.

Catherine Alexowna was born of poor parents near Dorpat, a little village of Livonia. At an early age she lost her father, and by her own exertions barely supported herself and her mother, enfeebled by infirmity. Her form was that of symmetry and beauty; and nature had endowed her with a mind as active as it was just and energetic. She was taught to read by her mother, and instructed by an aged Lutheran clergyman in the principles and duties of religion. At the age of fifteen years her mother died. She then went to reside with the clergyman, and instructed his daughters in those things she had been taught by their father. She received, together with his daughters, lessons in music and dancing, and continued to accomplish herself in them until the death of her benefactor. This misfortune reduced her to the most abject penury, and the war between Russia and Sweden breaking out, forced her to leave her country and seek an asylum at Marienburg. She was necessitated to travel, on foot, a country ravaged by two inimical armies; and after having escaped many dangers, she was attacked by two Swedish soldiers, from the violence of whom she was rescued by the timely interposition of an inferior officer. Upon thanking her liberator, what was her surprise when she found he was the son of the Lutheran clergyman who had raised her from her infancy! The young officer rendered her all necessary aid for the prosecution of her journey, and gave her a letter of introduction to M. Gluck, an intimate friend of his father, and his intimate friend, at Marienburg. Although she was but seventeen years of age, M. Gluck confided to her the education of his daughters. In this employment she so well acquitted herself that her employer, who had been afflicted by the loss of his wife, offered her his hand; which she refused, but at the same time offered her own to her liberator, although he had lost an arm and was also covered with wounds. It was, undoubtedly, impossible to predict the future grandeur of Catherine; yet were it foreseen, one might be assured that fortune would not look upon such a mind unpropitiously. The young officer was in the garrison of the village at the time. His surprise was only equalled by his gratitude—and he received the hand of Catherine with transport. The marriage ceremony was performed, and the same day Marienburg was besieged by the Russians. The young officer was called to repulse an assault, and was killed, before having reaped the rewards of his generosity. In the meantime, the siege continued unabated, and the town was carried by assault. The garrison, men, women and children, all were put to the sword. The massacre of the inhabitants at last having ended, Catherine was found concealed in an oven. She had braved indigence, and she now preserved her composure in bondage. Her energy of mind, and rare merit soon made her known. She was spoken of to the Russian general, Prince Menzikoff, whose destiny had been as rigorous as that of Catherine. He asked to see her, and was charmed by her beauty. He purchased her of the soldier to whom she belonged, and placed her under the care of his own sister, and in fine, paid to her all the regard due to her sex and misfortunes. A short time after, Peter the Great paid a visit to Prince Menzikoff, and Catherine served at the table with becoming grace and modesty. The czar, too, was impressed with admiration for her. He returned the next morning, and asked to see the beautiful slave. He interrogated her much, and found that the brilliancy of her intellect surpassed the symmetry and beauty of her figure. Peter, who knew how to create men, also knew how to judge them. He thought she was worthy of seconding him in his great designs; and inclination, joined to considerations of policy, made him resolve to marry her. He made her acquainted with all the events of his life, even from his infancy; and he traced hers in obscurity, that state in which the mind, obliged to depend upon its innate resource, struggles against fortune without attracting spectators, and triumphs without applause. He saw her preserving, everywhere, the character of greatness truly original, and thought this alone sufficient to elevate her to the title of empress; and appropriately determined to celebrate the marriage in a private manner. While on the throne, she entered into all the views of the czar, and devoted much time to elevating the minds of Russian female society. She had the talent of the other sex, without sacrificing to it the accomplishments of her own, and died with that same fortitude in adversity that never forsook her on the throne.—Albion.

VIEW OF GLOUCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CLARA F., Medford.—Yes, the Roman shops had signs. At Pompeii, a pig over the door represents a wine-shop within.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Our correspondents must be particular to state in their letters the name of the paper through which they expect an answer—whether "The Flag of our Union" or "Pictorial." We are often at a loss from this omission.

.... The report of English railway accidents for the past year

CHEAP!—In Philadelphia, lately, a lady bought quite a nice shawl for one thousand four hundred and twenty-five dollars!

Snow.—Some one calls snow the dust swept from the streets of heaven! There must have been extensive sweeping operations last winter.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. Clark Hodges to Miss Mary Lewis; by Rev. Mr. Williams, Mr. E. F. McDonald, of Washington City, to Miss Elizabeth C. Hastings, of Cambridge; by Rev. Mr. Edwards, Mr. Seth Westcott, to Miss M. J. Kneeling; by Rev. Mr. Hale, Mr. Nathaniel B. Devereux to Miss Caroline Bullard; by Rev. Mr. Cobb, Mr. George Turnbull to Miss Mary D. Fuller; by Rev. Mr. Milner, Mr. Samuel L. Moulague, of Brighton, to Miss Mary E. Burchstead.—At Charlestown, by Rev. Mr. Lambert, Mr. Thomas Harding to Miss Emeline Stickley.—At North Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Averill, Mr. Samuel D. Reeves to Miss Harriet A. Taft.—At Dorchester, by Rev. Mr. Clinch, Rev. William C. Brown, of Haverhill, to Miss Helen Morse.—At Brookline, by Rev. Mr. Perkins, Mr. Henry Keyes, of Springfield, to Miss Lucy A. Plympton, of Wardsboro', Vt.—At Medford, by Rev. Mr. Braham, Mr. Sylvester Russell, to Miss Sarah A. Cramble, of Manchester, N. H.—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Beards, Mr. Emory Shepard, of Boston, to Miss Carrie Simonds.—At Weymouth, by Rev. Mr. Potter, Mr. James H. Maurice to Miss Susan E. Holbrook.—At Newton Corner, by Rev. Mr. Hill, Mr. C. Cary, to Miss Elizabeth Barker.—At Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Sullivan K. Poor, of Manchester, N. H., to Miss Alicia L. Fox.—At Pepperell, by Rev. Mr. Babbage, Dr. C. E. Dearborn, of Boston, to Miss Carrie M. Lawrence.

In this city, M. Elizabeth L. Moriarty, 43; Mrs. Mary Austin, 33; Mrs. Mary Thiden, 79; Mrs. Lucia A. Peck, 24; Mrs. Marietta Williams, 33; Miss Clara Stone, 31; Mr. George Tucker, 33; Mr. Aaron Coffin, 54; Mrs. Lucy Moore, 45; Mrs. Sarah M. Smith, 46; Ida Annabel, only daughter of George and Sarah P. Mitchell, aged 3 years and 1 month.—At Charlestown, Capt. Amos H. Clark, 77.—At Cambridge, Mr. Fannie P. Clark, 27.—At West Cambridge, Mr. William H. Clark, 24.—At Watertown, Mr. William H. Clark, 24.—At Jamaica Plain, Mrs. Irene H. Richards, 42.—At Medford, Miss Lydia Caroline Prentiss, 19.—At Hingham, Mrs. Adelaide Hervey, 25.—At Watertown, Mr. Stephen D. Ruggles, 41.—At Lynn, Mrs. Hannah Payne, 76.—At Salem, Mr. William Pickman, 82.—At South Danvers, Mr. Isaac Hays, 67.—At Danvers, Mr. William H. Hays, 67.—At Andover, Mr. William H. Roberts, 25.—At Salisbury, Mrs. Julia Cheswell, 25.—At West Newbury, Mr. Lois Chase, 85.—At Lowell, Mrs. Mary W. Farmer, 55.—At Middleborough, Mr. Samuel Shaw, Jr., 57.—At New Bedford, Mrs. Grace King, of Tiverton, R. I., 80.—At West Springfield, Mrs. Achsah Kent, 85.—At Westport, Miss Alice Kent, 85.—At Nantucket, Mr. William Coffin, 77.—At Portland, Mr. John C. French, 43.—At Vashboro, Mr., Capt. Henry Hout, formerly of Nantucket, 88.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

Published every SATURDAY, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 20 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballo's Pictorial.]

REMEMBERED MELODIES.

BY ORVILLE FRANKS.

Softly o'er the fancy stealing,
Like the pleasant, soothing chiming
Of the bells at vesper pealing,
Come the songs of olden time;
And as gently do they soothe us,
Calming every ruffled breast:
All our thoughts they sweetly weave thus,
Back from toil and strife to rest,

All the songs we heard in childhood:
These dear melodies of home—
Come to us as through the wildwood,
Or across the sea, we roam.
And sweet memories they awaken
Of the friends of early days—
These by death from 'mong us taken,
Ere they trod life's darkest ways.

Dwelling in our hearts' recesses,
May they ever thus remain,
Well up to cheer and bless us,
Calming we and soothing pain.
Thus may memory's sweetest visions,
Dreams of childhood's home and friends,
Be ours till our earthly missions
Close, and life's dark journey ends.

THE REVELATIONS OF TIME.

Time, as he courses onwards, still unrolls
The volume of concealment. In the future,
As in the optician's glassy cylinder,
The undistinguishable blots and colors
Of the dim past collect and shape themselves,
Upstarting in their own completed images,
To score, or to reward.—COLERIDGE.

THE OLORY OF TIME.

Time's glory is to calm contending Kings,
To unmask falsehood, and bring truth to light;
To stamp the seal of time on aged things,
To wake the morn and sentinel the night,
To wrong the wronger till he render right.—SHAKESPEARE.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Leafy June! Do you not welcome it, gentle reader, whether city bred or country born, with a glad heart? Is not this balmy breeze, sweeping over hill and lea, the very elixir of life? Do not those songs of birds from the branches go more directly to the heart, than even the lurk-like notes of that wonderful Lagrange, who mounts so daintily the diatonic scale, never losing breath till she reaches the "high topgallant" of her melody? O, that the summer sunshine could last forever! But since it may not be, let us strive to perpetuate a summer in the heart. .... That was a funny story told in a French paper at the expense of Il Traviatore. A deaf man went to hear that act at the advice of his physician, who accompanied him. In the third act the crashing music restored his hearing; he expressed his delight to his medical friend. But alas! the remedy he had counselled had rendered him stone deaf. .... A book printed by the Roxburgh Club, in England, from the original records of several ancient families, contains some curious details of the style of living in the highest classes of England, in the 13th and 14th centuries. .... "The distinguishing peculiarity, not only of England, but of European taste in food during the middle ages, was a predilection for the strong, and, in some cases, for the coarse flavors. To what other cause can we ascribe the appearance of the flesh of the whale, grampus, porpoise, sea calf, seal, and other such fish at the tables of the sovereigns and people of rank, by whom they were considered as delicacies? Some notion may be formed of the quantity of whale, etc., that was eaten in Europe during the 13th century, when we find Henry III., in Lent, 1246, ordering the sheriffs of London to purchase for him, in the city, a hundred pieces of the best whale and two porpoises." .... It is said to have been discovered, in France, that the great secret in producing the magnetic sleep is in the subject's elevating his eyes to an angle of forty-five degrees. This has been suggested by a friend as a reason for so many people being sleepy in church. .... A schoolmaster, describing a money-lender, says:—"He serves you up in the present tense, he leads you in the conditional mood, keeps you in the subjunctive, and ruins you in the future." .... Among the wonders of the age, we find it recorded that "Dr. Conyers, of London, dissected a person who died for love, and found an impression of a lady's face upon his heart." This beats animal magnetism all hollow. .... Lecturing is quite a profitable pursuit; and those who wish to make money, had better preserve the following directions for making a popular lecturer, which we transfer from an old receipt-book:—Take four or five encyclopedias, seven dictionaries, three or four works on philosophy, two histories of the American Revolution, together with St. Pierre's Studies of Nature—boil them down to a jelly, and season the whole with a little of the spice of self-conceit, and you have the product, which may be wrapped up in a neat parcel, and labelled, "This side up with care—a popular lecturer." .... There is an old story of a Scotch peasant girl, who, on arriving at the turnpike-gate nearest Glasgow, knocked, and inquired, "Is this Glasgow?"—and being answered in the affirmative, asked, "Is Peggy in?" .... The letter II is taken great liberties with by the genuine cockneys. Mrs. C. Smith, in her "Conversations," gives an example of this. "They saw a flower in the hedge, and in trying to get at it, trod just at the hedge of the stream. They have their air cut by a fashionable dresser, and have bought a most beautiful hat, which is a most becoming head-dress; and they shall wear it the next time they go home to dinner." .... At a temperance meeting in one of our country towns, lately, a fair one offered the pledge to her friend, saying, "John, will you sign that?" He hesitated, and finally declined. "Then," said the young lady, "you will understand I shall not be at home next Sunday evening." John was a fool to prefer his glass to his lass. .... A circus-rider, in Mobile, lately threw seventy-one summersets in succession. What a politician he'd make! .... Signor Zambois was a shrewd fellow. In his "Hints to Citizens," he says:—"When you meet with a sheriff in the street, with whom you are familiar, always salute him first; and if you chance to be going the same way, take him by the arm, rather than permit him to take yours. There is a vast difference in the effect upon spectators." .... In old times they treated criminals with less lenity than at present. In the reign of Henry VIII., it was enacted that, in order to prevent the crime of "poisonage," persons guilty of the offence should be "boiled to death." So that detected poisoners were sure to get themselves into "hot water." .... To illustrate the power of imagination, a lecturer recently stated that, on its being announced to a man, in New Hampshire, that he had been elected "town clerk," he was so deeply affected by the "exalted honor" conferred upon him, that he died instantly. We are free to confess we do not believe the statement. .... Somebody asked us, the other day, the origin of the word "bether." We believe it originated in the following way: A sergeant in the army, exposed to the volubility of two Irishmen, one at each ear, exclaimed, "Don't both ear me!"—hence the verb. .... In Southern Africa, the wives of the chiefs used to cultivate the land with the very poorest implements. When the Rev. Barnabas Shaw, a missionary clergyman, introduced the first plough to break up the land, one of the chiefs remarked that "one plough was equal to seven wives!" .... What constitutes good breeding in one locality, is downright rudeness in another. For instance, a Kam-schatka kneels before his guest. He cuts an enormous slice from a sea-calf; he crams it entire into the mouth of his friend, furiously crying out "Tana!" (There!) and cutting away what hangs about his lips, snatches and swallows it with avidity. Fancy Louis Napoleon welcoming Queen Victoria to the Tuileries in that style. .... A state of intoxication is sometimes argued for a mitigation of the penalty for an offence against the law, though the law itself recognizes no such plea. The ancients considered intoxication an aggravation. Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, made a law, that every man who committed a fault in a state of intoxication, should receive a double punishment. .... We see that a process has been discovered for rendering rattan flexible. We rather fancy schoolboys find it flexible enough already. .... A very heavy immigration from Norway is going on this season. Ten thousand, at least, are expected in Canada. These hardy Northerners make excellent colonists. .... The New York ticket swindlers are supposed to fleece at least 150 passengers in each California steamer, by pretending to be branch agencies, buying tickets at wholesale and dividing the profits with the purchaser, and distributing a warning against bogus agencies at the same time they make their sales. Can nothing be done to stop the operations of these villains? .... A sexton of the cemetery at Dundas, Canada West, has been accused of "dunning" the mourners for his fee while the funeral was actually going on. We should think a rival sexton, who was willing to bury "on time," would do a fine business. .... An extraordinary feature of recent medical experience is, that consumption prevails along the southern seacoast of the United States, Cuba, and other West India islands, as much as it does at the North. This is known to physicians in the West Indies, but will be startling news to the majority of invalids, who look to the tropics as a land of promise. .... Lewis Baker, of Philadelphia, formerly of San Francisco, has leased the Cincinnati and Louisville theatres, the former for ten, and the latter for eight years. The former is to be considerably enlarged, so that it will comfortably seat 3000 persons. The rage for theatre-going seems to have revived all over the country; and perhaps theatrical management will become what it has never been before, a safe speculation. .... The Indian outrages in Minnesota, it appears, have been much exaggerated. .... The Revere House, in this city, was opened by Col. Paron Stevens ten years ago. It is, in every respect, a model hotel, and travellers from Europe are surprised at its magnificence and completeness. .... The biography of Miss Charlotte Bronte, the authoress of "Jane Eyre" and "Villette," is quite as interesting as any romance ever published. Out of the depths of her own sorely-tried heart she wrote, and her most powerful scenes were but reflexes of her own experience. .... The strange disease at the National Hotel, Washington, is still an unravelled mystery and the theme of marvellous comment. Many well-informed persons still persist in believing that the poisoning was an attempt on the life of President Buchanan. If so, this is one of the most monstrous crimes ever attempted in this country. .... At a recent auction sale of a private library in England, a copy of Tindal's "Translation of the Pentateuch," printed for the martyr at Marburg, in Hesse, 1530, and a work of excessive rarity, brought $630! .... The late lamented Rev. Dr. Peabody, of King's Chapel, in this city, truly appreciated the influence of the press and the labors of our editors. He wrote to Mr. N. P. Willis:—"I know of no way in which an author of ability is more sure of a speedy return—in the shape of influence and usefulness—for the most conscientious and careful labors, than by addressing the public through the newspaper press. I will not, however, be so absurd as to defend journalism in this age, when it has come to be one of the great powers of the world. .... A French speculator has just despatched 300 cats from Paris to Australia, where rats abound and pussies are minus, and reasonably expects to realize a splendid profit on his consignment. The cats were incarcerated in splendid cages lined with cotton batting, to guard them against injuries from the motion of the ship on the passage. The rats of Paris—we don't mean the opera rats—ought to pass a vote of thanks to the novel speculator. .... The Undertakers' Company, of Paris, has a monopoly of all the funerals. Our readers will bear this fact in mind, as we proceed to inform them that a rich French provincial, firmly convinced of the destruction of the world by a comet, on the 13th of this month, exclaimed:—"If everybody dies, what an enormous harvest the Undertaker's Company will reap! Colossal fortunes will be realized." Thereupon he wrote to his agent to sell off all his property, and invest three hundred thousand francs—all he was worth—in stocks of the Undertaker's Company. What a genius! .... We often hear people exclaim, "This is a great country!" But how great is it, territorially? Why, the United States cover an area of more than 2,900,000 miles. .... The burglars of New York, we perceive, have taken to shooting at the police officers; they ought to return the compliment, and shoot at the burglars. .... Poor Kossuth! He is the only man excepted from the general political amnesty granted by the emperor of Austria to the Hungarians. But the exception is the highest compliment that could be paid him. The boy-emperor fears that one great man more than "an army with banners." .... A revolutionary movement in favor of Santa Anna has lately been detected in Mexico. How many times Santa Anna's star has risen and set! His life is a perfect romance, of which the last chapter has yet to be written. .... The property left by John Jacob Astor was estimated at twelve millions of dollars; this will vie with the colossal fortunes of some of the European capitalists. The best of the story is, that every penny of Astor's wealth was honestly and honorably earned. .... How strange it seems to receive an elegantly printed newspaper from Honolulu. Yet such is the "Pacific Commercial Advertiser," a journal that, in appearance and matter, would be no discredit to any of our old Atlantic cities. There is also a native paper published at Honolulu, called the "Ene Hawaii." .... The slave-trade is said to be more active at present than it has been for years. It is alleged that at least two vessels leave the coast of Africa for Cuba every week, with five hundred to seven hundred captives stowed away between decks. .... The necessity of public amusement is now urged by some of the most influential men in the country, Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York, and Rev. Edward Everett Hale, of this city, leading the van

AN OLD COUNTRY.

A correspondent, writing from Sterling, Whiteside county, Illinois, says:—"There are strong indications that this country was formerly inhabited by a civilized people, and that the entire surface has been covered by the present surface to a depth of twenty to thirty feet. I will mention facts that have come to my knowledge, occurring within three miles of my place, which go far to satisfy me of the truth of the theory advanced. Last autumn, when I was here, a man from Dorchester, Mass., was digging a well, and when about twenty feet from the surface, he found pieces of cedar cut and split, and below them a soil with a deposit on it like decayed grass. Another man, when digging a well, at about the same depth came directly upon a well stoned up with stone, laid in lime mortar, which he cleaned out and now sees. Other cases I could name, but they are of similar import."

Choice Miscellany.

THE SNAKE AND CROCODILE.

The following thrilling account of an engagement between a bna-constrictor and a crocodile, in Java, is given by an eye-witness: It was one morning that I stood beside a small lake fed by one of the rills from the mountains. The waters were as clear as crystal, and everything could be seen to the very bottom. Stretching its limb close over this pond was a gigantic teak-tree, and in its thick, shining, evergreen leaves lay a huge boa, in an easy coil, taking his morning nap. Above him was a powerful ape of the baboon species—a leering race of scamps, always bent on mischief. Now the ape, from his position, saw a crocodile in the water rising to the top exactly beneath the coil of the serpent. Quick as thought he jumped plump upon the snake, which fell with a splash into the jaws of the crocodile. The ape saved himself by clinging to the limb of a tree, but a battle royal immediately commenced in the water. The serpent, grasped in the middle by the crocodile, made the water boil by its furious contortions. Winding his folds round and round the body of his antagonist, he disabled his hinder legs, and by his contractions made the scales and the bones of the monster crack. The water was speedily tinged with the blood of both combatants, yet neither was disposed to yield. They rolled over and over, neither being able to obtain a decided advantage. All this time the cause of the mischief was in a state of the highest ecstasy. He leaped up and down the branches of the tree, came several times close to the scene of the fight, shook the limbs of the tree, uttered a yell and again frisked about. At the end of ten minutes a silence begun to come over the scene. The folds of the serpent began to be relaxed, and though they were trembling along the back, the head hung lifeless in the water. The crocodile was also still, and though only the spine of his back was visible, it was evident that he, too, was dead. The monkey now perched himself on the lower limbs of the tree, close to the dead bodies, and amused himself for ten minutes in making all sorts of faces at them. This seemed to be adding insult to injury. One of my companions was standing at a short distance, and taking a stone from the edge of the lake, hurled it at the ape. He was totally unprepared, and as it struck him on the head he was instantly tipped over, and fell upon the crocodile. A few bounds, however, brought him ashore, and taking to the tree, he speedily disappeared among the thick branches.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

SAGACITY OF THE BEAR.

Several anecdotes, which were related to me by our guide, concerning the habits of the black bear, would seem to entitle him to a higher position in the scale of animal instinct and sagacity than that of almost any other quadruped. For instance, he says, that before making his bed to lie down, the animal invariably goes several hundred yards with the wind, at a distance from his track. Should an enemy now come upon his track, he must approach him with the wind; and with the bear's keen sense of smell, he is almost certain to be made aware of his presence, and has time to escape before he is himself seen. He also states, that when pursued, the bear sometimes takes refuge in caves in the earth or rocks, where the hunter often endeavors, by making a smoke at the entrance, to force him out; but it not unfrequently happens that, instead of coming out when the smoke becomes too oppressive, he very deliberately advances to the fire, and with his forefeet beats upon it until it is extinguished—then retreats into the cave. This, he assured me, he had often seen. Although these statements would seem to endow him with something more than mere animal instinct, and evince a conception of the connection between cause and effect, yet another anecdote, which was related to me, would go to prove this curious quadruped one of the most stupid fellows in the brute creation. My informant says, that when the bear cannot be driven out of the cave by smoke, it sometimes becomes necessary for the hunter to take his rifle, and with a torch to enter the cavern in search of him. One would suppose this a very hazardous undertaking, and that the animal would eject the presumptuous intruder; but, on the contrary, as soon as he sees the light approaching, he sits upright on his hanches, and with his fore-paws covers his face and eyes, and remains in this position until the light is removed. Thus the hunter is enabled to approach as close as he desires without danger, and taking deadly aim with his faithful rifle, poor bruin is slain. These facts have been stated to me by three different Indians, in whose veracity I have much confidence, and I have no doubt are strictly true.—The Far West.

THE INDIAN AND THE SETTLER.

It is generally supposed that the Indian is an exceedingly cunning being, unrivalled in the peculiar knowledge of the woods. This is something of a mistake. The Indian has the quick perception and the natural sagacity of one who lives in the woods; but it never surpassed, if it equalled, the acquired knowledge and perception of the pioneer hunter. On one occasion, in a sort of block-house, an old hunter of the pioneers was standing in a door, when the cry of a wild turkey was heard at some distance. A youth stood by the hunter, able to bear a rifle, who, with youthful impetuosity, exclaimed, "There is a turkey—I'll go and kill it." The hunter listened a moment, and said, "No, you are not a good shot. I'll go and give you the turkey." The youth demurred, but was at length persuaded. The hunter crept out in an opposite direction from the cry. Slyly he made his way through the bushes, and at length came behind the spot where the cries of the turkey were heard; and, concealed by low bushes and brush, came up a ravine. There, before him, in the limbs of a tree, was a large Indian, who was imitating the cries of a wild turkey, to decoy some one from the block-house. The hunter shot him and took his scalp. Arriving at the block-house, he threw it down before the youth, saying, "There is your turkey!" The youth was filled with gratitude for his escape.—Western Times.

THOUGHTS AND LANGUAGE.

It is not always easy, either in painting or literature, to determine where the influence of language stops, and of thought begins. Many thoughts are so dependent upon the language in which they are clothed, that they would lose half their beauty if otherwise expressed. But the highest thoughts are those which are least dependent on language; and the dignity of any composition, and praise to which it is entitled, are in exact proportion to its independency of language or expression. A composition is, indeed, usually most perfect, when to such intrinsic dignity is added all that expression can do to attract and adorn; but in every case of supreme excellence, this all becomes as nothing. We are more gratified by the simplest lines or words which can suggest the idea in its own naked beauty, than by the robe and the gem which conceal while they decorate; we are better pleased to feel by their absence how little they could bestow, than by their presence how much they can destroy.—Westminster Review.

EASILY DONE.—There is not a village or town in the country so small, but that a club of twelve subscribers might be easily obtained for "Ballou's Pictorial," and the work be thus procured for each at two dollars a year, besides a gratis copy to the person who sends the names and money. Any person desiring to form a club, can have sample copies sent free of charge, by sending us a line to that effect.

Editorial Melange.

It is said that "Hiawatha" has netted the author thirteen thousand dollars. In consequence of the recent murderous assaults upon policemen and others, the mayor of Baltimore has ordered the arming of the city police with Colt's rifle barrelled six-shooters. Of all the projects of reformers and enthusiasts, no one has done so much to enlarge the sphere of woman in a practical way as—hoops. The new mayor of Madison, Wisconsin, discourses upon the advantages of that fascinating region: "Travellers to and from all parts of the globe will make their calculations to stop at Madison a few days, to refresh themselves, recruit their tired and weary frames, preparatory to resuming their journey to all portions of the world. Such are our railroad advantages." The eldest son of Governor Wise, of Virginia, is studying divinity at the Episcopal School in Alexandria county, Va., and will probably be ordained next year. It is said that in Calcutta, the hogs feed on the dead bodies of the natives thrown on the river bank during the night. Who wouldn't be a Jew there?—When the bells ring noon, nine hundred thousand children, in the State of New York, pour out from eleven thousand school-houses. Two Sing-Sing convicts have escaped lately from prison by drilling through the marble wall of their cells, and descending from the fifth story to the ground by means of a rope. Among the exports from New York, lately, were ten printing presses, to Australia. The streets in the city of Chicago and the buildings are to be raised fifteen feet. This will enable the inhabitants to adopt an effectual system of sewerage, and add much to the permanent beauty as well as health of the place. A writer in the New York Observer states that there are over six thousand street organ players and statuette sellers in New York. In the middle ages, in France, a person convicted of being a calumniator was condemned to place himself on all fours, and bark like a dog for a quarter of an hour. If this custom were adopted at the present day, there would be some howling. Parties in New York city are talking of erecting an opera house in Brooklyn, N. Y., which now has nearly 200,000 inhabitants. It is expected that the New York operatic companies will be able to draw full houses there on the off nights. L. H. Troom, of Michigan, has been appointed private secretary to Secretary Cass, at a salary of $1400 per annum. What more touching commentary upon the misfortunes of Marie Antoinette, than the cash entry made by the sexton, and yet to be seen, in the parish records of the Madeleine: "Paid seven francs for a coffin for the widow Capet." Mrs. Elizabeth Goldizen, who resided on the North Fork, in Harby county, Va., died a few days since, having reached the extraordinary age of one hundred and eighteen years. The winter wheat of Canada has escaped the dangers of the spring, and is "doing finely." Since the Gazette was commenced in Salem, by Samuel Hall, forty-nine other newspapers have been started in that city, forty-six of which have broken up in bankruptcy. Measures are about to be taken by the State authorities to test the validity of the title of the city of New York to Castle Garden and the land on which it stands; the object being to secure Castle Garden to the emigrant commissioners as a permanent landing depot.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS.—There is a prospect that women will be allowed to vote in Michigan. In that case, none but handsome, polite men who eschew that vile weed, tobacco, need expect to be elected to office. Of course, bachelors will be ruthlessly ostracised, unless a prominent candidate secures the influence of the leader of the ladies by promising her his hand in the event of his success.

A PAIR OF THEM.—A couple of comets have been discovered in the heavens by the European astronomers. If these long-tailed gentry are belligerently inclined, we would respectfully suggest to them the expediency of hitting each other, instead of viciously making a foot-ball of this good little globe of ours that never harmed a comet in its life.

AN EXILED RAPPER.—Mr. Hume, the American spiritualist who has been astonishing the court circle of France, has been sent off by the emperor, because his wife and her ladies were terrified by the demonstration. We are induced to think that Louis himself dreaded the conjurer might call up the shades of those murdered by his orders at the time of the emp d' chat.

AN ANCIENT RELIC.—The Pittsfield Sun office has a composing stick made more than fifty years ago by Luke Noble, of that town, when there was but one type foundry in the United States—Ronaldson's, in Philadelphia. This stick is almost as good as new, having been used in setting up good democratic matter.

EARTHQUAKE.—A very sensible shock of an earthquake was experienced at the U. S. military station near Fort Townsend, in Washington Territory, last December. We are glad earthquakes are getting "sensible;" we have thought some of them quite unreasonable.

GETTING IT IN THE WORLD.—M. Godard, who was rather unfortunate in his balloon ascensions here, lately went up from Cuba, with four persons, who much enjoyed their excursion.

Wayside Gatherings.

Prince's Bay oysters sell for $2,000,000 annually, the papers say.

The small pox is raging with fearful effort in the towns of Candella and Sanosin, in Mexico.

Judge Woodruff, of New York, has decided that a married woman's note has no legal force.

Fish are common in the seas of Surinam with four eyes—two of them on horns which grow on the top of their heads.

A building fell at Albion, near Detroit, Michigan, a few days ago, and by the fall, five persons were buried.

The Vanderbilt, Commodore Vanderbilt's fine steamer, is of 5268 tons, and 2500 horse power, for the New York and Havre line.

There is a family in Hadley, Mass., some member of which has been justice of the peace in the county since 1659, or about two hundred years.

A man named Bierman, foreman of a brewery near Cleveland, was killed by the explosion of a beer cask, in which he had burned a hole for a faucet with a hot iron.

Henry Harley, a painter, has recovered $750 against the city of New York, for damage in falling through a sidewalk, where rotten plank had been laid over an old well.

The contract for constructing the new court house, etc., at Rutland, Vermont, has been awarded by the secretary of the treasury to Messrs. Colby & Bird, of Lynn, Mass., for the sum of $42,827.

A policeman of Charleston, S. C., named Edward Johanna, died a few days since from the effect of the point of an umbrella entering the eye, which had been mischievously thrust at him in a scuffle.

A physiologist of Cincinnati has discovered that wearing moustaches strengthens the eye-sight, and that the removal of these hairy appendages has the effect of causing general diseases of the eye.

A woman at Dorchester, C. W., lost her reason from reading an account of the terrible accident at the Desjardines bridge, and is only just recovering a glimmering of sense again, under the care of a medical gentleman.

The wife of Asa Mason, at Valley Falls, R. I., hearing a noise in a closet after the family had retired, one night lately, opened the door, and found a big man, whom she seized, and, with her husband's assistance, secured.

Verdi's last opera, "Simon Boccanegra," has been purchased by a Milanese publisher for 30,000 francs. Besides this, the composer receives thirty per cent. of the proceeds of each performance, and reserves to himself the copyright for France and Germany.

A portrait of Washington, taken on ivory, when he was about 25 years old, has been discovered. It is supposed to have been taken by Copley, a distinguished painter at that time, and that it was done on the occasion of Washington's first visit to Boston.

Children are sometimes born, as it were, at the beginning of life's second volume. The Alexandria Gazette mentions a colored child that can talk quite plainly, though only three months old. It was born with two teeth, and has six perfect teeth already.

Mexico supplies us with a great deal of mahogany, which is sold by the weight, averaging about $12 per ton. Under the revised tariff, it has been placed on the free list. Last year, 6804 tons were exported from a single Mexican port, two-thirds of which came to the United States.

A lady of Troy—one of the aristocracy of that city—lost her husband on a Monday, lately, at nine o'clock in the morning. Two hours later, she caused the following telegraphic despatch to be sent to a modist in New York: "What is the latest fashion of mourning goods? Send particulars by mail."

Simon Dillon, of Clay county, Ohio, a man 60 years old, has been arrested for murdering his son, 15 years old, ten years since. The father killed the boy by a severe flogging, and then reported that he had run away; but the murder has now been discovered by finding the lad's body buried in the cellar.

A scientific expedition, to circumnavigate the globe, and every accessible coast and climate, is about to be despatched by the Austrian government. The steams of Europe are looking forward to the results of this expedition with deep interest. Leading men in the different departments of science, it is expected, will go with the expedition.

Secretary Toucey has decided that the retired and dropped officers coming before the Courts of Inquiry, may demand a copy of the charges preferred against them. This is in opposition to Attorney-General Cushing's decision, which requires the officers to prove their fitness in all respects—moral, mental, professional, and physical, for the service.

A fellow in North Carolina had been imprisoned for having thirteen wives, and broke jail. A gentleman recognized him, and invited him to dinner, thinking to get the reward that was offered for his apprehension. After dinner, the gentleman slipped out for a constable, and came back to find that the culprit had absconded with his own wife.

Redpath, the railway swindler of England, seems to have been living in very comfortable circumstances. The recent sale of his effects, including wines, pictures, books, furniture, and other little et ceteras, it is said, has netted the handsome sum of nearly $150,000. It must go very hard with the poor fellow to be compelled to get along without the luxuries to which he was accustomed in the hey-day of his financial operations.

A. G. Benson, agent for the New York company, has taken possession of the islands of New Nantucket and Jarvis, and planted the American flag thereon. These are about 1200 miles from the Hawaiian Islands, and a cargo of the guano found thereon has been brought to Honolulu, and it is said to be a first rate article. New Nantucket is without vegetation, but is loaded with the accumulated bird line of ages.

Andrew Hoover, of Washington city, was seized with an apoplectic fit, lately, and died on the following day. On the morning of the day he was taken with the fit, he casually remarked to his family that on that day his policy of life insurance would expire. His son, in the course of the morning, took the policy and had it renewed. In a short time, on that very last day, the father was speechless, and has departed. His remark and prompt attention has saved a worthy family $5000.

Judge Thompson, of the Marine Court of New York city, has rendered a highly interesting and somewhat unexpected decision, involving the rights of policemen. James T. Burdham, one of the police force of that city, refused to put on the uniform when the order was promulgated in 1853, and on that ground was removed by the commissioners. He prosecuted for his arrears of pay to the close of his term, and Judge Thompson, holding that the department had no right to order the wearing of a uniform, gave judgment in his favor for $500.

Foreign Items.

In France, there are thirty six coal fields in thirty departments, and the annual produce of coal exceeds 7,000,000 tons.

Three hundred thousand persons in France are engaged in mining, and their operations show an annual value of $80,000,000.

The Austrian Minister of the Interior announces that the work on the exhibition building for the Austrian Universal Exhibition of 1859 has begun.

Some of the bronze cannon taken by the English at Canton were ascertained to have been the work of some of the Jesuits, who were tolerated in China in the time of the Emperor Hong Hi.

The bronze statue, by Moore, the sculptor, of Thomas Moore, the poet, has arrived safely in Dublin. Early steps will be taken to have it placed in its designed locality, opposite the entrance of the House of Lords, in College Street.

Ten millions of pounds sterling ($50,000,000) are annually transmitted through the British post office, to all parts of the realm, without the loss of two pounds to the trillion, by peculation, robbery, fire, or any casualty whatever.

Letters from Vienna announce that the celebrated singer Staudigl, who has been for a long time confined in a mail-house, is now in a worse state than ever; his mental excitement had, a short time ago, reached such a pitch that he was obliged to be confined in a strait-waistcoat.

Sands of Gold.

.... Speech is silver, silence is gold.—Greek Proverb.

.... Flattery is like your shadow: it makes you neither larger nor smaller.—Danish Proverb.

.... Common sense, which, to tell the truth, is none too common, is the best sense that I know.—Lord Chesterfield.

.... People who declare that they belong to no party, certainly do not belong to ours.—J. Pelt-Senn.

.... Politeness is a mixture of discretion, civility, complaisance and circumspection spread over all we do and say.—St. Evremont.

.... The universe is an immense steam-engine kept up by a secret, invisible fire, constantly renewed, never expiring.—Lewellen.

.... The first pressure of sorrow crushes out from our hearts the best wine; afterwards the constant weight of it brings forth bitterness—the taste and stain from the lees of the vat.—Longfellow.

.... Every negation implies the affirmation of the contrary. The most powerful method of opposing evil, is not to recognize, but to deny it; that is already the substitution of good.—Feuchtersleben.

.... It is a necessity of the human heart and mind to employ themselves on spiritual objects to arrive at a perfect understanding, and to produce within us that purity of sentiment which makes us love virtue on account of its intrinsic worth, without the hope of other recompense than our own conscious integrity.—Lessing.

Joker's Budget.

A man may with truth be said to make a false step in life, when he mistakes the cellar stairs for those leading to the chambers, on retiring to bed.

"Do you understand me now?" thundered a country pedagogue to an urchin, at whose head he threw an inkstand. "I've got an ink-ling of what you mean!"

Reynolds, the dramatist, observing the thinness of the house at one of his pieces, said: "I suppose it is owing to the war!" "No," was the reply, "it is owing to the piece."

Degradation.—Charles Lamb once remarked, on seeing some boys at play: "What a pity to think that some of those fine, fun-cut fellows may some day come to be members of parliament!"

Mr. Provine, a dealer in flour and beans, says that although he has been a member of the choir for at least three years, he has never been able to sing more than one tune yet, and that is Benevento.

This morning a friend said to an Irishman: "Good-morning, Patrick; slippery this morning." "Slippery! and be jabers, it is nothing else, your honor; upon my word, and I slid down three times without getting up once!"

A man, pretending to be deaf and dumb, was begging in Stockton, a few days ago. At one house where he solicited alms, a fine Newfoundland dog sprang out at him, when the fellow exclaimed in an excited manner: "If you don't take the dog away, I'll stick him!"

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.

DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the bosom of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

It is so written, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE

1 subscriber, one year, $2 00

4 subscribers, " " 7 00

10 " " 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate.

Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every SATURDAY, by

M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

PRAYER-WHEEL IN INDIA.

The first engraving on this page represents the interior of a Lama temple at Cashmere, India, with one of the famous "prayer-wheels," by operating which the poor devotees fancy they sufficiently propitiate their god. These wheels are about ten feet high by eight or ten in diameter, made of large rolls of cloth, on which the Lama faith is written, and enclosed in a wooden case painted all over with facetious and not very correct representations of gods, devils, etc. They turn on a pivot, and are pulled round by a strap in the manner represented; the Lamas fancying themselves on the high road to heaven all the time, pulling day and night, and not having time in consequence to wash. Major Cunningham, in his admirable work on Ladak, more minutely describes this prayer-wheel, as he witnessed it in operation in that country.—The prayer-cylinder, or manichhos khor (the precious religious wheel), is a very ingenious instrument, and does great credit to the genius of the Thibetians. The body of the instrument is a metal cylinder about three inches in height, and from two to two and a half inches in diameter. The axis is prolonged below to form a handle. The cylinder is filled with rolls of printed prayers and charms, which revolve as the instrument is turned round. Every Lama carries a chhos-khor, which he keeps perpetually turning by a gentle motion of the hand, assisted by a cubical piece of iron fastened by a chain to the outside. As every revolution of a prayer is equivalent to its recitation, the chhos khor is a very ingenious instrument for multiplying the number of a man's prayers. * * These instruments are found of all sizes, and in all positions. Cylinders about one foot in height are placed in rows around the temples, and are turned by the votaries before entering. Larger cylinders are found near villages, turned by water, which keeps them perpetually revolving.

STATE CAPITOL, NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

This noble building, of which we present an accurate drawing, will serve to show our readers of the older States what architectural advances their brethren of much younger States are making. The structure reflects the highest credit on the liberality of the legislature, and on the taste and skill of the architect, Wm. Strickland, Esq. The corner-stone was laid on the 4th of July, 1845, with appropriate and imposing ceremonies. It stands upon a hill in the centre of the city, from which a noble prospect is obtained. The whole structure is built of limestone taken from quarries in the vicinity of Nashville. Mr. George Dardis has supplied the following description of this noble edifice:—In plan and elevation, the design and whole character of the architecture is essentially Grecian, consisting of a Doric basement, supporting, on its four fronts, porticos of the Ionic order, taken from the example of the Eretheum at Athens. In the centre of the building rises a tower above the roof, to the height of 30 feet; the superstructure of which is after the order of the Choragic Monument of Lysicrates at Athens. The various chambers, halls and porticos are arched throughout. The rafters of the roof are of wrought iron, having a span of the whole width of the building, being supported by the interior walls at the north end, and by the columns of the southern division of the building, the whole covered by thick sheets of copper. In plan the basement story is intersected by longitudinal and transverse halls of wide dimensions, to the right of and left of which large and commodious rooms are to be appropriated to the uses of the governor, supreme court, secretary of state, federal court, etc. The crypt, or cellar story, in part, is to be used as a depository of arms. From the great central hall, you approach the principal story by a double flight of stairs, which leads to the chambers of the senate and house of representatives, to the library, and to the other rooms in connection therewith. The committee-rooms of the house are disposed on the same floor, to the right and left, communicating immediately with it and the lobbies; over these rooms the galleries are placed. Flanking the public hall, private stairways are constructed, leading from the crypt to the various stories, and to the roof. A geometrical stairway leads from the level of the roof to the tower, where you land upon an arched platform, which is intended for an observatory. The tower is built up from the foundation of solid stone, containing four niches in the basement and eight in the principal story, with spacious halls leading to the right and left. The principal stairway, which is thirty feet in width, leads from the centre of the building to the hall of representatives, senate chamber and library. The hall of representatives contains sixteen fluted columns of the Roman Ionic order, two feet eight inches in diameter, and twenty-one feet ten inches in height, from the level of the galleries over the committee-rooms. The shafts of these columns are all in one piece. A chief beauty and convenience in the design of the principal story—so much superior to the plan of the Capitol at Washington—is, that the committee-rooms are on the same plan with, and surrounding the hall of representatives; the dimensions of this room are 100 feet by 70—height of ceiling from floor, 40 feet. The forum of the house of representatives consists of a semi-circular platform three feet in height, forming three steps, upon which there is a screen of East Tennessee variegated marble, thirteen feet in height, twelve feet wide, and one foot in thickness; on the top of which is a cornice and blocking course, surmounted by an eagle resting upon a shield of cast iron, bronzed and gilt. One foot from each end of the screen on a die of black marble, the Roman fasces are placed, which are of beautiful variegated East Tennessee marble, one foot two inches in diameter and ten feet in height. The senate chamber is of an oblong form, thirty-five by seventy feet, having pilasters of the Ionic order with a full entablature; the ceiling of this room is formed into radiating panel, or lacunaria, and is forty-three feet in height. There is a gallery of twelve feet

A PRAYER WHEEL AT CASHMERE, INDIA.

The north and south porticos are finished with pediments containing ceilings of stone, and the east and west porticos are surmounted by parapets; those of the north and south are octo-style, and those of the east and west hexastyle. The columns of the principal story rest upon bases six feet square. The water is conveyed from the gutters of the roof by means of cast iron pipes, eight inches in diameter, buried in the walls. The glass, which is of double thickness, is of a superior quality, and was made at the works near Knoxville, East Tennessee; indeed, all the materials are furnished by the State of Tennessee. The building is heated with furnaces communicating with hot air flues within the walls.

A REMARKABLE MAN.

Our city contains one of the most remarkable men that we have seen for a long time. He is over 104 years of age, and his mind does not appear to be the least impaired, as he converses freely upon different subjects—more especially of our Revolution—in which he figured extensively. His name is John Shenandoah O'Brien. He is half Indian, large and well proportioned, possessed of a robust and powerful constitution. He participated in the battles of Brandywine, York, Trenton and Germantown; and in the former he received a severe bayonet wound, the marks of which are visible on his breast. The united tribes of Stockbridge and Brothertown were led by him to the field under the command of Gen. Brown.—Wilmington Republican.

THE STATE CAPITOL, AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

in width on three sides of the room, supported by twelve columns of variegated East Tennessee marble, with white capitals and black bases from the Eretheum. The forum in this room consists of a platform of two steps; the appealers' and clerks' desks are of fine East Tennessee marble. The library is immediately opposite the senate, and is 35 by 35 feet; on each side there are committee-rooms communicating. Over the arches of these rooms are alcoves for books, papers and archives of the State; the doors and windows, which are of a large size, are all of solid white oak, moulded, panelled and ornamented with devices; the windows are all double, divided by stone pilasters, enriched with consoles, ovolo and spears. All the floors are groin-arched and flagged with rubbed stone; hanging stone steps throughout the building. The building stands upon a rusticated basement eighty-two feet in height, which is tooled on all fronts, and the superstructure is of rubbed stone inside and out; all the walls of the foundations are seven feet in thickness, and those of the superstructure, four feet six inches. The building is in the form of a parallelogram, 140 feet by 270, surrounded by a terrace 17 feet in width and 6 feet in height, flagged with stone, with flights of steps in the centre of each front opposite the doors of entrance. There are 28 fluted columns, four feet eight inches in diameter, ornamenting the four porticos with the most elaborately wrought capitals.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. } Vol. XII., No. 24.—Whole No. 3120
6 CENTS SINGLE

CORNER OF WASHINGTON AND SUMMER STREETS.

The local view upon this page, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Winslow Homer, a promising young artist of this city, is exceedingly faithful in architectural detail and spirited in character, and represents one of the busiest and most brilliant spots in all Boston. The sketch is made from the north sidewalk of Winter Street. The most prominent building in the view is the large stone structure at the corner of Washington and Summer Streets, the lower story of which is occupied by the magnificent jewelry establishment of Messrs. Jones, Shreve, Brown & Co., and which vies in splendor and attraction with similar magazines in New York, London or Paris. This is always an attractive spot, and you can scarcely pass it any hour of the day without finding loiterers at the windows, with bright eyes gazing on the kindred diamonds, or scanning the superb plate, watches and rings there displayed in dazzling profusion. Within, the elegant arrangements, the spacious counters, the lofty groined ceiling and all the appointments harmonize well with the character of the business. Opposite this establishment is that of Orlando Tompkins, apothecary, which has recently been refitted and renovated in the style of the Renaissance, with carving, gilding, fresco-painting, mirrors, marble, etc., in the most approved style of luxury. We merely show the corner of this store. The name of George Turnbull appears upon the awning in front of his store, No. 3 and 7 Winter Street, which projected within our artist's field of vision. Turnbull's is another noted Boston establishment, and a fine specimen of the retail dry goods store. It is a favorite resort of ladies, who are attracted by the complete assortment of goods always found there, and the politeness and attention with which their wants are supplied. Mr. Turnbull enjoys an enviable reputation, and conducts a very extensive business. The figures introduced in our sketch, give a good idea of the character and hustle of this part of the city in the busiest part of the day. Here we have a carriage dashing up at rather an illegal rate of speed which might endanger the lady at the crossing, but for the gentlemanly policeman who is stationed here to ensure the safety of pedestrians and moderate the ardor of charioteers, and who steps forward to lend his assistance and interpose his potential authority. In another place we have an itinerant Italian with his organ, on the summit of which resides habitually a painful caricature of humanity in the guise of a monkey, attired in shabby habiliments, whose chief offices are to bold his hat for money and amuse the juveniles with his antic capers. Promenaders of both sexes, and pedestrians of all ages, complete the lively picture. At this point, Washington Street presents many of the characteristics of Broadway, New York. In the human tide that pours through it there is nearly the same diversity of feature and origin, and the amount of passing is perhaps larger in proportion to the size of the city, crowding the sidewalks full.

CORNER OF WINTER, WASHINGTON AND SUMMER STREETS, BOSTON.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN:

—OR—

THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONCLUDED.]

CHAPTER XXVI.—[CONTINUED.]

Redding having been sworn, said that on the evening of his supposed murder, Gilbert Falkland sent him to Jeduthun the Jew's, for the purpose of paying one hundred pounds, for which the Jew held Falkland's bond.

"As I was passing a little blind court adjoining the Jew's buildings," he went on to say, "I heard some one say, in a low voice: 'That must be our man, Corkle.' This, the place being dark and lonely, somewhat startled me, as I thought he might mean me. I quickened my steps, and the next minute I reached the shop door. To my dismay, I found that it was locked, though I could see through the chinks of the shutters that a light was still burning. I gave several loud raps at the door, when I was seized by the arm, and pulled off the steps. I struggled to free myself, and at the same time cried loudly for help, for I found that I had more than one to contend with.

"Be quick, Skellum, and stop his noise," cried some one who was at a little distance, or the old Jew will be out of his den to find out the cause of the fray."

"That was the last I heard. The instant he ceased speaking, it seemed to me as if a blow, or some heavy weight, crushed me to the earth, when, for a single moment, thousands of stars appeared to be dancing before my eyes. From that time, for more than two weeks, all was a blank to me, except that at one time I have a dim recollection of feeling cold and weak, and of going towards something which I took to be the fire on the hearth of my master's lodgings."

This statement, instead of being invalidated by a strict cross-examination of the witness, and by the testimony of the different members of the family who had acted towards him the part of the good Samaritan, was more fully substantiated, and rendered more consistent.

The corner of the velvet doublet which had been found in the court by those who arrested the Jew, and which had been sworn to by Falkland as being of the same color and material as that worn by his valet the evening he sent him to the Jew's, was produced, and was found, on comparing it, to exactly supply what was missing of the one Redding had on. Yet still there was one circumstance which it was difficult to account for. As Redding steadily persisted in denying that he entered the shop, or any part of the building, how Falkland's bond came to be in the place where the Jew admitted he had found it, remained a mystery still to be explained. Till it could be, the counsel for the prosecution objected to the release of the prisoner. The assassins, he maintained, might have been employed by him for the purpose of obtaining it. The greed of gain, supposed to be common to his race, justified him in making this assertion.

At this crisis, an honest-looking yeoman, who had entered the court-room just as the question of the bond was brought up, and whom Harleigh recognized as Hendrick Dykes, made his way towards the counsel's benches, and requested to be sworn as a witness.

"I think," said he, when his request had been complied with, "that what I have to say may throw some light on the point in question. Late in the evening of the seventeenth day of last month, I started from home with a load of country produce, and arrived in the city before daybreak. I went to the stable where I commonly go, and waking the hostler, had my horses taken care of. As there wasn't room for my wagon under cover, I didn't like to leave it, so I crept under the straw in the back part of the wagon, close to a couple of barrels in which were packed a nice lot of cheese I had brought for sale, and was beginning to be a little drowsy, when I heard voices close by. I was wide awake in an instant, for I didn't know but some thieves had strolled that way, and would be helping themselves to some of my cheese. I kept still as a mouse, and listened to what they said.

"It was lucky," said one of them, 'that he got the bond, when he went to the old Jew's yesterday morning.'

"Why so?" said another voice.

"Don't you see that it will be proof right to the point?" said he who had first spoken.

"Yes, I see now, and I rather think that if Jeduthun had known how it was going to burn his own fingers, he would 'ave let it be where it was, instead of pickin' it up," said the other."

"Was the name of the person mentioned, who was referred to, as obtaining possession of the bond?" was here asked by the counsel for the defence.

Harleigh and Elliston both looked at Falkland, when this question was asked, and saw that a look of intense agony swept over his face, which at the same moment grew pale as death, while his dilated eyes were fastened on the witness. So perfect was the stillness reigning throughout the crowded assembly, it seemed that not only he but all present must have held their breath, that they might the better hear the answer. But the witness had not understood the question, and it had to be repeated. The delay was not more than half a minute's duration, but to Falkland, the horror crowded into that half minute was enough to embitter a life-time.

When the answer of Hendrick came clear and distinct, "It was not," it was well for Falkland that he stood wedged in, among so dense a crowd, as otherwise, so great and sudden was the revulsion of his feelings, that he must have fallen.

"Did they call each other by name?" was the next question which was asked of Hendrick.

"I heard one of them call the other by name," was his answer. "Do you remember what it was?"

"Yes; it was Skellum."

"You are quite sure that you didn't hear the name of him they said had got the bond?"

"I am. When once I hear a name, I seldom forget it."

Other and relevant questions were asked him by the counsel on both sides, which served to make good what he had already testified.

Corkle and his two guilty confederates were conveyed from the court-house to Newgate, their employer remaining still unsuspected; while the Jew, conducted to his own home by Harleigh and Elliston, found Abi, Alice and Mrs. Selwyn to welcome him. Asenath and Mizar were also there, the same testimony which proved their master's innocence having shown them to be guiltless.

CHAPTER XXVII.

CORKLE IN HIS CELL AT NEWGATE.

"CAN I see one of the prisoners a short time?" asked a man, of the Newgate turnkey.

"Which one?" he inquired, endeavoring to get a peep at the man's face, which was nearly concealed by the broad, slouched brim of his steeple-crowned hat.

"A man by the name of Corkle," was the answer to the turnkey's question.

"You can't see him."

"I must."

"It is already past the hour for closing the outer doors of the prison. If you are a relation, or a particular friend of his, if you will come in the morning an hour before the court opens, you may see him."

"I must see him to-night," and to give weight to what he said, he put gold into the turnkey's hand.

"This shows you to be in earnest," said he, pocketing the gold.

"Follow me, and keep silent."

Entering a corridor lined with cells on either side, he did not stop till he had reached the further extremity, when, with great caution, so as not to be heard by the prisoners near, he unlocked the door of the right-hand cell.

"Enter," said he, in a whisper, and stepping back, so that the man could pass him. "To half an hour, I will come and let you out."

"Half an hour is a short time. Let it be three quarters."

"Well—fifteen minutes isn't much, one way or the other."

Having entered the cell, he waited to hear the key turn in the lock, and then removed the slouched hat from his head.

"Falkland!" exclaimed the prisoner; "what sent you here?"

"I have come to see if I can do anything to befriend you."

"Well, you can't, and so might have spared yourself the pains."

"Don't be too sure. Doesn't that window open on to the street?"

"And what if it does?"

"Why, it may afford you the means of escape."

"Yes, if I could squeeze myself through the two-inch space between the iron bars that cross it."

"The bars may be removed with the proper implements."

"But how are they to be obtained?"

"I will furnish you with them."

"Did you bring them with you?" said Corkle, eagerly.

"No. As your trial is to take place to-morrow, there would be no chance for you to use them, and it might be difficult to conceal them."

"Why didn't you bring them before? I might have been free now."

"There was caution to be used in procuring them. It couldn't be done in an hour, nor a day, either. I succeeded at last, and have them safe. You, of course, have never mixed my name up with the affair that has proved so unfortunate to you and me, in the hearing of Skellum and the other one?"

"No. Do you suppose I'm a fool?"

"Well, then, I will furnish you with the means of escape, on certain conditions."

"Let me hear them."

"You must bind yourself by a solemn oath to keep secret all that has passed between you and me, concerning the matter, let what will happen."

"I won't degrade myself by doing any such thing. I'll give you my word on the honor of a gentleman that I won't—that is, if you'll help me to escape."

A sneering smile slightly curled the lips of Falkland.

"Do you dare answer me with a sneer?"

The question was accompanied by a look of ferocity, which made Falkland quail.

"Sneer at you? No, my dear Corkle," he hastened to say. "What made you think of such a thing?"

"Maybe I'm more suspicious than I used to be. Being shut up in a cell, with a gibbet staring me in the face every time I close my eyes—for whenever I do, the hideous thing seems actually before me—don't make a man feel very amiable."

"A gibbet? Why should that stare you in the face? It won't be so bad as that."

"You think it won't?"

"I know so."

"Then I shall have time to make my escape at my leisure. I shall need none of your help."

"But the means?"

"I'll have none of your furnishing. And remember that you are to have your pay for that sneer, let the price be ever so high."

"You are beside yourself. You don't know what you are saying."

"I shall know, when I proclaim to the world what a double-dyed villain Gil Falkland is."

"You'll think better of what you say, when your rage has had time to cool."

"You'll find yourself mistaken. As surely as you live, the world shall know it."

"There is one way to prevent it," and as he spoke, he drew forth a poignard which had been concealed about his person.

The quick eye of Corkle caught the gleam of the shining steel aimed at his breast, in season to wrench it from his hand. The next moment, Falkland lay at his feet, with the poignard sheathed in his heart.

"The evil one tempted us both," he muttered to himself, as he removed to that part of his cell the most remote from him who had so suddenly and unexpectedly met his doom. He turned his face to the wall, to prevent looking at him, for, as if by the power of some secret fascination, he could by no other means prevent fixing his eyes on the face which every moment grew more pale and ghastly.

The deep silence of his cell, for ten or fifteen minutes, remained unbroken, except that now and then a nervous motion of the prisoner caused a faint clank of his iron fetters. Then the door was unlocked, and held a little ajar.

"Come," said the turnkey; "the time is up you were to stay. But how is this, Corkle?" he added, seeing Falkland extended on the floor. "Has your friend gone to sleep?"

"Yes, and won't wake very soon, I'm thinking."

"Then I must wake him. It won't do for him to stay here any longer."

He stepped into the cell, and then saw that he lay weltering in his own blood.

"Who did this?" said he.

"The deed lies between him and me, I suppose," said Corkle, sullenly.

He would 'ave hardly taken the pains to come here to take his own life."

"Well, I'm in no humor to answer questions to-night. I've been kept awake by the fool's prating, when I should rather have been asleep, and as you let him in where he wasn't desired, I shall be glad now if you will take him away."

"It has turned out to be a bad piece of business, and will cost me my place, I'm afraid."

We will, however, leave this to be settled by the proper authorities, as well as the fate of Corkle and his two accomplices, who, even more than he, by a long series of crimes, had themselves to be "careless, reckless and fearless of what was past, present, or to come."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

FLOWERS FOR THE BRIDAL.

MORE than a year had passed since the events recorded in the foregoing chapters. Mildred Dacres, finding that she was shunned by Harleigh, after his release from the Tower, soon left the city. No one seemed to know where she was, though it was rumored that she had gone to Italy.

It was a balmy, delicious morning, early in June. A lady, who, for some time, had been sitting in a thoughtless attitude near an open window of a cottage, nestled among flowers and shrubbery, and situated within a short distance of the great metropolis, suddenly roused herself, and looked up with a smile, as a young and very pretty girl entered the room.

"So you have just returned, Nina? Have you had a pleasant ride?"

"Very pleasant, madam."

"Did you see your young friend who lives with Mrs. Selwyn?"

"I did."

"What did she tell you?"

"That what I heard yesterday is true. Clarence Harleigh, Mrs. Selwyn's brother, is to be married this evening."

"You heard the name of the bride elect?"

"Yes—Alice Dale."

"I have heard of her. She was formerly in the family of a Mrs. Elliston."

"She is there still—so my friend Julia told me."

"That will do, Nina," said the lady, with a smile, and the girl turned to leave the room. "Stay one moment," added the lady. "You said, when I told you I wished you to go to the city, that before long you would like to make your sister a visit."

"It will give me great pleasure to visit her, whenever you can spare me."

"Go now, then, and stay till to-morrow morning, if you choose."

"You are very kind."

A smile still more radiant than before lighted up the lady's countenance, and Nina, with a light heart, withdrew to prepare for the proposed visit to her sister. The lady did not move from the window where she was sitting, till Nina, who was soon ready, left the house, and was out of sight. She then rose and went into the garden, where roses, red and white, were beginning to bloom. Having selected some buds of the white rose, a few of which had just commenced to unfold, she threw them into a small basket, and then hastily gathering some flowers of different kinds, she placed them in such a manner as to entirely conceal the rosebuds.

When she returned to the house, she went directly to her chamber, and having locked herself in, she took the rosebuds from the basket, arranged them, and tied them together with a silver ribbon. She then unfastened a private drawer of her dressing-table, and took from thence a small square box. Pressing a spring, which would have been unnoticed by one not in the secret, the lid flew open and disclosed several tiny vials, all of which were filled with some liquid, each with that of a different color, and carefully sealed. Having closely muffled her face, she selected from among the vials one whose contents were clear and colorless as dew. This she carefully unsealed, and poured a few drops of the pellucid liquid into the heart of each of the roses which had begun to unfold. Her hand was not quite steady, and ere she had accomplished her task, some noise caused her to start and look round. She smiled and murmured half audibly:

"How foolish I am! It was only one of those ravens whirring by, I saw on the dead ash just now."

She might have deemed it a sound of ill omen had she known that, at the moment she was startled by it, a heavy drop of the subtle poison fell from the vial on a rose which, with some other flowers, Nina had, by her direction, placed in an agate vase that stood on the table.

"There's a double portion of dew on them now," said she, to herself, as she deposited the flowers she had prepared in a box of beautifully carved ivory. Having done this, she wrote in a disguised hand, on a slip of paper:

"A bridal gift for Alice Dale. 'Sweets to the sweet.'"

A few hours later, she was in the city of London, attended by a foreign servant, who neither spoke nor understood any language, except his native Italian.

In deference to the wishes of Mrs. Elliston, the marriage of Clarence Harleigh and Alice Dale was to take place at her house, and the ceremony was to be performed in the plain, simple manner suited to the religious faith of the sect to which she belonged.

She had fully recovered from the effects of the accident which had so nearly proved fatal to her, and what was better, it had been to her like the refiner's fire. She was no longer intolerant towards those who differed from her in opinion, as was shown by a letter she wrote Mr. Walworth, her brother, in which she pleaded so eloquently for Harleigh, as to overcome his lingering prejudices against him, on account of his belonging to the established church, and as he imagined, his too aristocratic notions, and likewise succeeded in gaining his consent for his marriage with Alice, prior to the accomplishment of the two probationary years.

A still greater evidence that she was no longer the bigoted, illiberal, unforgiving woman she had been, was her willingness to receive Abi Rushton as her daughter-in-law. She knew not, at the time, who the ministering angel was who so constantly hovered round her pillow; but whoever it was, she felt that her heart had found a home, such as it never had found until then, since the lovely and beloved daughter had been taken away, and laid beneath the green turf.

The guests were assembled, and Abi had just finished twining the bridal wreath, with the rich brown tresses of Alice, when there came several quick, sharp raps at the door.

"For the bride," said some one who stood in the shade of the portico, and who quickly turned away after handing something to the servant who had opened the door.

"Here is something for the bride," said he, to Mrs. Elliston, who ordered it to be sent to Alice.

Abi undid the cord of blue and white floss bound round it, and removed the envelope.

"How beautiful!" she exclaimed, as a box of pure white ivory, delicately and elaborately carved, was disclosed to view.

They bent over it, and read what was written on the slip of paper glued to the cover of the box.

"'Sweets to the sweet,' it says," said Abi. "The writer must be some one who knows you. Shall I remove the cover?"

"Yes. We must see what it is."

"A gift delicate and lovely as theasket which contains it."

"See," said Alice; "the morning dew is still sparkling in the heart of these half-blown roses."

"They are just what are needed," said Abi; "for though Mrs. Elliston requested you to wear no jewelry, she cannot object to your wearing these."

They were soon arranged amid the snowy folds of the lace kerchief worn by Alice, which was of a texture so fine and delicate, as to make it of a price many times greater than its weight in gold. Word had already been sent them that all was ready.

The Jew, who had been hidden to the wedding, was standing in the doorway of the room contiguous to that where the ceremony was to be performed, and where Harleigh, Elliston, and others, were awaiting the bride.

"Whence comes this sickening and deathly odor?" exclaimed the Jew, as he stepped back for Alice and Abi to enter.

"What is it?" said Harleigh, coming quickly forward.

"There is a subtle and deadly poison somewhere near," replied the Jew.

"It is nothing but the perfume of these roses," said Abi.

"Where? What roses?" he asked.

"These," and she pointed to those worn by Alice.

"They are poisoned," said he, as he tore them from the bosom of the frightened bride.

Harleigh snatched them from his hand, and in the almost frantic terror of the moment, threw them from a window.

"How is it, Alice?" said he. "Speak and tell me they haven't had time to do you harm."

"I'm a little faint," she replied, attempting to smile.

"Look!" said Edward Elliston, aside to the Jew. "Her lips are as white as snow."

"Is there nothing which can save her?" exclaimed Harleigh, as he took her in his arms and bore her to a couch.

"I know of an antidote; I have it at home, but it cannot be obtained in time. I fear the hand of death is already upon her," said the Jew.

"If you mean the perfume such as you gave me," said Abi, "I have some here." And she drew a little gold box from her pocket, in shape resembling the ringette in use at the present day.

"That is it. Take courage. It is still more subtle than the poison, and will soon pervade the whole system;" and he held the pleasant though pungent perfume so that Alice could inhale it.

There was a minute of harassing doubt, scarcely relieved by hope. Then her color began to return, and the sluggish, almost frozen pulse to resume its natural, healthful beat. A few moments more, and all danger was past. The Jew handed the perfume to Abi.

"Make use of it," said he. "You, too, have been endangered."

They did not see, during all this time, a pale, haggard face pressed against one of the window-panes, nor the cold, glittering eyes which were watching them. Even if they had, they would not, in their wild terror and intense excitation, have given the circumstance a single thought.

It was not till they knew that the terrible danger was past, that some one asked what had become of the poisoned flowers. No one knew. Harleigh, too much agitated to know what he did when he threw them from the window, had no recollection of the circumstance. The servant who had received at the door what had so nearly proved a fatal gift, entering the room as the inquiries were being made, said that he saw Mr. Harleigh throw them from the window.

"They mustn't remain there," said the Jew. "If they do, more than one life may be lost by means of them."

Edward Elliston, having called for a lantern, went in search of them. As he held the light close to the ground, its rays fell on some object which, it appeared to him, was a human form, lying under the window next to the one where he was searching for the flowers. Approaching it, he found it was a woman. He called for help, and when he had assisted to carry her into the house, Harleigh and Alice saw that it was Mildred Dacres.

"She appears to be dead," said Harleigh. "Is it possible that she found the poisoned flowers?"

"There was no need that she should find them, to produce the effect you see," remarked the Jew. "I can perceive that the same deadly effluvia emanates from the flowers entangled in such a manner with the breast-knot she wears, as to make it seem probable that she made an effort to tear them thence, as I detected in these."

"Is there no spark of life remaining?" said Alice, as she looked on the livid features. "Wont the same remedy revive her which saved me?"

"It can be attempted," said the Jew, "though I think it is too late."

In a short time after applying it, a slight, convulsive movement was perceptible, causing a mantle she had on to slip aside, which would have fallen to the floor, had not a corner of it been wound round her hand. Harleigh, who stood near, removed the mantle, when it was seen that her hand was closed over the flowers which had been thrown from the window, with so firm and rigid a grasp as to crush them. An attempt to remove them awakened her to a degree of consciousness.

"No—no," she murmured. "They are flowers for the bridal. I lost them somehow, but I shall keep them safe now, till I can give them into the bride's own hand."

"Can it be that it was she who sent the flowers?" said Edward Elliston.

"It must have been," replied Harleigh, "and

"—The foul practice
Hath turned itself on her."

She recognized his voice.

Clarence Harleigh, said she, "there was one who stood between you and me, but she is out of the way now. Don't try to find how it came about. It will never come to light. Stay—don't go yet. In a minute I'll be ready to go with you."

As she spoke, with a sudden effort she raised herself from her recumbent posture, threw out her arms in a wild, impassioned manner, as if she wished to prevent some one's departure, fell back, and immediately expired.

"Had she remained quiet, her life might possibly have been saved," said the Jew, "but after her unconscious confession, we could hardly wish it to be otherwise than it is. As for me, it is enough that the secret which, many years ago, I learned from an Italian chemist, and which I have ever carefully guarded, lest it should by some evil-minded person be turned to some bad purpose, has saved the life of one whose presence we believe will be a joy and a blessing to us all."

After what had taken place, all thoughts of the intended wedding was for that evening abandoned. When, in a week afterward, the guests re-assembled, it was not alone to witness the bridal of Harleigh and Alice, for ere they returned to their own homes, Edward Elliston and Abi Rushton had likewise received the nuptial benediction.

A few months from this time, Harleigh and his youthful bride visited the home of her childhood. It was the evening after their arrival, and the air, keen and frosty without, causing the earnest snow to sparkle in the beams of the full moon, as if strewn with thousands of diamonds, was tempered within the ample parlor of the Walworth farm-house, to a kind of festive mellowness not easy to describe; nor will any one, who has helped to form the circle round a bright wood-fire in one of the huge fire-places of the olden time, need any other description than what memory will supply.

It seemed to Alice that elfin fingers must have been busy with her former guardian's face—here snatching away some stern and rigid line—and there, softly giving it a little dash of sunshine. It was certain that he had seldom, or never before, so fully given himself up to that social enjoyment which develops the better and the more kindly feelings of our nature, since, by a mistake common to the enthusiasts of his time, he had, in his own mind, confounded even the pure and innocent pleasures of the home-circle with those which he considered vain and sinful. But an iceberg cannot resist the constant and genial influences of the sun, and his artificial coldness and austerity had gradually yielded to the gentle and benign influences of her who presided over his household.

"You don't know who Aunt Jane is, do you?" said Ella, who, as in former days, had taken a seat by the side of Alice.

"No, dear," she replied. "Who is she?"

"Uncle Gabriel's wife. You know he taught my brothers and me to call him uncle."

"And we like to, now," said Benjamin. "He don't seem so strange as he used to."

"Gabriel," said Mrs. Walworth, "has been married to the good-natured, laughing Jane Lovering, more than a year, and being strong and healthy, she makes nothing of spinning and weaving the fleeces of his flock," which he once, on a certain occasion, alluded to, and of managing a large dairy to his entire satisfaction."

"And what," inquired Clarence Harleigh, "does he think of the prediction of the weird woman, and the wonderful vision that followed?"

"That it was a delusion of Satan. He rejoices at having escaped the snare, and at the same time, expresses his wonder how such a little childish thing as Alice could ever have filled his eye."

"I guess Aunt Jane's face fills his eye," said Benjamin, "for it is as big and as round as the full moon."

"My son," said his father, reprovingly, though a smile could be seen lurking in his eye, "you mustn't suffer yourself to exaggerate when you make comparisons."

"For my part, I think it is nothing but the simple and candid truth," said Silas Watkins, who, hitherto, had been a silent partaker of the social enjoyment, and who continued to think that if ever there was an angel on earth, it was Alice.

THE END.

[Back numbers of Ballo's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

THE RUSSIAN KNOT.

There is scarcely a book of Russian travels you can open—English, French, or German,—without a chapter bearing this special heading, the knot, and in nine cases out of ten the description of the punishment is taken from the old wonderful magazine account of Madame Lapoukhin, who suffered in the reign of the Empress Ann Elizabeth, or from some of the Faubourg St. Denis travelers. The Russians use the stick, the whip, and the rod, freely enough, heaven knows; but the extreme agony of the knot, they are exceedingly chary in having recourse to. There was not one criminal knotted during my stay—at least, in the capitals (for the imminence of the ultimo ratio is always made public a week beforehand in all the newspapers), though I dare say some dozens, males and females, were daily beaten, cruelly but not dangerously, in the police-yards. The infliction of the knot in cases of murder (brigands and female criminals, who, the latter, only receive from five to twenty strokes, are allowed to survive), amounting to one hundred and fifty lashes of that terrible instrument, is almost always fatal; indeed I have often heard Russians, whose humane dispositions I have had no reason to doubt, say that the police-surgeons had, generally, instructions not to attempt to cure the criminals after their torture. It is not the actual knot that kills, but the gangrene that supervenes in the neglected wounds. The old assertion, that a skillful executioner can kill his patient with three strokes of the knot, is a pure fable.—G. A. Sala.

PATERNAL DUTY.

The father who plunges into business so deeply that he has no leisure for domestic duties and pleasures, and whose only intercourse with his children consists in a brief word of authority, or a surly lamentation over their intolerable expensiveness, is equally to be pitied and to be blamed. What right has he to devote to other pursuits the time which God has allotted to his children? Nor is it an excuse to say that he cannot support his family in their style of living without this effort. I ask by what right can his family demand to live in a manner which requires him to neglect his most solemn and important duties? Nor is it an excuse to say that he wishes to leave them that competence which he desires. Is it an advantage to be relieved from the necessity of labor? Besides, is money the only desirable bequest which a father can leave to his children? Surely well-cultivated intellects, hearts sensible of domestic affection, the love of parents and brethren and sisters, a taste for home pleasures, habits of order, regularity and industry, hatred of vice and vicious men, and a lively sensibility to the excellence of virtue, are as valuable a legacy as an inheritance of property—simple property, purchased by the loss of every habit which could render that property a blessing.—Wayland's Moral Science.

MOTHERS.

By the quiet fireside of home, the true mother, in the midst of her children, is sowing, as in vases of earth, the seeds of plants that shall sometime give to Heaven the fragrance of their blossoms, and whose fruit be a rosary of angelic deeds—the noblest offering that she can make through the ever ascending and ever expanding souls of her children to her Maker. Every word that she utters goes from heart to heart with a power of which she little dreams. Solemn is the thought, but not more solemn to the Christian mother than the thought that every word that falls from her lips, every expression of her countenance, even in the sheltered walk and retirement, may leave an indelible impression upon the young souls around her, and form, as it were, the underlying strain of that education which peoples heaven with that celestial being, and gives to the white robe of the angel, next to the grace of God, its crown of glory.—Traveller.

AFRICANS AND ASIATICS.

We have, from time to time, presented our readers with illustrations of the scenery and people of the East, and the success of these views has induced us to publish another series which occupies this and the next page of the Pictorial. For the use of these fine and spirited engravings, we are indebted to Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., of New York city. They are specimens of the liberal illustrations which embellish one of their recent popular publications: "The Americans in Japan; an abridgement of the government narrative of the United States Expedition to Japan, under Commodore Perry. By Robert Tomes." This work, notwithstanding its elegance and importance, is sold at a moderate price, and hence it will be disseminated broadcast over the United States. It contains a clear and well-written account of Commodore Perry's voyage, and of all his diplomatic proceedings. We propose to cull from its pages such information as relates to the engravings in our present number. Four of the pictures delineate inhabitants of South Africa, which Commodore Perry visited on his way to the East. These portraits are a Caffre chief, with his singular head-dress; a Fingo woman; Soyola, an African chief, and his wife, the two latter favorable specimens of the black races. The Cape of Good Hope is of great commercial importance to Great Britain as a convenient rendezvous for her cruisers stationed in the neighborhood, and as a stopping-place for vessels bound to and from the Indian Ocean. Excellent water, fresh provisions, fruit, and other necessities, can be obtained in any quantity and at reasonable prices. Wood, however, is scarce, but almost every other article usually needed by vessels may be procured from the numerous well-stocked shops and warehouses at Cape Town. Since the abolition of slavery in the British colonies, the agricultural interests of the Cape have suffered, and although the commerce of some few of the ports continues thriving, the interior of the country has declined in prosperity, there being at present but few examples of successful farming in consequence of the scarcity of laborers. The country has also suffered from the effects of the war carried on between the British colonists and the Caffres, which, species, which are highly prized for the excellence of the meat. The long teams of oxen passing in and out of the city are characteristic objects at Cape Town. These teams are composed often of seven, eight, or even nine yoke, and are guided by two teamsters, one seated in front of the wagon, not unlike what is used in Pennsylvania, where he urges the animals along by his voice and a long whip, while the other man precedes the team, holding a halter fastened to the horns of the two leaders, with which he guides them. When the journey is a long one, the teamsters generally accompany the oxen on horseback. Commodore Perry, accompanied by some of his officers, took occasion to visit one of the celebrated vineyards of Constantia, having provided himself with an open carriage drawn by four beautiful stallions, and driven by a negro boy, who proved himself a very skillful Jehu. The drive was through a picturesque country, with pretty villas scattered about, which were approached by wide avenues bordered by oaks and firs. These trees are raised from the seed, and are generally cultivated in the colony for fuel and ornamental purposes. Substantial hedges are also formed of the young oak raised from the acorn. The Constantia vineyard was of no great extent, and the culture was of a character that was somewhat disappointing. The proprietor accounted for the inferior condition of his vineyard on the score of his being unable to provide himself with the necessary number of laborers. He said, in fact, that he would have been obliged to abandon the cultivation of the grape altogether had he not obtained an American "cultivator," that he had recently imported from the United States, which simple plough, as he stated, drawn by a single horse, accomplished as much as the labor of fifty men according to the usual method of cultivating the vine with a hoe. The grape is grown at Constantia, as in Sicily, by trimming the vine near to the ground, and not allowing it to reach a height beyond that of a gooseberry bush. The richness of flavor of the wine, which is much extolled, is supposed to be dependent upon the condition of the grape when it goes to the press.

A JAPANESE COOPERING ESTABLISHMENT.

Although it begins to ripen in the early part of February, it is not gathered until the middle of March, when the fruit has assumed almost the appearance of the dry raisin, in which condition it is pressed. The prices of Constantia wine vary from two to six dollars a gallon, according to its quality. The population of Cape Colony, according to a census taken in 1848, was 200,548. Of these, 76,287 whites, and 101,176 colored, make up the whole number of inhabitants of the various parts of the colony, with the exception of Cape Town, which contains a mixed population of 22,543. There are but few of the aboriginal Hottentots of pure race to be found, as their blood has been intermingled with that of the Dutch, the Negro and the Malay. The first European discoverer of the southern promontory of Africa found it tolerably well peopled, and the natives, in some respects, in a better condition than many of the more northern tribes. They were in possession of herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, and led a pastoral life. They were a comparatively happy people, and, being divided into tribes under a patriarchal government, wandered about with their flocks and herds from pasture to pasture, carrying their huts, constructed of boughs and poles, upon the backs of oxen. These tribes, however, have been mostly exterminated by the cruelty of the Europeans. A wretched remnant, however, still survive, and living as miserable outcasts in the forests and the fastnesses of the desert, are known as Bushmen. They are still savage in character, and disgusting in their habits and persons. They have received, it must be confessed, but little benefit from the boasted civilization of their white conquerors. "We, however, as Americans," remarks Commodore Perry, "have no right to rail at other nations for the wrongs they have inflicted upon the aborigines of countries seized upon by them; for, though hardly equal to the English in the disgusting hypocrisy with which they excuse their acts, we are not far behind them in the frauds and cruelties committed upon our native tribes." The warlike Caffres still retain their characteristic wildness, and pursue their predatory life. They are in many respects superior to the ordinary African, and have some of the peculiarities of the Egyptian races. They are of a greater height and strength than the inferior negro; their color is lighter, and though their hair is black and woolly, they have fuller beards. Their noses are more prominent, but they have the thick negro lip, and with the prominent cheek-bone of the Hottentots, they possess the high European forehead. The Fingoes, though traced in origin to some scattered tribes of the Caffres, differ from them in some degree, and although spirited and brave, are of a less savage nature, and have the character of being a comparatively good-natured people. The Fingoes, like the Caffres, are pastoral, but more given to the culture of the land, in which the men engage as well as the women, although this kind of labor is confined among the Caffres to the females alone. On the return of the commodore from Constantia, he stopped to pay a visit to a captive Fingo chief and his wife, whom the fortune of war had thrown into the hands of the Europeans. The chief was confined in a jail at a short distance from the town. The jailer unhesitatingly allowed the commodore to visit his prisoner. Soyola, for that was his name, was a remarkably fine-looking negro, of about twenty-five years of age. He had been accompanied to imprisonment by his favorite among his numerous wives, and his confidential lieutenant, who had also a similar companion to cheer his captivity. The women were no less remarkable for their good looks than their negro lords and masters. One of the artists of the expedition was admitted to a subsequent interview with the distinguished party of Fingoes, and secured likenesses of them. The war carried on by the English with the Hottentots and Caffres, which has continued so long, costing an immense amount of blood and treasure, is still prolonged by the obstinacy of the blacks. The whole frontier has already been devastated, and although there is some hope of peace, no one believes that any treaty that may be made will be respected by the negroes longer than may suit their convenience.

In the last battle, at the date of the visit of Commodore Perry, in which the English forces, headed by General Cathcart himself, were victorious, it was said that the Caffre chief brought into action six thousand foot and two thousand horse. These numbers are probably exaggerated, but it is well known that the negroes have acquired a tolerable organization, and that they are well supplied with arms and ammunition. They have hitherto had an abundance of provisions, obtained from their own herds, or from those stolen from the whites, but report says that, owing to the carelessness and waste always attendant upon the irregular warfare of savages, their supply of food is running short. The English declare that the Caffres have been instructed in the art of war by numerous deserters from the British army, and by a French missionary living among them, who passed his early life in the army.

JAPANESE MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

although it has enriched the merchants and tradesmen by the large expenditure of public money, has impoverished the farmers by depriving them of the necessary laborers and by unsettling the general tranquillity. The consequence has been that many of the farms have been allowed to run to waste, and although the soil is capable of producing Indian corn, wheat, barley, oats, and several other descriptions of grain, the home consumption of such articles is not fully supplied. There are, however, some wine, hides, tallow and wool exported. The farming is chiefly of a grazing character, and vast herds of cattle, sheep, horses and mules are raised. At Cape Town, horses can be bought for thirty to one hundred and fifty, and mules for thirty to seventy-five dollars. The cattle which are indigenous to the country, somewhat resemble the buffalo in appearance, and the sheep are of the broad-tailed

A TANKA BOAT-GIRL.

The principal white inhabitants of Cape Town are the government officials, army officers, merchants and tradesmen. The laboring class is composed of the mixed races—the Malays, Coolies, and negroes. The emancipated negroes and their descendants have not profited by their liberty to the extent hoped for, and are in general degraded and indolent, and are not captivated in appearance. They are perfectly independent of all restraint as long as they do not violate the laws. They work when it suits them, and at their own prices, and break off abruptly from their labor if spoken to in a manner which wounds in the least their sensitiveness.

AFRICAN CHIEF, SOYOLA.

WIFE OF SOYOLA.

A CAFFRE CHIEF.

Their ordinary charge for work is a dollar and a quarter for a day of ten hours. The Chinese woman and girl in the engraving below were sketched at Macao, the woman being the mistress of a Tanka boat. There is also another portrait of a Tanka boat-woman on the opposite page. The Chinese damsels, in gay costume, as they scull their light craft upon the surface of the bay, present a lively aspect, as seen from a distance from the verandas above the Praya, but they do not bear a closer examination. The last engraving on this page represents a Chinese barber-boy of Canton, with his implements of trade slung over his shoulders. The Chinese make very dexterous Figaros, and withal work very cheap. The ordinary compensation for all operatives in Canton, who find their food, varies from twelve to twenty cents a day. Farm hands, when fed, receive six cents for twelve hours' work, being at the rate of a farthing an hour. The day-laborers, chair-bearers, and porters, if not hired by the job, are paid from twenty to twenty-five cents. Boatmen's wages are from one and a half to two and a quarter dollars per month, when found, which latter condition generally includes food, not only for themselves, but for their wives and children, who live with them in the boat. Porters,

A CHINESE WOMAN AND CHILD.

and those of other crafts in Canton, form themselves into guilds, and appoint leaders, or headmen, who contract for labor of various sorts.—Many very curious customs have from time to time been given by travellers. Some very striking contrarieties in comparison with our own, are amusingly given in the following extract from a work published at Macao:—"On inquiring of the boatman in which direction Macao lay, I was answered in the west-north, the wind, as I was informed, being east-south. We do not say so in Europe, thought I; but imagine my surprise when, in explaining the utility of the compass, the boatman added that the needle pointed to the south. Wishing to change the subject, I remarked that I concluded he was about to proceed to some high festival and merry-making, as his dress was completely white. He told me, with a look of much dejection, that his only brother had died the week before, and that he was in the deepest mourning for him. On landing, the first object that attracted my notice was a military mandarin, who wore an embroidered petticoat, with a string of beads round his neck, and who, besides, carried a fan; it was with some dismay I observed him mount on the right side of his horse. On my way to the house, my attention was drawn to several old Chinese standing on stilts, some of whom had gray beards, and nearly all of them huge goggling spectacles; they were delightfully employed in flying paper kites, while a group of boys were looking on and regarding the innocent occupation of their seniors with serious and gratified attention. Desirous to see the literature of so curious a people, I looked in at a bookstore. The proprietor told me that the language had no alphabet, and I was somewhat astonished, on his opening a Chinese volume, to find him begin at what I had all my life previously considered the end of the book. He read the date of the publication, 'Fifth year, tenth month, twenty-third day.' 'We arrange our dates differently,' I observed, and begged he would speak of their ceremonies. He commenced by saying, 'When you receive a distinguished guest, do not fail to place him on your left hand, for that is the seat of honor; and be cautious not to uncover the head, as it would be an unbecoming act of familiarity.' Hardly prepared for this blow to my established notions, I requested he would discourse of their philosophy. He re-opened the volume, and read with becoming gravity, 'The most learned men are decidedly of opinion that the seat of human understanding is in the stomach!' On arriving at my quarters, I thought that a cup of 'Young Hyson' would prove refreshing, feeling certain that in this, at least, I should meet with nothing to surprise me; imagine my astonishment when I observed that the 'favorite leaf' the Chinaman was about to infuse, looked quite different to any I had ever seen, it being in color a dull olive, having none of the usual bloom on its surface. I remarked on its appearance, when my attendant quietly said that they never used painted tea in China, but as the foreigners pay a better price for it when the leaves are made of a uniform color, they of course had no objection to cover them with powders. On drinking the infusion made from the pure leaf, I at once resolved to become a convert to this fashion, leaving the other Chinese customs for future consideration." There are as singular customs, also, respecting the manner and matter of their repasts as in other things. The tables of the rich Chinese shine with a beautiful varnish, and are covered with silk carpets very elegantly worked. The master of the house absents himself while his guests regale at his table with undisturbed revelry. They do not make use of plates, knives, or forks, but their food is served up in dishes, out of which they eat in common; and for this purpose every guest has two little ivory or ebony sticks, which he handles very adroitly. Following up this idea, let us look at the social customs of other peoples of the East. For instance, the Maldivian islanders eat alone. They retire to the most hidden parts of their houses, and draw down the cloths which serve as blinds to their windows, that they may eat unobserved. An absurd reason may be alleged for their unsocial repast: they will never eat with one who is inferior to them in birth, in riches, or dignity; and as it is a difficult matter to settle this equality, they are condemned to lead this unsocial life. On the contrary, the inhabitants of the Philippines are remarkably sociable. Whenever one of them finds himself without a companion to partake of his meal, he runs until he meets with one; and, however keen his appetite may be, he ventures not to satisfy it without a guest. The Otaheitan, who are lovers of society, and very gentle in their manners, eat separate from each other. At the hour of repast, the members of each family divide; two brothers, two sisters, and even husband and wife, parents and children, have each their respective basket. They place themselves at the distance of two or three yards from each other, they turn their backs, and take their meal in profound silence. The Tartars pull a man by the ear to press him to drink, and they continue tormenting him till he opens his mouth; they then clap their hands and dance before him.—Then again the social regulations concerning marriage among the Celestials are also very strict. For instance, it is forbidden to marry during "the period set for mourning," the death of a father or mother. It is forbidden to marry a person bearing the same name, or one guilty of crime, or a musician, or an actor, or a widow whose former husband has distinguished himself. The inevitable bamboo is the punishment for transgressions of these laws. Parties safely married, who cannot agree together, may separate. Divorces are also granted for the following causes: sterility, immorality, contempt of the husband's father or mother, propensity to slander or theft, a jealous temper, or habitual ill health. A man is allowed to have but one wife by law, and the law punishes him with eighty blows of the bamboo for every additional wife he brings home. The secondary wives—of whom there are a great plenty—have no rights whatever. The children of the legitimate wife wear no mourning for them at their death. But if they should omit the mourning dress upon the demise of their own mother, the inevitable bamboo would be administered. The Chinaman takes care to use all the liberty left him by the innumerable laws. His legitimate wife he dare not put away, except for causes specified above. His additional wives the law does not recognize, and he therefore treats them as he pleases. Another item of interest respecting these people may be introduced here, also illustrative of their peculiar observances. Our readers are aware that a commissioner has been appointed to treat with them as to intercourse and the establishment of those commercial immunities common to civilized people. Whether it will amount to anything, time will decide. From the most authentic accounts which we have of the mode of conducting things in the Celestial Empire, the only audience granted to foreign envoys is the following: At the opening of the spring of the year, the emperor celebrates a great national festival of turning up a few shovels full of earth in honor of the sacred occupation of cultivating the soil. Before the imperial cortege moves from the palace, all the doors and windows of the houses in the capital are closed, and no one allowed to look out under pain of death. Outside of the city, the foreign envoys and tribute-bearing officials are arranged in two parallel lines, face to face; but long before the "sun of heaven" heaves in sight, they are compelled to lie down prostrate on the ground, and the guards over them take good care that they do not lift up their profane eyes to gaze at the celestial divinity as he passes along. This is the only reception granted to foreign envoys. Chinese etiquette is rather an obstinate matter.—Another of the larger engravings of our series represents, a Japanese cooper plying his trade. Though their tools and manner of working differ from ours, yet they are exceedingly dexterous mechanics, and in some branches cannot be surpassed. Coopering is an important trade at Hakodadi, where immense quantities of fish are salted and packed for exportation in barrels.

A FINGO WOMAN.

These are made of staves, and hooped as with ours, but their form is peculiar, being somewhat conical in shape. The neatness of finish of the woodwork of the houses proves the carpenters skillful workmen, and the cabinet-ware, often inlaid, richly adorned, and covered with the exquisite lacquer polish, is unsurpassed by the finest marqueterie of Paris. In the higher arts, the Japanese deserve a rank much beyond any Oriental nation. The carvings in wood with which many of the better houses and most of the temples are adorned, show an exact knowledge of form, particularly of that of familiar objects of nature, such as birds, fish and flowers, and a skill of hand in the cutting almost perfect. In the Japanese paintings and drawings, there is the freedom that belongs to great manual dexterity, and a correctness of outline which proves a close observation of nature. Some specimens of the illustrated books brought to this country by the commerce, establish the fact hitherto denied, that the Japanese, unlike the Chinese, are familiar with the principles of perspective. These works also show, in their drawings of the human figure and of the horse, a well-directed study of the anatomy of the form in its external developments. Our remaining engraving exhibits a group of Japanese musical instruments. In this picture are grouped together a kettle-drum, a sort of Pan-Asian pipes, a guitar, clarinet, cymbals, etc. Gongs, drums, rattles, and other noisy musical instruments, bear an important part in the worship, and some of these are no less remarkable for the beauty of their workmanship than for the vileness of the music they produce. At the door of each temple there is a straw rope connected with a bell and a drum, and the former is pulled and the latter beaten on the arrival of a devotee, in order to awaken the deity to the consciousness of the presence of a worshipper. Before many years have elapsed, we shall doubtless be perfectly familiar with all the strange customs and peculiarities of the Japanese, for it is the "manifest destiny" of western civilization to open the long-closed gates of the mysterious Orient to English and Americans.

A CHINESE BARBER-BOY AT HONG KONG.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SUMMER STREAM.

BY ELLEN ALICE MORIARTY.

O, fair to the eye is that calm, summer stream,
Smiling up at the sky 'neath the sun's loving beam,
While it steals through the woodlands, and all the day long
Lowly chaneth its murmurous song;
Oreen leaves droop above it, the flowers spring beside,
And a blessing afar to the sea doth it glide:
That beautiful stream, that calm summer stream—
O, thus be it ever a blessing and pride.

And thus may thy life like that summer stream be,
As it peacefully glides to eternity's sea.
Long, long be its course and unclouded its day,
Love's sunshine, love's flowers attend on its way;
When the shadows of evening are over it cast,
May it never look back with regret to the past,
But flow on like that stream, that calm summer stream,
Till it blends with the waters of life at the last.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SUSPICIOUS CHARACTER:

— on —

THE AFFRAY AT THE INN.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

THOSE Argases of a village, the hangers-on at the tavern, endeavor to make up for the disadvantages of country life, in point of news, by getting as much information as possible out of every traveller who happens along. He runs the gauntlet of their eyes, ears and tongues with philosophy if he is experienced, but with agony if otherwise, or thin-skinned, or desirous to avoid notice from some other cause. Merciless, when they imagine him to be at all disturbed by their inquisitiveness, they watch him the more closely and worry him the more; the more he desires to be let alone, they more they wot do it.

One sultry day in August, Mr. Ban—so he called himself—stopped with his horse and saddle-bags at the old wooden inn of Cherrytown, and as he was the only traveller who had passed that way for the space of three weeks, he became an instant object of hungry scrutiny. It was a far western village in a sparsely settled country, and the manners of the people conformed to the rude state of things around them.

After giving very particular orders about his horse, and taking a glass of whiskey with a very suspicious air, he looked furtively and anxiously about him; and then, beckoning the landlord into the entry, whispered directions to him about a supper in a private room. While the meal was in preparation, he went several times out to the stable to look after his horse, and the hostler remarked that he every time gave sharp glances after his saddle-bags, as if they contained something of no ordinary importance, after which and a close inspection of the premises, he would return to the inn, where finally he partook of his lonely supper.

"Queer customer, that," said one of the loungers in the bar.

"Pears so," said another, behind his pipe, from which he seemed to be sucking knowledge. "Very anxious eyes."

"Very particular about eating alone, want he, hoss?" asked the first speaker.

"Yes, but he didn't put on any airs," said the landlord, parrying the sneer.

"Perhaps he's one of the kind that can't afford to put on airs—may have reasons for keeping quiet and snug as possible. Hey, Joe Stroder?"

"Just so," said Joe, approvingly, behind his pipe. "When a man's unseizable in a crowd, I ollers suspicion he's one of the kind that's been too sociable with lone travellers on the road."

Landlord Jugley began to prick up his ears and to dilate his nostrils.

"You never saw him afore, did you, Jim Griggle?" asked he.

"Don't know's I have, but I don't like his looks overmuch. His ways is mean, too; he took that whiskey alone, and now he's taking that supper alone."

"Not peractually?" said Joe Stroder, informed by his learned pipe. "I reckon Rose, your daughter, is waiting on him, old hoss, aint she?"

"In course," replied Jugley, "and why shouldn't she? Must treat strangers well, you know."

"Perhaps he wout make himself long a stranger," insinuated Stroder. "He looks like a horse thief to me; and if his practice is half as sharp as his eye, he'll give you trouble—now mind my markings."

While such conversation was being held in the bar-room to the prejudice of the new-comer, who, the landlord said, had proposed to stop a week or two in those parts, Mr. Ban was quietly enjoying his private meal, attended by the landlord's only daughter, Rose Jugley, a blooming, healthy, dark-eyed western lass of some eighteen years, whose cheerful manners gave zest to the stranger's repast.

"So, then, you are the landlord's daughter," said he, pursuing his meal with unmistakable appetite. "Were you born in these parts?"

"I was born in Ohio, but we have lived here about five or six years," answered Rose.

"Don't you ever desire to see more of the world?" asked Ban, looking steadily at her as he spoke.

"O, no—I never feel lonesome. I love the wilderness, if it can be called a wilderness, where everything in nature is so beautiful around one. I believe there is no place in the world where there are so many flowers and woods and wild birds. I could always be happy among them—if—"

Her face changed, and she paused.

"If what?" asked Ban, curiously.

"If it were not for one thing," she added, with a sigh.

"And what is that?"

"That's a secret," replied Rose, with a melancholy smile.

"O, I know it all!"

"You!" and Rose started. "You know it all? That is impossible. You are an entire stranger."

"There is a man in the case," said Ban, positively.

Rose colored up and then turned pale, but was silent. The stranger, having finished his meal, rose and went out to his horse.

"There he goes again," grumbled Stroder, looking after him. "Mighty partickler about that horse of his'n."

"If it is his'n. Mebby it's a stole one," said Griggle.

What further the two said the landlord could not hear, as they put their heads together. He was himself puzzled about the stranger, who was a tall, gaunt man, with a swarthy complexion, immense black whiskers and moustaches, and with a reserved look which he could not interpret. Whether it indicated pride, ill-nature, alarm, or a sinister design, Jugley could not tell; but, his suspicion being aroused, it seemed, by the light of the whiskey which he used to solve the mystery, the queerest look he ever saw. Not the least puzzled of the people at the inn was Rose, the landlord's handsome daughter. When Ban had left the room, she left the dishes untouched for awhile, absorbed in thoughts of him and what he had said.

"Strange! Who can he be? Has he ever been here before? He said there was a man in the case, as if he knew that father wished me to marry that odious Joe Stroder! Perhaps Stroder has been making common talk of it. Ugh! it makes my blood run cold to think of it. But how could this stranger know about it?" And clearing away the table, the thoughts of Rose dwelt upon the face of him who had such an exuberance of black hair and such a sad face, such a sweet smile and such eyes!

"There he goes—there he goes—out to the woods!" was the joint exclamation of Stroder and Griggle, shortly after, as Ban was seen by them to leave the barn and walk away alone.

The landlord, in a high state of excitement, rushed to the door, just as Jerry, the hostler and man-of-all-work, in another high state of excitement, approached the house.

"I begin to think I doane what a boss is, and I've tended 'em, man and boy, for more'n twenty years!" said Jerry, vehemently, and shaking his head angrily.

"Why, what's the matter?"

"Nothing's the matter that I couldn't see to," answered the hostler, "but this long-legged chap yonder, straggling over the clearing, is more partickler about his animal than if he was Old Bowssiferous himself. He gav me more'n a hundred directions about the boss, helped rub him down, talked into his ear as if he was a human, looked at the feed, chewed some of it to see if it tasted good, drank some of the water, helped spread the straw, fumbled about his saddle-bags, and teetered about the barn, till I began to think he was loony,—and now there he goes into the woods to make a speech to the trees, I 'spese. Dod rot it! I hope he wout stay long."

"Highwaymen are always looking sharp after their horses. They're bound to be," said Stroder.

"There's been a heap of robberies lately. Who knows who's done 'em?" said Griggle, with a significant wink to Stroder.

"Who, indeed? And whose turn will come next? When I travel I don't take much money with me, but I shouldn't care to have a junk of lead through my head on suspicion that I had a pile. After death is too late to rectify mistakes."

"Talking about money, Stroder," said Jugley, glad of a chance to broach the subject, "it would be a mighty pretty lift to me, if you'd pay me the hundred and fifty you owe. I'm short."

"You don't oughter to speak about that, Jug," quickly returned Stroder, coloring up, "when I'm to be your son-in-law so soon. I'll make it all right on the wedding-day."

"Short settlements make long friends, Joe," said Jugley, firmly.

"You've owed me that nigh onto two months. You said your cattle would be sold in less than two weeks and then you'd pay. But you aint bang up, Joe!"

"I'm the bang-uppest chap you ever seed, Jug," replied Stroder, affecting indignation. "That two hundred head of cattle was sold in Cincinnati at the time I said, but I haint got the money yet. You know I'm good for it."

"I don't know nothing but what you've told me about what you're wuth. I reckoned you were all you said—lent you money—agreed to let you have Rose—and that's the way I'm served."

"Hear him, Griggle! Hear old Jugley! Anybody would think he hadn't plenty of money as well as I."

"I know I have—but I don't want to disturb my pile. In course I can put my hand on it when I want it, but I wout. I callate to pay my way as I go along, and expect others to do the same."

This was a more "flat-footed" speech than Stroder had ever heard Jugley make before. Their acquaintance had been but of about three months' duration, and Stroder's false representations, supported by Griggle, about his extensive property in Ohio, in land and cattle, had been plausible enough to induce the landlord to favor him as has been seen. The host, however, had of late been repenting his credulity. Stroder was mistaken when he thought he could parley further.

"Well, I never thought you a mean man afore!"

"Mean! If you call me mean, Joe Stroder, you'll leave this house quicker than ever you comed into it! I tell you, we'll break up bargains, by gossamer!"

"Well, guvner, there's no use in getting riled. I'll pay yer, up to the handle. I'll marry yer daughter, and you'll be proud of me. I—"

The speaker was suddenly interrupted by the unexpected entrance of Ban, who strode in as he uttered the last words, and fixed a penetrating look upon him as he passed.

"Any commands, sir?" asked the landlord, wishing to change the subject. "A light?" It was now dark.

Ban took the proffered lamp, and giving directions in a whisper that particular watch should be kept lest the saddle-bags should be stolen, he retired for the night.

"Saddle-bags! Ha, ha!" laughed Jugley. "Them old saddle-bags. I wonder who'd steal them?"

Griggle and Stroder exchanged words, arose and walked out together. Leaving Jerry at the bar, Jugley sought the society of his wife and daughter.

"Sorry I ever came to this place," said the landlord, sighing. "Cat-throats, horse-thieves and swindlers are two-thirds of the travelling population."

"But the country is so delightful, father," said Rose; "so much pleasanter than the city."

"You think so, no doubt, as long as you can have your rambles in the woods every day, without being troubled by a wolf or a panther, and can bring home berries and plants and wild flowers. But I didn't come out here for such traps. And mind, I tell you, Rose, you masn't make your tramps too far from home, or you'll be clapper-clawed yet, by some wild varmint, and nothing left."

"That's what I often tell her," said Mrs. Jugley; "but old folks are thought to know nothing, now-a-days."

"O, there's no danger, mother, where I go. I never see anything more terrible than a bird, or a squirrel, a raccoon or a briar-bush. The most I have to fear is nearest home."

"And what is that?" asked her father.

Her mother knew full well.

"That Joe Stroder you wish to marry me to!"

Jugley looked down and patted his feet on the floor without reply. He had begun to be more of his daughter's opinion with regard to Stroder, but was unwilling to acknowledge it.

"Well, Rose," said he, finally, "you're not married to him yet, at any rate;" and he looked so mildly as he said this, that Rose was agreeably surprised.

Her father was not a man of many words, and the subject was dropped. But Rose's dreams that night were pleasant ones, for she inferred from her father's manner that he was not so bent upon her marrying as formerly.

Thrice during the night Ban arose and went out to the barn to look after his horse, making as much noise each time as to wake up the inmates of the tavern, and add to the suspicious curiosity which he had previously excited.

"Either that fellow is crazy or he has done something wrong, or means to, which makes him uneasy," mumbled Jugley to his timid wife, as each time Ban returned to his room, loudly fastening the door, he courted sleep again.

Stroder and Griggle occupied the same chamber. A window in it overlooked the barn. They heard the stranger's exits and entrances in the night, and made their own comments.

"You may bet high there's a heap of money in them saddle-bags, Jim Griggle."

"Just what I was a going to say, Joe. Who'd ye 'spose he is?"

"I inspicion he's an orkard customer, anyhow," returned Joe, in a whisper; "but you and I might outwit him, if we couldn't outfight him. I don't like the looks of his eye, nor more do I like the 'pearance of them shoulders and arms, and the cut of his head behind the ears; but I should like to know the feel of his money. You know my game is 'early up here. We can't stop long."

"If we could only keep Jerry off the watch," said Griggle, "we'd soon see the inside of them there saddle-bags."

"Time enough, p'rhaps. He'll be here some days yet."

The ensuing day was a lovely one, and Ban, with his rifle over his shoulder and a hunting-knife in his belt, went out for a stroll, leaving no word when he would be back.

"Singular feller, that," said Jugley, looking after him.

"I've ollers thought it uncommon remarkable that the most on-natural beings is most fond of the society of natur. Sump'n on his mind, you may depend. Can't rest easy in his bed. Acts as if he had the nightmare in the daytime, too. What's that?"

The sharp crack of a rifle was heard at that instant, evidently not far within the forest, which extended in one direction for miles.

"Shot a 'possum, I 'spose. Eh! What's that he's got?"

The figure of the stranger was now seen emerging from the edge of the woods, bearing in his arms a female form, apparently lifeless. Ban hastily advanced towards the tavern with his burden.

"Jernpiter—it's Rose!" exclaimed her father, running wildly out to meet Ban. "I know her by the yaller gown! Hullo! what in thunder's the matter? Have you shot her by mistake?"

Ban made no answer, but strode rapidly on, entering the tavern and depositing the body of Rose on a sofa in an apartment occupied by her father.

"Keep them out!" said he to the landlord, shutting the door so quickly in the face of Stroder and Griggle, who were about to enter, that they recoiled. "You see she is not in a state to bear intrusion. She is only wounded in the arm, I think, though it might have cost her life."

"I should think so! A rifle ball is a dangerous thing to let fly," said Jugley, reproachfully. "You ought to have looked where you were shooting, stranger."

"That I did," returned Ban, understanding the misapprehension of the excited father, as together they applied such restoratives as were at hand. "Had I not, the panther would soon have spoiled the beauty of this delicate cheek, if not have taken her life."

"The panther!" exclaimed the father, amazed.

"Ay," said Han. "He sprang upon her from a tree, and had fastened upon her arm, when she fainted. I never made such a timid shot in my life as when I levelled at his head. But he's past biting now. See, she revives. Do you feel much pain, miss?"

The wounded girl replied faintly in the negative, though the blood streamed freely from her frightfully lacerated arm. The entrance of her mother, who had just heard of the accident, aided in such care as was required, and Ban retired, not unmindful, however, of the gratitude of the family, expressed more by looks than words, but especially in the earnest gaze of Rose herself.

When Han left the apartment, he repaired mechanically to the stable to look after the horse in which he seemed to take such careful interest. As he entered, he overheard the voices of Stroder and Griggle, the latter of whom enjoined his comrade to:

"Be quick, quick, or that black-looking chap will be out again, betting about his horse."

"No danger," replied Stroder, who was rummaging the saddle-bags to see what he could find worth stealing. "He's too much engaged with Rose. Hang the wretch! I'd like to serve her out for slighting me as she has done; I will that, too."

"Come!" said Griggle, impatiently, "do you find anything?"

"Here's a letter I've been trying to make out, addressed to—"

"Me, second!" exclaimed the exasperated Han, at this instant springing forward with such force as to tumble Griggle headlong upon his kneeling companion, and the two rolled together on the stable floor, close to the heels of Han's horse.

Bewildered by the shock and the shame of detection, Stroder imagined Griggle to be the stranger, and clatching him blindly, as they lay, he pummeled him severely, a salutation which Griggle, enraged, returned with interest. Han looked calmly on, while the two thieves were wreaking vengeance upon themselves. But they soon discovered their mistake, and desisted, rising, covered with dirt, to their feet, which they had scarcely regained when the horse, as if conscious of the presence of his master, and of the meditated mischief, gave Griggle a finishing kick, which, as the latter had stood with his back towards him, sent him plunging into an opposite stall, seriously bruised. Han at once collared Stroder, and snatched the letter from his hand.

"Rascal! have you read that letter?" he inquired, with such a show of apprehension that Stroder at once saw that he feared to have the contents known.

Necessity being the mother of ingenious ideas, Stroder feigned that he had read the letter, though he had not.

"Of course I did. I know all that's in that there bit of paper, and you can keep it now if you like. As for me—both on us—we're poor men, and that's the reason why we took such a liberty with your baggage. But there's nothing there worth stealing."

"Well, then, fellow," said Ban, releasing his hold and putting the letter carefully away, "since you know what's in this letter, keep what you know a secret, and I'll say nothing of this affair; but if you play false, I'll have a reckoning with you. Enough."

He said this with a tone that awed them, and the two slunk away.

"Stupid!" grumbled Stroder, "you've gin me a bad eye."

"Stupid yourself!" retorted Griggle, limping from the horse's kick. "I told you he would be after us. What was in that letter?"

"Not a word that I know. I didn't open it. But it served my purpose, for he looked awfired. I wish, howsoever, I had learned the secret. He 'pears to be a man of grit, but he looked scared about the letter. I'll tell you what it is, Grig, it is dangerous to stop in these parts any longer. Somebody'll be soon on our track, and besides, there's too few travellers in this part of the country. Rose I have gin up. The old man's agin me now, and as that chance for the property is gone, we must try the next best plan."

Stroder scowled as he said this, and Griggle shuddered, seeming to comprehend his plan.

"What you hinted at before?"

"Ay, no less. Six thousand dollars in hard coin will set us afoot once more. The job done well, we can then part company, forever if you like, and there'll be no one left to tell the story."

"Equal work, equal wages," said Griggle, turning pale.

"In course, Jim Griggle, though I should have more, for I've taken the lead. I worked till I got his confidence. I found where he kept his money. But help do the job up, and I'll call it square."

"But this hard customer will be in the way, and—"

"No they want, to-night. Jerry told me they were both to go to Bushville this afternoon, to stay over night, on business. That's well. We'll never see them again; though I should like to put an ounce of lead into his knob, for him to remember me by."

"I'm glad he'll be out of the way. See!" added Griggle, pointing towards the forest, from which Ban was now dragging the body of the panther to the tavern. "I s'pose that critter made the bounce upon Rose."

"She'll find me a worse varmint to deal with before to-morrow's sun," muttered Stroder, eyeing Ban with hatred. "We shall have to borrow Jugley's horses, Grig, and so we'd best look to them during the day."

In the afternoon, agreeable to preparation, Ban and Jerry, mounted, set out for the next town, on some business for the stranger, who was to return on the following day. The sky was threatening, and much of the way through the forest, the seldom trodden path being scarcely distinguishable in many parts of it. They had travelled but little more than half the distance, when the first peal of the thunder-storm admonished them of the need of shelter. Still they pushed on, unwilling to turn back, or to remain in the forest through the night. Continued peals and flashes caused the horse on which Jerry was mounted to rear and plunge violently, testing his horsemanship severely; but the steel of Ban pressed forward calmly as if nothing unusual was happening.

"That's a rare beast of yours," exclaimed Jerry, with difficulty recovering from a plunge which had nearly unhorsed him. "You have good cause to care so tenderly for him, after all. He don't mind this more'n an April shower. Ha! what a dash was that!"

An instant clap of thunder attended the bolt, which showed an oak across their path. Jerry's horse dashed madly over the tree and was soon lost in the darkness; while Han's horse stood sedulously still, and refused to proceed, despite all his rider's coaxing.

"A fearful storm to-night, mother," said Rose, as they sat together in the evening, her wounded arm in a sling. "I wish Mr. Han had not set out to-day."

"I wish so too, child; but God will watch over him. He has a rough outside, but he has a good heart, I'll be bound, and a stout one. They'll get along safely."

"Safely enough, perhaps," said Jugley, entering, "but they're wet enough by this time. There's no house atween here and Bushville, and I'm not so sure, after all, that they may not lose their way in such a night. I'd much rather those two do-nothings and watch-everythings below were out, instead of him and Jerry, though he is such a queer acting chap. What do you say, Rose?"

"The same, father. I shall always feel an interest in his welfare."

Jugley watched the expression of his daughter's face and mused silently awhile.

"We don't know who nobody is, in these parts," he said, seriously. "Can't always tell who to trust. I wonder what business he's on! Dresses oddly. Acts strangely. Didn't act long though when he killed the panther, that's a fact. Poor, I s'pose."

"I shall always be grateful to him," said Rose, warmly. "I can never repay him for my life."

"That's true, Rose. I s'pose you wouldn't object to giving up Stroder for him, would you?" said Jugley, with a significant smile.

"He is too old for me," she replied—"forty at least. Hark! there's a step at the door."

Jugley arose and opened it, just in time to get a glimpse of Stroder, as he stole softly up stairs to his chamber.

"Skulking!" said Jugley, shutting the door angrily. "I wish we were rid of them both. They shall go to-morrow, pay or no pay. I feel a queer feeling, as if they would make more trouble yet. The Lord only knows."

The hour was late when the family retired, while the storm continued, rattling the weather-beaten walls and windows of the inn as if enraged that they had stood so long.

When Ban's horse refused to proceed in the forest, his master huddled after Jerry, but in vain. Still he urged his horse, but equally in vain; the animal, as if scenting danger ahead, or desirous to turn back from the uncertain road, remained stock still.

"A plague upon it," muttered Ban; "all this journey for nought. Well, Rolla, I know your temper, and you must have your own way. Do as you will."

He loosened the bridle as he spoke, and the horse, as if perfectly understanding what he said, at once turned round, snuffing and pawing the ground as if wishing to return, and asking leave.

"Well, en avant! Back, if you will!"

The noble animal pricked up his ears and snorted as if for joy, and waiting no further word, trotted back on the path they had come. The way was tortuous and difficult, and it was near midnight when Ban arrived at the tavern again.

The storm had subsided, and unwilling to rouse the host, he rode at once to the stable, where, to his surprise, he found the door wide open, and two horses waiting, ready saddled as for sudden departure. Suspecting that all was not right, and recurring to the alteration of the morning, Ban stalled his horse and then fastened the door, proceeding at once faithfully to the inn. To increase his apprehensiveness, he there found a side door also wide open, but no light, and all was still about the premises.

"Strange," he mused. "This is carelessness or design. Can these two rogues meditate robbery—perhaps murder? My pistols! In my room. I must go softly, at all events, for I would not disturb the slumbers of Rose—charming creature—if indeed her arm suffers her to sleep. So—this is the entry door—there the stairs."

Hastily and silently pulling off his boots, he groped his way up the stairs towards his chamber. As he reached the landing, he noticed that the door of Jugley's apartment was ajar, the moon just then having burst through the parting clouds. By its yet faint light he perceived a dark object moving within the room.

"It may be the host—but I'll make sure."

Quickly gliding into his own room, and seizing his pistols, which he had kept concealed beneath his pillow, he again went out, noiselessly, when he heard some one stumbling in the landlord's apartment, and a voice asking: "Who's there?"

At the same moment Ban came in contact with some one in the entry, who seized him.

"Who's this?" inquired he, returning the gripe.

"No matter," was the hoarsely whispered reply. "Take that."

Ban, by a sudden movement, partly foiled what would have been a deadly thrust. As it was, he felt the keen knife enter his arm. Infuriated, he hugged his antagonist with a giant's strength, and lifting him from his feet, hurled him headlong down the stairs. At this moment a scream issued from an adjoining chamber, and Ban recognized it to be the voice of Rose. Drawing his pistols, he was proceeding in that direction, when he was again startled by the sounds of a struggle in the chamber of Jugley, mingled with oaths, a cry of pain, and a shout for help, while the shrieks of Mrs. Jugley added to the alarming din. Hastening to the door, he thrust it aside violently, and at once learned the source of the outcries. By the light of the now cloudless moon he beheld Joe Stroder kneeling upon the body of Jugley, whose resistance had forced him half out of bed. His wife lay motionless, her face presenting a ghastly appearance and covered with blood.

"Merely, Joe! Take all I have, but spare—"

"Have mercy on you—I won't. You've scared your last reckoning. I'll quiet you!" was Stroder's savage reply, endeavoring to choke the host with one hand, while he lifted a knife with the other. "I'll—"

"No, like a will! Hear, as you are!" was the exclamation of Ban at this juncture, and the loud report of a pistol rang through the room, as, with paralyzed limbs, the intended murderer fell quivering and dead from the bed to the floor, Jugley rolling over upon him.

"Am I too late?" asked Ban, eagerly, as the astonished man staggered to his feet, scarcely able to recognize him in his fright.

"No—that is—my wife—my daughter—I fear they are murdered—he struck her such a blow!" And Jugley placed his hand upon his wife's forehead, half sure that she was dead.

"Get a light," said Ban, hurriedly. "Where's your daughter?"

"Here, father," was the answer from Rose herself, who entered with faltering steps.

She had heard the fall of Griggle, and arisen, but dared not cross the threshold before. A light was instantly procured, and by their united aid, the mother of Rose was restored to consciousness. The ruffian had dealt her a blow with his fist, while contending with her husband.

"Let me see to that other wretch, lest he escape," said Ban, "if he be not dead already;" and on repairing to the spot where he lay groaning, they found that the fellow's leg was broken by his fall.

Obedient to the instinct of an undesired humanity, they cared for the crippled man as well as they could till morning, when he made a full confession of the diabolical scheme which had been so unexpectedly foiled—the intended murder of the family, the division of the booty, and the instant separation and flight. The morning had advanced but a few hours, when the still further confession of a life of crimes was made by Griggle, who was now found to be expiring from internal injuries received by his fall. This dying statement was made in the presence of Jerry and a traveler with whom he had returned to the inn, thus fully exculpating Ban and the family at the inquest over the body held on the following day.

Notwithstanding the providential escape of the family, such a gloom was cast over the minds of the landlord and his wife that they determined to leave that region as soon as they could dispose of their property, Rose herself, notwithstanding her fondness for forest life, now finding its associations unpleasant. The time fixed for their departure was not a distant one, but while they remained, Ban also lingered, his manners as odd as usual, though not quite so reserved, and vastly less suspicious than on his first arrival. He remained more within doors and in the society of the family, though what his business was or whence he came, he still refrained to tell. It was not unobserved, however, that an unmistakable, though unconfessed attachment had meanwhile sprung up between him and Rose, despite the apparent disparity of their ages. One day, as they sat conversing together upon the eventful night of their deliverance, the landlord remarked:

"You are not a married man, Mr. Ban?"

Ban looked up from his attitude of deep musing, and, with an earnest glance at Rose, half fearful, half inquiring, he answered:

"In truth, mine host, I am not, though once I did love and would have married, has long lain beneath the cold sod, snatched by consumption from this life. I will be free with you, since we perhaps must part so soon—hoping, however, that it may not be so. Since the death of my first love, my life, though a public one, has been most lonely. High station and wealth could not atone for the loss of pure and disinterested love such as I knew hers to be. In the throngs of fashion, had I been less penetrating—perhaps you will call it less suspicious—I might have found a substitute; but I still doubted and kept aloof, growing more and more averse to society, yet ever seeking a companion, ever seeking in vain. Seclusion of this sort so increased my natural reserve of manner, and a sensitiveness I never could control, that I became marked as an eccentric; and wishing to escape the world which knew me, and which I believed flattered me from selfish motives, I gave up business, assumed a name not my own, and sought for disinterestedness in regions of simple life, among whose members I should be a stranger, and where I might, unknown and unsuspected, seek for the long-lost treasure, an undivided, undivided heart—one that should be attached to me for myself alone, unworthy as I am, irrespective of position or fortune. For two years of wandering, my horse has been my only companion. You may know I prize him when I tell you he has borne me on the battle-field, and twice saved my life by his fleetness and sagacity—"

"As you have saved ours," interrupted Rose, "and mine twice, by your bravery."

"Ah, Rose, if I may call you so—"

"Call me any name you please," she said, with a smile of gratitude.

"I know of but one sweeter name, but that will be for some happier man to utter."

"And what is that?" she asked, blushing, and half-divining his meaning.

"Hie!" exclaimed Ban, hazarding all upon the word.

"And why not?" was all she said.

It was enough; and in an instant the tacit bargain was sealed by a warm and mutual kiss, not at all displeasing to the parents, as may be imagined, when after explanations proved Ban all that he had represented himself to be. In Rose he found a bride who filled the desolate niche of his heart with brightness, and a worldly idol at whose shrine his affectionate devotions are unceasing. Happy in good old age, her parents still live to bless the kindness of his lofty nature, and to repeat the declaration that "suspicious characters" are not always the worst—though the husband of Rose has long ceased to be suspected.

BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL, JUNE 17, 1775.

[See description, page 376.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AN ANSWER.

See "Lotus Land," on page 198, and "Lines," on page 234, of this volume.

BY WILLIE E. FAVOR.

Will thither go, Cassandra? I am waiting now to lead
Your footsteps down "the snow-white sand" to that fair, smiling mead;
And unto thee, Cassandra, all the simple songs I sing,
As magic brought the gifts of old, with homage I will bring.

In Lotus-land, Cassandra, the ebon belt of grief
Is never girt about the heart like hands about a sheaf;
And evermore, Cassandra, do the songs of pleasure rise,
As larks rise from the moorlands toward the smiling skies.

And what is more, Cassandra, in that famed Lotus land
Rises high a magic structure—a temple fair and grand;
Its turrets kiss, Cassandra, e'en the "white-capped clouds" in air,
And all that's beautiful and true in rich array are there.

And hither come, Cassandra, all the minstrels of the land;
Here at the shrine of melody, with singing hearts they stand;
Each pilgrim here, Cassandra, touches lip to charmed wine,
As Moslems kiss the sacred stone at Mecca's holy shrine.

Here came of old, Cassandra, all the hards of ancient time,
Whose verse adown the ages—an argosy of rhyme—
Has floated on, Cassandra, with music such as swept
The stream where Cleopatra's barge beneath the sunlight crept.

And here come now, Cassandra, the song-dowered ones who throw
The passion of their poet-soul upon the waves that flow
In silence by, Cassandra, and here they watch and wait,
Like Egypt's daughters by the Nile, to know their future fate.

Stay not thy steps, Cassandra, the staff is in one hand,
The other waits to clasp thine own, and then—to Lotus land!
Thou shalt be queen, Cassandra, and sit upon a throne,
And rule in one young heart whose love shall centre in thy own.

The wreath is made, Cassandra, of "lilies blue and gold;"
And white-robed ones await to bind it in thy dark hair's fold:
Stay not thy steps, Cassandra; speed thee, as speeds the dove,
And soon our steps shall wander in the Lotus land of love.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

HOPEFUL BRADSHAW:

—OR,—

WRITING A STORY FOR BALLOU.

BY MARY W. JANVEIN.

AND what shall my story be about? A cold winter night—four long hours to myself; for grandma, dozing in her arm-chair in the chimney-nook, will be no interruption. I ought to get up something "short," "spicy," "racy," with a "good plot,"—the kind these editors who cater to a capricious public, specify for; but somehow I don't feel in the mood to-night, and I remember that "plots" will not always come at one's beck and call, and gold pens are not always the mediums of "happiest efforts." But I waste time in extemporizing; now for the story.

"Let me see," as old ladies say, pausing in their knitting-work. This must not be one of the old stereotyped sentimental "love stories." No, indeed! Something quite different—in fact, why not, for the nonce, go wholly out of "my line," and concoct something bordering on the mystical, mysterious or tragic? Shall it be of "Spirit Rappings"? No, we are no disciple of that faith. Of Ghostland? No, we have little faith in the marvellous either. Rather let it be something on the domestic order—about gentle, tender, lovable home-heings, and pleasant firesides, and home-cheer. And what a picture of cosy home-comfort is just before me now! Grandmama, in her nice cap and kerchief, nodding, nodding, in her cushioned arm-chair; Tabby curled up in the warmest corner of the hearth; the bright copper teakettle simmering in the genial heat; a round table drawn up in front of the sofa, with a dish of great cherry-checked Baldwins in tempting proximity to my portfolio; the rays of a cheerful wood-fire flashing and dancing over the rich dark carpet, the antique furniture, and even lighting up the old portraits on the dark oaken-panelled walls.

They are old portraits, most of them—ancestral pictures, painted in earlier days; and ruff and fardingale, and jewelled stomacher, betoken dames of the days before the Revolution, whose costume would be quite unsuited to our republican taste. But there is one portrait more modern than the others, yet antiquated still—of a beautiful, high-bred looking girl, with a fair English complexion and eyes blue as summer skies; so bright and beautiful on canvas—what must she have been in life? I wonder if she was not a belle and a beauty in her day? Perhaps, nay I am sure, there must be a history about that portrait. After all, who knows but I may weave it up into a romance far better than pen of mine would idlyite? I must waken grandma—she'll know—for wonderful memories have grandmothers—and—

But hark!—sleigh-bells, as I live! and merry voices!—and now they're coming up the drive, and the bells jingle before the front door. Ah, I know!—that's Harry Allston's voice! and Lou, and Jenny Wilder! Good fellow, Hal is, to bring the girls out here to see me! It has been rather lonely here at Dudley Hall, with nobody but old Jane and Robert to make talk with me. Grandma is so quiet lately—she dozes almost all her time away. She isn't much company for an emancipated school-girl; but then she does so love to have some of her "young folks" pass their vacations with her, that we grandchildren all take turns in spending a fortnight at the Hall.

And now, half an hour later, after nuts and apples are discussed, and Hal is busy with the last Harper's, and the girls have "talked out," Lou idly fingers my gold pen, and queries:

"What were you doing, Mary,—writing another story for Ballou?"

"Yes, Lou, and sadly at a loss for a plot. Can't you give me one?"

"O, I can! Pray, ask me!" upspoke lively Jenny Wilder. "I've got the nicest one all planned out—thought of it all the way out here. That's why I kept so still, Lou. Think I shall turn blue stocking, myself! Somebody has said 'tis pleasant to see one's name in print.'"

"But your story!" asked Lou.

"O, it's all about a young girl—beautiful, of course, 'beautiful as an opium reverie,' as some author has written; and—let's see—well, she went one day—"

"A shopping?" put in Lou, slyly.

"And fell in love with—"

"A clerk at Chandler's!" again suggested Lou, roguishly.

"Nonsense! How you tease me!" exclaimed Jenny, her cheeks burning at a sly look from Hal, who, by-the-by, himself had that day stood behind a desk at the above-named mercantile bazaar. "You're always quoting that brother of yours," with a sancy glance at Hal. "But let me go on with my story. It should 'come to pass,' that the clerk should turn out no clerk at all, but a fine gentleman in disguise—"

"There, Jenny, that'll do! I can plot better than that myself; listen!" interrupted Lou Allston. "What do you want to write about anybody less than a bonafide nobleman for? Now my story should be about a beautiful princess. Let me think; I'd have her live in an inaccessible or enchanted spot, and by-and-by a brave young knight should hear of her wonderful loveliness, and come to her deliverance, and—"

"Stop, sister mine!" interrupted Harry. "That's not quite an original idea. Don't plagiarize, dear, if you do, I fear you'll have the critics after you when these same brain-fancies come to light. That's Tennysonian; don't you remember how in that description of the sleeping princess, after telling how she became awakened by something very like a kiss from this lover of hers, he goes on to state—"

"And over the hills and far away—
Beyond the twilight's purple sun—
And deep into the dying day,
The happy princess followed him?"

So just draw on your imagination, please, for some other plot—an original one, I mean."

"Well, then," said Lou, poating, "I'll discard princesses and knights errant, and come down to our own republican times. My hero shall be bluff and hearty, and jovial, with red cheeks and black eyes, and such splendid whiskers!" (Hal stroked caressingly an incipient moustache.) "And he shall be a returned Californian, rich as Cressus or the Rothschilds, and wear such immense fob-chains and rings!—Jones and Ball have nothing like 'em!—and he shall come home—"

"Ah, yes, sister, I see him, a-la Mother Goose—"

"Bobby Shaftoe, fat and fair,
Combing down his yellow hair,—
He'll come home and marry me,
Under my father's apple-tree;"

quoted Harry, teasingly.

"Not another word from me to-night, Sir Tantalizer, if you are going to try that fashion," and Lou settled back determinedly in her chair, taking up a paper.

"Well, Jenny, it's your turn now. Suppose you take up the cue?" said Harry. "Give us a description of your hero."

"O, mine shall be just the opposite of Lou's," said Jenny. "My hero shall be tall and slender, with dark blue eyes, and such pale, 'interesting' features. And then he should part his hair down the middle, and wear a 'Byronic collar,'—and I would have him a music-teacher, or an artist. And the heroine should be a heiress, and a stern father should 'forbid him the house,' and the artist should leave the country in despair and go to Italy; and, years after, should become rich and famous, and return to find his lady-love a poor music-teacher, supporting her father, who had failed in business,—and all this time she had remained unmarried, and 'true as steel.' And so it should come about that they 'made up,' as children say, and the end of it was a wedding,—that's the usual terms of a romance, I believe.—Or, I might give you another plot," rattled on Jenny, quite enthusiastically. "It is something after this sort:—A young man, of poor but respectable parentage, as the novelists say, falls in love with a beautiful girl, far above him in station. So he resolves to disguise himself—"

"A-la Claude Melnotte?" quoth Hal.

"And applies to the lady's father," went on Jenny, not heeding the interruption, "for a situation as private secretary, or a sort of tutor, rather, in his family."

"How very singular that the young lady's paternal relative chanced to stand in need of a secretary or tutor at this precise period!" ventured Hal, with a profound air. "Are you sure, Jenny, that it was a secretary he wanted? Don't you mean a coachman? You remember how recently one of the latter ilk rode his horses, carriage and all, over the aristocracy of a certain Gothamite family? You must mean a coachman, dear!"

"Please don't call me dear, Mr. Harry Allston!" exclaimed Jenny, with a decided, but very becoming pout on her cherry lips. "And why can't you attend to Harper, and let us girls alone. I did hope to spend a quiet evening out here—but you will not let us, I see."

"Well, I suppose I am wicked; yes, 'a thorn between two roses,'" and Harry took an ottoman between the two girls, while Jenny pettishly removed her chair. "There, don't frown, Jenny, and I'll be on my best behaviour the rest of the evening. Go on with your love story. How was it with your secretary?"

"Love stories?" echoed grandma, starting up in her arm-chair. "Are you making love stories, children?"

"O, yes, indeed, Grandma Dudley, by the wholesale! But I'm sure you must be able to make a better one than any of us. Do tell us, grandma, some love story of your younger days?" And Jenny drew near the old lady, and laid her little white hand on an old withered one. "Tell us about some of your lovers. I've heard, grandma, that you were a beauty in your youth, and had plenty of admirers."

"Nonsense, child!" said grandma; but the smile that flickered momentarily about her withered lips, and the sparkle that lit a pair of eyes whose brightness seventy years had not dimmed, told what memories of her youth-time were busy in the old lady's brain. "Nonsense, dear! I never had much beauty to boast of; though, if I do say it, I suppose I was once as decent-looking a girl as could be found in the country. But I'll tell you a story about the original of that portrait up there—Hopeful Bradshaw; how would you like that, children?"

"O, of all things!" exclaimed Jenny.

"It is just what I was wishing, grandma," I said.

And straightway "Harper" was tossed to the table, and Harry folded his arms complacently, and took the attitude of a listener.

"Well, children," began grandma, smoothing down her wide, black alpaca apron, "it was many and many years ago, before the Revolution, here at this very old mansion-house, lived a fine old English gentleman, who had left his native country at an early day, to make his home in the colonies. George Bradshaw lost his wife shortly after coming over, at the birth of a daughter, whom he christened Faith; and his only other child—she was called Hopeful," glancing up to the portrait, "—was eight years old when little Faith was born,—even at that early age felt the responsibility of her station, and vowed in her little heart to fill a mother's place to her wee baby sister.

"So she grew up, tall and handsome, with fair English complexion and glossy brown hair, and many lovers sighed at her feet; but no one touched her heart; and at the age of twenty-four, a dignified, noble-looking woman, filling her station as mistress of her father's house, then called 'Bradshaw Hall,' she also filled the place of mother to her younger sister.

"There were many visitors who came to the Hall; for old George Bradshaw was of noble family, and kept open house in the true old English fashion; and as it was about this time that the troubles broke out between the colonies and the mother country, the English officers quartered in Boston found it a very pleasant way of passing their time, by driving out here into the country, sitting for hours over their host's wine, and chatting after dinner, with his handsome daughter in the long drawing-room.

"When Faith was sixteen, she came home from boarding-school; for young ladies, even in those early times, learned to play and dance, and embroider in crevel; so Faith came from Boston, very accomplished and beautiful. Her proud old father bought a spinnet and placed it in the best room, for Faith's little white fingers to make music upon; and she had a costly embroidery-frame; and dinner-parties were given, and new dresses bought; and Hopeful was very proud of her younger sister; nothing was too good or expensive for Faith.

"There was a brave, handsome English officer—Sir Henry Dudley, the eldest son of an earl—a tall, grave-looking man of thirty years—who had been much to the Hall, and seemed to pay court to Hopeful Bradshaw. If Hopeful was flattered by his notice, she didn't show it much; she was always so quiet and dignified-like.

"Well, the next week after Faith came home, there was a great dinner-party made for her; and she looked like a picture, in her blue brocade, and with geranium leaves in her thick brown hair; and from the first of it, when Sir Henry Dudley stood leaning over Hopeful's chair, and proud old George Bradshaw led in his youngest daughter to present her to the company, the English officer was ready to go down upon his knees for admiration of her. And Faith, pleased as any school-girl would be at so brilliant a conquest, returned his courtly salutation with a coquettish toss of her little vain head, and sat down at Sir Henry's right hand, as though the place belonged to her; while Hopeful took her station at the head of the table.

"And so they had a long and sumptuous dinner; and the elder officers lingered over their roasts and puddings, and told such long stories—and little Faith was much elated when an old general praised her rosy cheeks, and asked her to drink wine with him,—and chatted like a magpie with Sir Henry, till her little head was completely turned, and her little heart fluttered like a young swallow in its nest; that night she dreamed of nobody but harlots and lords. And when, next morning, Sir Henry sat beside her all the forenoon in the long drawing-room, she played upon the new spinnet, rattled off boarding-school French, and practised a hundred pretty girlish ways, till the proud English officer went away with his wise head as completely turned as hers.

"And so, day after day, he came to the Hall; and while Hopeful went about the house with her bunch of keys, overseeing the servants and the cooking, and keeping pretty Faith's nice dresses in order, they two sat all the long mornings together, reading or singing, or talking, or walked under the shady lindens in the garden; till at last, one day Sir Henry was closeted a half hour with old Mr. Bradshaw, and then little Faith was called in, and her proud father put her hand into Sir Henry's, and told her she would be the future Lady Dudley.

"And then the news came out; the betrothal was announced at a great party, and an early day was set for the wedding. I don't know what gay, giddy Faith would have done without 'Sister Hopeful' then! Very sure it is that nothing would ever have been accomplished, if she had not, in her own way, looked after everything—cut out linen, directed seamstresses, and with her own fingers put the last stitches to the wedding-dress, which had been cut over for Faith, from the stiff white brocade their mother had worn at her own wedding. And in the rejoicings and preparations, nobody noticed how pale Hopeful was getting—how the color faded from her cheek and she grew thinner day by day—excepting once, when her father said, "You mustn't work so hard, daughter, for our little Faith," and then Hopeful only smiled and said, with a bright blush, "O, I shall get rest enough by-and-by, after the wedding is over."

"Well, the day came at last, and everything went on smoothly and happily. Faith looked like a white rose—I've heard about it a hundred times, how beautiful my moth—I mean Faith—looked on her wedding-day; and they said that Hopeful never had seemed in better spirits, nor so much the counterpart of the portrait on the wall—the same one that hangs there, girls—it was painted when Hopeful was twenty;" and our eyes again involuntarily rested on the pictured face.

"There was a great company—and they were married by a clergyman in his bands and gown—and married with a ring, too; not much like the way they hurry folks through their weddings these times," and grandma sighed, and unconsciously slipped round a plain, old-fashioned gold band, that for over fifty years she had worn upon her wedding-finger. "And then they had cake and wine, and a great dinner; and everybody danced in the evening; and old George Bradshaw led off the dance himself with a great lady;—but there, children, you all know what a wedding is, or expect to, one of these days, and so I'll tell no more about this—only they do manage things so different, these days!" And grandma sighed again.

"Well, for a month or two, things went on pleasant with the young couple, for they loved each other dearly. But poor Faith wasn't ordained to see much comfort in her married life; for, as I said, it was about that time that the war broke out, and shortly after the marriage, Sir Henry was called to take command of his company, and poor Faith was left alone with father and sister again. Battle followed battle;—you all know how it was in those Revolutionary times, children—and many brave and noble men, both captains and soldiers, were stricken down in the noonday of life; and neither his rank, his young wife, nor anything, could save Sir Henry. He was shot down by a cannon-ball, in a skirmish, on the very day one year from his marriage; and he never saw the son born to him within the hour when they brought Faith news of her husband's death.

"For many weeks the poor creature lay between life and death; and for months, she could only see his dear, handsome head, all mangled and bloody; and when she sat at the grave where they buried him, she prayed to die.

"But grief doesn't always kill," went on grandma; "for, though Faith mourned long and truly, and thought she never, never could love anybody else, but would only live for her boy's sake—eight years after, when Alfred was a fine lad, and the Revolution was over, she married a rich sea-captain, and many other children came to be brothers and sisters to Alfred Dudley."

"Alfred Dudley? Why, grandma, you are telling us about grandpapa—" I began; but lively Jenny Wilder, intent only upon the romance of the story, exclaimed:

"But Hopeful Bradshaw, grandma—what became of her? Can't I guess right?—she never married—but always lived—the good, kind maiden sister; for, grandma, didn't she love Sir Henry?"

"Yes, dear, you are right," said grandma, with a half smile and a half sigh. "You have guessed, child, what neither Faith nor her father suspected all her life—though she fainted dead away, and dropped like a stone, when they brought news of Sir Henry's death. She did love the handsome English officer; and he loved her, till the beautiful younger sister came, with fresh cheeks, winning ways, and girlish prattle, and won his heart away. But she kept her secret well; she never, by word or look, reproached him for his broken faith; for, though no betrothal vow had passed between them, yet his glances and attentions had given her assurance that he loved her. And Faith never knew how hard the struggle going on under Hopeful's quiet, almost cold exterior.

"Never judge wholly by appearances, children!—you can't always tell if others care for you. Many's the girl who'd a-died for him who was as dear to her as her own heart, but was too proud to show it, or, maybe, was playful and mischievous, and liked to tease her lover," and here a meaning glance shot from grandma's eyes in the direction of Jenny Wilder, who, just at that moment, seemed bent on withdrawing her hand from Harry's imprisoning grasp.

"In some cases, it may be right to cover it up," went on grandma. "Hopeful did just right. But such don't happen very often; and, dears, it's always best to act up to what your heart teaches. It's a great deal better to love and be loved in the world, than go through it cold and lonely;" here Jenny's hand slid quietly back into Harry's; "to love, even if you're never loved in return—so Hopeful Bradshaw thought; and it was known at last how faithful she had been all her life long to her one love, when, as she lay upon her death-bed, with the frosts of seventy winters in her hair, they found upon her bosom an old miniature, painted on ivory, bearing the features of a young and handsome man, dressed in the uniform of a British officer, with bright gilt epaulets on his shoulders—Sir Henry Dudley."

"I thought so!" cried Lou, softly; while Jenny said never a word, but sat very quiet, with glistening eyes, and I fancied that Harry's hand clasped hers tighter.

"Yes, Hopeful had always loved him; and when Faith stood by her coffin, and took up the miniature from her breast to look at it long and sadly ere she laid it back again, she turned away and said, in a thick, husky voice—"God is just. She has gone first to meet him, and it is well. She loved him better than I did!" Girls, I couldn't help crying like a baby to see her—"

"You, grandma! Did you know Hopeful, and Faith? You don't mean—" but Lou Allston was interrupted.

"Yes, dear, I did know Hopeful. Don't you see how, child? Alfred Dudley grew to be a man, and a good, noble man he was, too; and he asked me to become his wife; so Faith became my mother-in-law, and Aunt Hopeful has tossed my children and rocked them to sleep many and many a time." And the old lady smiled and stroked Lou's bright curls.

Lou's blue eyes dilated with astonishment for a moment; then with a long-drawn breath and a half sigh, she said:

"O dear! I never thought that Faith could grow old, or lose all her beauty; and her children should grow up about her, and they, too, should grow old in their turn. I shall always think of her as a young, beautiful English girl; and of Hopeful as quiet, noble-looking and dignified, as she is in the portrait there. I shall always keep them young in my heart, Grandma Dudley."

"Yes, dear, so you can. It's the way we all do; keep all who dwell in our hearts young; age cannot touch them there. But Hopeful and Faith—they've been dead this many a year! and Alfred's gone before me—it won't be long before grandma'll be laid beside them out there, children!" And the old lady pointed from the east window to a hill, where, cold and bright in the moonlight, gleamed one or two white marble headstones in the old family burying-ground, under a grove of firs. "We've all got to die."

Lou shuddered, and rising, dropped the full moon curtain over the window; and Jenny Wilder, nestling closer, buried her face on Harry's shoulder, and wept silently.

"There, don't cry, dear," said grandma, rising slowly, and resting her thin, withered hand on the girl's brown braids. "I know death is gloomy to the young and the beloved; but we've got a good Father, and a blessed Saviour, and a home, up there," and she raised her finger, "up there, in heaven, when life's journey's through. Good night—God keep you all, children!" And, leaning on her cane, the old lady passed slowly from the apartment.

An hour later, Harry Allston's sleigh stood at the broad front door-steps, and the bells rung out a tide of wild jingling melody on the clear evening air, as his horse pawed the snowy path, impatient to be away. And as the girls stood muffled in furs and hoods, and Jenny's warm kiss was on my cheek as she bade me good night, Hal cried out, in his loud, cheery voice:

"Do come away, and don't keep a poor fellow in the cold, all night, Jenny! Look here, Mac! wouldn't it be a capital idea to write up Grandma Dudley's story into one for Ballou?"

What do you think of Hal's query, Mr. Editor?

EXECUTION AT MARSEILLES.

Matracchia, the Italian, who was some short time back condemned to death by the Court of Assizes of Aix, for a series of extraordinary murders at Marseilles, has been executed in the latter city. He begged, as a special favor, that he might be accompanied by one of his friends, a countryman, who had been with him all the morning, and that his parrot, which was in a cage in his cell, might be taken with him to the scaffold. Both these requests were granted, and he was placed in a van, the chaplain being in attendance on him. Arrived at the scaffold, which was erected in the Place St. Michel, and which was surrounded by an immense crowd, consisting of at least 30,000 persons, the vehicle stopped, and the cage containing the parrot was, to the surprise of the spectators, first placed on the scaffold; the criminal, his friend and the chaplain then alighted from the van. Matracchia cast a glance at the guillotine, and embraced several persons who were present. Then, supported by his friend and the chaplain, he ascended the steps of the scaffold, and in doing so, it was observed that he slightly trembled. When he reached the platform, he kissed with great fervor the crucifix which the chaplain presented; then he embraced the chaplain and his friend, and then turning to the parrot, he said in Italian, "Your master is about to die, and he embraces you for the last time." Afterwards he advanced towards the front of the scaffold, and cried to the people—"I demand pardon of the inhabitants of Marseilles for the scandal I have occasioned. Pray for me, for in a few minutes I shall pray for you." He was then seized by the executioner, and in a few seconds all was over.—Liverpool Mail.

GENUINE BENEVOLENCE.

For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him.—Rom. 10: 12.

A late archbishop of Bordeaux was remarkable for his tolerance and enlightened benevolence. The following anecdote is illustrative of this trait in his character:

"My lord," said a person to him one day, "here is a poor woman come to ask charity; what do you wish me to do for her?"

"How old is she?"

"Seventy."

"Is she in great distress?"

"She says so."

"She must be believed; give her twenty-five francs."

"Twenty-five francs! My lord, it is too much, especially as she is a Jewess."

"A Jewess?"

"Yes, my lord."

"O, that makes a great difference. Give her fifty francs, and thank her for coming."

INSECTS FOR MEDICINES.

Insects once occupied a place as important as herbs in the list of sovereign remedies. To take a wood-louse or millipedes, perhaps, alive and conveniently self-rolled for the occasion, was as common as to take a vegetable pill. Five gnats were administered with as much confidence as three grains of calomel. In an alarming fit of colic, no visitor with a draught of peppermint could have been more cordially welcomed or swallowed than a lady-bird. Fly-water was eye-water, and even that water-shinning monster, hydrophobia, was urged to lap apud pura by the administration of a dry cockchafer. Like other drugs and drugs, these have all had their day in the world of medicine, but have left behind them that salutary biter, Cantharidis, or Spanish flies of Europe, and the Meloe Chironi, used by the natives of the Celestial Empire for the same purpose of drawing off terrestrial humors.—Episodes of Insect Life.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE OLD CLOCK IN THE CORNER.

BY AMANDA F. WATSON.

I sit alone in the darkness,
With the midnight all around,
And list as the clock in the corner
Ticks on with a solemn sound,
And an awe is o'er me stealing,
As I sit in the twilight gloom—
The voice of the Past has awakened,
The whisper fills all the room.

The clock ticks on, and the whisper
Is talking of days gone by,
When a youthful bridegroom and bride,
With hopes of the brightest day,
Made this same roof that's o'er me
A sheltering ark of love:
And this clock a mentor to tell them
How fast Time's footsteps move.

The clock ticks on, and the whisper
Is telling how many a day
Together they toiled, all hopeful,
And never fell out by the way;
And it tells of innocent prattle,
And wee, little pattering feet,
That filled all the house with glory,
And their hearts with joy complete.

The clock ticks on, and the whisper
Tells of the prattling band,
Each day growing older and fairer,
Led on by Love's guardian hand;
It tells of the tomb and the bride,
How closely together they came:
Some early were crowned for the altar,
And almost as early the tomb.

The clock ticks on, and the whisper
Tells how that bridegroom and bride
Lived on till their locks were silvery,
Then one by one they died.
And it, it tells, as I listen,
With a painfully throbbing heart,
How the silver life-chords are riven,
And the immortal gems depart.

I sit alone in the darkness,
While the few that are left to me
Are roaming in dreams with the loved ones
They will waken in vain to see;
But I hope, and my spirit grows brighter,
When life's fitful slumber is o'er,
We may waken some morning in heaven,
And find all the loved gone before.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

A writer in a late number of the North British Review observes: "Instead of educating every girl as though she were born to be an independent, self-supporting member of society, we educate her to become a mere dependent, a hanger-on, or, as the law delicately phrases it, a chattel. In some respects, indeed, we err more barbarously than those nations among whom a plurality of wives is permitted, and who regard women purely as so much live stock; for among such people women are, at all events, provided with shelter, with food and clothing—they are 'cared' for as cattle are. There is a completeness in such a system. But among ourselves, we treat women as cattle, without providing for them as cattle. We take the worst part of barbarism and the worst part of civilization, and work them into a heterogeneous whole. We bring up our women to be dependent, and then leave them without any one to depend upon. There is no one, there is nothing for them to lean upon, and they fall to the ground. Now, what every woman, no less than every man, should have to depend upon, is an ability, after some fashion or other, to turn labor into money. She may or may not be compelled to exercise it, but every one ought to possess it. If she belong to the richer classes, she may have to exercise it; if to the poorer, she assuredly will."

THE MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

The solid rock which turns the edge of the chisel, bears forever the impress of the leaf and the acorn, received long, long since, ere it had become hardened by time and the elements. If we trace back to its fountain the mighty torrent which fertilizes the land with its copious streams, or sweeps over it with a devastating flood, we shall find it dripping in crystal drops from some mossy crevice among the distant hills; so, too, the gentle feelings and affections that enrich and adorn the heart, and the mighty passions that sweep away all the barriers of the soul and desolate society, may have sprung up in the infant bosom in the sheltered retirement of home. "I should have been an atheist," said John Randolph, "if it had not been for one recollection; and that was the memory of the time, when my departed mother used to take my little hands in hers, and caused me on my knees to say—"Our Father which art in Heaven!"—N. Y. Independent.

ONE DOLLAR! WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR
BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 80,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us right subscribers at eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the same copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

CHARLES SWAIN, THE POET.

We embrace the occasion of the publication of an elegant diamond edition of the writings of this popular English poet, by Messrs. Whittemore, Niles and Hall of this city, to present our readers with a portrait and a brief biographical sketch of the author. Charles Swain was born in Manchester, England, in the year 1803, and is still a resident of that busy city. His father was originally a man of large fortune, but his habits were so prodigal that at the time of his death, which occurred when the subject of our sketch was but six years old, his family was in very straitened circumstances. The mother of the poet was the daughter of a French physician, and was born in the city of Paris. To his Gallic blood Swain is probably indebted for the sparkling vivacity of his lyrics and for his cheerfulness in the hard struggles of life. While at school he gave decided evidence of ability, but his scholastic career was limited by the necessity of earning a livelihood. At fifteen he was placed in the dye-works of his maternal uncle, and thenceforth he was dependent on his own exertions for the acquirements of knowledge and accomplishments. While residing with his uncle he had access to a large library, and employed his time profitably in possessing himself of its literary treasures. After fourteen years' service in the dye-works, he joined the firm of Lockett & Co., engravers, of Manchester, and afterwards purchased an interest in the business which he still retains. His first volume of poems, published in 1827, under the title of "Metrical Essays," was a decided success, and confirmed the reputation he had previously won as a contributor to the London Literary Gazette and other journals. In 1831 he published another volume with the poor title of the "Mind and other Poems," which was very favorably received. His "Dryburgh Abbey," a poem upon the death of Sir Walter Scott, written and published in 1832, and included in the Boston edition of his poems, has enjoyed a circulation equal to that of any single poem of modern times. It is one of his finest productions—original in conception, melodious in versification, and full of forcible expressions. It recalls the characters created by the "Wizard of the North," and they move in solemn procession at the wave of the enchanter's wand. In the year 1847, Mr. Swain published his "Dramatic Chapters and other Poems." Two years later appeared the "English Melodies," the most popular of all his volumes, and four years afterwards, the "Letters of Laura D'Auvergne and other Poems." He was married in 1827, and has four children living. Henry T. Tuckerman presents us with a very interesting picture of the poet's home in his "Month in England." "The fine shops and nutritive 'Albion' of Manchester could not long beguile me; and, as it wanted two hours of the time to start, I determined to seek the dwelling of a poet whose very name was a refreshment to the mind in this sooty hive of prosperous activity. It was with a feeling of infinite relief that I rode forth from those dusky and crowded streets, and entered the lane wherein stands the cottage of Charles Swain. Many of his songs had been wafted by their own aerial sweetness across the sea; and his felicitous description of Scott's funeral, attended by a procession of the romancer's immortal characters, is too graphic a tribute to genius not to be recalled with delight. I entered the family circle—thoroughly English in its geniality—just as they had assembled for lunch. The house is bounded by a snug garden of trees and flowers; the rooms are hung with choice engravings; all around and within indicated comfort and taste, and when I met the dark eye of my friend, I imagined myself in the villa of a cordial Tuscan. The books, the pictures, the hospitable guide wife, the unaffected and blooming girls, the cheerful old lady by the fireside, and the retirement and quiet suddenly encountered, were all the more charming from the idea of noisy, toilsome, smoke enveloped Manchester so near in fact, so distant in fancy. I was conscious of a peculiar satisfaction at the thought that the poetic instinct could thus isolate a man of soul, whose lot was cast amidst the most utilitarian scenes. It was a cheering reflection, that, at evening, this brave aspirant could leave behind him the turbid city, and here yield himself to letters, love, and song. How potent are fancy and affection to redeem material life; and how independent are intellectual resources and earnest sentiment of the work-day world. I honored the enlightened will which led him thus to dedicate his leisure to his family, nature, and the Muses." Charles Swain is emphatically the poet of home. The domestic affection, the gentler emotions, the trials and joys arising from the relations of father and children, husband and wife, these have inspired him with some of his sweetest songs. Without a particle of affectation or of sickly sentimentality, he is a man of pure and elevated feeling. His verse flows like a calm river, reflecting images of peace and beauty, with sometimes a soft cloud-shadow, but oftener a gush of warm sunshine on its tide. It has none of the turbulence or turbidity of the torrent. In these days of words—words—words—exaggerated expressions, forced sentiments, and enigmatical language, with ideas signifying in carnival costume, it is a great merit of our poet that his style is so pure and pellucid, simple and unaffected. His lyrics cost no effort to the memory, and they will be remembered when many more brilliant productions are forgotten. In the collection before us is one of our favorite pieces, entitled "The Cottage Door." We quote it as a specimen of the graceful and easy style of the poet.

Charles Swain

The starry silence falls
Along my sylvan way,
A spirit walks the earth,
We never meet by day;
And listening to the voice
Of years that are no more,
My feet—O, know'st thou why?
Have wandered to thy door.

The quiet taper burns
And makes thy casement bright,
And soft thy shadow falls
Between me and the light;
I gaze as on a shrine
My heart would bend before;
My couch had seen no rest,
Had I not seen thy door.

The Night, as if to breathe,
Her starry curtain parts;
The very air seems faint
With breath of lovers' hearts:
Some spirit robes the earth
In light that heaven wore;
Or is that light thine own?
And is that heaven thy door?

KAW (KANSAS) INDIANS AT WASHINGTON.

The characteristic group on this page represents an interview which took place at Washington, D. C., between a delegation of Kaw Indians from Kansas, and the commissioner of Indian affairs, in the office of the latter. The Indians arrived at the federal city about the time of the inauguration, and the delegation consisted of four warriors and their interpreter, a half-breed. The chiefs, as will be seen in the sketch, wore their striking war-dresses, and their faces were gorgeously painted. The two seated at the right hand of the sketch are "Great Elk" and "Little Dog," the two others are "Buffalo" and "Fleet Deer." The usual ceremonial was observed at the interview. They all made speeches. The amount of their talk was that they were candidates for the chieftainship of their tribe, and wished their "Great Father" to compel their countrymen to acknowledge their authority. The commissioner was indisposed to afford them encouragement, and sent them back with a speech in which he pretty strongly expressed his dissatisfaction. The red-skins, after this, will not probably repeat their visit to the Federal City.

KAW INDIANS OF KANSAS, BEFORE THE U. S. COMMISSIONER AT WASHINGTON.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

RAILROAD.—The Ohio and Mississippi Railroad is completed between Cincinnati and St. Louis.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A THOUGHT.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

But yesternight my heart was sad;
Dark shadows of repented wrongs,
Although repented, came in throngs,
Prosaging sorrow, sombre clad.

No light of hope could pierce the gloom
Which cast its baleful shadow there:
Nor seemed there hope of aught in prayer
To break away the clouds of doom.

Thus passed the night; 'tis morning now,
And nature's voices through the air
Come sweetly, driving off the care
Which made its impress on my brow:

The shadows of the night have fled,
With them have passed away my fears,
My gloomy doubts. My heart appears
No more inanimate and dead.

O, bear ye up, ye souls that yearn
For hope deferred; and see no day:
The sun of joy with cheering ray
Will surely unto earth return.

DUTY.

Serene will be our days and bright,
And happy will our nature be,
When love is an unerring light,
And joy its own security.
And they a blissful course may hold,
Even now, who, not unwisely bold,
Live in the spirit of this creed;
Yet find that other strength, according to their need.

WORDSWORTH.

BEAUTY.

For her own person,
It beggared all description; she did lie
In her pavilion,
O'erplotting that Venus, where we see
The fancy out-work Nature.—SHAKESPEARE.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Miss Heron's play of "Camille," translated from the French of Alexandre Dumas, Jr., was strongly and decidedly condemned by some of the most influential papers of this city, as an immoral production. It was peculiarly unfortunate that such a play should have been produced in America, and attracted large audiences, just at a time when the drama was finding advocates in the pulpit, and when, after a long struggle, the immoral exorcism of the theatre had been lopped away. Little is gained by transferring spectacles of vice from the auditorium to the stage. The play of "Camille" merits the reprehension with which it has been visited. . . . Luther Colburn, of Needham, the defendant in a trespass suit, lately committed suicide rather than go into court. The treatment to which witnesses are sometimes subjected on the stand is enough to drive nervous people to distraction. . . . The two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Jamestown, Virginia, was celebrated lately in excellent style. . . . The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, of this city, is an offshoot of an ancient military organization of the same name in London, of which Prince Albert is the present commander. Pleasant relations exist between the corps, and at the late dinner of the "Ancients" here, a courteous letter from Prince Albert was read. . . . We have to add to our list of very aged people who have died recently, that of Rebecca Carlton, the oldest person in New Hampshire, who died, lately, at the age of 104 years. She was born in the town of Dover. Her husband served in the war of the Revolution, and has been dead some years. She was the mother of eight children, all of whom are living—the youngest over sixty years of age. . . . A female child, three weeks old, was recently deserted by its mother, at Dunleath, Iowa. Two married men who had no children desired to adopt it, and to settle the question, procured a dice-box and raffled for it. This reminds us of Jimmy Twitcher, in the play of the "Golden Farmer," who, when asked about his parentage, says—"I never had no father and no mother—my Aunt Nancy won me at a raffie." . . . A priest asked a soldier at confession, if he had fasted. "Only too much, father," he replied. "I have sometimes been eight days without breaking bread." "But if you had had it, you would have eaten it?" "Of course." "Ah, my son," said the confessor, "Heaven takes no pleasure in these compulsory fasts." "Nor I either," replied the soldier. . . . A very tedious preacher set almost all his audience to sleep while discoursing of the Beatitudes. "You omitted one," said a lady, "Blessed are those who did not hear your sermon!" . . . Grimm told a capital story of M. de la Monnaye, in his "Literary Correspondence." He was enormously fat, and one day, in the pit of the opera house, a person who sat near him, and was incommoded by his rotundity, said, "When a man is built in a certain manner, he ought not to come here." "Sir," said de la Monnaye, "every one can't be a fat." . . . Mme. Geoffrin was passionately fond of children, and believed in their good influence. She said that if all condemned criminals were asked if they had ever loved children, she was sure they would answer in the negative. . . . Fontenelle was extravagantly fond of asparagus, particularly dressed with oil. One of his friends, who liked it served with butter, came to dine with him one day, and Fontenelle, making a great sacrifice on the altar of friendship, ordered the cook to dress half the asparagus with butter. Before taking their places at table, the guest (the Abbe Terrasson) fell down in an apoplectic fit. Fontenelle rushed instantly to the kitchen, and bawled out to the cook, "Serve it all up with oil!" . . . Nine tenths of the clergymen in this country are inadequately remunerated for their services. Among the ways of increasing the minister's salary, the Knoxville Whig suggests that all members of his congregation hand over what they now pay for liquor, cigars and tobacco. . . . There is a genius in Schenectady who writes a four months' note on the ice with skates with such precision, that in less than an hour the sun liquidates it. But it certainly can't be called a note of hand. . . . A correspondent of the Boston Traveller, writing from Beyrout, in Syria, gives the Arabs a very pretty character. He says:—"Does one doubt the doctrine of total depravity, as taught at Andover and in the Westminster Catechism? Let the unbeliever live six months, or six weeks only, among the Arabs, and he will confess that total does not express it. Such lying, cheating, robbing, murderous wretches the sun never looked down upon. Thousands of years back they were as bad as they could be; and they have been growing worse ever since." There is no reservation in that. We shouldn't like to be an Arab dragoman asking the writer for a "character." . . . Mr. Barry, of the Boston Theatre, did nobly

In giving us, in succession, two such stars as Edwin Booth and Matilda Heron. . . . A lady, now-a-days, can dress quite respectably for a moderate sum. You can buy a very decent bridal dress for a thousand dollars, and fifteen thousand will purchase quite a superior camel's hair shawl at Stewart's. New York. . . . Henry Russell, the well-known ballad singer, is about to visit this country, but he goes to Canada first. He first made a reputation and fortune in America, and then, on his return to England, he, singular to say, abused the Americans roundly, burlesquing them at his concerts, and filling his pockets with money at their expense. It will be rather a cool operation in him to ask us for our patronage. . . . Secret societies of all kinds are said to be increasing in France, the aims of which are supposed to be political, and their existence is said to be very annoying to the peace of the Emperor Louis Napoleon. The government officials find it impossible to follow them up, and they are said to be more rife than at any period since the revolution. There will be a volcanic political outburst in France before a great while. . . . It would seem as if America were the country for long life. We are every day called to chronicle some case of extraordinary longevity. There is a man in Columbus county, Wisconsin, called "Old Creole," who was married at New Orleans a hundred years ago, and is now in his 130th year—living with a grandson 60 years old. . . . A curious case of ingratitude lately occurred in Paris. A celebrated physician and surgeon performed an operation on a blind man, as an act of charity, and fully restored him to sight. In a few days the blind man sued the doctor for destroying his profession as a blind man, and taking tools, laying damages at twenty thousand francs. . . . The year closing with March was, we are happy to learn, a prosperous one for the American Bible Society. Its receipts were $441,805, which exceeds by nearly $49,000 the receipts of the previous year; and it has distributed 740,000 copies of the Scriptures, an excess of 198,000 over the previous year. Contributions have come in from every State and territory in the Union. New York contributed nearly one-third. . . . The Post knows an oldish young lady, not a hundred miles from the North End, who thinks she would enjoy herself on the Kiss-me River in Florida. On hearing this remark, one of her neighbors, of the same sex, exclaimed, "I'll bet a thousand dollars she'd remove the Seminole." . . . In one of the country theatres in the interior of the State of New York, Shakespeare's "Hamlet" was performed for the first time—at the end of the play one or two, who knew what's what, made loud cries for the "author." The manager, who was formerly a grocer, and but slightly posted in such matters, assured the audience that the author was not in the house, and he presumed modestly kept him at home. . . . When the Pilgrims were coming to this country in the Mayflower, whites showed themselves, and one being fired at, the gun exploded, when the whale "gave a sniff and away, thanks be to God!" The New Bedford and Nantucket whalers of the present day would hardly offer up thanks for such an occurrence. . . . One of Willis's correspondents sends him the following item about "American Walking":—"A highly educated traveller made a singular remark to me the other day. He says the Americans all walk with shaky knees—not putting the foot firmly down before they take the other step. I looked at Broadway for a day or two, and I really think it is generally true. It is apparently a habit acquired by hurry and thoughtless neglect. Not one man in twenty fairly straightens his leg as he walks. The knee-muscles consequently stiffen with a head outward. . . . The Boston Post tells the following story, almost too good to be true:—"A country lad says his Uncle Ben made a scarecrow so very frightful, that one of the black-feathered thieves actually went and brought back all the corn he had stolen during several days. . . . The truth of the following sentiment will be fully realized at this season of blooming flowers and rural pleasures:—"A garden is a place of healing to the soul. It would seem as if from the growth of leaves, and flowers, and shrubs, there exhaled a silent dew, which brought comfort to the heart blistered in the sultry suns of life. The intercourse of men and women is often harsh and clashing. Little irritations, like nettles, lie hid along the paths—but the silent growth of a garden communes without speech, and every leaf becomes a leaf of healing." . . . We hear that some of the French residents of New York talk of getting up a military company costumed like the French Zouaves. A corps clad in Oriental dress will be a picturesque addition to the appearance of the New York military on festival days. . . . Complaints are made of shocking outrages upon Christians, in several instances, in Turkey, where they have attempted to exercise the privileges lately accorded to them. It will require the most strenuous efforts of the Turkish government to overcome the deep-rooted prejudices of its subjects. . . . Autograph collectors sometimes give high prices for choice specimens. At a recent sale of autographs in Paris, a short letter of Napoleon I. brought $190; one of the great Condé, $90; Maria Antoinette, $60, and Mary Stuart, $100. . . . The most trifling causes often produce the most tremendous results. The horrible atrocities which are being perpetrated by the Indians on the Western border, were started by a squatter's dog. From so slight a beginning an unrelenting war of extermination and destruction is likely to be waged. . . . In Henry Clay's correspondence, there is a kind letter to the Kentucky statesman, written from Washington to a favorite servant. He tells her "to take care of herself first, and the house and furniture afterwards." Such advice would be superfluous to a good many of our latter-day domestics. . . . Wm. S. Chase, of this city, one of our most accomplished scholars and writers, who has resided in Paris for six years past, has returned to this country. He is capable of writing a most captivating volume of foreign reminiscences. . . . D'Israeli says:—"Genius, when young, is divine—the history of heroes is the history of youth." . . . It is a frequent and well-founded complaint, that "superfluous lags the veteran on the stage." An actor, in his dotage, attempting to simulate the vivacity of youth, and a literary genius pouring out at the close of a long life the drivel of senility, are pitiable spectacles. But there are minds over which Time has no power, gifts that age seems to mellow as it does wise. Such is Washington Irving, who, past the allotted boundary of life, continues to produce, in his rural retirement, volumes that enchant the world of to-day, as his earlier writings did the world of half a century ago. . . . In Andover, last year, five dollars premium were offered to the boy who would destroy the largest number of caterpillars' nests—and, in consequence, 20,000 nests were destroyed. This year the premium was increased to fifteen dollars. These pests of the orchard can only be eradicated by combined action. Every man, woman and child should make it a duty to destroy every nest visible—thus the whole breed would be finally exterminated. . . . A novel mode of expressing election returns was adopted in the Ayrshire (England) elections. The distance to be travelled was eleven miles, and a number of swift-footed boys were placed at short distances on the road, who made the trip in thirty five minutes. "Old Q. (the Duke of Queensbury)," once sent a letter, on a wager, fifty miles in an hour. He enclosed the document in a cricket-ball, and stationed a line of excellent players all along the route to be passed over, but in hand. The ball was sent to its destination with the speed of a gale of wind.

CIVIL LIBERTY.

Men are qualified for civil liberty in exact proportion to their disposition to put moral chains upon their own appetites; in proportion as their love to justice is above their rapacity; in proportion as their soundness and sobriety of understanding is above their vanity and presumption; in proportion as they are more disposed to listen to the counsels of the wise and good, in preference to the flattery of knaves. Society cannot exist, unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere; and the less of it there is within, the more there must be without. It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things that men of intemperate minds cannot be free; their passions forge their fetters.—Burke.

Choice Miscellany.

A GARDEN NOVELTY.

The Egyptian pea is an instance of vegetable resurrection, or at least resuscitation. It is a fragment of the old life of Egypt—a true type of the fertility of the classic country of the Nile, and unquestionably the most truly historical of any esculent we possess. The circumstances that led to the discovery of this companion of mummies and inhabitants of pyramids, are in themselves as interesting as the plant is distinct from every known member of its useful family. During the explorations of Egypt by Sir Gardiner Wilkinson, a vase was found in a mummy pit, the age of which was computed at about three thousand years. This vase, hermetically sealed, was presented to the British Museum; Mr. Pettigrew, the librarian to the late Duke of Sussex, proceeded to open the vase to ascertain the contents, and in so doing unfortunately broke it in pieces. The interior contained a mass of dust, and a few grains of wheat and vetches, of a resin yellow color, and as hard as stone. It was known that mummy wheat had been resuscitated after an interment of five thousand years; and it was determined that the first peas ever found in a mummy vase should be subjected to the experiment of a revival. Mr. Pettigrew accordingly distributed amongst his learned friends these desiccated peas, reserving three for himself as mere curiosities. Those who tried to grow the peas failed, and no more was thought about them till the remaining three were given to Mr. Grimstone, of Highgate. Mr. Grimstone tried his hand at them, subjected them to heat and moisture, and, after thirty days, one miserable plant appeared above ground. By patient care and ingenious culture, this plant was brought to produce nineteen pods, which were ripened, and planted the next year; and 'twas the foundation of the stock which is just beginning to be known as the Egyptian pea. Botanists were as much delighted as antiquarians at the success of the experiment; for it gave them a new variety of the greatest value and most distinct character. Its blossom is unlike every other pea; it more nearly resembles a bell than the wings of a butterfly, and is reined with green lines on a white ground. The blossoms break at every joint in clusters of two, four, and eight, and are succeeded by pods that protrude crookedly through them, each pod containing from five to ten peas, which, when cooked, are deliciously flavored, and melt in the mouth like marrow; in fact, there is no pea to equal it. So that dusty Egypt has conferred upon us, through those few shrivelled seeds, a palatial benediction.—National Magazine.

INFLUENCE OF A LITERARY TASTE.

To a young man away from home, friendless and forlorn in a great city, the hours of peril are those between sunset and bedtime—for the moon and stars see more evil in a single hour than the sun in his whole day's circuit. The poet's visions of evening are all composed of tender and soothing images. It brings the wanderer to his home, the child to his mother's arms, the ox to his stall, and the weary laborer to his rest. But to the gentle-hearted youth who is thrown upon the rocks of a pitiless city, and "stands homeless amid a thousand homes," the approach of evening brings with it an aching sense of loneliness and desolation, which comes down upon the spirit like darkness upon the earth. In this mood, his best impulses become a snare to him, and he is led astray because he is social, affectionate, sympathetic and warm-hearted. If there be a young man thus circumstanced within the sound of my voice, let me say to him that books are the friends of the friendless, and that a library is a home to the homeless. A taste for reading will carry you to converse with men who will instruct you by their wisdom, and charm you by their wit; who will soothe you when weary, counsel you when perplexed, and sympathize with you at all times. Evil spirits, in the middle ages, were exorcised and driven away by bell, book and candle; and you want but two of these agents, the book and the candle.—Boston Transcript.

New Publications.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF GERALD MASSEY. Complete in one Volume. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857. 18mo. pp. 301.

Gerald Massey is a born poet. His inspiration has enabled him to surmount the depressing influences of birth and position, and prompted him to pour forth songs, which have found an echo in the great heart of England and America. To his thousands of admirers this beautiful "blue and gold" edition will be warmly welcomed.

ILLUSTRATED SCHOOL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By O. P. QUACKENBOS, A. M. 12mo. pp. 458.

This history, brought down to the present time, is well-written, well-arranged, and admirably illustrated. We trust that it will be extensively introduced into our schools and academies. For sale by Redding & Co.

JANE TALBOT. By CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN. Philadelphia: M. Pollock. 1857. 12mo. pp. 257.

"Jane Talbot" is one of the most effective of Brown's romances, all of which bear the stamp of genius. There is water under this in single volume, so terse is the style, to make three or four duodecimos in the expansive manner of modern writers. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

WAVERLEY NOVELS. Household Edition. The Antiquary. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 2 vols., 12mo. 1857.

This splendid edition of the Waverley Novels is creating a sensation far and wide, and the punctuality with which they are issued is highly creditable to the publishers. The first of these volumes is illustrated by a fine steel engraving from a design by Darley, representing the antiquary surrounded by his cherished antiquities, and the second by a vivid scene—the "Escape of Miss Wardour."

BLEAK HOUSE. By CHARLES DICKENS. 2 vols., 12mo. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson.

These volumes are illustrated by Phiz and Cruikshank, and are equal in elegance to the others of this series—the edition, emphatically, of Dickens's works, which no American household should be without. For sale by Shepard, Clark & Brown.

THE BORDER ROVER. By EMERSON BENNETT. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. 1 vol., 12mo.

The scenes of this romance are laid in Kansas and the neighboring frontier, and it is full of stirring incidents, graphically narrated. For sale by Shepard, Clark & Brown.

HINTS CONCERNING CHURCH MUSIC. By JAMES M. HEWES. Boston: A. Williams & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 180.

A portion of these essays, originally published in the Boston Transcript, attracted great attention, and they are well worthy of the reputation they have created.

EDGAR HUNTER, or, Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker. By CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN. Philadelphia: M. Pollock. 1857.

Mr. Pollock's republication of Brown's novels is meeting with deserved success. "Edgar Hunter" is one of the best, and its intense interest commands it to every class of readers.

NEW MUSIC.—We have received from Russell & Richardson, the "Grand March," by Adolph Baumbach; Ronelio, No. 3, in G, by Beethoven; "Love on, Love on," the admired ballad sung by Mrs. Wood, in the drama of the "Marble Heart;" "A Song without Words;" "Fanny in her Grave;" "The Lover's Triumph Polka;" "The Prairie Polka;" "Al Cirio le Cingete;" (Come, deck her fair tresses), by Pacini.—From Oliver Ditson, we have received the "Camille Polka," by George Danckin.

EASYLY DONE.—There is not a village or town in the country so small, but that a club of twelve subscribers might be easily obtained for "Ballou's Pictorial," and the work be thus procured for each at two pence a year, besides a gratis copy to the person who sends the names and money. Any person desiring to form a club, can have sample copies sent free of charge, by sending us a line to that effect.

Editorial Melange.

The governor of Pennsylvania has signed bills increasing the banking capital of that State to the extent of $3,420,000. — A letter from Hamburg of the 15th ult. says that on the day before, upwards of four thousand emigrants were collected at that port to embark for the United States. They generally came from Holstein and Mecklenburg, and the mountainous districts of Central Germany. — The quantity of public lands sold and located in the State of Wisconsin, up to the 30th June, 1857, exceeds nine millions of acres. — Napoleon is indebted to foreign countries for two dear pets in his family—his wife and his horse—the former being from Spain, and the latter from the United States. And for their position they are indebted to the same quality—beauty. When this is gone, both will make way for others. — The St. Paul, Minnesota, Advertiser says the landlords of that place have this season advanced their rates for stores and dwellings from twenty to thirty per cent. over the prices demanded for the same buildings last year, and think themselves justified in doing so by the increase of business and emigration in prospect. — The Bordeaux Journal of Medicine says that M. Kuhn found that vaccination performed on infants the second, third or fourth day after a previous vaccination, always succeeded. — In Washington, Me., lately, Mary A. Hoke, a young lady twenty years of age, who was suffering from a severe toothache, arose from her bed, and building a fire upon the hearth, lay down before it. In a few minutes she dropped asleep, when her clothes took fire, and she was so severely burned that she died three days after. — The Duke of Wellington is announced as chairman of the next annual meeting (dinner) of the London Printers' Pension Society. He has never exhibited any literary tendencies; while his father, the Iron Duke, was a great reader as well as a very voluminous writer. — The total number of emigrants sent to Liberia since the foundation of the American Colonization Society in 1820, is stated to be 9502, of whom 3676 were born free, and 5826 emancipated with a view to emigration. — The citizens of Roxbury, Conn., are about to erect a monument to the memory of Colonel Seth Warner, a revolutionary patriot and gallant leader of the "Green Mountain Boys," whose remains repose in that town. The legislature appropriated $750, and the citizens contributed $250 for the same purpose. — Cassius M. Clay has lately buried a promising son, bearing his own name. — A crazy woman got on a train of cars at Columbus, Ohio, recently, and ran through them, brandishing a club and creating considerable alarm. The conductor nabbed her, when she turned upon him, and beat him terribly with the club. Others came to the rescue, but she was more than a match for a dozen men, for some minutes. She was finally overpowered and secured. — The New Hampshire owners of Young Morrill back that horse for $4900 against Ethan Allen, and the race will probably come off in October, on the Long Island course. — The Winsted Herald says: "Two chaps, on a late Sabbath evening, returned into Pleasant Valley from a stroll out on the mountains, with eighteen large snakes of different sorts swinging upon a pole on their shoulders."

CHINESE SOLDIERS.

The military forces of China are estimated at more than 800,000 men. In their army, rank is hereditary. A soldier can only retire when his son is in a position to replace him; if he has no son of his own, he is at liberty to adopt one. It is allowed to enter the service at as early an age as fifteen. Gunpowder has been in use among the Chinese from time immemorial; nevertheless, the Chinese artillery is far from being as perfect as that of Europe. The balls originally used by the Chinese artillerymen were made of clay dried and hardened. In times of peace, the soldiers are dispersed over the whole empire, and, in addition to their pay, they are at liberty to cultivate the portions of land that are allotted to them. They are generally employed by the state in public works, or making roads, and in preparing the banks of rivers. Their arms consist of sabres, swords, pikes, muskets, bows and arrows. In times of war, they receive helmets of iron, cuirasses they wear quilted and wadded, and shields of bamboo wickerwork. From the very commencement of a campaign, the Chinese endeavor to get possession of the hostile commanders, either by force or by stratagem.

FIENDISH.—At Naples there is a demon in human shape, a police ruffian, by the name of Espagnolis, who, by means of ropes attached to the feet and neck of the prisoners under examination, and gradually tightened by machinery, bends the body backwards, in the shape of a bow. He began life as executioner at Milan, and on account of his proficiency and ingenuity, his majesty has made this demon an inspector of the first class.

HOTELS AT ST. LOUIS.—Two large and fine hotels—the Southern and Laclede—are to be erected in St. Louis immediately. They are both to be built by companies. The Southern has been organized some time. The amount of stock subscribed for the erection of the Laclede Hotel is at least $300,000.

THE FRUIT SEASON.—Accounts from all quarters of the South and West represent that there will probably be a good yield of fruit of all kinds, notwithstanding the unseasonable spring weather.

Wayside Gatherings.

There are 1000 professional rag pickers in New York, some of whom have accumulated fortunes and live in splendid mansions. The return train from the railroad opening at Memphis, ran from Memphis to Savannah, 750 miles, in fifty-two hours.

There was a large seal captured in the North River, near West Point, lately, by Mr. Ward of that place. It measured four feet in length.

Patrick Delvin, a drunken loafer at Philadelphia, threw a stone at a crowd of boys who were annoying him in the streets, and killed Ellen W. Crossin, a pretty little girl, three years old.

A woman died at Manchester, near Pittsburgh, Pa., lately, who had not tasted a mouthful of food for five weeks. She labored under the impression that her friends were trying to poison her.

Hon. John G. Montgomery of Pennsylvania, has died of the National Hotel disease, and the collector of Philadelphia is very ill from the same cause.

At the great railroad jubilee at Memphis, Tenn., on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, a quantity of water from the Atlantic Ocean was poured into the Mississippi to commemorate the union of the roads.

A little girl of twelve or thirteen, at Arabkir, among the Armenians in Turkey, who has learned to read the New Testament, and has become a zealous convert, is boldly preaching not only to the members of her own house, but to laborers at work.

A congregation of Mormons in Cincinnati, living in a kind of free love institution, have so awakened the ire of the people by their outrages, that they have been compelled to leave the city. They go to Utah 2500 strong.

The big tunnel of the Pittsburg and Steubenville Railroad which has been under contract for some time, is now opened the entire distance of 2200 feet. Upwards of 1400 feet of the arching is completed, and the material is all on hand for finishing the balance.

There are no two letters in the manuscript alphabet of the English language which cause so much misconstruction as I and J, as most people write them exactly alike. The rule for writing them properly, and which deserves to be universally adopted, is to run the J below the line, and the I even with the line.

Lead ore, considered good for six millions of pounds of mineral, has been discovered near Hazel Green, Wisconsin. The fortunate discoverer, who is an Englishman by the name of Mills, will not take one hundred thousand dollars for his "show" as it stands.

A learned Hungarian gentleman is on the eve of making a journey to Central Asia, to make researches into the root and origin of the Magyar people. His project has been taken up warmly by his countrymen, and considerable sums of money, and indeed help of all kinds, have been freely given to him by his friends and well wishers.

Dr. Jewett says a friend of his residing in Coventry, Rhode Island, came into possession of the leaf of an account book, on which a poor drunkard had been charged with a quart of gin per day for five successive days. On the night of the fifth he died in a drunken fit, and on the sixth day the entry on the rum-seller's book was—"To five yards cloth for winding-sheet."

The Pittsburg Reveille reports that John Layline of Shirley village, while gunning, tripped in the brushwood, and his gun, which he was carrying in his hand, came in contact with the back part of his right leg, when the piece exploded, cutting off both bones, and nearly severing the leg from his body. The limb was subsequently amputated.

It is ascertained that, in females, the ratio of cases of pulmonary consumption, to that of all other diseases, is highest in those following sedentary employments, less in those having mixed indoor employments, and least in those occupied out of doors. The highest ratio occurs in the case of females whose habits of life are irregular.

In New York city, one hundred dollars will command apartments for a family in a tenant house; one hundred and fifty dollars, the upper part of a small house in a narrow street; five hundred dollars, a small house in the outskirts of the town; and two thousand five hundred dollars, a fashionable house in the respectable portion of the city.

According to the Courier Franco-Italian, M. Caruans, historical painter at Veletra, in the island of Malta, has discovered that slate is superior to wood for engravings. It is, he alleges, easily worked, reproduces the finest lines with remarkable exactness, and resists longer than wood the action of the typographical press, so that several thousand copies of a design can be struck off without producing any sensible difference in the quality of the impression.

The Tampa Peninsula gives full credit to the recent statement announcing the discovery of an outlet for the swamp waters in the south of Florida. Officers of the army who have traversed the everglades at all stages, inform the editor that there is now less impediment to travel than before. It thinks troops in search of Indians will be able to continue scouting during the summer where it has hitherto been impossible.

At the sale of autographs, in Paris, a letter from Napoleon, then only a general, to his brother Joseph, was sold for two hundred dollars. Napoleon was in despair at hearing that Josephine was sick. He writes: "Give me hope; tell me the truth; you know my love and how ardent it is. You know that I have never loved before, that Josephine is the first woman I adore. Her sickness throws me into despair."

At Berlin, lately, the king of Prussia attended the theatre to witness the production of a new tragedy. The piece proved wretchedly dull, and his majesty, after the second act, determined to quit the house. On entering the saloon leading to his box, he saw a lequy sitting on a chair, with his chin resting on his breast, in a profound slumber. Turning to one of his attendants, the king remarked: "I'm sure that fellow has been listening at the door!"

Experiments with gun cotton on a grand scale have recently been made in England. A London journal says: "It was found to answer much better than gunpowder for military mining purposes, as the explosive power was greater, and there was not the least smoke in the galleries. The artillery has already two gun-cotton batteries, but experiments are still being made, as it has been remarked that cannon charged with gun-cotton are more liable to burst than those in which powder is used."

A large grey eagle was captured at Rochester lately. Some gentlemen purchased his freedom, and he was conveyed to the temple of Justice, escorted by Scott's Band, and attended by a vast concourse of people, where he was taken out upon the epulis and his shackles removed. He stood for a moment upon the platform of his cage, shook his wings once or twice, and then soared away. His flight was hailed by a tremendous shout, and watched until his majestic form faded away in the distance.

Foreign Items.

The Grand Duke Constantine has had a great reception at Toulon. A review of 50,000 troops was given at Paris in his honor.

A despatch from Paris announces that the difference between Austria and Montenegro appears to be in a fair way of settlement.

The London Times has two part editors and owners in the new Parliament, Mr. Walter, its chief, and the Right Hon. Robert Lowe, of the Board of Trade.

The Prussian and Swiss plenipotentiaries have accepted the propositions of the mediating powers, "ad referendum," for the approval of their respective governments.

The Chinese in Sarawak, Borneo, had risen on February 17, and massacred several Europeans. Sir James Brooke saved his life by swimming across a creek. One of the Borneo Company's steamers subsequently arrived at Sarawak, and, with Sir James Brooke at the head of a body of Malays and Dayaks, avenged the destruction of the settlement by killing 2000 Chinese.

A numerous meeting of merchants and manufacturers had been recently held at Manchester, for the purpose of forming an association for the promotion of the growth of cotton all over the world, to be called the Cotton Supply Association; to encourage by all practicable means the growth of cotton in British colonies and other countries, by diffusing information, supply of machinery, and every possible removal of legislative impediments.

Sands of Gold.

.... The eagle does not prey on flies.—Greek Proverb.

.... Fight against sloth, and do all you can to make friends.—Sidney Smith.

.... Truth is never drowned; in vain you plunge her beneath the water; she always rises to the surface.—St. Pierre.

.... Take short views, hope for the best, and trust in God.—Sidney Smith.

.... We must surrender to reason, as soon as it appears, and deem it beautiful even on the lips of a pedant.—St. Evremont.

.... There are three modes possible for the development of an intellect of an intellectual being: to know, to act, and to do.—Aristotle.

.... It is only necessary to grow old to become more indulgent. I see no fault committed that I have not committed myself.—Goethe.

.... The Mormons make the marriage ring, like the ring of Saturn, fluid, not solid, and keep it in its place by numerous satellites.—Longfellow.

.... Metaphysics always remind me of the caravanserais in the desert. They stand solitary and unsupported, and are therefore always ready to crumble into ruin.—Talleyrand.

.... Reputation is rarely proportioned to virtue. We have seen a thousand people esteemed, either for the merit they had not yet attained, or for that they no longer possessed.—St. Evremont.

Joker's Budget.

What are the largest species of ants?—Ans.—The elephant.

Fainting—a clever way by which old maids get into their beaux' arms.

Sleeping in church may be tolerated, but when you snore loud enough to wake up your neighbors, it becomes a nuisance.

Turner says that "Hocus Focus" was the name of an Anglo-Saxon magician; but others regard the two words as a corruption of the hoc est corpus used by priests in the mass.

A boy, at a recent examination in an English school, was asked who discovered America? "I wish I may die," says a British editor, "if he didn't answer—Yankee Doodle!"

Reads, the author of "Peg Woffington," describes a great actress (Mrs. Oldfield) as "a creature with the tongue of an angel, the principles of a wensel, and the passions of a fish."

"I think," said a farmer, "I should make a good congressman, for I use their language. I received two bills the other day, with a request for immediate payment; the one I ordered to be laid on the table—the other to be read that day six months."

The editor of the Woonsocket Patriot makes merry over the mistake of an old Shanghai hen of his, that has been "setting" for five weeks upon two round stones and a piece of brick! "Her anxiety," quoth he, "is no greater than ours to know what she will hatch. If it proves a brickyard, that hen is not for sale."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.

DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the fireside of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00

4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00

10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every Saturday, by

M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

TRAVELLING IN THE DESERT BETWEEN CAIRO AND SUEZ, EGYPT.

TRAVELLING IN THE EAST.

The very graphic sketches on this page, forcibly illustrate the pleasures of oriental travelling, the scene being the desert between Cairo and Suez. For the line of two and four-wheeled omnibuses, drawn by teams of horses and mules, travellers are indebted to the English. As our first engraving shows, the poor animals sometimes have a hard pull, and when there comes a stick, the travellers themselves sometimes have to get out and ply their strength at the wheels, while the Nubian attendants, of whom there are two besides the driver, do their utmost, with whip and voice, to stimulate the exertions of the horses. One of the leaders in our picture is haughty, and is rearing madly. He has doubtless a touch of pure Arab blood in his veins, and like Pegasus in Schiller's ballad, refuses to bend his haughty spirit to "such base uses," as the traction of an omnibus. Haply he has borne a chieftain to battle—and how can he degrade himself to the office of a post-horse? The Nubian attendants are fine, active, clean-limbed fellows, constantly alighting to encourage the animals, mend the traces, etc. Their costume is a white Nubian cap, with a wide-sleeved, blue blouse. In the front of our picture is seen a portion of the skeleton of a camel; the desert is strewn with dead camels in every stage of decomposition, notwithstanding which, such is the dryness of the atmosphere, the air is always pure and sweet, though at times, of course, the heat is oppressive.—The second engraving presents the exterior of a station in the desert. All these stations are alike; plain, whitewashed structures, but neat and convenient. In each of them there is a large square room, whitewashed, with a stone floor, a divan running round the apartment, and a table in the centre. On one side of the building represented in our picture, a group of Arabs have pitched their tent. A camel is grazing on the scanty herbage, with a long lance attached to his saddle. Beside him, a horse, saddled and bridled, is lying down, while their masters, in those flowing, picturesque robes, which we hope will never be exchanged for the angraceful and inconvenient garb of the Franks, are watching them. A train of mules is being led up to the station—in front a couple of camels are taking their repose under the eye of their master; a goat and a bevy of hens add to the pastoral effect, while a gaunt dog goading the bones of an unfortunate camel, forcibly reminds us of the trials of the desert. A great tide of travel flows over the route we have illustrated; so great are the facilities now afforded. There is no longer danger of robbers or of serious mishaps. All the attendants speak enough English to be understood. At Suez there is a splendid hotel, with spacious apartments, a good table and attendance, a delightful balcony overlooking the Red Sea. We are well convinced that Egypt will become in time a regular resort for our blasé fashionables—the time of the journey thither being less than a month from Boston or New York.

STATION IN THE EGYPTIAN DESERT.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. } Vol. XII., No. 25.—Whole No. 314
6 CENTS SINGLE

BOAT RACE ON CHARLES RIVER.

The exciting scene depicted on this page, by our artist, Mr. Hill, who made the drawing expressly for us, is the conclusion of the race between the club boats Huron and Volant, which took place on the 16th ult., in presence of a large concourse of spectators. The locality is faithfully represented. The houses in the background of the picture, are the fine ones recently built on Western Avenue; in front and to the left, are Braman's baths, and boat-houses. From the baths, a line was drawn to the judges' boat, to form a starting-point for the race; the Volant is represented as having crossed it, and the Huron coming up. In the foreground is the judges' boat; beyond the Volant is one of the boats of the Union club; and the gentleman pulling the extremely narrow one is Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, the poet, who is very partial to this manly exercise, for which no city in the world has such facilities as Boston, the fine expanse of Charles River being unimpeded by navigation and the dangers incident to the passage of steamers. Our sketch, through the kindness of Mr. Braman, was made from the judges' boat. Of the two boats engaged in this spirited race, the Huron is owned by a club of Harvard College students, and the Volant is well known as the champion of the Charles River

Association. The race was not for money, but a set of colors was to be given by the loser to the winner in the generous contest. The race was to be pulled over the usual three mile course on Charles River, the boats to be governed by ordinary rules, to start from the judges' line at half-past four, to round the stake at the upper end, pulling starboard oars. Both crews had been thoroughly and severely trained, and came to the line in most excellent condition. The following are the names and positions of the crews, as reported in the Traveller. Volant—Stroke, R. H. Stevenson, No. 2, A. H. Clark, No. 3, J. C. Putnam, No. 4, R. Pratt, No. 5, R. F. Clark, No. 6, T. G. Stevenson; Huron—Stroke, S. B. Parkman, No. 2, C. F. Walcott, No. 3, W. H. Elliott, No. 4, W. G. Goldsmith, No. 5, A. E. B. Agassiz, No. 6, J. J. Storow. Mr. Grenville T. W. Braman acted as judge for the Volant, and Mr. Alfred Whitman, Jr. for the Huron. At quarter past four the gun was fired, the boats disappeared under their houses for a moment, and in another minute came out—the crews stripped and ready for the race. The Volants wore scarlet caps, white, close-fitting body shirts, and dark trousers; the Hurons, white, flat caps, with red band, white shirts and white trousers. Both crews looked admirably. The judges were between the boats, able to see that they were even, and to direct their movements with much greater facility than is possible from a boat moored at the end of the line. The word was given by Mr. Whitman, and the boats started at 4 h. 37 min. 30 sec. The Volant led. She had gained a length at the end of the first eighth of a mile, and throughout the race, pulled steadily ahead of her rival, at no time losing any part of her advantage. Off the lower breakwater, on the up-stretch, there were two lengths of clear water between the boats. The distance of the Volants increased to three or four at the upper breakwater—they were at least five ahead after rounding the stake, and on the home-stretch gained in about the same proportion, coming in with a lead of ten or eleven lengths. Both boats having started at 4 h. 37 min. 30 sec., returned as follows: Volant, 4 h. 58 min. 30 sec.—time, 21 min.; Huron, 4 h. 59 min. 9 sec.—time, 21 min. 38 sec.; difference in favor of the Volant, 38 sec. The time is good, better, the Traveller says, than any amateur six-oar has made in public on this course. Neither boat, however, came down to its practice time. The Huron has been round in 20 min. 50 sec.; and it is said the Volant has accomplished it in 19 min. 52 sec., which, if correct, is very much better than anything recorded. This sport was witnessed with much interest by the spectators.

BOAT RACE ON CHARLES RIVER, BOSTON, MASS.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MADAME DE SOLANGE.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

It was towards the last of the year 1775. Two men were seated opposite each other near a desk covered with open books and sealed parchments. The costume of the first announced one of the most brilliant noblemen of the court of Louis XVI., while the second wore the black coat and cambric ruffles which designated the lawyer.

"So, Monsieur Durocher," resumed the young nobleman, "you assure me the fortune of Madame de Solange amounts to not less than a hundred thousand pounds per annum—that it is free from debt and unincumbered?"

"I can affirm it to you," replied the notary.

"Well! tell me honestly what you know of her, and what you think of her."

"Her father was a porter, and afterwards a pawn-broker. He died, leaving her two millions. An ordinary woman would have been satisfied with this, but Madame de Solange wished to be a court lady. She discovered a poor nobleman who consented to give her his name; it was the Marquis de Solange. Indolent, unambitious, and now almost in his second childhood, all semblance of authority has been by degrees withdrawn from him. He lives alone in a retired apartment, and trembles at the voice of his wife. No one obeys him; he speaks to no one, and no one speaks to him. His daughter alone, who has just left a convent, manifests affection for him; but this consolation will soon be taken away, for Mademoiselle Jeanne is to be disposed of in marriage as soon as a noble son-in-law shall appear."

"That son-in-law is found, Monsieur Durocher," said the nobleman.

"I suspected as much."

"This marriage has been proposed to me, and what I have just learned from you has decided me. You know that a rich alliance is necessary to re-establish my fortune, and enable me to take a house suitable to my rank. The ambition of Madame de Solange will aid in forwarding my interests; her daughter's dowry will furnish the means. Let the contracts be drawn up by to-morrow."

"I doubt whether this will be possible, monsieur count; I shall have some deeds to look up, some titles to ascertain."

"Have you not the aid of Jerome Bouvart, your clerk, who, you say, is as skillful as yourself?"

"He was so, but is greatly changed of late. He has become as pale and mute as a trappist, and is always absent-minded."

"The fellow is in love," said M. de Lanoy.

"I thought so, when I saw how frequently he visited his cousin at the convent of the Visitation; but for two months past, he has scarcely been there at all."

"No matter, Durocher," resumed the count. "Be diligent; I wish to terminate this affair; I need not recommend discretion."

At these words, M. de Lanoy waved his hand with that impertinent familiarity which at this period constituted good manners, advanced towards the door, which the notary respectfully opened, and disappeared, humming, down the crooked stairway.

In Versailles, at first sight, only the century of Louis XIV. appears; palaces, gardens, squares, streets, boulevards—all seem to bear the same stamp of despotic splendor. Everywhere appears that inflexible will of the great king who brought everything into a straight line, and subjected nature to the same etiquette with his court. To find the France of succeeding centuries, we must look for it in retired squares, where are hidden hotels with their fronts carved in wreaths; cottages with concealed doors, above which Cupids keep guard; gardens with long avenues and shady arbors. There the society of Louis XV., fatigued with the symmetrical brilliancy of the preceding reign, came to conceal its vices among court and garden, not through modesty, but through sensuality; for the eighteenth century was, above all, an age of pleasure, relying on nothing, sporting with everything, and preparing its own ruin with the voluptuous frivolity with which Sardanapalus arranged his funeral pile.

It is to one of these hotels of the era Pompadour that I must now transport you. Built some sixty years before at the extremity of the Rue Montbauron, the pavilion of Madame de Solange had all the fantastic ornament and affected graces of the age. It was reached by a narrow court, on which opened a side-door serving as an entrance. The façade, which could not be perceived from without, overlooked a terrace bordered with orange trees in boxes, and a parterre almost entirely garnished with tulips and hyacinths. The remainder of the garden was divided into narrow beds, bordered with sage, lavender or rosemary. In the midst, stood a dial of white marble, and here and there statues peeped out among the shrubbery, cut in grotesque forms. An avenue of lindens, from each end of the house, conducted to a large arbor of vines and honeysuckles, beneath which, in summer, Madame de Solange sometimes received her visitors.

At the moment our story commences, an old man and a young girl were sitting there alone. The old man wore a costume of almost coquettish elegance. His hair, carefully frizzed, was slightly powdered; an ornamental snuff-box was visible in one of the pockets of his embroidered vest; his silk stockings were fastened by a buckle of wrought gold, and a diamond of great value sparkled on each hand. But this luxury of ornament only served to render his decrepitude more perceptible. His countenance had a sickly aspect; his lips, always half open, were agitated with a nervous tremor, and his eyes, of a tender blue, had a timid and vague expression.

As for the young girl, she seemed in all the splendor of early youth. Her air was at once modest and attractive; she might have served as a model for one of Watteau's madonnas. Her costume participated in this double expression; convent habits seemed partly to have yielded to the elegance of the court.

She was holding in her hand a tragedy of Voltaire, and reading aloud. Suddenly she paused. The old man had fallen asleep. The young girl laid the book in her chair and approached him softly; but this movement made him re-open his eyes.

"Ah, I have awakened you, father!" exclaimed she, with regret. "Stay," said he in a feeble voice; "sit down there, Jeanne; nearer—nearer."

She seated herself at the old man's feet, in the graceful attitude of a child who asks for caresses. He placed one hand on her shoulder, with the other raised her forehead, and gazed at it for a long time with a sort of naive enchantment. The young girl at first smiled beneath this glance; but a sudden remembrance crossing her mind, her eyes moistened, and she cast down her head.

"What is the matter, Jeanne?" asked the old man, whom this movement had not escaped.

"Nothing—nothing, my father," she hastily replied.

"You are deceiving me. Last evening, also, I saw that you had been weeping; I meant to have asked you the cause, and I forgot it this morning. O, my head—my head!"

He placed both hands on his forehead with the plaintive expression of a child. Jeanne attempted to embrace him; but he gently disengaged himself, cast around him a cautious glance, and lowering his voice, said, with a sort of terror:

"Does Madame de Solange make you unhappy?"

"Why do you think so?" interrupted the young girl.

He imposed silence with a gesture of his hand.

"Well, well, I know you will not confess it. Why should you? I cannot protect you; but take care, Jeanne; do not oppose your mother. Whoever opposes her, she crushes."

"I know it," murmured Jeanne, her eyes turned upon her father.

The latter drew her nearer to him.

"Has she refused you any pleasure?" asked he.

"No, papa."

"Perhaps you desire some ornament?"

"None."

"Why conceal it? It could be purchased. Your allowance is small, and may not be sufficient."

"I wish it larger only when I see poor families."

"And you know some whom you would like to assist?"

"Alas! my father, there are always to be found those who suffer."

M. de Solange looked around him, and drawing from the pocket of his vest a little leathern purse, said: "Take it."

"Gold!" exclaimed Jeanne, astonished.

"Yes, but conceal it, lest your mother should see it."

"Why so? Did you not obtain it from her?"

"No."

"From whom, then?"

"It is all yours," said the old man, coloring.

"But you do not reply to me, father," resumed Jeanne, hastily.

"This purse—" And as if illuminated by a sudden remembrance, she exclaimed: "This purse was stolen from my mother a few days ago!"

"Hush!" said the terrified old man.

"What! could it be—?"

"Hush!"

She looked at her father in surprise. The latter cast a glance around to assure himself that they were alone.

"All belongs to her," resumed he, in a low tone; "I am here as in a hospital; I have nothing of my own. When I saw this gold, I thought it might make you happy."

"O, my father—my father!" cried Jeanne, moved at once with shame, pity and tenderness.

"Say that you are happy, Jeanne," resumed her father, drawing her towards him. "Poor girl! I would have robbed for you the treasury of the king of France. If I had Paradise, Jeanne, I would give it all to you, without reserving even a place there. But embrace your father; thank him. It is the first time he has been able to make you a present."

There was, in the words of the old man, a half-bewildered tenderness which moved Jeanne to the depths of her heart. Despoiled of his liberty by long oppression, this poor soul had recovered all the instincts of childhood. Jeanne threw her arms around her father's neck, and kissed his white hair.

"Hide the purse," resumed the old man, joyously. "Ah! they think I have a weak head. But I see all—I comprehend all. So be tranquil, Jeanne; I know what to do. They do not suspect me; your poor people shall want for nothing. But above all things, hide the purse."

"It does not belong to us," observed the young girl, gently, "and we must restore it."

"Restore it! To whom?"

"To my mother."

"What say you?" exclaimed the terrified marquis. "Will you tell her, then, that I took it from her?"

"No, papa."

"She will guess it; she will compel you to acknowledge it; you will denounce me."

"Father!"

"O, do not do this, Jeanne, I conjure you! Your mother will revenge herself on me; you would not make me miserable? You are the only one here who loves me. O, do not restore the purse! I took it for you, Jeanne. In mercy, do not mention it to your mother."

He clasped his hands and wept. The young girl threw herself into his arms, attempting to re-assure him by promises and kisses, but he seemed still uneasy.

"You will not know how to conceal this gold," resumed he, "and all will be discovered. Give it back to me; it is the surest way. Give it to me; I will keep it."

Jeanne gave him the purse, which he eagerly took.

"Especially, not a word to your mother," added he, placing his finger on his lips. "If she asks you, love me well enough to tell a falsehood; your confessor will pardon you, and, if necessary, I will take the sin upon myself."

At this moment, a servant in livery appeared at the end of the avenue. He came to announce to M. de Solange that supper was served. The latter rose, made a sign to Jeanne to recommend discretion, and leaning on the arm of the servant, regained, with tottering steps, the apartment he occupied in the hotel. The young girl followed him with her eyes, with an expression of affectionate pity, till he had disappeared among the lindens. Then her ideas seemed to take another direction, and she fell into a profound reverie.

The day, which was now declining, threw on the arbor uncertain gleams. The supper-hell had sounded, and, according to the customs established in most noble houses, Jeanne was not obliged to appear. Certain, thus that her absence could not be noticed by her mother or the servants, who would be occupied elsewhere, the young girl sought the most retired corner of the arbor, seated herself and drew from her bosom a letter which she had concealed there. The sight alone of this paper seemed to awaken in her a sudden emotion, for blushes covered her cheeks, and she cast around her an anxious glance; but certain of not being perceived, she slowly opened it and began to read it. This perusal doubtless had for her a lively interest, for she was soon entirely absorbed in it. A gleam of inexpressible joy illuminated her features at intervals; this was suddenly lost amid a cloud of doubt and fear. Two or three times she paused, remaining immovable, her eyes fixed, and as if crushed beneath a sentiment of despair.

At last she had finished her reading, and was about to recommence, when the sound of footsteps was heard. She hastily concealed the letter in her bosom, and almost at the same instant, Madame de Solange appeared at the entrance to the arbor.

Madame de Solange was a woman of tall stature, richly clad, with slow but firm step. Nothing about her recalled her origin. Her features had an aristocratic regularity, and nothing was wanting about her but life. The robe of velvet could not disguise her meagreness, and the paleness of her countenance was visible through the rouge that covered it. It was only in her look that energy appeared; all vitality seemed to have taken refuge there, and her gray eye gleamed with an almost insupportable brilliancy. Jeanne, who had almost been surprised at sight of her, stood trembling, and with downcast eyes. Madame de Solange appeared not to notice it.

"I was in search of you," said she, to the young girl, in a tone whose melody was somewhat metallic. "Are you alone?"

"Alone, madame," replied Jeanne.

Madame de Solange seated herself on the bench from which her daughter had just risen, and beckoned to her to take one of the rustic seats in the arbor.

"I have something to say to you, Jeanne," resumed she, in a tone more confidential than usual. "Approach, and listen to me attentively."

The young girl obeyed.

"During the three months which have transpired since you left the convent," resumed Madame de Solange, "I have avoided introducing you to the society which frequents the hotel. You have lived in retirement, as becomes a young lady of your rank, who should not appear in the world till she is married; but this moment has at last come."

"What say you, madame?" exclaimed Jeanne, hastily raising her head and starting.

"I say that I have just arranged a desirable marriage for you."

"For me?" interrupted the young girl.

"For you," returned Madame de Solange. "What is there in this intelligence which should astonish you? Have you never thought it must sooner or later come?"

"Madame!" stammered the bewildered Jeanne.

"Compose yourself," said Madame de Solange, coldly; "I wish to converse with you on this subject. The marriage will take place in a month, and to-morrow I will take you with me to choose the trousseau."

This intelligence was so unexpected that Jeanne remained for an instant as if thunderstruck. She looked at her mother, pale, with clasped hands, and unable to speak.

"It is impossible," said she, at last, in a broken voice; "in a month, madame, it is impossible."

"Why so?" asked the marquise.

"I do not know—I was not prepared. O, I conjure you, I do not wish to marry another!" exclaimed the young girl, sinking on her knees.

The marquise hastily drew back.

"Rise," said she. "Why this terror—these tears? and what am I to conclude from such folly? Have the ladies of the Visitation abused their influence to inspire you with a fanatical desire to withdraw from the world?"

"No, madame."

"What then? Do you experience any repugnance to marriage?"

"I do not say so, madame."

"It is then only for the husband I propose to you; but I have not named him; you have never seen him. If he is young, talented, gallant and of high birth, will you still refuse him?"

"Whoever he may be!" exclaimed Jeanne, carried away by her emotion.

Madame de Solange hastily raised her head.

"Then you love another!" said she.

Jeanne covered her face. "There was a pause.

"So you acknowledge it?" resumed the marquise, in a tone whose tremor announced suppressed anger. "Well, mademoiselle, let us see your choice. To be preferred to the Count de Lanoy, the man distinguished by you should unite to high rank the advantages of beauty, of intelligence and of fortune. Name him—name him immediately! But why this silence! To hesitate is to lead me to believe your preference an unworthy one. Is this name so disgraceful that you dare not pronounce it? Speak, mademoiselle,—speak!"

"Do not ask me, madame!" stammered Jeanne, stifled with soba.

The marquise made a hasty movement.

"That is to say, you blush to acknowledge your choice," resumed she. "You shall then be just to yourself. Let it be no longer mentioned. You will espouse M. de Lanoy."

"Mother, have pity!" exclaimed Jeanne.

But Madame de Solange seized her rudely by the arm, and with a rage which she had with difficulty restrained, said:

"Enough! you will obey. No prayers—no tears. I will it. I will no longer demand the confidence of your foolish preferences. Keep your dreams; but this marriage realizes a hope which I have pursued for twenty years; it ensures the credit and the rank to which we have a right to aspire. It will take place, mademoiselle. Were it my last hour, I would postpone receiving absolution for my sins, in order to sign your contract."

The energy with which these words were pronounced, affected the young girl. She raised towards her mother eyes bathed in tears; but the fixed look of the latter rested upon her with a will so implacable, that she was, as it were, crushed, and sank back on the seat from which she had risen.

Madame de Solange perceived this sudden emotion. She had already recovered her self-possession.

"You will reflect," said she, in a tone of imposing coldness. "You should have been taught at the convent that to us belongs the right to dispose of your fate; to you the duty of submission. But it is not sufficient to obey; you must do it with the good grace becoming your education and your rank. I dare to hope that you will not forget it. Go!"

Jeanne rose tremblingly, saluted her mother, and left the arbor.

The clock had just struck six, and all seemed still asleep in the Hotel de Solange. A glazed door on the ground-floor was alone open, and the first rays of dawn were illuminating it with a mild light. The marquise was seated near the threshold, inhaling that fresh October breeze which tempered the heat of the rising sun. His sleep was short, like that of all old men, and he rose before the aurora to enjoy this hour of solitude. Subjected all day to the regulations established by Madame de Solange, reading, walking, taking his meals only at appointed hours, always followed by a valet, who seemed a keeper rather than a servant, he then found himself free from the degrading bonds in which his poor soul had been fettered.

He had been sitting for some time in the same spot, with his eyes vaguely fixed on the garden, when a door softly opened at the other extremity of the hotel. Jeanne appeared there, coiffed with a morning cap, and enveloped in a pelisse. She cast her eyes in every direction, stepped forward, then paused; she seemed to be trembling. Meanwhile, after having assured herself that there was no one in the garden, she glided lightly behind a clump of lilacs and reached the arbor.

Arrived there, she once more assured herself that she was alone, and advanced towards the grating which interrupted the wall at this spot, and allowed a view of the country beyond. An old statue stood there, and the lines traced on the marble by the passers-by proved that it could be reached from without. The young girl placed her hand beneath the pedestal at a spot which she seemed to know, and withdrew from it a letter. At the same instant, an exclamation was heard at a little distance. She turned her head. Madame de Solange stood at the entrance of the avenue of lindens.

The young girl had only time to dart through the other avenue and hasten to the garden gate; but it was locked. Bewildered, she was seeking some other mode of exit, when her name, pronounced by a well-known voice, made her raise her eyes. She perceived her father, uttered a cry of joy, and rushed into his apartment.

All this took place so rapidly, that the marquise, retracing her steps, on arriving at the hotel, had lost sight of the young girl; but a glance at the glazed door of the marquise made her comprehend all. She stopped, hesitatingly. During many years that M. de Solange had been exiled to this part of the world, she had but two or three times crossed the threshold. The aspect of this childish old man recalled to her too many abortive hopes, and perhaps too many inexorable wrongs inflicted, that she should not seek to avoid him. The apartment he occupied was like those domestic prisons where a monster or a madman is kept, and which one approaches only when death has removed the inmate.

Meanwhile, the opportunity for a discovery was too favorable to be lost. After a moment of hesitation, she overcame her repugnance, advanced towards the door, and resolutely opened it. The marquise was seated at the extremity of the room, pressing the hand of Jeanne, who was pale and breathless. Both started at sight of Madame de Solange, and the old man hastily concealed a paper which he held. But the marquise had noticed this movement. She advanced towards Jeanne, who had cast down her eyes, and in that tone whose sweetness had a sonorous indelibility, said: "Your governess is seeking you."

The young girl, astonished, raised her eyes.

"Go!" resumed the marquise.

Jeanne looked anxiously at her father. She appeared to hesitate for a moment; her hand pressed that of the marquise, as if to ask of him an order to remain. But the latter, who had met the eye of the marquise, turned away his head. Obedient at last to an imperative gesture from her mother, the young girl slowly went away.

Madame de Solange conducted her daughter to the door, which she closed after her; then dropping the curtains which had been raised, and permitted everything to be seen from without, she hastily returned to the old man.

"Jeanne has given you a letter," said she, brusquely.

"A seat—a seat for madame!" stammered the marquise, casting his eyes around him as if in search of a servant.

"Listen," interrupted Madame de Solange, impatiently.

"It is beautiful stuff!" resumed the old man, appearing to admire the dress of the marquise.

The latter stepped back, and looked at him fixedly.

"Ah, I understand!" said she, after a short silence. "Monsieur le marquis hopes to escape my questions by feigning not to understand them; it is a method which he has always practised. But he takes useless pains. I know all."

The old man started, without appearing to understand her.

"Winter is coming, madame," continued he. "There will be no more birds in the lindens—no more violets—"

"Enough!" exclaimed the marquise. "Look at me, sir, and listen. I know all, I tell you. Jeanne entered here just now with a letter; I saw her. Sure that I should demand it of her, she has given it to you to conceal from me, and you have it still."

The marquise hastily concealed both hands in the large pockets of his embroidered coat.

"I wish that letter," resumed Madame de Solange, authoritatively; "I must have it immediately!"

"No more violets, madame,—no more violets!" murmured the old man, in a half bewildered tone.

The marquise made a hasty movement, but immediately repressed it, and approaching with an almost smiling air, said, suddenly changing her tone:

"Come, why refuse to reply to me, sir? I did not come for this letter alone. I wished to converse with you."

The old man cast upon the marquise a timid look.

"I came to speak to you of Jeanne," resumed Madame de Solange; "she is now grown up, and it seems time to think of establishing her."

The marquise remained silent.

"I have been seeking a long time," continued the marquise, "but I think I have at last found a suitable husband for her."

"A husband for Jeanne?" repeated M. de Solange, raising his head.

"Young, amiable, and holding one of the first ranks at court," added the marquise; "the Count de Lanoy."

"The son of the former governor of Perigord?"

"The same, sir. Did you know his father?"

"Did I know him?" exclaimed the old man. "He was an old comrade. He is of high nobility, madame. The de Lanoy number as many quarters as the Montmorencys. Jeanne must espouse the count."

"I see with pleasure," said the marquise, "that we begin to understand each other. But, in exchange for the good news which I bring you, you will not refuse, I think, to give me that paper."

The marquise started, and thrust into his pocket the hand he had half withdrawn; his eyes, which had lighted up with a gleam of intelligence, became dim.

"It is a fine day, madame,—a fine day," said he, in a childish voice, pointing to the sun, which shone through the curtains.

"It is true," replied the marquise, tranquilly, "and you ought to profit by it to take a ride."

"I!" exclaimed the astonished old man.

"I can place the carriage at your disposal."

"A ride in a carriage!" repeated M. de Solange, wonderingly.

"In the forest, if you please. There is a hunt to-day."

"And I can see it—see the dogs, the piqueurs, the gentlemen?"

"Why not?"

"Ah, I will go—I will go, madame, immediately!"

"As soon as you have given me the letter."

"Ah, the letter!" repeated the old man, in a tone of chagrin, and as if this word had come to cut short his joy.

"Have you not also expressed to Baptiste a desire to be present at the masses of the king?" asked the marquise. "He will take you there, sir, next Sunday. The whole court will be present."

"I shall see Marie Antoinette."

"And hear an office in music."

"With a sermon, madame; there will doubtless be a sermon. They preached so well in Lorraine when I was young. There was especially a capuchin, whose name I have forgotten. Do you think the king's almoner can preach as well, madame?"

"Better, sir," said Madame de Solange, humoring the childish confidence of the marquise. "But you will give me the paper which Jeanne put in your care."

The old man turned the letter in his pocket.

"I cannot!" murmured he. "She gave it to me to keep. If she knew I had it no longer—"

"I will not tell her."

"But she will ask me for it."

"I will give it back to you."

"Certainly?" asked the old man, casting on Madame de Solange a look of hesitation.

"I promise it to you, marquise," said the latter, smiling. "But quick, if you would not lose your ride in the forest. The hunters will soon be returning."

The marquise remained for an instant undecided. The desire to recover a few hours of the liberty of which he had been deprived for ten years, and to quit his prison to breathe the free air of the woods, struggled in him with his pledged word. At last he half extended his hand towards the marquise, who hastily seized the letter, broke the seal, and rapidly read as follows:

"In a few days, the contract which binds you to the Count de Lanoy must be signed. You know it, for I have informed you of it. You know, also, that I have in readiness the means of flight. You can then, up to the last moment, choose between me and him whom your mother desires for you; but the choice once made in favor of the latter, think no more of him who now writes you; all will be over for him. Do not reproach yourself, Jeanne, if it should be thus. It is not your fault if I have loved you,—I who had the right only to adore you at a distance, as we adore the saints in heaven. Had I been more prudent, I should now have been less unhappy. But as long as I have been able to see you, I have thought of nothing else. Near you, my soul blossoms like the fields in spring; an atmosphere of joy seems to surround you. Whatever may happen, I bless you for the happiness you have given me. Whether you forget me for the world, or forget the world for me, I shall love you only and everywhere. Adieu, then, Jeanne; adieu, for a few hours, or forever!"

When Madame de Solange had finished reading, she hastily turned to the marquise, who had followed all her movements with uneasiness.

"Who wrote this letter, sir?" asked she, pale, and with compressed lips.

"I do not know," replied the old man.

"I will know," murmured she, stepping towards the door.

The marquise rose.

"The letter, madame!" exclaimed he.

"I shall keep it, sir."

"It is impossible!" cried the bewildered old man. "Jeanne will come back and demand it of me. You promised to restore it, madame. I must have it."

He stationed himself before the door.

"Give place, sir!" exclaimed Madame de Solange, with flaming eyes.

"The letter—the letter!" repeated the old man.

He attempted to detain Madame de Solange; but the latter thrust him away with a violent gesture, and hastened from the apartment.

The note she had just read, while it confirmed the secret love of Jeanne, left her in the same ignorance relative to the object of this love; for it contained no indication, no detail which could reveal the author. On the other hand, the reasons which had formerly prevented the marquise from interrogating the young girl, existed more powerfully than ever. An explanation could but increase the despair of the latter, and drive her to extremities. Madame de Solange trembled at the thought that the caprice of a child might compromise projects so long pursued. Though the days which remained to her of life might be numbered, she thought only of acquiring the rank which she had dreamed of forty years before. Fortune, health, family, the hope of a better world,—she would have given all to be of the court, and to die on a tabouret, like Louis XI. on his throne, amid all the etiquette of a royal reception.

Now, this triumph of pride, the marriage of Jeanne with the count might give her. On Jeanne would depend the fulfilment of all her hopes, or their annihilation. This thought inspired the marquise with a sort of desperate rage. She wished to have in her hands the heart of the young girl to conquer and subject it—were that to crush it. She was still hesitating what to do, when some one came to announce that M. de Lanoy awaited her in the saloon. The count was accompanied by the Duke de Lussac, who had introduced him to Madame de Solange, and had interceded for the proposed marriage. He came to aid his protégé in discussing the conditions of the contract.

The duke was then in all the eclat of his success at court, and at the highest degree of power which his relationship to the Princess de Lamballe gave him. No one possessed more than he that mocking levity then fashionable in court society, and he was cited as the bravest and most spirituel nobleman in France.

At the moment Madame de Solange entered the saloon, he was seated on a bergere, with all the ease of a gentleman who feels himself to be among his inferiors. At sight of the marquise, he rose indolently.

"Ah, here she is!" exclaimed he. "Compliment us on our punctuality, dear marquise. For you, I have failed at three rendezvous. There are manoeuvres of the cavalry, this morning, at the Grand Camp, and I wished to take you there."

"A thousand thanks," said Madame de Solange. "I do not know whether I can go."

"Why not? You must. We shall terminate the business of the contract in a few moments."

"I am awaiting Maître Durocher."

"Here is a clerk whom I overtook as we came along, and who brings you a copy of the deed."

Madame de Solange then perceived, standing near the door, a young man, whose features seemed not unknown to her. He was clad in black, like others of his profession; but she was struck with his noble mien and the kind of sorrowful pride revealed in his whole appearance. He stood immovable at a few paces from the threshold, with one hand concealed in his breast. At the movement made by the marquise, he bowed.

"You bring a copy of the contract, do you?" asked Madame de Solange.

Without replying, the young man presented the papers he held in his hand. The expression of his whole features was so profoundly sad, that the marquise could not, for an instant, withdraw her eyes from him. Meanwhile, the count and M. de Lussac had withdrawn to the embrasure of a window. She took the papers which the young man had presented, and unrolled them to look at them; but scarcely had she laid her eyes upon them, when she started. The clerk raised his head.

"This deed is not in the handwriting of Maitre Durocher," said she, hastily.

"I wrote it under his dictation," replied the clerk.

"You?"

"I, madame."

"What is the matter, marquise?" asked the duke, approaching.

"Nothing—nothing," stammered Madame de Solange, in an indifferent tone.

The duke resumed the conversation interrupted, and Madame de Solange seated herself. In the handwriting of the clerk, she had just recognized that of the billet addressed to Jeanne. She remained for a moment as if stupefied. She still doubted, but a new examination left her no room for doubt.

She raised her eyes once more on the young man, and sought to recollect where she had met him before. The convent of the Visitation instantly returned to her remembrance; it was there that she had seen him. She understood in an instant how he had become acquainted with Jeanne and won her love, for this letter left no uncertainty on the subject. She did not ask what chance had thus levelled the distance which separated them, nor by what fatality a poor clerk had been able to please her daughter. Laying aside a vain indignation, she began to seek, with the promptness of ambitious intelligence, a method of avoiding the peril.

This young man must be disposed of at all events, since his passion might lead Jeanne to adopt some desperate resolution. But in what manner?

[TO BE COMPLETED NEXT WEEK.]

"BEG, SIR, BEG!"

The accompanying picture is a sketch from life:—A little peasant girl, seated on an upturned basket, withholds the scrap of bread, a portion of her own supper, until her little poodle has gone through the motions of asking for it, as he has been taught to do by his young mistress. The anxious look of the little four-footed friend, his whimsical earnestness and humility are highly characteristic. These poodles are the most intelligent of the canine race, and are capable of being taught a variety of accomplishments. We have even seen one that could articulate "yes" and "no." The admirer of dogs is never weary of recounting tales illustrative of their intelligence and devotion, and dog stories have come to be as proverbial as fish stories. Sir Walter Scott was a friend to dogs, and throughout his works are scattered most admirable descriptions of their ways and characteristics. He was also fond of narrating traits of his own dogs, of which, it will be remembered, he had a large number. One of these we recall at this moment as particularly amusing, though if the great and good Sir Walter were not the authority, we should be inclined to withhold our belief from it. A certain dog of his, usually quiet and well-behaved, on one occasion, under the influence of a temporary access of "moral insanity," attacked and bit the baker, for which act he was properly chided and chastised. Afterwards, Sir Walter was in the habit of introducing the animal to strangers, saying, "This is my dog Watch, a very good dog, on the whole" (here Watch would wag his tail); "but once he bit the baker." The moment his offence was mentioned, the dog would take refuge under the side-board, with his tail between his legs, moaning in the most lugubrious manner, and showing every sign of shame and contrition. The authenticity of another dog-story we shall not vouch for. An animal of the species delineated in our picture was nosing about the sidewalk in State Street, when he suddenly espied a small roll of bills. Catching them up eagerly in his mouth, he carried them to a retired door-step, laid them down, pawed them over, and then turned away in disgust. His proceedings had been watched by a "curstooze broker," the bills were examined, and they were found to be counterfeit. That dog had formerly been the property of a bank cashier! We might quote hundreds of true tales to justify the favor with which the canine race is regarded—proofs of heroism, as in the case of Prince Llewellyn's dog, of sagacity in detecting crime, as in the case of the dog of Montargis, who ferreted out his master's murderer, of lives saved from shipwreck, but many such will recur to our readers. We hope it is unnecessary to put in a plea for the dog, the faithful friend and companion of man from his cradle to his grave; often the only mourner at the last, even dying in the churchyard where the loved and lost have been laid before his pitying eyes.

FEATS OF PERSIAN HORSES.

A Paris paper gives the following details relative to the horses just sent to the Emperor Napoléon from Persia:—"The horses sent by the shah belong to the tribe of Tehi, which, as regards beauty and perfection of form, are only excelled by the tribe of Nedji; but, as a set off, those of Tehi possess qualities which are quite exceptional, being not only full of fire, but extremely docile. This breed of horses can travel for a whole day without any other food than a little barley, mixed with chopped straw. A fact which appears to us incredible is mentioned on this subject. When the predecessor of Feth Ali Shah died, the latter had to present himself immediately to secure the crown, to prevent another competitor coming forward. To do this, he travelled, in twenty-four hours, on the same horse, from Schiraz to Isfahan, a distance of 240 miles." This statement is fully believed at Teheran.—London Journal.

THE WANT OF SUNSHINE.

"Your city horses don't get enough of sunshine," said a shrewd farmer, "and no wonder therefore, they are so often unhealthy. In the coldest days of winter, when it was clear, my old father used to take his horses out of the stable, and tie them to the fence in the middle of the day, so that they might get sunshine." There was even more wisdom in the farmer's speech than he had supposed. It is not horses only that suffer for the want of sunshine. Thousands of persons living in cities injure their health because of the want of sunshine. The over-worked operative, confined all day in a dark, ill-ventilated room, owes not a little of his fondness for a dram to the absence of the light, joyous, exhilarating sunshine. The pale, sickly child, that by-and-by is laid in its coffin, amid the sobs of its heart-broken mother, might probably have grown up to a vigorous manhood if it had been bred on a breezy, clover-decked, sunshiny hillside. Who can compute the adults who die the annually of consumption solely because they have deprived themselves of sunshine year after year? In the physical life of Americans, especially those who dwell in cities, there is no deficiency so marked and fatal as that of the want of sunshine. The human animal requires sunshine quite as much as the plant. But we need sunshine in a moral sense, also. We are too grave and serious a people. We rack our nervous system to pieces, and prematurely destroy our digestion by the neglect of seasonable recreation, or by amusements that are such only in name. As old Froissart said to the English four hundred years ago, "We take

THE WHALESHIP AND THE CANNIBALS.

A New England whaleship foundered in a gale, some years ago, in the Pacific Ocean. Her crew took to the boats; and, after toiling for several days and nights, two of the boats came in sight of an island. One of them was run through the surf, and the crew jumped on shore, making signs to the natives, to express their destitute condition. But no pity dwelt in those savage breasts. Rushing upon the exhausted seamen with their clubs, they instantly killed them, and made preparations to feast upon their bodies, for they were cannibals. Seeing the fate of their companions, the other boat's crew pulled hastily away from that dreadful spot, and, after almost incredible sufferings, were picked up by a friendly vessel and saved. Some years passed, and another ship was wrecked in the same seas, and near the same island. Her commander had been second mate of the former ship, and was saved with the boat's crew which witnessed the destruction of their shipmates by the cannibals. Again he approached the island, a wrecked mariner, and reduced by hunger and exhaustion to an emaciated state. He recognized the fatal shore, and told his companions of the cannibals who dwelt upon it. But they were too weak to put out to sea again. To do so was to die. They could but die if they landed, and perhaps the savages might be merciful. Perceiving none of the natives, they hauled their boat up on the beach, and sought the shelter of the adjoining woods, in the hope of finding fruits or berries for subsistence. But, once in the woods, their fears increased. They moved stealthily along, alarmed at the cracking of the dry bushes beneath their feet, and at the rustling of the leaves. Death seemed to speak in every sound, and to leer upon them through every opening glade of the forest. Cold sweats gathered on their sunburnt brows; and more than once they halted, and consulted on the propriety of returning to the boat; but as often they resolved to advance, especially as they found themselves ascending a wooded hill, which they hoped might furnish them with a nook or cave in which to hide. Thus trembling they proceeded. They approached the summit of the hill, which was bold and rocky. The foremost of the party ventured from the shelter of the trees to view the island. Cautiously he stole, step by step, to the mountain's brow, until his eye caught sight of the village below. Then he literally sprang into the air, clapped his hands, and shouted, "Safe! safe! safe!" "What is the matter?" asked his companions, who thought him crazy. "We are safe, I tell you we are safe!" pointing to the village on the plain below. Looking down, the now joyful seamen beheld a church lifting its modest front above the huts of the natives. Then they shared in the transports of their companions. They leaped, they wept, they embraced. They knew by that church that the missionary was there. They knew that where he lived and labored, cannibalism must be dead. They accordingly descended to the plain, and found, instead of a cruel death, the utmost kindness, perfect security, and a generous hospitality. Had those wrecked mariners been skeptics or infidels, would they have needed any further proof of the humanizing and renovating power of the gospel, or of the utility of missions?—Missionary Records.

PARISIAN THEATRES.

Probably in no city are the edifices, the scenery, the music, the talent of the actors and actresses, and in fact the whole machinery and appliances of the theatre in so great perfection as in Paris. There are twenty-five theatres of merit in the city, capable of seating 35,000 spectators, and receiving an average attendance every evening of 20,000. There are 145 other places of amusements visited on an average by 24,000 people every night, making in all 44,000 individuals who daily seek pleasure in the public places of amusement. In 1851, the receipts of these twenty-five principal theatres were $2,100,000. To the support of three of the best theatres, government contributes $300,000 in addition to their receipts. Think how many people are employed in and about these theatres. There are 400 box-keepers; 750 clerks, etc.; 600 dress-makers, carpenters; 630 musicians; 2043 performers—1152 men, and 891 females, of which 793 only are considered as 'artists.' The "French Opera House" is one of the largest and most splendid theatres in the world. It will accommodate 1800 persons. Its stage is 42 feet wide, and 82 feet deep. The whole theatre is finished with very elaborate ornaments of painting, statuary and carving. The rich and most gorgeous scenery, the splendid dresses of the actors, of which, in some operas, nearly 200 are upon the stage at once; the fine music of the orchestra, consisting of 60 or 70 performers, the brilliant appearance of the whole house lighted with gas, and the gay dresses of the audience, render the first visit of the stranger to the "French Opera" peculiarly exciting. Connected with the theatre is a large corps of ballet dancers—perhaps the best drilled company in Europe. At this theatre, the imperial family has a suit of rooms, connected with a box decorated with the usual regalia of majesty. In every portion of the house are stationed a sufficient force of police and firemen, which latter stand ready at any time to give a supply of water from the hydrants. Just in front of the stage, the building is partitioned by a thick wall of brick, with an opening equal in size to the curtain. In the attic is an immense iron curtain, which can be let down in case of fire, thus dividing one portion of the house from the other by a fire-proof screen. The outlets of this theatre are so numerous that it can be cleared, when full, in fifteen minutes, a very important matter.—Correspondent of the North Western Home Journal.

"BEG, SIR! BEG!"

our pleasures sadly, as is our fashion." Man is a laughing animal—the only laughing animal there is. Nature intends that a due proportion of mirth and merriment should be his. "All work and no play," as the old proverb goes, "makes Jack a dull boy." The English people were never more heroic than in that almost Arcadian time when their country went by the name of "Merrie England," and when, after the transition period during which Froissart wrote, and in which civil war made the nation naturally sad even in their pleasures, they were prosperous, happy and festive. It is impossible to believe that what tradition says of the last fifty years of the sixteenth century in England is all poetic exaggeration. The love of music alone—a love which then existed among all classes, but which, alas! has long ago died out—is a proof to the contrary. It was an age when there was sunshine, metaphorically speaking, all over the realm of England; and the natural results followed, great deeds and generally diffused happiness. It is said, however, that we have too solemn a mission before us, as a people, to be otherwise than grave. But it is a mistake to suppose a serious aspect indispensable to success; as fatal as to confound a long face and a sour aspect with religion. The healthiest man, all things else being alike, is not only the cheerfulest but the best. By overworking our brains and denying ourselves amusement, we become irritable and peevish, and therefore unjust. A little relaxation, especially relaxation of the right sort, would make us all much happier, and would fill thousands of households with sunshine where now the domestic atmosphere is gray and choking as a wet November day. Give us more sunshine; or rather let us all seek sunshine.—Baltimore Sun.

ANCIENT WARFARE.

The spirited picture on this page delineates a thrilling episode in ancient history, the attack of a band of robbers on a cave in the face of a rock, by the soldiers of Herod, King of Judea. The position of the bandits would seem to be almost impregnable, and nothing short of desperate valor could prevail against them. The engraving shows how these formidable enemies were reached. Strong boxes of wood, clamped with iron, and full of armed men, were lowered by chains down the face of the cliff, and the assault was then commenced. From a projecting rock Herod, accompanied by his principal officers and a portion of his troops, is seen, witnessing and directing the deadly combat. Proclaimed king of Judea by the Roman Senate, he was forced to wage a fierce contest with Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, to obtain possession of his states. The victories he achieved over his rival soon gave him possession of all Galilee, with the exception of a considerable band of robbers (or, more probably, partisans) who fought for Antigonus, and who being pursued unsparingly, sought refuge in caverns situated near the village of Arbela. King Herod ordered an attack to be made on them in the inaccessible retreats to which they had fled with their families. The historian Josephus has related this engagement. The difficulty, he tells us, was to reach the place, because the roads leading thither were very narrow, surrounded by sharp rocks and precipices which defied ascent from the foot of the mountains, or descent from the summit. To remedy this difficulty, Herod had coffers made, attached to iron chains, lowered from the mountains by machines. These coffers were filled with soldiers, armed with halberds to seize those who resisted. But the descent was exceedingly perilous, on account of the height of the mountains, and those who had taken refuge in the caverns had plenty of provisions. When these coffers reached the entrance of the caverns, a soldier, armed with his sword, buckler, and several darts, seized hold of the chain to which his coffer was attached with both hands, and alighted; and seeing no person appear, approached the entrance to one of the caverns, killed several enemies with his darts, hooked some of those who dared to offer resistance with the curved portion of his halberd, and precipitated them from the summit of the rocks. Afterwards he entered the cavern where he killed several more, and finally retired to his coffer. The cries of the robbers terrified the others and made them despair of safety, but night forced Herod's people to retire, and the king proclaimed pardon to all who were willing to surrender. The next morning the combat was resumed, and several soldiers left their coffers to fight at the entrance of the caverns, and to throw fire within, knowing that they contained large quantities of combustible matter. In one of these caverns they found an old man who had retired thither, with seven of his sons, who, seeing themselves reduced to such an extremity, begged him to grant them permission to surrender to the enemy. Instead of granting it, he placed himself at the mouth of the cavern, killed them one after another, threw their bodies from the top to the bottom of the mountain, and afterwards precipitated himself also into the abyss, preferring death to servitude. But before committing this act, he uttered a thousand reproaches to Herod, couched in very injurious language, though the prince made a sign with his hand that he was ready to pardon him. Thus all those who were in these caverns were constrained to surrender because they could neither conceal nor defend themselves. Such were some of the horrors of ancient warfare; but they are not without parallels in modern times. Our readers will remember, that, by the orders of Marshal Bugeaud a large number of Arabs who had taken refuge with their families in a cave in Algeria were literally suffocated in their asylum by the fires kindled at the entrance, and an officer of the Garde Mobile told us of a parallel incident in the bloody days of June, 1848, at Paris. The troops under Cavaignac, after carrying a barricade in the Faubourg St. Antoine, found no enemies upon the other side, but were decimated by a murderous fire of musketry proceeding from the coal holes under the sidewalk, where a large body of insurgents had hid themselves and were loading and firing as fast as possible. Our informant stated that by the orders of the commanding officer, a large quantity of sulphur was thrown down these holes and fired with rockets, and he concluded his appalling narrative by saying, Je vous assure, monsieur, que nous avons tres gentiment asphyxie les gous-las. (I assure you, sir, we very gently asphyxiated those fellows). Such is war! and so familiar to men engaged in the business of wholesale murder become to its horrid features, that the destruction of masses in the most terrible manner ceases to affect them. The same man who would shrink with horror from the sight of a single homicidal act, beholds hundreds of his fellows swept from existence without a solitary shudder.

Authors have a greater right than any copyright, though it is generally unacknowledged or disregarded. They have a right to the reader's civility. There are favorable hours for reading a book, as for writing it, and to these the author has a claim. Yet many people think that when they buy a book they buy with it the right to abuse the author.—Longfellow.

OLD ITALIAN VIOLIN MAKERS.

If, says M. Fétis, the violin was not cultivated by the virtuosity of the age of Pericles or of Augustus, it is of very respectable antiquity, notwithstanding. He believes it to have originated in India, and on apparently sound testimony. It is understood, of course, that the Asiatic violin was very unlike those of Stradivarius, just as the performers were neither De Bériot nor Vieuxtemps. It was simply a bowed instrument, that's all. What modifications it has not undergone since its first appearance in Europe in the middle ages! The viola was the mother of the violin—but the latter was not long in appearing. Towards the end of the sixteenth century it comes, finally, the precursor of modern music. The viola was sweet and soft, the violin brilliant and vivid. Gasparo di Salo, a lute maker of Brescia, was the creator of this valuable addition to the orchestra; and though his glory has been eclipsed by that of the Amati, of the Guarneris, and, above all, of Stradivarius, all violinists should hold him at least in grateful remembrance. Magini, a pupil of Gasparo, commences the series of Italian lute-makers whose fame is world-wide. Let us remark, in passing, that they are still called "lute-makers," though the lute has long disappeared from the realm of music to become a mere object of curiosity. It was De Bériot who brought progress. By dint of researches, trials, and experiments at random, the lute-makers, Stradivarius's predecessors, had managed to make very good violins. That which gives the celebrated artisan of Cremona a rank apart from the others is that he found out fixed, and in some sense mathematical, principles, and his success was a matter of theory, and assumed beforehand. He began by copying Nicholas Amati, as Raphael in his youth copied Perugino, but he adopted different proportions, and his productions bore a peculiar stamp. How many things there are in a violin which we do not even dream of! And what care is needed to make one really superior! There is nothing arbitrary in its proportions; each piece which composes this machine, at once so frail and so powerful, so rigorously determined. A millimetre more or less in the length or the thickness of certain parts, has its influence on the quality of the sound. The beauty of Stradivarius's instruments is to be referred to the absolute exactness of these proportions which he established—not empirically, but in virtue of the laws of acoustics—for, with him, the skillful hand and delicate ear of the artist were guided by the knowledge of the philosopher. Stradivarius died at ninety-three, having passed all his life in making violins; it may be supposed he left a few behind him. The good man never left his workshop; he never passed his time in courting the virtuosi, or in devising great or little means of publicity; he employed himself about his violins, and finished each one with his own hands, never delivering them to the purchasers till he had recognized them as worthy of him. He had fixed the price at four louis; some of them, at present, have been sold for as much as ten thousand francs. An eccentric whim of this celebrated lute-maker of Cremona caused for a long time an error as to the time of his death. He had a tomb made for himself, on which he caused an inscription to be placed, which read thus: "The tomb of Antonio Stradivarius and his family, erected in 1723." The date of the monument was taken as that of his decease, and people were only undeceived by the discovery of a violin, bearing his signature, with the mark of 1736, while quite recently, the vicar of the cathedral in Cremona has found in a register the inscription of his burial on the 29th of December, 1737. Stradivarius did not imagine, when he executed his dismal whim, that he was leading his biographers into error, though it is true that, even if he had thought of it, it would have been just the same to him.—N. O. Della.

BATTLE OF ALBUERA.

Such a gallant line, issuing from the midst of the smoke, and rapidly separating itself from the confused and broken multitude, startled the enemy's masses; then augmenting and pressing onwards as to an assured victory; they wavered, hesitated, and vomiting forth a storm of fire, hastily endeavored to enlarge their front, while a fearful discharge of grape from all their artillery whistled through the British ranks. Myers was killed, Coles, the three colonels—Ellis, Blakeney, and Hawkshaw—fell wounded; and the Fusilier battalions, struck by the iron tempest, reeled and staggered like sinking ships; but suddenly recovering, they closed on their terrible enemies, and then was seen with what a strength and majesty the British soldier fights. In vain did Soult, with voice and gesture, animate his Frenchmen. Nothing could stop that astonishing infantry. Their flashing eyes were bent on the dark columns on their front, their measured tread shook the ground, their dreadful volleys swept away the head of every formation, their deafening shouts overpowered the dissonant cries that broke from all parts of the tumultuous crowd, as, slowly and with a horrid carnage, it was pushed by the incessant vigor of the attack to the farthest edge of the height. Then the French reserve, mixing with the multitude, endeavored to restore the fight, but only augmented the disorder, and the mass giving way, went headlong down the steep; and eighteen hundred unwounded men, the remnant of six thousand British soldiers, stood triumphant on the hill.—Napier.

WOOD GAS.

It is but recently that successful experiments have been made in the manufacture of illuminating gas from wood. A patent was first applied for it in this country, in 1853, by a German chemist, the assistance of the discoverer, Emil Briesach. Under this patent different gas works have been erected in this country, and with satisfactory results. Where wood is cheap, it is believed this gaseous product will be cheap. The residuum consists of charcoal and tar; and creosote and pyrolygones acid may also be obtained. Different kinds of wood may be used for this purpose—pine, spruce, beech, oak, etc., if it be perfectly dry; and if the wood is as cheap as in many districts in this country, the cost must be very much less—indeed, but a small fraction of the cost of coal gas at its ordinary rates. The following statement of the product of gas from wood, from a reliable source, throws some interesting light on the subject: "One cord of ordinary pine wood, of one hundred and twenty-eight cubic feet produces gas-light equal to eight hundred pounds of spermatic candles; one cord of oak or maple, of good quality, will yield gas-light equal to nine hundred pounds of spermatic candles." A cord of dry pine wood has produced the light of thirteen hundred pounds of spermatic candles.

AN ANCIENT MODE OF WARFARE.

in favor the violins of Magini, in Belgium, France, and England. They were scarcely known out of Italy when our great virtuoso, who owned an excellent one, and knew how to use it, drew the attention of artists to its principal qualities, which are power and fullness of tone. After Magini came Amati—or rather the Amati, for there was a whole family of excellent lute-makers of this name—of whom the most celebrated was Nicholas Amati. His violins had not the power of those of Magini, but were distinguished by extreme mellowness of tone. If they have not sufficient brilliancy under the bow of the solo player in the concert hall, in revenge they do wonders in the quartette for chamber concerts. Even if Nicholas Amati had never made delicious instruments, it would be sufficient glory to have been the instructor of Antoine Stradivarius. The name of the celebrated maker was Stradivari, but it was Latinized, according to custom, and it would now be difficult to give the name its true autography. Stradivarius, then, was the first of lute-makers, past, present, and perhaps even to come. He carried the manufacture of the violin to such perfection that for fifty years all attempts to approach him have been in vain, and the only maker who has succeeded in this important branch of industry has found no better way than to copy him scrupulously. It is lucky that there are things which, perfect at the outset, it has been impossible to improve, and which have remained stationary in their excellence. Our age would grow too vain if it were not sometimes forbidden to pronounce the name of

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WHEREFORE.

BY ELIZA F. MORIARTY.

Now the winter waneth slow,
And the fierce winds fainter blow,
But vain tears my eyes o'erflow,
Wherefore?

Snow-drops from the dark earth rise,
Benisons to happy eyes,
Still my heart in secret sighs,
Wherefore?

From the southland bluebirds wing,
Heralds of the virgin spring,
Thy to me no pleasure bring,
Wherefore?

Every maiden's face I see
Breathes forth joy's serenity:
Ah, how different to me!
Wherefore?

Cares of age my heart has known,
Joy was smote upon her throne
Ere my childhood's hours had flown:
Wherefore?

Each dull day some heavy care
Makes my lot more hard to bear,
While I languish in despair,
Wherefore?

O, mourning heart! At Christ's behest
Life's sharp arrows sting my breast:
Doubt I it is for the best,
Wherefore?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE TWO CAPTAINS:

—OR—

THE SAILORS' PROTEGE.

BY RALPH TRYON.

IN a neat apartment two men were seated, whose grizzled locks and weather-beaten countenances told as plainly that both had passed the meridian of life as their pea-jackets, flowing shirt collars and tout ensemble revealed their intimate acquaintance with salt water. Both were possessed of vigorous frames, and if old Time had marked his approaches, he had left them,

"Strong for service still, and unimpaired."

The room, also, bore evidence of the calling of its inmates. A rich Turkey carpet covered the floor, while upon the mantel-piece, between two vases formed of the shells of the nautilus, was a full-rigged ship, and in the wall directly above a harpoon was crossed over a lance of corresponding length. The recesses on either side of the chimney was fitted with shelves, upon which were displayed with considerable taste, shells from the South Sea Islands, whale's teeth, Chinese ornaments and trinkets, and curiosities from various parts of India. The furniture also bore witness to its varied nationality, while a piano stood out in bold contrast to the motley collection that surrounded it.

The instrument was a tell-tale of a third party who was wanting to make up the family group, and the fact of its being open made its recent use apparent. The hardy men sat apart with gloomy looks. One was industriously puffing small clouds of smoke from the short Dutch pipe which hung like a pot-hook from his lips, although its fine workmanship and silver mountings render our comparison a failure. His companion was busy with his knife and a piece of wood, which, in his fit of abstraction, he was unconsciously shaping into a miniature boat.

"Jack," at length remarked the latter, "you are as glum as a dead light, to-night."

"I had in mind the same observation to make to you."

"You have sailed in my company long enough, Jack Crosstree, to know that my words are as valuable as the weather, but with you the case is different; you always keep on with a steady breeze and taut bowline."

"Well, shipmate, the fact is, I have been thinking."

"Blast it, so have I!"

"And I find myself cruising in a fog."

"Well, all I've got to say is, that when Jack Crosstree owns himself at fault, Will Roughwater isn't going to set himself up as a pilot."

"Will, you know that for some years back I have acted as a sort of banker for you."

"You have had the key to our shot locker, or there wouldn't have been much in it I reckon."

"Since the night that—you know what I mean—we agreed to put our earnings together for one common object."

"True as gospel, Jack, only the object could hardly be called common."

"The overplus we were to divide equally. Now how much do you suppose your share amounts to?"

"I haven't kept no sort of a reckoning, but over and above my interest in the Fanny Crosstree, perhaps there may be the matter of a few hundred dollars."

"A trifle over five thousand dollars, salted down in true blue bank stock."

The other sprang from his chair in amazement.

"Shipmate, if we were twenty years younger I should say that you had liquor on board and was altogether by the head."

"But as it is?"

"My topsails are all aback, and blow me if I know what to make of it."

"Never mind about the money, Will, we can easily take care of that. It is altogether a different matter which is kicking up such an ugly chop-sea in my mind."

"I see what you are driving at—our little Fanny."

"True; but little Fanny is now a young woman."

"Yes, and as handsome, tight-built a craft as was ever turned out among her sex."

"I don't know how you feel, Will, but if any harm happened to her to blight her innocent young heart, I'm sure it would break my own."

"I am sure of one thing, Jack," said the other, flourishing his herculean fists, "and that is, that I would break the head of the one who was the cause of it."

"Fanny has now arrived at an age when she finds pleasure in a society somewhat different from what two rough old sea-dogs like ourselves can offer her."

"But dash my cutwater if she can find any that will be so true to her."

"The darling loves us both dearly, and Heaven knows if she was my own child she could not be dearer to me; but she regards us both as parents, and young girls with her dashing cut and rig soon find out that there is another kind of love which outweighs all this."

"It's lucky, Jack, that she thinks you are her father."

"I don't know about that, Will; I sometimes think we have done wrong in keeping her in ignorance on this point so long."

"Blast me if I do! What is the use in taking a reef in her happiness while she is making such a lively run with a spanking breeze and plenty of sea room?"

"It has got to come sooner or later, shipmate."

"Stave it off until the weather changes."

"It is the duty of a true seaman to make all sang aloft, to be in readiness for whatever change Providence has in store for him. I don't know how you feel, but the barometer of my heart warns me to look out for heavy weather."

"Hang me if I know how I feel."

"What do you think of this Walter Fearing with whom she has gone to a concert to-night?"

"He seems to trim ship very fairly, and for a landsman I have taken quite a fancy to him."

"But if he were cruising under false colors?"

"Shipmate, you are heaving the load, but blow me if I know whether we are shodding or not."

"The youngster seems all right, I'll allow; but his family are proud and rich, I understand, and might not relish a connection with such as us."

"Such as us! Why, Jack, two abler seamen do not tread the planks of a quarter deck, if I do say it."

"Able or ordinary, it would make little difference with these fashionable folks."

"Then all I've got to say is, that they show a—I won't swear—a thundering lubberly taste."

"They might go further and fare worse, I'll allow, but that's neither here nor there. One of us has got to be on hand continually to watch over the child and keep her clear of hidden rocks and quicksands. She needs a pilot, and Will, it's my opinion that you had better stop on shore and take charge of her."

"What, I, Will Roughwater, lie up in ordinary while my shipmate is boxing about on this blasted ugly coast; by all the sea lions that cruise in the Northern Ocean, I'd matiny first!"

"I know your generous heart, and will therefore make terms to satisfy you. I will make my mate master of the 'Roughwater,' and then you and I will take turns in commanding the 'Fanny.' How does that suit you?"

"Why, that is more ship-shape and sailor fashion. I'll agree to that."

"This point is settled then; but there is another matter we must come to an understanding about. Our cruise in life won't last forever. We must bring up with a round turn sooner or later, and we ought to provide in season, in case of any accident, so that our little property shall go to the right destination, or to come square up to the mark at once, we ought to make our wills."

"But Fanny will be our heir of course."

"That is nature and justice, but it isn't law. She is in fact no relation of ours."

"Well, heave ahead, Jack, as you think best. I'm kind of superstitious about this will-making business, I'll allow; but I'm not the man to shirk when duty lays out the course."

"Here I am, dear father, and uncle Will, safe home again!" exclaimed a fair girl, bounding into the apartment.

"What has become of your convey, darling?" asked Roughwater.

"Why, as soon as he saw me safe into port he 'bout ship and stood off homeward bound, I fancy. Wasn't that tolerably expressed for a sailor's daughter?"

"That's the lingo, you gipsy."

"It's a raw night, Fanny," said Crosstree. "Don't you feel cold, my dear?"

"Not in the least, father, for to tell the truth, I rode home in a carriage."

The friends exchanged a significant glance.

"Why, uncle Will," she continued, "you have been whittling upon the carpet again!"

"Bless me, I believe I have, sweetheart, but it was altogether a lupus liny—I believe that's the French for a mistake."

"Not exactly," rejoined the laughing girl; "but never mind, uncle, I can easily brush them up."

"Fanny, has this Walter Fearing ever called upon you during our trips?"

"Why, father, a few times, I believe," she answered, while the rich coloring of her cheek deepened to a still warmer hue.

"What was the object of his visits?"

"I am sure I cannot tell, unless it was to see me," was her ingenuous reply.

"You know that I am an old sailor, and do not like a long parley, therefore I come to the point at once. Did he ever tell you that he loved you?"

"Never, father, or I should at once have sent him to you."

"That's right, my child; and now we will put a stopper on this subject. Suppose you sing us a song, for Will and I have been a trifle dull to-night, and a good lively air will set us up all right again."

"With pleasure; but Uncle Will must join in the chorus."

"Ay, ay, my lively lass, these old copper lungs of mine are ever at your service!"

Passing over the interval of a few days, during which Captain Roughwater had proceeded on his usual trip to Philadelphia, in his snug little packet brig, the "Fanny Crosstree," leaving his friend to finish the lading of his own brig, we will transfer the scene to the counting-room of Mr. Fearing, the father of the young man whose visits caused the two captains so much uneasiness in reference to their protegee.

"Walter, I wish to speak with you in my private office," he said, as the young man entered at a late hour in the morning. "Well, sir," he proceeded, after they were seated, "so you have thought proper to appear abroad in very questionable company, I understand."

"I do not comprehend you, sir."

"To be plainer then, you have been seen in a public place with the daughter of a low sailor."

"I have always known you, sir, as a severe man, but I had hoped you were at least just."

"What do you mean by such language?"

"Simply that you have spoken unjustly of a worthy man."

"The fellow is well enough, I suppose, for his calling, but if your intentions are honorable in that quarter, he is not the man I would have for the father-in-law of my son."

"And if my intentions were otherwise?"

"I would advise you not to appear abroad in her company."

"In that case you would not blame me seriously."

"I know that young blood does not flow so circumspectly as that of maturer years. I could pardon an error, my son, but the disgrace of a low marriage, never."

"And thus you would rebuke one who openly avows his dishonorable purpose of blighting the heart of an innocent girl and bringing misery into a happy and worthy family, and that one your son," replied the young man, rising indignantly from his chair with a glance before which his haughty parent quailed.

"Have a care, sir; your intemperate language exceeds the bounds of forbearance."

"I am no longer a child. You sought the interview and you must hear me out."

"If it is your purpose to insult me, have the kindness at least to moderate your voice, unless you wish to have the drudges of the office overhear your unattractive words."

"I have no such purpose, sir, and I regret that I spoke to you in anger," said Walter, softening; "but it made my blood boil within me to have you contemplate so calmly a wrong against one of the loveliest and purest-minded creatures that ever owned a nature human."

"I perceive that you are too extravagant to pursue this theme. At another time, when you are more reasonable, we can renew it."

"Nay, sir, hear me now, for I must confess that I love her. I have struggled to suppress it, and have brought family pride and your anticipated opposition to aid me in the effort, but I cannot control this affection, although I have never made the object of it aware of its existence."

"Enough! I know your headstrong nature too well to think you will regard my wishes or brook control. Be pleased to listen to my determination. From the moment that you call this girl your wife, I will not say do not darken my doors, but take care that she never crosses their threshold; for never will I own her for a daughter."

"In the event of such a connection, you must be aware, sir, that this determination would also exclude me."

"That would be as you pleased to consider it."

The son gazed thoughtfully on his parent for a few moments, noting the cold, relentless countenance before him, and then, as if discerning further expostulation, he seized his hat and rushed into the street. As he darted blindly from the doorway he ran against a person whose strong arms at once encircled him to prevent his falling.

"Mr. Fearing?"

"Captain Crosstree, is it you?" was their mutual exclamation.

"Your lookout does not seem on the alert this morning."

"Hardly, captain; but they say fortune is blind, and that, doubtless, is the reason I was brought into collision with you, the man of all others I wished most to see at the present time."

"Well, my young friend, step on board the brig and I am at your service."

The vessel lay at the wharf only a short distance, and in a few moments they were seated in her snug cabin, when Walter told the story of his affection for Fanny, not omitting the incidents of his late interview with his father, and besought permission to openly pay his addresses.

"Young man, this is ship-shape and honorable. Give me your hand."

"And you give your consent?"

"Belay for a few minutes, Walter, and give your attention to a yarn which is important for you to hear before I decide."

"Proceed, captain."

"Some sixteen years ago, at a late hour of the night, two seamen were standing up this same wharf under a full press of sail and with no little liquor on board. They had been paid off that day for a long voyage and were just underweigh with a spree. However, they were not enough by the head to make them steer badly, and they knew perfectly what they were about. These men were Will Roughwater and your servant to command, Jack Crosstree."

"Do you see that?" suddenly exclaimed Will, pointing to a white object which was moving rapidly towards us.

"Ay, ny, shipmate!" I replied.

"What do you make of it?"

"Hang me if I know what to think."

"Do you believe in ghosts, Jack?"

"Nonsense, Will, we are on shore and not in a fore-castle."

"Blast me if it isn't making directly for us, whatever it may be," he said, gripping my arm; for though his heart was as true as steel in ordinary cases, he was a trifle superstitious in his younger days, you see.

"I have made her out, any how," I said.

"In Heaven's name what?"

"Only a fair craft in her night rig."

"Upon that Will began to laugh, thinking what a fool he had been."

"Avast, shipmate," I whispered, "for there is trouble in her wake or I'll lose my reckoning."

"Let us heave-to and see what all this is about," said Will.

"At that moment she was close on to us. Her face was very pale, her eyes gleamed with a wild, unnatural fire, and her long hair was streaming like a thousand pennants in the breeze. She gave us both a sharp look, and before I got over my astonishment thrust a package in my arms, saying:

"For the love of Heaven save it, I implore you! I am pursued. You are seamen—my husband was a seaman. They would destroy it—but I'll trust you. Ah, they come—they shall not find it! May the good angels bless you as you are true to this charge!" And before I could reply or recover from my dumb-foundedness she darted up the wharf like a dolphin.

"Jack Crosstree," exclaimed Will, "do me the favor to pull my cutwater."

"Can't, shipmate—both hands full."

"Blast it, then, tell me whether I am asleep or not!"

"I aint able to make out my own longitude."

"Well, Jack, at all events you've got something in your fists. I suppose that's real, any how."

"It's heavy enough to be something."

"Let me have a peep at it. Hey, what's that; didn't you hear a noise?"

"Yes, and whatever it is, 'tis alive, for I can feel it kick."

"Well, Jack, here's for an overhaul. I'm bound to find out what sort of an animal it is."

"No raised several napkins as white as snow, and with an exclamation quickly let them fall again. It was as handsome a little baby-craft as ever was launched into the sea of life."

"Well, shipmate, what shall we do with it?" I asked.

"I don't know, Jack, but I haven't the heart to set the little thing adrift without a pilot."

"After a long confab we decided to take it to the woman where we boarded when ashore. She was the wife of an old shipmate of ours who had gone to Davy Jones's locker several years before, and Will and I had felt in duty bound to help her along. She received our little charge and promised to do her best by it. Before we went to sea we agreed between us that if the child was not claimed, we would bear the expense of bringing it up, drew lots to see who should act as father, and as it fell to me, I allowed Will to hitch together a name for it. We were both in the fore-castle then, but on the voyage, as if to bless us for the net we had done, I was made mate and Will second officer, the first mate having died, while the second was broke for mutiny. From this time we threw grog overboard, and saved every cent of our money for one common end. For several years we remained in the same employ, during which the little one learned to use her pins and to chatter in tolerable good English. Will and I set our lives by her, and in order to see her the oftener, we got employment in the coasting business, where we have worked our way up to the position in which you now find us. Our child went regularly to school and grew as beautiful as a little angel. Strange to say, no inquiry was made concerning her. In the course of time we chartered a house, hired her former nurse for housekeeper, made her a Christmas present of a piano, and allowed her to learn the French lingo. In short, we tried to do our duty by her, and she has repaid us by her sweet affection a thousand fold. Now, my friend, you know all that I know about our beloved Fanny, and it is for you to say whether you wish to continue your visits."

"My dear captain, I am completely astounded with what you have told me. I have always supposed her to be your daughter; but whoever she is it cannot alter her sweet nature nor my determination."

"Spoken like a man of honor!" exclaimed the hardy master, embracing him, "and if any man is worthy of the dear girl it is yourself."

"But was there no clue by which you could seek out her parents?"

"None except the clothes which she wore when she fell into my charge and a little coral necklace with a gold clasp, upon which are some initials I believe. I have taken pains to keep everything."

"Does Fanny know all this?"

"Not a word, but I shall overhaul the log with her soon, and until then you will do me a great favor not to allude to it in her presence."

"I will obey you, captain, and thanking you for your kindness and confidence, must now take my leave."

"God bless you, my boy, for unshipping a heavy burthen from an old sailor's heart."

Thus they parted, and the worthy Crosstree spent the remainder of the day in getting his vessel ready for sea, with her new master.

We will again return to the old sailors' home, allowing the space of a month to intervene since the conversation which occurred in the cabin of the "Roughwater." A fearful wintry storm was raging without, and from the appearance of Crosstree and his protegee, all was not calm within. He was pacing the room in rapid strides and instinctively gazing aloft as though he was treading the planks of a quarter-deck, while his iron countenance was expressive of great mental anxiety. Fanny was gazing abstractedly at the glowing grate, while her usually bright eyes wore an air of heaviness, and the pallor of her beautiful cheek showed that clouded lowered over her heart. Within a few days she had learned the secret of her connection with the worthy man whom she loved as a father. Walter Fearing had also breathed into her ear the tale of his ardent attachment; but while she could not conceal the fervor which made it reciprocal, yet her womanly pride gave her strength to firmly refuse an alliance with so haughty a family so long as the secret of her birth and parentage remained unknown. The trouble which oppressed the old seaman owed its origin to an entirely different cause. He knew that his old shipmate, if he made his ordinary run, must be at that moment somewhere inside of Cape Cod, and although aware of his perfect knowledge of the bay and harbor, he feared that the driving snow, together with the fierceness of the gale combined, would place him at fault and perhaps wreck his vessel; while to be wrecked on such a night, he felt, would be almost certain destruction to all on board.

"Father, you seem disturbed to-night," said the fair girl.

"It is a fearful night, my dear. This storm will strew the coast with wrecks, and drive hundreds of poor unfortunate beings into eternity."

"Is it not time for the arrival of dear Uncle Will?"

"Yes, my child."

"And he is in danger, I see it by your looks."

"I cannot hang out false colors, Fanny. There is a Providence who commands the storm, and his power alone can, I fear, return my dear shipmate in safety." And the strong man covered his face with his hard hands, unable to control the agony which he endured.

"Fanny," said he, at length, "it is already past midnight, and you had better seek your bunk."

"I could not close my eyes, dear father. O, what a terrific blast was that!"

"Shipmate, ahoy!" was the welcome hail which rose even above the violence of the storm.

"Heaven he praised! Will Roughwater is safe!" exclaimed Crosstree, making a bound towards the door, and in a moment he was locked in the strong embrace of his hardy shipmate.

"Heave ahead, Jack, for I don't know whether I'm standing on my natural limbs or two frozen sticks. What, Fanny too, on the watch for her old uncle! Give me a kiss, darling."

So busy were they with their congratulations, that they did not notice the presence of the stranger who accompanied Captain Roughwater.

"Blast me, if my happiness hasn't put a stopper on my manners," said the latter. "Jack, you haven't forgotten our young skipper of the Dolphin."

"Captain Talbot, I give you a sailor's welcome. Time, I see, has been overhauling you as well as ourselves. My daughter, sir."

The stranger turned and took the proffered hand of the fair girl in his own; but as his glance rested upon her beautiful features, he started wildly, and a strange emotion rested upon his features.

"Great heavens!" he faintly exclaimed, sinking into a chair, "what a resemblance!"

The two captains did not notice his agitation, so much engaged were they with each other, the one in recounting the perils of his severe trip, and the other in listening. Fanny had left them to see that a room was prepared for their guest, for whose appearance we will account from the fact that Roughwater accidentally met him in Philadelphia, and being a master with whom he had formerly sailed, and learning that he was on his way to Boston, he offered him a passage in his brig, which the other thought proper to accept.

"Pardon me, Captain Crosstree," he at length said, "but is that beautiful girl really your daughter?"

"For the want of a better father, sir."

But the stranger was not satisfied, and at a later hour, after Fanny had retired, the two captains thought proper to give him all the particulars of her eventful history. His emotion seemed to have fearfully increased, and he demanded, in a hoarse voice, to see the articles which they had preserved.

"Just Heaven!" he exclaimed, when they were shown him, "she is my own child! The initials upon the clasp of that necklace were cut by me. A. F.—Agnes Fearing, the maiden name of my poor wife!"

He then related to them the story of his love for the beautiful sister of the proud merchant whom we have already introduced to the reader, of the cruel opposition they had encountered, of their private marriage, which they were able finally to accomplish only a few days before he was compelled to depart on a long voyage, and of his anguish upon his return to find that she had died during his absence, bereft of reason. News had reached her that her husband's ship was lost, and this shock, together with the recent birth of her child, produced such an appalling effect upon her mind and system that she became a raving maniac. Mrs. Fearing did everything for her to the extent of her power, and treated her with the most sisterly kindness. Eluding their vigilance one night, she seized her babe and fled from the house, and when they obtained the custody of her again she had been rescued from a watery grave by a watchman. As the babe was missing, it was supposed that she had destroyed it, and to avoid publicity little inquiry was made concerning the matter. In a few days the unfortunate wife and mother died.

"Our yarns splice together like two pieces of the same rope," said Roughwater.

"Captain Talbot, our beloved Fanny must be your child," said Crosstree, sighing in spite of himself.

"I am rich, thank Heaven!" said Captain Talbot; "and this proud family shall learn the necessity of respecting Fanny Crosstree when I introduce her as Agnes Talbot, their niece."

Of the meeting of father and child—of the surprise of the Fearings, and the delight of the noble-hearted Walter at the unexpected denouement, we must leave the reader to fill up the picture. The proofs of the identity of the sailors' protegee as the daughter of Captain Talbot, were established beyond doubt, Mrs. Fearing having recognized every article that was originally found with the child.

The fair girl only enjoyed her new title for a brief space, for an event which occurred a few months afterwards made her better known as Mrs. Fearing. Years have passed, and the two captains have abandoned the seas. They still occupy their former cabin, as they call their home, and Agnes, although she has scores of fashionable acquaintances, loves them dearly as ever. Her piano remains in its old place, nor is it neglected, for there is a little Fanny, the image of her mother, who almost daily runs her tiny fingers over the keys, delighting with her bird-like carols the warm hearts of the two captains.

WITCHCRAFT IN MISSISSIPPI.

Under the caption of "Very Singular," the Grenada (Miss.) Republican relates the following cock-and-bull story: "We are credibly informed that there is now, in this county, a girl ten years old, who is very singularly affected. It appears she labors under the impression that she is bewitched. Her case is certainly a remarkable one. She wears a piece of gold around her neck, and if the gold is not watched, the string will twist to suffocation. She thinks if the gold was removed she would die instantly; on one occasion it was removed while she was asleep, and immediately there were signs of strangulation. Another remarkable feature connected with her case is this: cut off a piece of her hair and throw it into the fire, and she will show evident signs of pain or uneasiness by screaming. Her hair has been burnt half a mile distant, and at the very instant of burning she manifested the same signs of pain. Another strange feature in this case is, that if the picture of the individual whom she believes to be the cause of her sufferings is drawn upon paper, and shot at with lead, it makes no impression upon her, but present a gun loaded with silver, and she is thrown into spasms; fire, and she is calm again. This certainly is a strange case, and we hope to hear more from it." Great credit is due the editor of the Republican for the gravity with which he states the case.

A DARK MYSTERY.

Lately, as a workman of the extensive powder mill of St. Chamas (Bouches du Rhone, France), which belongs to the government, was about to resume his work in one of the rooms, in which there were at least ten tons of gunpowder, he perceived some bluish substance in the midst of the powder he had to handle; and on examining it found the heads of a dozen chemical matches, so arranged as probably to cause explosion on being touched. He immediately summoned his chiefs, and the heads of the matches were removed with the greatest care. The operation was attended with considerable danger, as, in addition to the vast quantity of gunpowder in the place, there were at least thirty tons in an adjacent storeroom. Suspicion fell upon a young man named Moutet, a stranger to the establishment, who on some pretext had entered it just as the workmen were suspending work to go to dinner. He was sought for everywhere, and was at last found stationed on the top of a high hill which overlooks the mill, gazing earnestly below, as if in momentary expectation of some great event. About two months before, a terrible explosion, which did great damage, and killed five persons, took place in the same mill, and the cause of it was never discovered. It is now not unreasonably suspected that Moutet may have occasioned it. His motive, however, remains a mystery.

A WEALTHY MERCHANT.

John F. A. Sanford, an eminent merchant of this city, died recently, in the fifty-first year of his age. He commenced life as a trader on the Missouri, rose to a partnership in the great St. Louis firm of Pierre Chouteau, Jr., and Co., and rapidly accumulated a fortune amounting to not less than a million and a half of dollars. We have heard that he, in connection with George Penbody, Esq., the London banker, made $500,000 on one year's importation of British iron, mainly for railroads. But the enes and anxieties of his immense business proved too great for even his vigorous mind, and Mr. Sanford was some months since stricken down with insanity. He recovered his reason after a time, but not permanently; he was again stricken, and died under the infliction—more deserving of commiseration in the midst of his vast wealth than many a beggar who knows not where to lay his head. The life of this man, truly and fearlessly written, would prove more instructive in a salutary than many ponderous volumes.—New York Tribune.

It is a fortunate thing in the early part of one's life to escape those causes of self-applause which too generally satisfy the mind with a few successful steps in this world's career. "I would never have been bishop of Worcester," said Pradeaux, "could I have been made clerk of Uxbridge; and Carneaues, the celebrated founder of the new newspaper, used to say, 'if there were no Chrysippus there would be no Carneaues,' thus acknowledging how much he was indebted to the talents of his opponent for his own reputation as a disputant.

NEW SPORTING STEAM YACHT FOR PRINCE HALEM PACHA.

HALEM PACHA'S SPORTING STEAM YACHT.

The beautiful yacht depicted on this page, is quite a gem in naval architecture. It is a miniature craft, exquisitely fashioned, and weighing only three tons with all her equipment. She is by this time in possession of her fortunate owner, Halem Pacha, of Egypt, having sailed from England for Alexandria during the past month, soon after her completion by Messrs. Westwood, Baillie, Campbell & Co., of London-yard, Isle of Dogs. She is intended to convey the pacha and his suite up the shallow and intricate passages of the River Nile on shooting excursions; consequently it is necessary that the draft of water, when loaded, should not exceed eighteen inches, at the same time speed being required with small horsepower. The vessel is constructed very flat amidships, but possesses fine lines in the bow and stern. She was built from designs by Mr. T. Smith, naval architect, her dimensions being as follows:—Length between the perpendiculars, 45 feet; beam, 5 feet 6 inches; depth, 3 feet 5 inches; burden in tons, 6 66-94; length over all, 51 feet; displacement, at eighteen inches, two tons two cwt. The engine was made by Mr. Stewart, of the Blackwall Iron Works, Blackwall, and is a five-horse-power oscillating condensing engine, with a cylinder of ten and a half inches diameter, and a stroke of fourteen inches. The engine and boiler occupy but little space, having the cylinder and air-pump directly under the shaft. The whole weight of engine and paddle-wheels is 15 cwt.; the weight of boiler, with water and coals, 35 cwt., making a total of 50 cwt.; complete length of engine and boiler space, 13 feet.—We are pleased to notice the movements in naval architecture of our transatlantic friends; in this great business, the men of England and America can afford to be generous rivals. We shall never forget how heartily the triumph of the America was acknowledged by the English, nor the reception given to the Merrimac, nor the commendations which our noble clipper ships have elicited from the British press and people. America and England are able to furnish the "rest of mankind" with shipping if they will foot the bill, and they must be content to share with each other the glory of sending forth the finest craft.

THE BOSTON SARDINIAN CANNON.

We present on this page an accurate representation of the monster gun, purchased by contribution in this city, as a gift to Sardinia, as it was exhibited on State Street. It was taken out by the clipper bark Nevada, which sailed recently for Genoa, and by this time is placed in a battery in the fortress of Alessandria, in the front of Sardinia, next to Austria. It bears the inscription, "Boston, United States, to Sardinia." The amount of its cost, $500, was raised by subscription in this city. The cannon was cast at Alger's foundry, and is an eight-inch Columbiad, a truly beautiful piece of ordnance. It may yet speak in thunder-tones in the sacred cause of Italian liberty. The present king of Sardinia, Victor Emanuel Albert Eugene, formerly prince royal and duke of Savoy, is one of the most liberal sovereigns of Europe. He greatly distinguished himself in the war of liberation which closed disastrously in 1849. On ascending the throne, he promised his subjects a liberal constitutional government, and he has thus far kept his word. It is something to have such a nucleus as Sardinia as the basis for a movement in favor of the regeneration of Italy, an event which the lovers of freedom anticipate with trembling.

CHARLOTTE BRONTE.

In June, 1851, Charlotte Bronte came to London. She attended Thackeray's lectures, and preferred them to the Crystal Palace, albeit she visited the latter under the scientific superintendence of Sir David Brewster. During all the next winter and throughout the succeeding year, her own ill health and her care for the infirmities of her father, compelled her to suspend her labors. By December, 1852, however, "Villette" was ready for the press. But we must now hasten to the two closing events of her career, her marriage and her death. In January, 1853, the project of her marriage was first openly broached. Mrs. Gaskell tells us little enough about Mr. Nicholls, although, from Charlotte's own confession that he made her very happy, he must be a good man. We gather, however, that he was her father's curate. At first, when he proposed, old Mr. Bronte objected, and Mr. Nicholls determined to throw up his curacy and leave Haworth; subsequently, however, it was represented to Mr. Bronte that the marriage of his daughter would not necessarily entail his separation from her, but that she and her husband might still reside in the parsonage and be a comfort to his declining years. Then did the old man consent that the wish of the poor girl's heart should be gratified. When the wedding-day arrived, the 29th of June, 1851, "when all was finished, the trunk packed, the morning's breakfast arranged, the wedding-dress laid out, Mr. Bronte announced his intention of stopping at home while the others went to church." But, for all this, she was married, and her husband loved her, and everybody blessed her. Short felicity! She was married but nine months, and in March, 1852, the same consumption which had taken her sisters, came and carried her off too.—London Critic.

CURIOSITIES IN CRYSTALS.

When the wind is from the northeast, and an ashen gray sand sweeps close overhead, the general exclamation is, it "feels like snow." Soon the flakes begin to descend; at first leisurely and few; then swifter, and finally faster, faster. Before an hour, the earth is covered with a white mantle, composed of millions of millions of little crystals, each as perfect of its kind as a diamond, and each in itself, if you will only look at it, as beautiful. Take up one. It melts in your hand; it is gone. See that other, on the very top of the snow-drift, glistening, gem-like, in the sunshine. A while ago it was vapor floating in the sky; before that it was a drop of sea-water; to-morrow it will be fluid again and mingled with the ocean. Examine its shape. It is like a tiny star cut in Carrara marble. Yet no sculptor, nor even lapidist, could ever rival it. No marble is fine enough to fabricate it. What subtle power in nature has made this snow-flake so different in appearance from the rain-drop, yet substantially the same? The very boys in the telegraph-office will tell you it was magnetism. Yes! it is this, as yet, almost unknown agent, the motive power, by which we send "lighting" messages to our friends, which helps to crystallize like the diamond at the bottom of the mine and the snow-flake high up in the heavens.—The whole subject of crystals is beautiful beyond imagination. It is crystallization, and crystallization alone, which draws the line between the diamond that flashes on a lady's finger, and the charcoal that smuts a kitchen maid. Sandstone and granite, limestone and marble, have their essential differences in crystallization. One has been formed in the laboratory of nature, by the slow deposit of matter held in solution in primeval seas, the other by particle on particle, also held in solution, arranging itself in the precision of soldiers at a review. No architect ever built more regularly than nature when constructing even the smallest crystal. Plants and animals grow by successive developments; increase by assimilation through chemical changes; but crystals are equally perfect in their earliest stages, and enlarge only by accretion. Yet crystals, like all other created things, die in time. Mines abound with skeletons of crystals. Crystals differ in shape as much as plants themselves. Yet the same substances always crystallize in the same forms, at least under the same conditions, so that we may say there are tribes and races of crystals, with typical shapes, exactly as of men. Crystallization is found through all nature. There is not a substance, which when allowed the free movement of its particles, does not exhibit a tendency to crystallize. Water, at a low temperature, crystallizes into ice. Metals, slowly cooled, after melting, crystallize. The gases, evanescent as they seem, may be made so artificially cold as to crystallize. Our children eat crystallized sugar under the name of rock candy, and we ourselves use it in the loaf, crystallized in another form. What is glass but a crystal? The sizes of crystals vary indefinitely. There are crystals too small to be recognized except under a microscope; and there is one at Milan weighing nearly nine hundred pounds. The White Mountains of New Hampshire are a vast aggregation of crystals. The Mammoth Cave in Kentucky is an enormous museum of crystals. As yet, however, the science of crystallization is a sealed book. Its mightiest curiosities still lie awaiting the skill and perseverance of some fortunate explorer.—Tribune.

SARDINIAN CANNON, EXHIBITED IN STATE STREET, BOSTON.

NIAGARA ENGINE CO., NO. 5, NASHUA, N. H.

We present on this page two engravings, drawn expressly for our Pictorial, from ambrotypes by Mr. J. S. Miller, of Nashua, N. H., illustrating the fire department of the flourishing city of Nashua. The first is a portrait of Franklin Munroe, Esq., chief engineer of the fire department, and the second represents the fine company whose name heads this article. Our representations will, we trust, prove interesting, not only to the locality referred to, but to members of the fire department of other places, for we well know the spirit of fraternity which links these gallant men together in the bonds of sympathy. The officers of the Niagara are Messrs. J. Q. A. Warren, foreman; Edward Wright, 1st assistant do.; J. W. Blood, 2d assistant do.; and S. B. Hutchinson, clerk. The Niagara Engine Company was organized in 1848, with fifty members, including the officers, and numbering on its roll many of the leading business men of the place. When its organization was completed by the usual complement of men, the town (Nashua not being then chartered as a city) furnished them with an engine from the manufactory of Messrs. Hunneman & Co., of Hoxbury, in this State, of six inches cylinder, and fifteen inches stroke, one of the best of its class. Mr. John H. Gage was elected foreman, and held the office one year. This gentleman was every way adapted for the position, and under his intelligent and energetic administration, the company was thoroughly disciplined and trained in everything necessary to the efficiency of a well-organized fire department. He was succeeded by Mr. George H. Whitney, of the firm of Gage, Warner & Whitney, who held the command for two years, and was re-elected for a third, but resigned in favor of Mr. S. F. Lund, who served one year, and was succeeded by Mr. J. Q. Brown, who commanded for one year and three months. Mr. J. Q. A. Warren was next elected, and has held the office ever since, being re-elected at every subsequent annual meeting. The Niagara enjoys the reputation of being one of the most efficient companies in the State, and has well earned its laurels. Prompt at the call of duty, resolute and fearless, the Niagaras labor to save property with the zeal of men whose souls are enlisted in the cause. The vigor and efficiency they display in fighting the devouring element may be accounted for in some measure by the fact that, since the organization of their company in 1848 to the present time, they have been called out to eighty-one fires and alarms, and have on all occasions acquitted themselves with credit. The following spirited motto is that adopted by the company:

Where'er is heard the tocsin's sound,
The fireman's starting cry,
Niagara's boys will there be found.
Their motto: We will try.

There have been two fires in Nashua when the total conflagration of this fine city seemed imminent. The first occurred July 24, 1852, and originated in the engine building of Josephus Baldwin, on Water Street, which contained oil and other combustibles. The fire spread with fearful rapidity, and the burning oil occasioned such a dense cloud of smoke, that for miles distant it was supposed the entire city was in flames, and such indeed would have been the case, but for the almost superhuman exertions of these devoted firemen, although nearly suffocated with the intensity of heat and smoke. They maintained their positions for three hours in succession, when the fire was extinguished and they were relieved by their then chief engineer, Hon. Josephus Baldwin. Their fellow-citizens were not unmindful of their services, and the same evening held a public meeting to offer a fitting testimonial of their appreciation of the services rendered, and their gratitude to a department which had so nobly earned their thanks. The second large fire broke out July 1, 1856, in one of the mills of the Nashua Manufacturing Company. At that time, the Niagara was at Messrs. Rollins & Co. for repairs, but the alarm was no sooner given that the mill was in flames, than the men were on the ground with the relief tub Thomas Gillis. In the short space of twenty minutes, however, the Niagara was put together, and in the hands of the company. No effort could save the mill, and the city was taking fire in many places from the falling cinders, a most critical occurrence, for the houses were mostly of wood, and its doom seemed certain. The firemen, however, were equal to the emergency, and worked on with the same tireless vigor and undaunted spirit as before. The Niagara Engine House took fire, and but for the speedy aid of Engine Companies No. 1 and 4, and Hydrant Company No. 3, would have been consumed. This timely and efficient service will ever be gratefully remembered by the Niagaras. After a hard contest of five hours with the "fire-king," his devastating progress was finally arrested, though several buildings had been destroyed. The company have always had their full complement of men—fifty. Their headquarters are on High Street where they occupy a fine house erected by the city. Besides ample room for their engine and hose on the lower floor, there is a hall above for holding meetings, of which any fire company might well be proud. The floor is richly carpeted, and the walls are decorated with costly engravings, including a fine portrait of Washington. Captain J. Q. A. Warren, the foreman of the company, is a model fireman, a gallant and whole-souled man, who enjoys the entire confidence and respect of the fine body of men he has the honor to command. Franklin Munroe, Esq., the chief engineer, of whom we present an excellent likeness, graces the honorable and responsible position he fills. He is not only one of the leading business men of the city, as all his predecessors have been, but is identified with the educational, religious and progressive movements of Nashua, and is universally respected by the community in which he lives. We annex, as a matter of record, the names of the assistant engineers: John H. Gage, John M. Flanders, E. P. Emerson, George White, J. D. Otterson, Daniel Hossey, B. Saunders, and F. M. Stirrison. It always affords us pleasure to do justice to the exertions of a fire department. Its members are among the most self-sacrificing of our fellow-citizens. Their duties are the most trying and arduous that men can assume, and when, in addition to their professional services, they exhibit the spectacle of well-ordered organizations, distinguished by propriety of action and excellent private deportment, they surely merit all the praise we can bestow. The fire department and the military, in a republic, certainly deserve well of their fellow-citizens, and were it to those who would crush the spirit of either of these institutions! We should like, in this connection, to speak of the flourishing city so often referred to in the course of this article. It is situated in Hillsboro' county, and was called Dunstable until 1836, the name being changed in December of that year. The Merrimac and Nashua Rivers afford a water-power which led to the establishment of the extensive manufactures by which the city is distinguished. It was the earliest settlement in the southern part of New Hampshire. It was incorporated in 1673, but was settled some time previous. For half a century it was a frontier town, and as such, was particularly exposed to harassing attacks from the Indians.

F. MUNROE, CHIEF ENGINEER OF NASHUA FIRE DEPARTMENT.

During King Philip's war, in 1675, the inhabitants were obliged to abandon it, as untenable, on that account. In 1691, several persons in the town fell victims to the Indians. From this time to 1706, frequent attacks were made and cruel outrages committed, in one of which a noted friendly Indian, called Jock English, was killed. Some were captured in the part which has since been set off from the original town under the name of Nashua, and carried into captivity. A party of eleven persons started in pursuit, but were ambushed by the Indians, attacked, and only one man escaped, John Farwell, who was the next year lieutenant in Lovewell's expedition. In 1725, Captain John Lovewell of this town raised a company of volunteers, and marched northward in pursuit of the hostile savages. In his first expedition, one Indian was killed, and one taken prisoner; in the second excursion, they killed ten Indians; but in the third, they fell into an ambush at Lovewell's pond, in Fryeburg, Me. Capt. Lovewell, Lieut. Farwell and Ensign Robbins, the chaplain, Mr. Frye, and twelve others, were killed, and eleven wounded, among the whites. In this conflict, the noted chief Pausgas was killed. The loss of so many brave men fell heavily on the settlement, but the result was glorious.

STREET SCENE, NASHUA, N. H.—NIAGARA ENGINE COMPANY.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WITH THEE.

BY WILLIE E. PAROR.

With others I can pass the jest—
The circling top of wit can spin;
And be as careless as the best,
With those whose hearts I would not win.
But when with thee, my lips a seal
Possess. A silent pilgrim I,
To shrines where tongue may not reveal
The love-words that beneath it lie.

With others, in their joyous mood,
I mingle with like tone of joy;
Each gives to each, as understood,
A little gold with much alloy.
But when with thee, no careless phrase
From lips of mine may ever fall;
For where my heart the tribute lays
Of its best wealth, it offers all.

Aside the glittering scales are flung
That hide the jewel's primal fire;
But on one crown alone is hung
The perfect pearl kings might desire.
And so I scatter on the throng
The worthless bangles of the mind,
But the true story of my song
I offer where my love is shrined.

With thee—with thee!—it sums up all
The happiness that earth can give;
On lips of mine shall never fall
The wine they taste who love and live.
The storm may come, the tempest sweep
Across life's ever-surfing sea,
But still my heart in peace will sleep
Secure with life, and love, and thee!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SOPHIE'S CONFESSION.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"MEN are never so awkward, never so ungraceful, never so disagreeable, as when they are making love. A friend is a luxury—a husband ditto, I suppose; but that intermittent class of human beings, denominated lovers, are terrible bores. It does very well for a woman to blush and look flustered once in a while, when occasion makes it desirable; but to see a man with his face as red as a ripe beet—and a real parcel of strong-mindedness, self-reliance and masculine dignity, done up in broadcloth and starched linen, quaking from the toe of his boot to the top of his dickey, his mouth awry and his tongue twisted into convulsions, in the vain attempt to say something sweet—O gracious!"

So said saucy Sophie Lynn aloud to herself, as she sat swinging back and forth before her window, half-buried in the cushions of a luxurious arm-chair, toying as she spoke, with a delicate ivory fan that lay upon her lap.

"It always seems so queer, not to say tiresome," she continued, with a rueful, musical laugh, "after one has waltzed and sang, quoted poetry and talked nonsense with anybody, till one is puzzled to guess which of the two is most heartless, one's self or one's companion, to hear him come plump down on the subject of matrimony, as though that was the legitimate result of every such insipid acquaintanceship. For my part, I never had a lover (here Sophie fluttered her fan, and looked pleased, for she had had more than one), that I wasn't heartily sick of after he had proposed. There was Col. Morris; I thought him the handsomest man in my whole circle of acquaintances, until he went on his knees to me, and swore he should die if I didn't take pity on him. Somehow he always looked like a fright to me afterwards. Then there was Dr. Wilkins; he was really agreeable, and people said very learned. I was delighted with him for a time. But he spoiled it all with that offer of his;—what long-winded adjectives! and how the poor fellow blushed, and puffed, and perspired!—he called me an 'adorable creature,' and hiccoughed in the middle of 'adorable.' Horrors! I've detested him ever since. Then there was—"

Here Sophie started. She had heard the door-bell ring. With a nervous spring she stood before her mirror, smoothing down her brown hair with a haste truly comical.

"It won't do to seem interested," she said, as she took a finishing survey of her person in the glass, and shook out, with her plump, jewelled fingers, the folds of her airy muslin dress.

The moment afterwards, when a servant entered to announce Mr. Harry Ainslee, she was back in her old seat by the window, rocking and playing with her fan, apparently as unconcerned and listless as though that name had not sent a quicker thrill to her heart, or the betraying crimson all over her pretty face.

"Tell him I will be down presently."

The girl disappeared, and Sophie flung open her window, that the cool, fresh wind might fan away the extra rosiness from her complexion. Then she went again to the mirror, and after composing her bright, eager, happy face into an expression of demureness, descended to the parlor. A smile broke over her features, and she reached out both hands to her guest; but, as if suddenly recollecting herself, drew them back again, and with a formal bow of recognition, she passed him, and seated herself in a further corner of the room.

It was very evident that something was wrong with Sophie; that she had made up her mind, either not to be pleased or not to please. Could it be that she had foreseen what was coming? that a presentiment of that visit and its result had dictated the merry speeches in her chamber? Be that as it may, a half-hour had not elapsed before she knew that Harry Ainslee's heart, hand and fortune (which latter, by the way, was nothing wonderful) were in the same place where Col. Morris's and Dr. Wilkins's had been before them—at her disposal.

"The first man that I ever heard say such things without making a fool of himself," muttered Sophie, emphatically, from behind her fan, as she sat blushing and evidently gratified, yet without deigning any reply to the gallant, straight-forward speech in which her lover had risked his all of hope. "He ought to do penance for the pretty way he manages his tongue. He's altogether too calm to suit me." And Sophie shook her curly head meaningly, holding her fan before her for a screen;—did she forget what she had been saying? "I wonder if I couldn't score the way old Uncle Jones used to in meeting? Wouldn't it be fun?—and wouldn't it plague Harry, if he thought I had been asleep while he was talking?"

Sophie's blue eyes danced with suppressed merriment as she gave two or three heavy breathings, and followed them up with a nasal explosion worthy of an orthodox deacon. It was well done;—theatrically done; and poor Harry sprang bolt upright—surprised, mortified, chagrined. Human nature could stand it no longer, and Sophie gave vent to her mirth in a burst of triumphant laughter.

"You a little witch—you mischief—you spirit of evil!" exclaimed the relieved Harry, as he sprang to her side and caught her by the arm with a gripe that made her scream. "You deserve a shaking for your behavior!" Then lowering his voice, he added, gravely: "Will you never have done tormenting me? If you love me, can you not be generous enough to tell me so?—and if you do not, am I not, at least, worthy of a candid refusal?"

Words sprang to Sophie's lips, that would have done credit to her womanly nature and made her lover's heart bound with rapture; for the whole depths of her being were stirred, and drawn towards him as they never before had been to any man. But she could not quite give up her raillery then. She would go one step further from him, ere she laid her hand in his, and told him he was dearer than all the world beside. So she checked the tender response that trembled on her tongue, and flinging off his grasp with a mocking gesture and a ringing laugh, danced across the room to the piano.

She seated herself, she ran her fingers gracefully over the white keys, and broke out in a wild, brilliant, defiant song, that made her listener's ears tingle as he stood watching her, and choking back the indignant words that came crowding to his lips for utterance.

"Sophie, listen to me," he said, at length, as she paused from sheer exhaustion. "Is it generous—is it just, to trifle with me so?—to turn into ridicule the emotions of a heart that offers you its most reverent affections? I have loved you, because under this volatile, surface-character of yours I thought I saw truthfulness and simplicity—purity of soul and a warm current of tender, womanly feeling, that would bathe with blessings the whole life of him whose hand was fortunate enough to touch its secret springs. You are an heiress, and I only a poor student; but if that is the reason why you treat my suit so scornfully, you are less than the noble woman that I thought you."

Sophie's head was averted, and a suspicious moisture glistened in her eyes, as he ceased speaking. Ah! why is it that we sometimes hold our highest happiness so lightly—carrying it carelessly in our hands, as though it were but dross, and staking it all upon an idle caprice!

When she turned her countenance towards him again, the same mocking light was in her eyes, the same coquettish smile wreathed her red lips.

"Speaking of heiresses, there's Helen Myrle, whose father is worth twice as much as mine. Perhaps you had better transfer your attentions to her, Mr. Ainslee. The difference in our dowries would, no doubt, be quite an inducement, and possibly she might consider your case more seriously than I have done."

Like an insulted prince, Harry Ainslee stood up before her—the hot, fiery, indignant blood dashing in a fierce torrent over his face—his arms crossed tightly upon his breast, as if to keep his great heart from bursting with its uprising indignation—his lips compressed and his dark eyes flashing. Sophie, cruel Sophie! You added one drop too much to your cup of sarcasm. You trespassed upon his forbearance one little step further than you would have dared, had you known his proud, sensitive nature.

Not till he was gone—gone without a single word of expostulation, leaving only a grave "good-by," and the memory of his pale face to plead for him,—did the thoughtless girl wake to a realization of what she had done. Then a quick, terrible fear shot through her heart, and she would have given every earl on her brown head to have had him beside her one short moment longer.

"Pshaw! what am I afraid of! He will be back again within twenty-four hours, as importunate as ever," she muttered to herself, as the street door closed after him; yet a sigh that was half a sob, followed the words, and could Harry have seen the beautiful pair of eyes that watched him so eagerly as he went down the long street, or the bright face that leaned away out through the parted blinds, with such a wistful look, after he had disappeared, it might have been his turn to triumph.

In spite of Sophie's prophecy, twenty-four hours did not bring back Harry. Days matured into weeks and still he did not come, nor in all that time did she see him. And now she began to think herself quite a martyr, and to act accordingly. In fact, she did as almost any heroine would have done under the circumstances—grew pale and interesting. Mama began to suggest delicacies to tempt Sophie's palate—"the poor, dear child was getting so thin." In vain. Sophie protested that she had no appetite. In vain papa brought dainty dainties and piled up costly dresses before her yet. A faunt smile or an abstracted "thank you," was his only recompense. If Sister Kate suggested that Harry's absence was in any manner connected with her altered demeanor, Sophie would toss her ringletty head with an air of supreme indifference, and go away and cry over it, hours at a time. Everybody thought something was the matter with Sophie, Sophie amongst the rest.

Her suspense and penitence became insupportable at last. Sister Kate, who had come so near the true solution of the mystery, should know all—so said Sophie. Perhaps she could advise her what to do, for to give Harry up forever seemed every day more and more of an impossibility.

"Will you come into the garden with me, Kate?" she asked, in a trembling voice, of her sister one day, about a month after her trouble with Harry. "I have something of importance to tell you."

"Go right along, darling, and I will be with you in a few moments," replied Kate, casting a searching glance at Sophie's flushed cheeks and swollen eyes.

Ranning swiftly along the garden-paths, as if from fear of pursuit, Sophie turned aside into her favorite arbor, and flinging herself down on the low seat, buried her head among the cool, green vines, and gave herself up to a paroxysm of passionate grief. Soon she heard steps approaching, and then a pair of arms were twined tenderly about her waist, and a warm hand laid caressingly on her drooped head.

"O, Kate, Kate!" she cried, in the agony of her repentance. "I am perfectly wretched. You don't know why, though you have come very near guessing two or three times. Harry and I—"

Here a convulsive sob interrupted her, and the hand upon her head moved back and forth over her disordered curls, with a gentle, soothing motion.

"Harry and I"—another sob—"quarrelled two or three weeks ago. I was wilful and rude, just as it is natural for me to be, and he got angry. I don't think he is going to forgive me, for he hasn't been here since."

Sophie felt herself drawn in a closer embrace, and was sure Sister Kate pitied her.

"I wouldn't have owned it to anybody if it hadn't been just as it is," she continued, rubbing her little white hands into her eyes; "but I think I love him almost as well as I do you, and father and mother."

A kiss dropped on Sophie's glossy head, and tighter was she held. She wondered that Kate was so silent, but still kept her wet face hidden in the vines.

"He asked me to be his wife—asked me as nobody else ever did—in such a grand, kingly way, that he made me feel as though I ought to have been the one to plead instead of him. I could not bear that, and so answered him just as I most didn't want to. He thought it was because he was poor and I was rich, and all the time I was thinking I had rather live in a mad hovel with him, than in the grandest place that ever was, with any other man, only I was too proud to tell him so to his face. What can I do? Tell me, Kate—you are so much better than I am, and never get into trouble. I am sure I shall die, if you don't!" And poor Sophie wept anew.

"Look up, dear, and I will tell you."

Sophie did look up, with a start, and the next moment, with a little scream, leaped from the arms of—not Sister Kate, but Harry Ainslee!

"H-h-o-o came you here, and who have I been talking with?" she stammered, hysterically, through her blushes and tears.

"You have been talking to me, and I came here at your sister's suggestion," was the answer, accompanied by a quiet smile. "To tell the truth, dear Sophie, Kate has been in the secret longer than you imagined, for I made her my confidant the very day following our estrangement. I met her accidentally, and she rallied me upon my dejected looks. In the freshness of my disappointment, stung by her careless remarks, I spoke bitter words to her. I was ashamed of them the moment they were uttered, as I met her grieved, wondering look; and having no other apology to offer, told her the whole truth. Knowing your heart, it seems, better than I did, she bade me wait, and hope for the best. It was in obedience to her command that I have avoided you so long, and it has been the most exquisite torture for me to do so, since I learned, through her, that you really regretted my absence. Last night, at Mrs. Evans's party, she gave me leave to call to-day. I met her in the hall a few minutes ago, and she directed me hither in search of you. You know the rest, and let me add, your confession has made me very happy."

Sophie declares to this day, that she has never forgiven either of them, though she has been Mrs. Harry Ainslee nearly two years!

ONE DOLLAR.
WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR
BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 75,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AUTUMN MUSINGS.

BY BLANCHÉ D'ARNO.

You see Anselm, murmuring in the gloom
With crimson lips up-breathing, seem to sigh
For the sweet morn of Spring—now past and gone—
When their translucent banners staid the sun,
And held him prisoner by their gentle wills.

Or, are they dreaming of their fragrant flowers
That tossed upon the winds their perfume free?
Methinks there's sorrow in those sighs of yours,
Dim sunset smiles!—ye lay your heads together,
And whisper so mysteriously 'mongst yourselves.

So, you wist Hendek-Fir—
With broken, dying bough, all sear'd and black—
Stands forth a ghost! Transparent amber light
Buys up you leaves, like banners dancing forth
On the proud wind! The boughs, in endless play, Leap gay this autumn morn! The tell-tale vines
Just 'gin to blush with the frost's poison virus—
The full consumption of the woodland train.

The larch her perfect leaflets wafts in gold:
Pure virgin flakes—gold without alloy.

The Maple, in his changeable banners' sheen,
Waves all his stately glory in the gale:

Ten thousand tones—ten thousand changeable hues,
Yon towering sapling, though—amplified wight!—
Streams bold on high his crimson pennon proud,
Flaunting it forth into yon azure sky.

Like young Benewa, audacious in new glory,
It fights the clouds sailing the sea of blue—
And borrows from their sapphires purple tones,
Sending unto them the pure roseate blush
That scintillates on the maiden's tender cheek.

The scarlet Sumac droops her fainting pedicles,
And one by one her leaves seek Mother Earth:
Or, they are borne along by transient winds
To the pure surface of the Painted Brook.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE ALLIGATOR AND THE TIGER.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

"THESE 'ere allegations is false, and that 'ere alligator knows it!" vociferated an indignant defendant, after listening to the testimony of a swift witness until his temper and patience were alike exhausted. That was one sort of an alligator, but the critter to which I allude, although making a very respectable show in his native mud, would, nevertheless, look decidedly senly in a court of law.

Some years ago, the barque Coquette, of Boston, having been dismantled on her passage across the China Sea, put into Manila under jury masts to refit. As the necessary repairs would detain the vessel some length of time, the crew were allowed to take a run of a week or so on shore. Most of the men lingered about the city, as the locality most congenial to their tastes; but two, Ben Gentleman, the second mate, and Jack Smith, a "high private," or tip-top and reliable foremast hand, made a straight wako for the interior, with the intention of spending a few days at the establishment of a friend and former shipmate who had, by some streak of luck made himself proprietor of a plantation. Arrived at their destination, they met with the cordial sailor's welcome they had anticipated, and a pressing invitation to remain an unlimited number of years.

Their friend, although abundantly tickled at meeting old shipmates, was in a peck of trouble in consequence of the frequent loss of horses and cows on a remote part of his estate, for which he could not account. The natives insisted that they were taken off, when they went to drink, by a disgraceful big alligator that frequented one of the streams in the vicinity; but their descriptions were so highly colored that they were attributed to the fondness of exaggeration to which the inhabitants of the island are peculiarly addicted.

Our salt-water friends, who were old Bengal rangers, and had paddled the length of the Ganges more times than a few, thought there might be more truth in the story than the Indians got credit for, and being no way averse to a little excitement, they resolved to ascertain the facts of the case.

Accordingly, bright and early the following morning, having armed themselves with a rifle and a stout knife each, they started for the infested locality, under convoy of an Indian guide. Their route lay, for some half a dozen miles, amid the gorgeous and somewhat savage scenery of the East India islands, with lofty mountains and frowning rocks upon one side, while upon the other a gentle flowing river, with its banks fringed with the graceful bamboo; and the alternate glory of glade and forest, spreading far and wide, presented a scene of beauty unappreciable by the untravelled denizen of our hyperborean clime.

"Ben," said Jack Smith, addressing his companion, as they strode rapidly over the firm, springy turf that spread like a luxuriant carpet beneath the forest trees; "don't you s'pose there's a smart chance for varmints in these 'ere woods? There are some spots here that look just enough like a Bengal jungle to make a chap think of cobras and tigers, and roaring lions going about seeking whom they may devour somebody. Maybe we should do as well to go kind o' easy like, and keep a sharp lookout ahead."

"You be blowed!" exclaimed Ben, who was the elder as well as the bolder and more fiery of the two. "You're not in Bengal now, by a long chalk. You don't know nothing about this 'ere island. Why, bless your heart, I travelled these woods as long ago as when you wore petticoats, and I nint eat up yet, not quite. But I say, what put such an idea as that into your skinner?"

"Why," returned Jack, with an anxious look around him, "I've noticed for the last half hour, that whichever way we turned, there was a round like the racking of sticks and twigs in our wake, and not a great way behind us, either. It's my belief there's something with mighty big paws following us, that's what I believe!"

"Slipnate," said Ben, halting suddenly in his tracks and facing his companion, "there isn't but one man in this world that could tell me Jack Smith was timorose, and make me believe it. You nint going to be that man, are you?"

"No," said Jack, calmly, "I nint afraid; and as for going about on the other tack, it don't belong to my father's sons to do anything on that lay; but for all that, I can imagine a pleasanter cussin than a tiger's belly."

Ben burst into a loud laugh, protesting that Jack had left all his courage boxed up in his chest on board the barque, and that he couldn't tell a land's hog from the footfall of an elephant.

Jack, although far from being convinced, remained silent, in deference to the superior age and experience of his companion; but he was constantly on the alert, with his ears open to every sound, until they reached the point of the river where the Indian intimated the alligator might be found. The stream here, after running for some distance through a narrow channel, spread out into a broad, quiet lake, a hundred rods or more in width. At the upper end of the lake, where the stream narrowed to a few yards in width, a primitive bridge of logs had been thrown across, affording passage to cattle and horsemen.

"Well, Jack," said Ben, after they had surveyed the lake for some minutes, without perceiving any signs of the alligator, "you cross over here and follow down the other bank, while I and the Indian travel this side. If the everlasting critter is anywhere about, we shall stand a chance to get a sight of him."

Jack crossed as directed, carefully examining every log and stump as he proceeded, while his companion occupied himself in a similar manner on the opposite side.

"Hi, me see 'gator!" suddenly shouted the Indian, pointing towards the centre of the lake, where a spiral motion of the water indicated that some large creature was in motion.

In another minute, the enormous head and a portion of the back of an alligator, forty feet in length, appeared above the surface and began slowly paddling towards the bank where Ben and the Indian were standing. Having waited until the animal was within half a dozen rods of the shore, Ben raised his rifle, and taking deliberate aim, succeeded in lodging a ball in its body, just forward of the fore legs.

On receiving the ball, he uttered a growl like an angry dog, and settling below the surface, began making his way towards the opposite shore, as could be perceived by the slight agitation of the still water in his track.

"Look out for him, Jack, he's coming over your side!" shouted Ben, as he hastily reloaded.

"All right, I'll tend to his case!" replied Jack, cocking his rifle and running along the bank to a spot where the huge trunk of a fallen tree lay with its branches in the stream, and where it appeared the alligator, from the course he was taking, would be likely to endeavor to effect a landing.

In a few moments, the water broke near the shore, and the senly monster resting his fore legs on the bank and raising his head, gnashed his formidable jaws with a sound like nothing else in nature, while his eyes glared upon Jack, and followed his motions most ferociously.

Such an interesting object suddenly appearing within a few feet of a fellow's nose, would be very likely to make most any man quail. It is not surprising, therefore, that Jack felt himself at liberty to quail a trifle—just sufficient to spoil his aim; but plucking up courage from the repeated shouts of Ben, from across the water, to let drive, he raised his gun to his shoulder and pulled the trigger.

The gun went off, of course; but as the alligator didn't follow the example, Jack did, precipitately, making his way back towards the roots of the fallen tree about as rapidly as he could make it convenient to lift his brogans. His shot, which had struck without inflicting any serious injury upon the alligator, only served to render the brute more ferocious.

Foaming with rage, with open jaws, and lashing the water into foam with his tremendous tail, he began to draw himself up on to the bank in pursuit. Jack, having placed the upturned roots and a portion of the trunk of the tree between himself and his foe, and having looked out for a good clear chance to run, in case desertion became the better part of valor, began hastily reloading his rifle.

In the meantime, Ben, who had been watching the proceedings with much satisfaction, chanced to raise his eyes towards the tall trees immediately behind where Jack was standing, when, to his dismay and horror, he beheld, half concealed among the branches, the fiery and ferocious eyes, the striped and creeping hide of a large and powerful tiger, that lay crouched upon a limb, softly stripping up the bark with alternate digs of each fore paw, as you may have seen a cat exercise her claws on a carpet, while she glared down upon the unconscious hunter beneath her, seemingly ready for a spring.

Ben's first impulse was to sing out and inform his friend of this new danger that threatened him, but it instantly occurred to him that by so doing, it would only hinder him in the operation of loading his rifle, upon which his only chance for safety seemed to hang. With his heart in his mouth, and every nerve quivering with excitement, he brought his own rifle to his shoulder and took deliberate aim at the tiger's head. The distance was too great to hope for much execution from the shot, but it was all he could do, and he resolved to reserve his fire until the last minute, when possibly, it might not be entirely thrown away.

Jack, thinking only of the alligator, and intent upon driving the ball to the bottom of his rifle barrel, remained wholly unconscious of his danger, until, as he dropped the butt of his gun and felt in his pocket for a cap, he saw Ben standing motionless, with his rifle to his shoulder, aiming in a direction very near himself.

"What are you going to fire at, Ben?" he asked, and turning to look behind him, he saw the tiger, with her legs drawn close under her, in the very act of springing upon him.

Petrified at the sight, he dropped his rifle from his hand and glanced helplessly and helplessly around him. To dodge the first spring of the tiger by retreating down and passing beneath the trunk of the tree, would be to throw himself into the jaws of the advancing alligator, which, with gnashing teeth and lashing tail, was now close upon him. To avoid the alligator, he would have to quit his present position, where he was partially protected by the upturned roots, and, in consequence, leave himself entirely exposed to the tiger.

There was not an instant for deliberation. Indeed, if there had been, it could not have benefited any, for there was no possible avenue of escape, except by a lucky shot, and he was now too much agitated to complete the loading of his rifle, even if he had time; besides, tigers are not often killed by a single shot. He saw the knotted muscles rise and swell in the huge limbs of the tiger, as she gathered herself for the fatal leap; he saw her quit the limb on which she had been crouching, and start through the air towards him like a cannon-shot.

Closing his eyes, he shrank back among the mass of roots and vines, expecting every instant to feel the tiger's claws tearing his body and her hungry jaws at his throat. He heard the crack of Ben's rifle from the opposite side of the lake, but he heeded it not; he knew that any assistance from him would be of no avail, and he cowered beneath the tree, stupefied with horror. From this condition he was aroused by the most prodigious uproar and scuffling that ever awakened the echoes of the forest.

It appeared that Ben, watching his opportunity, fired at the very instant the tiger sprang from the tree. The spent ball striking her in the head had no other effect than to slightly change the direction of her leap. But that little was everything to poor Jack. Instead of alighting directly upon him, she struck the ground a few feet to one side and almost upon the nose of the alligator. That enraged and indignant reptile being anxious for a row, without much caring with what, swept the tiger within reach with one vigorous flit of its restless tail, and bringing its jaws together with a resounding clop, caught her by one fore leg and the side of the head,—and then and there commenced a battle royal.

The tiger, with her eyes starting from her head, roared and shrieked with rage and pain, while with her formidable claws she tore the alligator's throat to shreds. The alligator, on his part, pounded and banged the tiger upon the ground, with a force that would have killed an ox, but not a tiger.

This scene Jack took in at a glance, and grabbing his rifle, with an inward prayer for the success of the alligator, he ran like a deer for the log bridge at the head of the lake, where he was joined by Ben, and from which they viewed the termination of the combat.

The alligator, beginning to suffer considerably from the awful clawing he was getting, with a natural instinct, made for the water; a proceeding on his part against which the tiger vigorously protested, but in vain; the alligator was the more powerful of the two. Reaching the edge of the bank, he plunged in, dragging the howling and struggling tiger beneath the surface.

A terrible encounter ensued; the water boiled and foamed; mud, sticks, stones and branches, that had lain for years undisturbed, were thrown to the surface in vast quantities. For several minutes this sub-marine conflict continued, then all was still; a few bubbles rising to the top, alone disturbed the quiet surface of the lake. Presently, a large dark object rose to the top. It was the alligator, dead, his throat and a part of his stomach completely torn out, but still holding on with his firmly set jaws to the neck of his smothered foe.

Leaving the Indian to recover the tiger's skin, if he saw fit, our salt-water friends set all sail for the port from whence they came, fully impressed with the conviction that they had seen sport enough for one day.

GASTRONOMY.

Dr. Veron, the author of "The Bourgeois de Paris," and known for his gastronomic superiority, gave a dinner to M. and Mme. de Girardin, to Dumas pere, and to Mme. Cabel, the singer of the Opera Comique. Dumas affirmed he could himself dress no better still. A wager was laid. Dumas fixed the 16th of April, on account of the preparation required. The wager is this: if Dr. Veron admits the dinner to be better than he ever ate, he is to pay whatever it costs; if not, Dumas is to pay. One dish is to be a roasted lobster, with a marvellous sauce; another is a dish of spinnach, which lies for three days soaking in goose grease, and is to be served with gravy extracted from mutton kidneys. In a certain set who are near upon the confines of the demi monde, this dinner is talked of as an event, and Rossini (a vast authority on the subject) has given his opinion that Dumas is one of the finest cooks in the world.—Correspondent Boston Journal.

THE EAWWIG.

This little creature is generally viewed with disgust, from the foolish prejudice that it attacks the ear of man, and, by entering the head or brain, occasions insanity. The supposition is idle, and without one particle of truth. It is no more subject to this charge than any other insect that moves on the ground or floats in the air. The forceps o curved hook, which you observe projecting over the tail, are instruments used for folding and settling their soft wings, which are placed under the outer or scaled wings. These wings are very beautiful, and by their aid this creature has considerable power of flight. It sits upon its eggs, and hatches them like a hen.—Lancet.

Great thoughts, indeed the greatest, come from personal being. Literary and scientific works are produced by certain isolated faculties working with a definite and restricted aim.—Edinburgh Review.

EDWIN BOOTH.

EDWIN BOOTH, TRAGEDIAN.

We present herewith an admirable portrait of this gifted and rapidly rising tragedian, drawn expressly for us from a photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, and one every way worthy of their high artistic reputation. It was certainly taken at a favorable moment, and is a counterfeited presentment of the highly intellectual and refined countenance of the original. Since we had occasion to notice this young actor's performances at the Boston Theatre, he has performed an engagement in New York, with great popular success, also winning the approbation of the New York press. The critics of our sister city agree in the main, in their estimate of Mr. Booth's powers, with those of Boston. While pointing out his inequalities, they all concede that he possesses talents of the first order, and predict for him a splendid future. The best guarantee of this young man's professional future is his innate modesty, which is not the modesty of the embarrassed novice, but a certain consciousness which is the attribute of true genius. Genius is ever aspiring—ever aiming at new conquests. It never rests satisfied with its own achievements. Titian, painting to the age of ninety, went on improving to the very last day of his life. It is only mediocrity that halts with complacency and listens to applause at a moderate elevation, while "Alps on Alps" rise in unscaled grandeur far above it. Mr. Edwin Booth and Miss Matilda Heron are prominently before the public at a fortunate period, for earnest and high-toned men are now advocating the stage and rallying the good and truthful to its support. The time is approaching when actors will be generally admitted, and not merely by the "judicious few," to take rank with members of the other liberal professions. Their laborious lives will no longer be regarded as profitless and wasted; but as the sphere of their exertions is recognized as a legitimate one, so will they be held to a strict accountability. Much of the former degraded character of the stage was owing to its neglect by the refined and moral portion of the community. Denounced and traduced, but existing in spite of denunciation and calumny, it addressed itself to the class that persisted in patronizing, for public amusements must of course reflect the tastes of their supporters. It is morally certain that if the virtuous and refined will give a constant support to the stage, the drama, like other forms in which literature is presented to the public, will take high and lofty ground.

EGYPTIAN SHADOOF FOR IRRIGATION.

BLANCHARD'S TIMBER-BENDING MACHINE.

We present herewith an accurate representation of the famous timber-bending machine, invented by Mr. Thomas Blanchard of this city, for which he has secured patents in the United States, in England and France. Its operations and results have been subjected to the severest tests by scientific experiments, and have sustained the ordeal triumphantly. Its principal application has been to producing the requisite curve in timber for ship-knees, but is applied, of course, to manufactures of wood wherever a curve is desired. Our illustration shows the machine in operation, and will be readily understood by those familiar with mechanics, and also several of the knees which have been bent by the process. The timber is first of all prepared by steaming. Every mechanic, especially the self-taught, and those who have had few or no tools, has felt the difficulty of bending timber so as to take that convenient or elegant shape which will answer the purposes of pleasure or amusement, taste or utility. This is true from the hoop and the walking-stick to the round table and the ship's timbers. For want of the means of meeting this difficulty, we are obliged to have all our vehicles, our houses, and our temples, built in the square form; and we are thus precluded from rounding our carriages, making our houses circular or oval, and even building a dome or an amphitheatre. The bending of timber is an operation which has hitherto been performed as rarely as possible, and always with very considerable trouble and expense. Every shipbuilder knows perfectly well that the expenditure of time, labor, and material, involved in bending a thick plank round a bluff bow, or round a quarter, is enormous; and knows further that the impracticability of bending very thick timber at all, leads to fearful waste. The characteristic feature of the apparatus is, that it subjects the wood, during the bending process, to pressure on all sides, by which it is prevented from bursting, crippling, or altering its form in any other than the desired manner. The "set" imparted to it becomes quite permanent, after a few hours, during which it is kept to its form by an enveloping band and a holding bolt. The French government gave this invention a warm welcome, because the forests of France have long since been denuded of trees supplying natural knees, and an artificial curvature had long been regarded as a desideratum.

EGYPTIAN SHADOOF FOR IRRIGATION.

In Egypt there is a very curious system of irrigation adopted, called the shadoof. The apparatus consists of two posts or pillars of wood, or of mud and canes or rushes, about five feet in height by three feet apart, with a horizontal piece extending from top to top, to which is suspended a slender lever, formed of a branch of a tree, having at one end a weight chiefly composed of mud, and at the other, suspended from two long palmsticks, a vessel in the form of a bowl, made of basket-work, or a hoop and a piece of woollen stuff or leather. Each lever being managed by a man, the bowl is made to dip into the stream, by whose side the apparatus is built up, and the water is thrown up to the height of about eight feet, into a trough hollowed out for its reception. When the height to which the water has to be raised is much greater than this, the shadoof assumes the more elaborate form accurately represented in the accompanying engraving at the foot of this page. It consists, in fact, of four or five shadoofs; the water is raised from the river by the bowls, and emptied into a trench or trough, from which it is taken by other bowls, and discharged into another trench above; and so on, from trench to trench, until it is raised to the level of the fields. The annual inundations of the Nile supply the material for the abundant crops of cereals that are produced in the adjacent regions, as its waters are full of fertilizing properties, but in the intervals it becomes necessary to supply the deficiency of water by artificial means of irrigation. When Belzoni travelled in Egypt he ingratiated himself with the government by setting up water-wheels, and improving the processes then in use. The necessity and labor of irrigation balances the advantages of climate, so that in every region of the earth the agriculturist is obliged to obtain his bread "by the sweat of his brow," in accordance with the universal penalty of man's original fall.

BLANCHARD'S WOOD BENDING MACHINE.

A HAUNTED CHAMBER.

A room in the principal inn of a country town had the reputation of being haunted. Nobody would sleep in it, and it was therefore shut up; but it so happened that at an election the inn was full, and there was only the haunted room unoccupied. A gentleman's gamekeeper came to the inn, exceedingly fatigued by a long journey, and wanted a bed. He was informed that unless he chose to occupy the haunted room he must seek a bed elsewhere. "Haunted!" he exclaimed; "stuff and nonsense! I'll sleep in it. Ghost or demon, I'll take a look at what haunts it." Accordingly, after fortifying himself with a pipe and tankard, he took up his quarters in the haunted chamber and retired to rest. He had not lain down many minutes when the bed shook under him most fearfully. He sprang out of bed, struck a light (for he had taken the precaution to place a box of Lucifer matches by his bedside), and made a careful examination of the room, but could discover nothing. The courageous fellow would not return to bed, but remained watching for some time. Presently he saw the bed shake violently; the floor was firm; nothing moved but the bed. Determined, if possible, to find out the cause of this bed-quake, he looked in the bed, under the bed, and near the bed, and not seeing anything to account for the shaking, which every now and then seemed to seize on the bed, he at last pulled it from the wall. Then the "murder came out." The signboard of the inn was fastened to the outer wall by a nut and screw, which came through to the back of the bed, and when the wind swung the signboard to and fro the movement was communicated to the bed, causing it to shake in the most violent manner. The gamekeeper, delighted at having hunted up the ghost, informed the landlord the next morning of the real nature of his unearthly visitor, and he was handsomely rewarded for rendering a room, which had been useless, now quite serviceable. All the ghost stories which are on record, might, no doubt, have been traced to similar sources, if those to whom the "ghosts" appeared had possessed as much pluck as our gamekeeper.—Watchman and Reflector.

THE SIAMESE.

The ordinary dress of the Siamese is a long piece of cotton printed cloth, passed round the waist between the thighs, the ends of the cloth being stuck in behind. They wear no covering over the head or upper part of the body; and the legs and feet are quite naked. The higher classes, sometimes, wear sandals; and have, generally, a piece of white hanging loosely about the shoulders, which they sometimes use to wrap round their head. Young women employ a sort of silk scarf to screen the bosom; a refinement which, after marriage, is much neglected; indeed, no sense of shame or impropriety appears to be connected with the exposure of the body above the waist. In the sun, a light bat, which looks like an inverted basket, made of palm-leaves, is used by both sexes. On all ceremonial occasions, and in visits from inferiors to superiors, it is usual to wear a silk scarf round the waist. In the presence of the king, the nobles have a garment with sleeves, made of tulle, of the most delicate texture, and richly ornamented, which they often take from their shoulders and fasten round their waist. The women who ply on the river wear rather a graceful sort of white jacket, fastened in front. In cold weather an outer garment is worn, whose value depends on the rank and opulence of the wearer. There is a universal passion for jewelry and ornaments of the precious metals, stones, etc. It is said there is scarcely a family so poor as to be without some valuable possessions of this sort. Rings of silver and gold adorn the arms and the legs of children; rich necklaces, earrings, and belts, are sometimes seen in such profusion as quite to embarrass the wearer. Female children, up to the age of twelve or thirteen, wear a gold or silver string with a heart in the centre, performing the part often assigned to the fig-leaf in exhibitions of statues. To the necks of children, a tablet called a bai soma, is generally suspended, bearing an inscription as a charm against mischief; and men have a metallic ball attached to a belt, to which they attribute the virtue of rendering them invulnerable. A necklace consisting of seven lumps of gold or silver is worn by girls as a protecting influence.—Sir John Bourging.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A YEAR AGO.

BY EFF. DAVITT.

One year has passed—'t was folly now
To count the changes time has wrought
By syren wiles and faithless vow
On hearts with care and sorrow fraught.
For time's eventful course may bring
Some brighter lot or happier hours,
Like as the balmy air of spring
Unfolds the petals of the flowers.

'E'en though the wound may never heal,
When pride forbids revenge to grow,
Forgiveness stoops to kindly kneel
And kiss the hand that dealt the blow.
'Tis better thus to feel the pain,
Than know 'twas from our hand 'twas given.
For who is there so proud or vain,
That would not make his heart a heaven?

One year has passed—and with it joy
Perchance has flown for ever away;
But yet there is one pleasing toy
With which poor mortals love to play.
'Tis memory! Ay, we love to muse
While bods of thought around us grow,
And sigh to think we chanced to lose
The bliss of "just a year ago."

I GAVE MY LOVE.

I gave my love a chain of gold
Around her neck to bind;
She keeps me in a faster hold,
And captivates my mind.
Methinks that mine's the harder part:
Whist! 'neath her lovely chin
She carries links outside her heart—
My fetters are within.—CAMPBELL.

JOY AND SORROW.

Sorrow treads heavily, and leaves behind
A deep impression, even when she departs;
While joys trip by with steps light as the wind,
And scarcely leave a trace upon our hearts.—MRS. E. C. EMBURY.

OUR HEAVENLY FATHER.

God's better to us than many mothers are;
And children cannot wander beyond reach
Of the sweep of his white raiment.—MRS. BROWNING.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Though at the close of the week, the last of our labors is the preparation of the gossip, yet we linger lovingly upon it, for it is more a recreation than a task, as we feel that we are addressing kind friends, who will pardon a careless expression, laugh with us at an old joke, and even allow a "little nonsense now and then" to pass unchallenged. So, on this glorious June afternoon, we drop our curtain on the sun-gilded trees and blue sky, and place ourselves in communication with our vast circle of sympathizing spirits. We call you to order by three raps on our study-table, and plunge our pen resolutely into our inkstand. . . . How beautifully the Common looks now that the trees are in full foliage—quite uncommon!—and that old veteran elm that has stood sentinel by the Frog Pond for ever so many years, looks quite juvenile in his new green uniform. And, speaking of trees, it is not too late to set out evergreens. Their verdure next winter will repay you for your trouble. . . . John Brougham, the popular author, actor, dramatist and manager, is going, or gone, to Ireland, "first flower of the earth, and first gem of the sea." Happiness attend him, and joyous meetings with old friends! But we can't spare him long; if he lingers in the Emerald Isle we shall send a steamer off in pursuit of him—positively. . . . It is said that the road up to the summit of Mount Washington will be completed the present season. The carriage to be used on the road will be of peculiar construction, so that the body of the vehicle will be level when ascending or descending the mountain. About a year ago we illustrated the road and carriage in the Pictorial. We really hope the road will be completed this season. . . . Gold continues to pour in from California; capital and machinery are now developing the extraordinary wealth of the mines. . . . Some one was asking us the other day where James H. Hackett was, the unrivaled delineator of Falstaff, the originator of the stage Yankee. It appears that he has purchased a farm of 1200 acres in Clinton county, Ill., on which he proposes to spend the remainder of his days. On the farm is a remarkable Indian mound, and Mr. Hackett has named his place "Hackett's Mound." . . . Another revolutionary soldier has passed away. Roswell Beach, in the 103d year of his age, died at his residence in Washington township, Belmont county, Ohio. The deceased was a soldier of the Revolution, and engaged in several battles. "They are calling the muster-roll in heaven." . . . Woman's love and constancy is proof against the most severe trials. Each day brings proof of her "amazing brightness, purity and love." Look at this picture! There is a woman, youthful and quite handsome, who visits the Baltimore penitentiary every day, and converses with her husband for an hour and more through the bars. Yet this man is serving out a term of years for having cut her throat—his wife's—and inflicted several severe stabs in her breast, from the effects of which her life was for a long time despaired of. . . . M. Pimont, of Rouen, France, has patented a simple method of restoring old steel pens, simply by raising them to a red heat, and afterwards cleansing them with a little soap and sand. If they can be thus regenerated, we advise our Yankee boys to take up the business. . . . By Thomas Blanchard's timber-bending process the strength of wood is increased at least seven-fifty per cent. at the point where strength is most required. The curve, moreover, never relaxes. . . . Think of our having plenty of peaches this year—for it is now a fixed fact—after the intense cold of last winter. This shows that the peach-tree, like Major Joe Bagstock, is "tough, sir, tough." . . . A letter from Italy says the Pope is about to canonize Christopher Columbus, the discoverer of America. Just think of it! An American saint! For though Columbus was a "confounded foreigner," yet we suppose he deserves some credit for taking the liberty of discovering America, and may be ranked as one of us. We'll adopt him into our calendar—Saint Christopher!—we like the idea. . . . A young man recently lost $17,000 by gambling at roulette, at New Orleans. It strikes us we heard a gentleman remark once that "a fool and his money were soon parted," and of all follies gambling is the most asinine. . . . People who are railing at the extravagant fashions of the day, tell us to look at our grandfathers and grandmothers. Well, we do look at them, and what do we see? Head-dresses like steeples, costly lace, diamond stomachers and bracelets, high-heeled shoes, hoops—yes, hoops! by the mass!—and crimson velvet coats and gold buttons, and diamond knee and shoe-buckles, satin and velvet in profusion. The fact is, our grandfathers and grandmothers were very extravagant ladies and gentlemen in their day, and must not be cited as examples of economy for their grandchildren. . . . The shad fisheries of Connecticut are growing less and less every year, and the papers are calling upon the legislature to take measures to prevent its being entirely destroyed. They "come like shadows, so depart. . . . The 'Avenir,' of Nice, relates an extraordinary instance of superstition. A servant in a family, consisting of a young man, his wife, and an infant, was found squeezing the head of the infant to a jelly, by way, as he said, of making an angel of it. Either, he said, the child will die and go to Paradise, or it will survive and be innocent for ever. . . . We have in abundance all the elements of the fine arts in this country—beautiful scenery, noble men and women, a great historic past, and even the physical materials. . . . In Rutland, Vermont, marble is obtained which has no superior for sculpture in the world, and some of it has been exported to Rome, ordered by Italian sculptors. It has a fine grain, and works beautifully under the chisel. In Great Barrington, in this State, there is a flexible marble which bends like a bow when wet. Black marble, equal to that of Ireland, is found in New York, and verd antique is found in many districts, and in every State, in almost every variety. . . . The true inspiration of the poet, the painter, and the sculptor, is to be found in the study of nature. When strangers visiting Wordsworth's house wished to see his study, the servant said:—"The library where my master keeps his books is in that room, but his study is in the fields." . . . Travellers in Turkey carry with them lozenges of opium, on which is stamped "Mash Allah (the Gift of God)." So when brandy was discovered, it was extolled to the skies as a sovereign panacea, and termed ca de vie (water of life). . . . Ticknor, Fields & Co. are the most tasteful of publishers. Their "blue and gold" editions of the "heart-books," and their "Household Edition" of the Waverley Novels, are absolutely peerless. . . . In England, during the past year, only one passenger in every sixteen and a half millions carried over the railways was killed; the mortality of travel under the old stage-coach system was far greater. . . . A benevolent gentleman of New York projects a gigantic scheme of benevolence. He proposes to support, during a four years' course of study preparatory to the Christian ministry, fifty young men chosen for piety and intellectual promise. The estimated expense is $300 a year; making the sum of $15,000 a year for four years, or $60,000 in all, contributed to the cause of ministerial education. . . . In the English Royal Transactions, mention is made of a gentleman who used to devour an ordinary leg of veal at a meal. Such a fellow would be rather an unprofitable boarder, even at New York hotel prices. . . . They have little sympathy for suicides in Indiana. A man there has just been sentenced to three years' imprisonment, and ten years' disfranchisement, just for trying to take his own life. . . . Custom gives the name of poverty to the want of superfluities. . . . In a neighboring village the following notice is posted up:—"No shooting not allowed here." The writer evidently was not posted up if the placard was. . . . A number of young gentlemen in Havana lately made asses of themselves by harnessing themselves to Gottschalk's carriage, and dragging him home to his hotel in triumph. A number of American young gentlemen once similarly assinated themselves in honor of Fanny Ellsler. . . . Bridget, who broke those barrels that were in the woodshed?" asked a gentleman of his servant. "Missus told John to break them up, au—save her the hoops!" . . . Horses may be bought at Brighton, in our neighborhood, for from fifty cents to fifteen hundred dollars. "Got a new boss," we heard a sand-cart man say to another, the other day. "How much did he stand you in?" "Wasl, about three dollars!" "Three dollars! Get out! I wouldn't drive such a low-fang animal. I'm going to save up till I git five dollars, and then I'm going to Brighton to buy me a rouer!" . . . The Post is responsible for the following capital dialogue which is "hobbling around" the newspapers:—"First boy—"Say, Bill, then you're getting a dollar a week now?" Second boy—"Well, you might a knew that, by seein' all the fillers come scapin' around me, that wouldn't a noticed me when I was poor." . . . Gerald Massey, the rising poet of England, is the son of a canal-boatman, now earning the wages of ten shillings a week. "Massey on us!" Mrs. Partington would say. . . . According to the Courier Franco-Italian, M. Caruana, historical painter of Valette, in the island of Malta, has discovered that slate is superior to wood for engravings. It is, he alleges, easily worked, re-produces the finest lines with remarkable exactness, and resists longer than wood the action of the typographical press; so that several thousand copies of a design can be struck off without producing any sensible difference in the quality of the impression. The above statement is going the rounds of the papers, but whoever originated it knew nothing whatever of wood engraving. In that all the lines have to stand out in relief, like the letters in type, and slate is far too brittle to admit of such a process. . . . Madame Tagliioni, some twenty-five years ago the most aerial sylphide that ever fluttered gauze wings and skirts behind the footlights, is now living in Italy, a fat and faded old woman. She has forgotten all her grand pas, and, we believe, she is a grandma herself. . . . Dr. Theodore Mundt, a German writer, affirms that the reign of woman is over in Paris; that women in France have not the least influence upon society; that there are no more literary saloons at Paris; that the part of civiliser, so peculiar to women, has become a fable—in short, to interpret his ideas briefly, he maintains that the mere woman of Paris is nothing more than a doll to try dresses, bonnets and shawls on, and that, in the re-unions and circles of French women, nothing is spoken of but the toilet, lansquenet, and the stock exchange. . . . The Sultan's daughter, espoused to the Pacha of Egypt, receives some magnificent bridal presents. Some of them have been manufactured at Paris. The cup from which the bride drinks on her wedding morning is already executed, and is valued at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It is of a pea shape, pure gold, incrustated with diamonds of the largest size and finest water. The top is bordered by a fringe of diamonds, all of equal size and immense value; these hang detached from the cup, and move and sparkle in a constant flutter. Nothing more beautiful than this cup has ever been produced. . . . Corinth, Mississippi, is fast becoming a place of importance. Eighteen months ago it was an unbroken forest, but now it is a town of a thousand inhabitants. Its location is at the crossing of the Mobile and Ohio, and Memphis and Charleston railroads, in Tishomingo county. . . . Some men are like pumashable ships. They have every rope but the most needful of all, and that is the one that guides the rudder.

ANECDOTE OF BURKE.

The following affecting incident, related by Mrs. Burke to a friend, took place a few months before Mr. Burke's death, in 1797:—A feeble old horse, which had been a great favorite with the junior Burke, and his constant companion in all rural journeyings and sports, when both were alike healthful and vigorous, was now in old age, and on the death of his master, turned out to take the run of the park for the remainder of his life at ease, with strict injunctions to the servants that he should neither be ridden nor molested by any one. While walking one day in solitary musing, Mr. Burke perceived this worn-out old servant come close up to him, and at length, after some moments spent in viewing him, followed, and deliberately rested his head upon his bosom. The singularity of the action itself, the remembrance of his dead son, his late master, who occupied much of his thoughts at all times, and the apparent attachment and almost intelligence of the poor brute, as if he could sympathize with his inward sorrow, rushing at once into his mind, totally overpowered his firmness, and throwing his arms over his neck, he wept long and bitterly.—New York Mirror.

Choice Miscellany.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER.

As a child, Sir Charles Napier was demure and thoughtful, and his expressions generally had a touch of greatness. A longing for fame was with him a master passion, and in his childhood he looked to war for it, with an intense eagerness; yet nothing savage ever entered his mind, his compassionate sensibility was that of a girl; it was displayed early and continued till death. When he could but just speak, hearing for the first time the caw of a single crow, probably a melancholy one, which infancy could detect, he stretched forth his little hands, and weeping, exclaimed with broken infantine accents: "What matta poor bird? What matta?" And only by repeated assurances that the bird was not unhappy could he be pacified. At ten years of age, having caught a fish when angling, he was surprised by the descent of a half-tamed eagle of great size and fierceness, which, floating down from a tree settled upon his shoulders, covered him with his huge dark wings, and took the fish out of his hands. Far from being frightened, he pursued his angling, and on catching another fish, held it up, inviting the eagle to try again, at the same time menacing the formidable bird with the spear end of the rod. Plutarch would have drawn an omen from such an event. About this time he was taken to the Hot Wells of Bristol, where Mr. Sheridan, being acquainted with his father, took much notice of the boy, and once offered him a present of money, which was instantly rejected. "Papa told me never to take money, and I will not have yours; but I thank you," Sheridan was surprised, and rather characteristically said to the father: "Your boy is a fine fellow, but very wonderful."—Life, by Sir W. Napier.

STREET WORSHIP IN RUSSIA.

There is no place in the world where a man with a very small capital can easier gain, if not an honest, at all events a competent livelihood, than in Moscow. All he has to do is to spend a few roubles in the purchase of a grimy and obscure saint on canvass, with a tic or gilt glory round his head, and a new frame; to find out a doorway, or an arch near a thoroughfare, where he can place this masterpiece on a table, and get room for himself on a chair, and there, with a wooden basin, or an old cap, or a money-box, sit patiently till his customers come. They are not loath to arriving. Behold, here is a mujik coming to market; the pietist catches his eye, he likes it, he makes a few inquiries about it from the proprietor, who assures him that the saint has great interest in the very highest quarters, and has done an immense deal of good to all his clients. The mujik is satisfied; off goes his cap, and down bends his head, while his hands busily wander from chest and brow in self-benediction; his wild locks fly over his face and hob back again, as with increasing fervor he utters his prayers to the obfuscated image before him. When he thinks he has made a favorable impression, he puts a few copecks into the saint's treasury, and goes on his way rejoicing. "Surely," said I, to a Russian, "these poor people ought to be the best in the world, they say so many prayers."—"Ah! the gamins," replied he; "au contraire, they have used of all their prayers, they sin so much; and these saints listen so readily, they are encouraged to commit all kinds of rogues."—Moscow Correspondent of the Times.

THE LIVING MAN'S GRAVE.

Close to the church of Moy, in Scotland, is a circular hollow surrounded with high rocks, and accessible only through one narrow entrance. Here it was that Donald Fraser, the blacksmith of the chief of Mackintosh, defeated Lord London, who commanded the king's troops at Inverness during the rebellion of 1745 and 1746. Quite close to this spot is also a green spot, Uaigh an duine Cheo, "the living man's grave," with which the following tradition is connected. A dispute having arisen concerning their marches between the Laird of Mackintosh and the Laird of Dunmaglass, the latter offered to find a man who would declare upon oath that the spot indicated by him was the exact march, with the condition that if found to swear falsely, the witness was to be buried alive. The man, when brought forward to the spot, swore by the head under his bonnet and the earth under his feet that he stood on Dunmaglass's land. On being examined, however, it was found that he had filled his shoes partly with soil from the acknowledged property of Dunmaglass, and that he had a cock's head in his bonnet, probably that he might save his own, and that he might not be considered perjured for swearing by the head of a cock. He was, however, adjudged guilty, and paid the penalty of his mental reservation by being buried alive on the spot.—Saturday Post.

A DARING CRIMINAL.

An assassin of the name of Lemaire, whose ingenuity in escaping from jails and from the gendarmes is remarkable, has been captured by the French authorities, after bidding them defiance for upwards of a month. The prisoner was brought into Amiens in an open cart, surrounded by gendarmes; such was, however, the terror inspired by the man's boldness and activity, that the following precautionary measures were adopted: His hands and his feet were chained, screws were placed on his fingers, and another chain was attached to his left arm and the cart. The last escape effected by Lemaire was characterized with great simplicity. He was being conducted by three gendarmes, when, seizing a favorable moment, he ran his head into the stomach of the gendarme who held the chain to which he was attached, facilitated the disappearance of the functionary into a ditch by a powerful kick, and then, with a violent exertion, wrenched the chain from the hand of the latter, and made off safely. The whole operation did not take two seconds to perform. He subsequently took refuge in a wood, where he remained concealed, until he had accomplished the fearful labor of sawing through his manacles with his teeth. The truth of the last feat is, however, granted by no better authority than the word of the prisoner.—New York Mirror.

CONQUERING THE NATIVES.

One of the most singular incidents in colonial history was the removal of savages from Van Diemen's Land by a single man, after £27,000 had been spent to no purpose in a war against them. A person named Robinson, a bricklayer by trade, but an active and intelligent man, undertook and performed the singular service of bringing every aboriginal man, woman and child quietly, peaceably and willingly into Hobart Town, whence they were shipped to Flinders's Island. From the time of Mr. Robinson's capture, or rather persuasion, of the natives to follow him, a complete change took place in the island; the remote stock stations were again resorted to, and guns were no longer carried between the handles of the plough. The means of persuasion employed by Mr. Robinson to induce the natives to submit to his guidance have ever been a mystery to me. He went into the bush unarmed, and accompanied by an aboriginal woman, his sole companion.—A Residence in Tasmania, by Capt. Butler Stoney.

SKETCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

We present on this page two striking pictures, affording a strange contrast, one a village of Skulls at Halai, the other the Royal Observatory at Cape Town, thus illustrating the extremes of barbarism and civilization. The locality first depicted was once visited by the celebrated African traveller and explorer, Dr. Livingston, and is at Halai, an island in the river Zambese, renowned as the burial-place of Sokote, a once powerful chief. On visiting the spot, he found his grave surrounded by seventy large elephant's tusks, and the graves of his relatives by thirty. The natives over whom Sokote bore sway, were among the most degraded people of the African peninsula. Their most precious ornaments were the skulls of human beings. The doctor counted between fifty and sixty, mounted upon poles, in a single village. These ornaments were so eagerly sought after, that strangers were often murdered, with the view of adding to their number. Some time previous to the doctor's visit, Sebotoané destroyed or banished these savages, and rendered the country equally safe to the natives and to strangers. Had this not been the case, he might have encountered a worse reception than he had yet experienced. The Zambese River, above alluded to, is described by Dr. Livingston, who explored and made a chart of it, as strikingly interesting, and he speaks of the Mosiotunya Falls as one of the most remarkable objects he saw in his journey, being, according to report, not less striking and sublime than those of Niagara. They are caused by the sudden contraction of the river to the breadth of about a thousand yards, where the ponderous mass of waters rushes through a narrow rent in the basaltic rock, of not more than twenty-five yards wide, and down a deep cleft, a little wider, into a basin about thirty yards in diameter, and about thirty-five yards deep. Into this narrow receptacle does the vast river precipitate itself. At the time when the doctor visited the falls, the Zambese flowed in its narrowest channel, its waters being at the lowest. The effects of the sudden contraction, and the rapid fall, formed a scene equally sublime and appalling. Not satisfied with the distant view of the opening through its rocky barrier, and the sight of columns of vapor rising to the height of three or four hundred feet, and there forming a spreading cloud which falls in perpetual rain, he engaged a native, expert and fearless, to paddle him down the river to an islet immediately above the fall. Amid the heaving, eddying, and fretting of its waters, apparently reluctant to approach the gorge and hurl themselves down the precipice, he stood on one point of the islet, looked over its edge into the foaming cauldron below, marked the mad whirl of the waters, and viewed the grand scene in the very focus of the columns of vapor, and close to the sound of the deafening roar of the broken mass. Unique and magnificent as was the sight of the cataract in the eyes of the doctor, he heard and believed that the spectacle was tame in comparison of that which it presents in the rainy season. Then the river overflows its banks for miles, and yet forces its increased waters through the same chasm into the same basin. Then the columns of spray are visible, and the roar of the waters is heard at the distance of ten or twelve miles. After it passes this chasm, the river changes its course; it foams and raves along a narrow channel amid tree-covered hills, and then emerging from its confinement, it spreads itself out again, and flows in a north and northeasterly direction, a broad and placid stream, till it reaches latitude  $15^{\circ} 37'$  south.—The Royal Observatory at Cape Town, the subject of the second picture on this page, was established by the Rev. Fearon Fallows, of Cambridge (Eng.) University, in 1820. Mr. Fallows found the great local mischief to be avoided when choosing the site of the observatory was sand—sharp, cutting, silicious sand—rendered up freely by the dry and heated soil to the everlasting winds and whirlwinds of the never-ending storm which blows so unceasingly, even with clear skies, at that windiest corner of the earth. With this object, he at last selected a station on a rising ground, four miles east of Cape Town, on the low tract of land which connects the mountainous peninsula of Cape Town and Table Mountain with the main continent. Here he fixed the observatory, on a foundation of green-stone, with a firm clayey upper soil, unvisited by either the red cloud of dust seen daily to come along the high road, on its way into Cape Town, on one hand, or on the other the great cloud of white sand flying along the plains of the flats, and destroying all the vegetation in its progress into Table Bay. The situation had, moreover, the advantages of an unobscured, almost a sea, horizon north and south; the eastern as clear, and the western only partially obstructed by mountains, and that not to the extent that would have been the case nearer to Cape Town, or any of the adjacent villages. Here, then, the observatory was built, containing the best meridian instruments of the day in well-apportioned apartments, with accommodation for the astronomer and two assistants. And here poor Mr. Fallows labored and died; here his successor, Mr. Headerson, made an immense number of observations, and deduced many important results; and here the present ardent astronomer, Mr. Maclear, has lived, and observed, and computed, and printed, for the last twenty years. During this period, many additions, alterations, and improvements, have been made from time to time, but none so important as that which we are about to mention, viz., the substitution of a new Airy's Transit Circle in place of the former Mural Circle with which all observations of declination have hitherto been made. The engraving shows the situation of the observatory, with the Table Mountain in the distance, capped by the "tablecloth" cloud. In the foreground appears a pump with shifting sails, planned and erected by Professor P. Smyth, during his residence at the Cape. The artist has also introduced into the picture a sketch of one of the famous Cape wagons, drawn by sixteen bullocks, fording the shallow water in the foreground. Dr. Livingston made many very important observations at the Cape Town Observatory, which has already been enabled to perform an inestimable service to science. Dr. Livingston's researches in Africa have brought to light many new facts in relation to that strange country—facts gathered with infinite difficulty and at great personal peril, which have been received with deep interest by the civilized world.

VILLAGE OF SKULLS, AT HALAI, ON THE ZAMBESE RIVER.

THE ENGLISH ROYAL OBSERVATORY AT CAPE TOWN.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. | Vol. XII, No. 26.—Whole No. 314. 2
6 CENTS SINGLE.

MARINE HOSPITAL, ST. LOUIS.

We present on this page a fine view of the new Marine Hospital at St. Louis, drawn on the spot, expressly for the Pictorial, by Mr. Kilburn. It is situated on an elevated bluff on the west bank of the Mississippi River, about three miles below the city. It is a building of no architectural pretensions, but is neat and commodious, and amply answers the purposes for which it was erected. In the foreground of our view is seen one of those steamers, of a unique pattern, peculiar to the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, being very light, and suited in all respects to the peculiarities of the western waters. The splendid city of St. Louis itself has many other benevolent institutions, besides this, which is a national one. Among these we may mention the City Hospital, the Sisters' Hospital, the Home for the Friendless, and the Orphan Asylums. The Home for the Friendless, designed for the benefit of aged indigent females, and opened October 4, 1853, is situated on the Carondelet road, about four miles from the Court House. The edifice, formerly "Swiss College," consists of a stone centre, seventy-five feet in length, and two frame wings, each from thirty to forty feet in length; the whole two stories high. The premises comprise about eight acres of ground, variously diversified with walks and shade trees. About $40,000 have been raised for the support of the institution. The City Hospital has long been distinguished for the excellent accommodations which it affords to the sick, and has recently been enlarged to meet the wants of an increasing population. The House of Refuge was completed in 1853, if we remember rightly. St. Louis is one of the most interesting cities of the West. Of quite recent origin, it has already attained colossal dimensions, and its future expansion is among those fixed facts which do not admit of negation. Its natural advantages are unsurpassed by those of any inland port in the world, and the world knows the manner in which Americans develop and apply such facilities. Its local position is midway between two oceans, and near the geographical centre of the finest agricultural region on the face of the globe, almost at the very focus towards which converge the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio and the Illinois Rivers. She is, therefore, destined to become the great receiving and distributing depot of most of the vast region drained by these streams. "Having already reached an enviable position among her sister cities, she is looking westward with a system of railways, intended not only to bring to her markets the agricultural and mineral treasures of the Missouri Basin, but eventually to extend beyond the Rocky Mountains to the valley of the Great Salt Lake, and finally to the golden shores of the Pacific Ocean." The completion of the railroad system already partially accomplished, and backed by heavy capital, will realize the most sanguine dreams of the friends of improvement, and the future of St. Louis cannot fail to be a brilliant one with its prosperity established on a solid and impregnable base. Already is it one of the most important centres of trade and commerce in the Western States, and acknowledged to be such.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"PLL THINK OF THEE."—TO S. C. S.

BY J. B. C.

I'll think of thee, my love, when day light breaks
O'er a world God's guardian care has kept;
When the fresh soul from soothing slumber wakes,
To hless the love that watched me while I slept;
When with new strength my blood is bounding free:
That first, best, sweetest hour, I'll think of thee.

I'll think of thee, when busy day begins
Her never-ceasing round of bustling care;
Which I must meet with toil, and pain, and sins,
And through them all thy maiden love must bear:
O, thee, to arm me for the strife—to be Constant till death—I'll think one hour of thee!

I'll think of thee, when rides the glorious sun
High in mid-heaven, and parching nature feels Lifeless and overpowered, and man has done
For one short hour with urging life's swift wheels:
In that deep pause my mind from care shall flee,
To make that hour of rest one hour with thee.

I'll think of thee when sober twilight flogs
Her soothing charm o'er lawn, and vale, and grove;
When I can feel, above all other things,
The sweet enthraling sense of thy pure love;
And when its softening power descends on me,
My swelling heart shall spend one hour with thee.

I'll think of thee, my love, when, softly, night
Climbs the high heavens with solemn steps and slow;
When the sweet stars, so sparkling and so bright,
Are telling forth God's praise to men below:
O, thee, while far away thy smiling face I see,
I'll spend, dear one, a happy hour with thee.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MADAME DE SOLANGE.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

[CONCLUDED.]

With her eyes fixed on the deed which she was feigning to read, Madame de Solange lost herself in reflections, formed a thousand projects. Meanwhile, Jerome had approached a window looking out upon the parterre, and was casting an eager glance through the avenues, while the duke and M. de Lanoy, seated at a little distance, continued to converse, imperceptibly raising their voices more and more.

"So," resumed M. de Lanoy, "the colonel knew nothing of it?"

"He came out of the Bastille only after the churishing of his wife, and they live together like Philemon and Baucis. This is the safest way, my dear count. Let but a husband be too inquisitive, a creditor threaten to pursue a man of rank, a lettre de cachet settles all this. The Scriptures must have had lettres de cachet in view, when they recommend us to avoid offences. It is the most Christian institution of the monarchy; so I use it for myself and for my friends. I have always in my pocket, along with my snuff-box, a dozen of these, by means of which I can send the first offender to live in retirement at his majesty's expense; and if you ever desire two or three, were it only by way of precaution—"

"Only one, monsieur duke," said Madame de Solange, hastily advancing.

"What! marquise, you also?"

"A lettre de cachet, and I will be eternally grateful."

"For so little? I think no more of them than of a pinch of snuff. See!" added he, seeking in his pocket a little pocket-book of embroidered satin, from which he drew several papers. "Help yourself, marquise, to as many as you please."

Madame de Solange took one, thanked him, and left the room.

A little while after, a servant came to inform Jerome Bouvart that madame wanted him. He found her in her library, a letter in her hand.

"You have the confidence of Maitre Durocher," said she; "I may grant your mine safely."

The clerk bowed.

"You must set out immediately for Paris."

Jerome appeared surprised.

"I will inform your patron," resumed Madame de Solange. "Carry this letter and wait for a reply; it may prevent the signing of the contract."

"I will go, madame," hastily said the clerk.

"Especially, not a word of the mission which I have confided to you."

"I swear it to you."

"And no delay."

"I will depart immediately."

"Go; I will await you."

The young man bowed and went out. Madame de Solange ran to the window to assure herself which road he took, and saw him take the avenue to Paris. A gleam of joy illuminated her features.

"Go," murmured she; "now I fear you no more."

And descending again to the saloon where M. de Lanoy and the Duke de Lussac were still awaiting her, she said, presenting the contract to the latter:

"It is well; it shall be signed by the marquis to-day."

But while everything was thus conspiring against the love of Jeanne, her very misery acquired for her an unexpected succor. The fear of encountering Madame de Solange had for some time prevented her returning to her father. At last her anxiety prevailed over everything else; she glided to the door of the marquis, and after having assured herself that he was alone, stealthily entered. The marquis was walking the room in an agitated manner, pronouncing some disconnected words. At sight of Jeanne, he stopped short and stretched out his arms to her.

"The letter—the letter!" stammered he.

"My mother has read it?" asked Jeanne, tremblingly.

"And carried it away."

The young girl uttered a cry.

"It was not my fault, Jeanne," resumed the old man, extending his hands to her. "She talked to me of the king's masses,—of a ride in the forest. Then she promised to restore it. You were not to know of it. O, Jeanne, Jeanne! you do not want it?"

The latter dropped into a chair, covering her face.

"In the name of Heaven, do not weep!" said the old man, almost weeping himself.

"Ah, my father, you have ruined me!" exclaimed the young girl, sobbing with sobs.

"Ruined you!" repeated M. de Solange. "What, then, did this letter contain? Jeanne, do not be so alarmed, I conjure you. Why did you give it to me to keep? I have no strength—no will of my own. You have never seen her immovable and piercing look. When it is fixed on me, I feel my head turn—my limbs tremble; I am afraid."

These words were pronounced in a tone so deeply affecting, that even in the midst of her desolation, Jeanne was touched by it. She seized her father's hands with sorrowful pity and kissed them tenderly. This caress touched the old man; his brow cleared up.

"You pardon me, Jeanne, do you not?" said he, placing his trembling lips on the cheek of his daughter. "O, be tranquil! All this will soon be over; soon you will be no longer a slave, and may do as you please."

"I, my father?"

"Are you not about to espouse the Count de Lanoy?"

"Never!" exclaimed the young girl, despairingly.

The marquis raised his head.

"Never!" repeated he, in astonishment. "What do you mean, Jeanne?"

"O, my father, I am very unhappy!" sobbed the latter, throwing herself into his arms.

"You unhappy, Jeanne? In the name of goodness, what is the matter? Look at me. Why do you weep?"

And as if a ray of light had suddenly illuminated him: "O," exclaimed he, "it is not the count whom you love!"

The young girl, blushing and weeping, concealed her face in the bosom of the old man.

"Yes—I understand," resumed he. "There is another, whom your mother repulses. Is it not so? Your mother thinks only of raising you in order to raise herself. Poor child! And you love him, then, well?"

"Ah, father!" murmured Jeanne, embracing him.

He sighed.

"Alas—alas! what is to be done?" said he, in a despairing tone. "She has chosen the count, Jeanne; she wishes you to espouse him, and no one can resist her."

"O, I know it!" returned the young girl, sobbing; "but rather than espouse the count, father, I will die!"

"You?"

"Yes," resumed she, with the energy of despair, "for everything would be easier to me than to endure such a union. Think of it, my father: to promise before God to live for some one, when your whole soul is elsewhere! to condemn one's self to act a lie until death? it is impossible! And he—what will become of him if I abandon him? You do not know how good he is. We have talked of you so often, and he loves you because I love you. O, I should have been so happy with him, father!"

The young girl spoke with a broken voice, and her sorrowful exaltation gained over the old man.

"Well," exclaimed he, suddenly, "let us go away together!"

"Go away?"

"Yes, Jeanne; it is the only method of escaping her tyranny. They would make you suffer like myself. Let us flee."

"Can you think of it?"

"What should prevent us? Am I not your father? With me you can go anywhere. I will accompany you, Jeanne. We will go far away, in some corner of the country where I shall be free to walk beneath the trees without a guardian. If we are poor, I will work."

"You, father?"

"Yes, yes; my strength will return, child. Here, her presence poisons the air; I feel around me her will like an iron net-work, which oppresses me. This is the reason why I am feeble, old and timid. But liberty will restore my youth. Tell him, Jeanne,—tell him to prepare everything, and we will fly before your mother suspects anything."

"Alas! it is too late," murmured the young girl; "the letter will have told her all."

"The letter!" repeated the marquis, changing countenance. "O, yes, you are right. The letter! And it was I who gave it up to her. It was deposited in my care, and I have sold it for vain promises."

The old man struck his forehead against the chair. Jeanne threw her arms around him.

"Do not say so, my father!" exclaimed she; "do not accuse yourself; do not be grieved for me. God has done all, and has not willed to give me the joy which I asked of him. He alone is master, and can control the future. Since I am not allowed to live for Jerome in this world, I will pray for him in a convent. Embrace me—embrace me, my father, for very soon you will see me no more."

"No, Jeanne," exclaimed the marquis, clasping her to his breast, "that shall not be! Thou in a cloister, my beautiful, my gentle Jeanne? And what wouldst thou do with thy joyous impulses beneath the veil? Ah, you do not know all which there is to suffer in the seclusion of a convent!"

"No, but I know, father, all that may be suffered from certain notions."

"As in mine, is it not so?" said the old man, turning pale. "You are right. I had not thought of it. If you should suffer as I have done! Jeanne, you shall not marry against your will!" exclaimed he, forcibly. "All unions without love must resemble each other. You shall not marry; I will oppose it. I am your father; this title, at least, cannot be taken from me. They cannot dispose of your hand without my consent. You shall not marry the count."

"Nevertheless, I come to present the contract for your signature," said a calm and sonorous voice.

Madame de Solange had just entered, and stood at a few paces' distant, with some papers in her hand. The young girl pressed closely to her father with terror. The latter started, but without casting down his eyes. The marquise approached.

"I think it useless to recall all the advantages of the proposed alliance," said she, coldly. "My word is given, the deeds drawn up, and nothing can make me reverse my decision. I may then believe that the marquis will not oppose the execution of a project which he has himself approved."

"My consent will follow that of Jeanne," replied M. de Solange, in a tone of hesitation.

"Your consent will follow mine, sir," returned the marquise, impatiently. "My will is not of those which yield to caprices and tears. I do not argue; I will. Sign!"

Her voice had an inflexible and menacing authority, by which Jeanne was moved; but the old man remained impassible. One of those hours had arrived when the most timid soul, urged to extremities, must revolt to relieve itself from a too long oppression. Without replying to the command of the marquise, he hastily took the contract which she held, crushed it contemptuously, and threw it on the floor.

"You see plainly that I will not sign it, madame," said he, in a resolute tone.

The marquise turned pale. She looked at the old man, then at the deed which he had so disdainfully repulsed.

"Take care what you do, sir," said she, in a trembling voice. "Your condition has privileges, and I like to believe that you are not conscious of your acts; but reflect."

"I have reflected," said the marquis, "and I refuse. As long as my own happiness was in question, I yielded; but Jeanne, madame, is more than myself,—is the only part of my life which you have not blighted. This marriage shall not take place against her will."

"This marriage shall take place, in spite of you!"

"I defy you, madame. My title of father gives me an authority which I will maintain. Nothing can take place here without my consent. I am the master, do you understand,—the master? Ah, because my head is weakened in the solitude with which you have surrounded me,—because I have long suffered, you to trample me under foot, you think, perhaps, that I have forgotten my rights! But in order to keep me submissive, you should not have touched this child. She came to weep in my arms, talking of death and a convent, and her tears have restored my strength. Until now I have suffered apart, in silence; I have preferred grief to a contest. But the courage which I have not had for myself, I will have for her. On your soul's salvation, do not touch Jeanne; for I am her protector, her guardian, and I shall know how to defend her!"

As he spoke thus, he clasped the young girl to his breast, trembling with emotion. His white hair seemed to be agitated on his expanded brow. His form became erect; it seemed as if a superhuman courage had descended into this crushed body, and that a soul long pent up within it had at last freed itself.

Madame de Solange stood immovable. This revolt of a man so long submissive to her will was a prodigy at which she was for a moment intimidated; but she quickly recovered from her stupor.

"Very well!" said she, in an implacable accent and with sparkling eyes; "you challenge me to a contest. I accept the challenge. Until now I had thought myself able to manage an old man in his dotage; I had kindly left to a phantom the semblance of the head of the family; but he has become rebellious and dangerous. I shall know how to deprive him of the appearance of a right which he would abuse. You call yourself the guardian of this child, sir? In a few days you shall have one yourself."

"Ah, madame!" exclaimed Jeanne, hastening with clasped hands towards the marquise.

The latter repulsed her.

"Leave me," said she. "You have desired a contest; we will contend. Let this spirit, so prompt to proclaim your rights, seek to defend them. We shall see how it will sustain the humiliating examination of its judges. I shall no longer ask your signature, sir; I shall soon have no need of it. A contract can dispense with the signature of a lunatic."

As Madame de Solange spoke, the enthusiasm of the old man seemed to diminish; the fire of his eyes became extinct, his brow had grown pale, his arms dropped motionless. It seemed as if this soul, for a moment hurried out of itself, recognized the voice of its master, and insensibly returned to its timid obedience. But at the last word pronounced by the marquise, he uttered an exclamation of terror.

"A lunatic!" stammered he,—"I! I will have no judges. I, tried like a criminal! No, no! I will not defend myself. You will not do this, for honor's sake, for pity's sake? A lunatic! I would rather die than pass for such, madame. Let me die!"

["Tears stifled his voice; he groped for his chair, and threw himself into it, falteringly.

"My father—O, my father!" exclaimed Jeanne, half receiving him in her arms.

"I am not a lunatic! I will have no judges!" stammered the old man. And he swooned.

A week had rolled away, and all in the Hotel de Solange seemed to have recovered tranquillity; only in this tranquillity there was something of gloom. Since the scene we have just described, the rumor of the derangement of the marquis had silently spread, without any one having been able to verify it, for all the services which had led domestics to the neighborhood of his apartment had been interrupted by order of the marquise. Life seemed suddenly to have withdrawn from that part of the hotel, and at sight of these closed doors, these carefully drawn shutters, through which gleamed the light of a lamp, one would have thought it the chamber of the dead.

The seclusion of the marquis had extended even to Jeanne; all the entreaties of the latter to be allowed to see her father were useless. Thus deprived of the only support and consolation which she could invoke, the young girl had passed the week in tears. To the grief caused her by the sequestration of the old man, which she accused herself of as the cause, was united all the anguish of a hopeless love. Where was Jerome, and what were the contents of the letter which had fallen into the hands of the marquise? What would he think of her silence? Perhaps he would accuse her of ingratitude, or forgetfulness. He would adopt some fatal resolution; and there was no way to warn him. The young girl in vain called to her assistance all the imaginings of grief and of love. The mute surveillance of her mother surrounded her like a net-work. Then came despair. Ceasing to struggle, she suffered herself to sink to the depths of the abyss, and asked of God only that she might die.

Madame de Solange had followed all the agitations of this burdened soul with an inquisitive glance, like that of the physician who studies the crisis by which he wishes to profit. The execution of the threat which she had made to the marquis involved too much scandal and danger to fulfil it. To call others to her aid, was to expose herself to masters or enemies. She preferred to do all noiselessly,—to crush the resistance of the father and daughter by arming against each their common affection, and to induce Jeanne to relinquish happiness, without violence, and as it were by a compromise. But she comprehended that to bring her to this point it was necessary to deprive her of hope. Circumstances served to aid in the execution of her projects.

One morning, Jeanne was informed that her mother wished to see her. The marquise, who was in her library with Maitre Durocher, beckoned to the young girl to pass into her chamber, and await her there. The latter obeyed; but the sight of the notary had struck her; she thought that he had been summoned for her marriage, of which Madame de Solange had said nothing for a week, and that her fate would perhaps be decided in this conversation. Urged by an anxious curiosity, she softly approached the tapestry hanging which separated the chamber from the library, and listened.

At first she could only distinguish some confused words, and she was about to withdraw, when she perceived that Maitre Durocher had risen. The marquise was about to conduct him out, and they approached each other. They had arrived near the door. The marquise stopped.

"Apropos," said she, smiling, "what is to be done with this mass of old titles which have been sent me lately from the province?"

"They must be examined," replied the notary; "but we have not time."

"Why not confide this duty to your clerks? You have competent ones."

"I had one," replied Durocher, shaking his head. "I have sent him to you several times."

"Send him again."

"Would to Heaven that I could! but Jerome Bouvart is no longer with me."

"How so?"

"I have lost him in consequence of an insane attachment."

"Do you know the object?" hastily interrogated Madame de Solange.

"No, but I can state the sad results. For nearly two months, Jerome was every day more gloomy, and despairing words sometimes escaped him. At last, about a week ago, he suddenly disappeared. Suspecting some desperate act, I made inquiries, and learned from some boatmen that a young man of the age and appearance of Jerome had been seen the evening before on the Pont de la Tourelle. They saw him walk near the parapet, with a bewildered air, until night. Afterwards they thought they heard the fall of a body into the river."

A stifled and heart-rending cry interrupted Maitre Durocher. He turned in surprise, and looked at Madame de Solange; but the latter feigned to have heard nothing. She opened the door of the library.

"I will wait till you have obtained a substitute for the young man," said she, with smiling composure.

The notary went out. Hardly had he turned the corridor, when Madame de Solange hastened to her room, and raising the tapestry, perceived Jeanne extended motionless on the floor. The grief which seized the young girl on emerging from her room brought on a delirious fever, at which the marquise herself was terrified. This soul, closed to all affection, had been unable to suspect the force of the blow which she had inflicted upon Jeanne; she was struck by it, not with remorse, but with terror. With Jeanne must perish her last hopes of elevation. The life of Jeanne had become more precious than her own, and this agonized vanity manifested all the anguish of tenderness. The ambitious woman wept the tears of a mother.

Seated at the bedside of her daughter, she watched her movements, listened to her breathing, interrogated the most transient hues of her burning forehead. All the powers of art were summoned, every care lavished. At last nature conquered grief; Jeanne recovered.

While the condition of the young girl had inspired some anxiety, Madame de Solange had carefully avoided everything which could remind her of the projected marriage; but as soon as her fears were dispelled, she thought only of hastening the fulfilment of her projects. Like a criminal who has been rescued from death only to be reserved for the tortures of the executioner, Jeanne recovered only to be subjected to new persecutions. The return of the Count de Lanoy, whom business had summoned to Burgundy, was expected, and must find her ready to obey. Madame de Solange had recourse to all the energy of her will to subject this feeble soul. She knew how to vanquish her frail scruples; she had already succeeded in depriving her of courage by depriving her of hope; it only remained to present submission as a necessary sacrifice.

During her convalescence, the young girl had several times asked to see her father. This favor was at last granted her. Jeanne was introduced into the room of the marquis by Baptiste. The shutters were carefully closed, and only a night-lamp shed there a dubious light. But when the eyes of the young girl had become accustomed to the half obscurity which reigned there, she could not suppress a cry of surprise at the gloomy and desolate aspect of the apartment. The curtains, the furniture and the pictures had been removed. Tapestry, the livid personages on which seemed to vacillate in the vague light of the lamp, alone garnished the walls, and gave them an aspect still more sombre. The sound of the young girl's footsteps, softened by a double carpet, had doubtless been unheard by the old man, for he remained motionless. Jeanne approached his curtainless bed, and could contemplate him with sorrowful surprise. He lay outstretched, with bare head, closed eyes and clasped hands; his unpowdered hair fell carelessly over his hollow cheeks, long bluish veins traversed his pale forehead, and from his parched lips escaped a half-suppressed sigh.

The young girl clasped her hands, and knelt beside the bed. This movement appeared to arouse the marquis from his torpor. He opened his eyes, raised his head, and perceived Jeanne. The latter seized one of his hands, which she covered with tears and kisses.

"It is I, father," said she. "Do you not recognize me?"

The old man looked at her fixedly, then disengaging the hand which she held, murmured:

"A lunatic! No more sunshine, no more sound, no more anything!"

"Father!" exclaimed the terrified Jeanne, rising.

There was in this exclamation so much of terrified tenderness that it penetrated the heart of the marquis. He looked fixedly at the young girl, and his eyes brightened.

"Jeanne," said he, stretching out his arms to her.

"Yes, my father, yes,—your beloved Jeanne," replied the young girl. "Look at me. O, how pale you are!"

"They have pronounced me a lunatic," repeated the old man.

"Do not believe it, my father."

"Look!" murmured he, casting his eyes around him; "they have taken everything away, even to the room where I have lived for ten years."

"This is your own room, my father."

"My room, say you, foolish girl! Where, then, are my large arm-chair, my library, the portraits of my family, the mantel-clock which I so loved to hear strike in night? No, no! They have put this great tapestry here to deceive me; but this is a tomb. Look as you go out, and you will read my name upon it. They have buried me alive, Jeanne, because I was a lunatic."

"O, my father, my father, be yourself once more!"

"Look!" added the marquis, pointing with almost feminine mortification to his dishevelled locks and soiled linen; "they have refused me even daily cares. I am for them only a corpse." And as if a thought of pride had crossed his affliction, he continued in a tone of triumph: "But no matter; I have refused to sign, Jeanne. She thought to make me yield as formerly, but for you I would have contended against fate. Do not fear, Jeanne. Let her come again; were death with her, I would reply as before: 'I refuse! I refuse! I refuse!'"

"Father," exclaimed Jeanne, in despair,—"O, father, it is I who am the cause of all! If I had obeyed, you would still be free and happy. But you cannot remain here, my father. You must quit this cell; you have the right to do so. Come!"

"Hush!" said the old man, "hush! it is the hour when it appears."

"What, father?"

"Lower—lower. There is a God even for lunatics. They thought to deprive me of a sight of the sun, but it visits me every day."

"What say you?"

"Look on that side, beneath that lattice. A sunbeam will soon steal in there. It shines but a moment, but it returns every day, and I count the hours till it comes. Thanks to this, I know there is yet a sun in the world. But do not tell your mother, Jeanne; do not speak of it to any one; they would take away my ray."

"O, my father!" said the young girl, tenderly, "you suffer, then, much from your captivity?"

"Do I suffer! Ah, you do not know what are this eternal night and solitude! There are moments when I doubt my life and when this bed appears to me a coffin. To change an old man's habits, is as if one had changed the place of his heart. I seek myself in the midst of this devastation. They have taken away all that my eye recognized,—all that misled me of the past. In emptying this chamber, they have emptied my memory. I no longer remember,—no longer desire. I seek the world around me without finding it. O, if I could go out, one hour—one minute! Jeanne, can you not deliver me without their knowing it? Only give me time to see the sky, to hear the birds, to feel a little air in my hair. Jeanne, must I, then, die in the depths of this sepulchre?"

He clasped his hands and sobbed like a child. The despairing young girl threw herself into his arms.

"No, my father!" exclaimed she, stifled with tears. "Your liberty shall be restored; you shall see the daylight."

"When?"

"Immediately, my father."

She sprang towards the bell and pulled it with violence. The door opened, and Madame de Solange appeared.

"Let my father be set free, madame!" exclaimed the young girl, hastening towards her. "I consent to espouse M. de Lanoy!"

A week after, the bells of St. Louis rang a merry peal, and a long file of carriages stood before the door of the church. The marriage of the Count de Lanoy with Mademoiselle de Solange was being celebrated.

Beside the altar stood the marquis, in festival attire, looking at the gay crowd, inhaling the odor of the incense, and listening to the music of the organs with a delighted air.

When the ceremony was over, at the moment the priest withdrew, Jeanne rose, tottering, and as it were bewildered; but her eyes, as she looked around her, encountered the old man. She sprang towards him with a despairing movement, and throwing herself into his arms, exclaimed:

"Rejoice, my father. Henceforth you shall be happy!"

On their return to the hotel, the newly married couple found the notary who brought additional deeds to be signed. Having finished reading them, the young man by whom Maitre Durocher was accompanied was receiving the signatures of the two families. The notary found himself near Madame de Solange.

"You have at last a new clerk?" asked the latter, without thinking of what she was saying, and only to escape the embarrassment of silence.

"Yes, madame," replied Durocher; "but I do not despair of finding the old one."

"How?" said the marquise, starting.

"The corpse of the young man whom the boatmen heard fall into the Seine has been recovered, and it was not that of Jerome."

Jeanne, who had listened breathlessly, rose, uttering a cry.

"Everybody has signed, Maitre Durocher," said the marquise, hastily.

And while the notary was collecting the deeds, she seized the hand of Jeanne, and compelling her to sit down, said:

"Compose yourself, Madame de Lanoy; your husband is looking at you."

The Marquis de Solange died a short time afterwards, and with him would have disappeared the last interest Jeanne retained in the world, had she not been about to become a mother. The marquise and the count, who pursued in concert their ambitious plans, rarely troubled her solitude; the young woman sought in new duties and in piety the consolations which she must have in vain demanded elsewhere.

Meanwhile, events disappointed all the projects of Madame de Solange. It was no longer the question for the nobility to conquer a higher position, but to retain that they had occupied; the revolution had commenced. The count, who had renounced his philosophical ideas as soon as he feared their application, was one of the first to invoke the assistance of foreigners to arrest the movement, leaving Jeanne with the marquise, whose faculties were becoming weaker day by day.

On the contrary, the young woman received no injury from those public agitations to which she remained a stranger. Such as she had left the altar after her marriage, beautiful, devoted, sorrowful, such she was still. The eternal youth of her soul had passed into her features; she seemed a flower gathered in its early freshness, and preserved, by some magic power, as sweet and as pure.

She was returning, one day, from the Quarter St. Mareean, whither she had gone on some benevolent errand. Her carriage was about to cross the square of the Hotel de Ville, when it was suddenly arrested by an immense crowd, which advanced, uttering cries of triumph. Madame de Lanoy leaned forward and asked the coachman what was the matter.

"The people have just taken the Bastille, madame," replied the laquay, trembling.

At this moment a band of workmen approached the carriage, and one of them hastily opened the door. At sight of Jeanne, so beautiful and sad, he involuntarily recoiled and uncovered.

"What would you?" asked the countess, in a gentle voice.

"Pardon me, madame," stammered the workman, "but one of the prisoners we have liberated has just fainted."

"Let him be brought hither!" hastily exclaimed Jeanne. "There is room for him."

Those who carried the dying man then approached, and placed him in the carriage. The countess had thrown aside the silk mantle which enveloped her, and assisted in placing him by her side; but in this movement, the carpet wrapped around him partially opened and permitted her to see him. Jeanne could not suppress a groan at sight of this countenance, which retained nothing human.

The dying man appeared to hear her, for he opened his eyes and fixed them on Madame de Lanoy.

"Do you suffer much?" asked the latter, in a voice rendered tremulous by tears.

The features of the prisoner became animated; his lips moved, and he murmured in a confused accent:

"Jeanne!"

"Do you know my name?" said Madame de Lanoy, surprised. "Jeanne!" repeated the prisoner, extending his hands towards the countess.

"Who are you?" exclaimed the latter, in anguish of doubt impossible to express.

"Jerome!" stammered the dying man.

Madame de Lanoy uttered a cry of terror, and fell on her knees before the prisoner. The latter raised himself, and throwing his arms around the neck of the countess, said:

"Jeanne, I have seen thee once more! God is good!"

At these words, he fell back. The countess bent over him, despairingly; but, exhausted by too long sufferings, he had been unable to resist this last emotion. Joy had killed him.

This unexpected stroke crushed Madame de Lanoy, and threw her into a kind of gloomy despair, from which even maternal love could not arouse her. When the revolutionary agitation spread, she refused to quit Paris, where her name was the more certainly compromised, that the count was known to be in La Vendée with arms in his hands; so she was arrested with the marquise, then in her dotage. Dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, they were condemned to death, and executed on the ninth of Thermidor.

A SUMMER SHOWER.

The picture on this page is full of rustic character and beauty. A young peasant girl and a young peasant lad have taken refuge under a spreading tree from one of those sudden showers which descend with but a momentary warning during the summer solstice, and against which the umbrella is but a feeble protection; the umbrageous canopy above forming an impervious shield. The shower is nearly over, and above the distant church spire, the symbol of Faith, shines the radiant bow of Hope, gilding the retiring march of the sullen clouds. The young girl extends her tiny white hand to ascertain whether it will be safe to venture forth. The young man, however, is thinking more of his pretty neighbor than of the skies, but he has not mustered up courage enough to address her. He stands buttressing the tree at a most respectful distance, the image of true rustic sheepishness. Yet that bright vision will be associated with the spot. Perhaps when love has mastered bashfulness, that friendly oak will be their trysting-tree, and here they may whisper words low and soft as the musical murmur of the summer winds among the foliage. This summer shower may mark an era in the lives of the simple couple before us.

YANKEE DOODLE.

Hon. R. C. Winthrop related the following amusing anecdotes in the course of his splendid address at the late musical festival in this city. He said that during the negotiation of the treaty of peace between England and the United States at Ghent (1814), a festival or banquet, or it may have been a ball, was about to take place, at which it was proposed to pay the customary musical compliment to all the sovereigns who were either present or represented on the occasion. The sovereign people of the United States—represented there, as you remember, by Mr. Adams himself, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Clay, Mr. Jonathan Russell, and Mr. Gallatin—were, of course, not to be overlooked; and the musical conductor or band-master of the place called upon these commissioners to furnish him with our national air. "Our national air," said they, "is Yankee Doodle." "Yankee Doodle!" said the conductor; "what is that? Where shall I find it? By whom was it composed? Can you supply me with the score?" The perplexity of the commissioners may be better conceived than described. They were fairly at their wit's ends. They had never imagined that they should have scores of this sort to settle, and each turned to the other in despair. At last they bethought them, in a happy moment, that there was a colored servant of Mr. Clay's, who, like so many of his race, was a first-rate whistler, and who was certain to know Yankee Doodle by heart. He was forthwith sent for accordingly, and the problem was solved without further delay. The band master jotted down the air, as the colored boy whistled it, and before night, says Mr. Adams, Yankee Doodle was set to so many parts that you would hardly have known it, and it came out the next day in all the pride, pomp and circumstance of viol and hautboy, of drum, trumpet and cymbal, to the edification of the allied sovereigns of Europe, and to the glorification of the united sovereigns of America.

A TAME BUTTERFLY.

One cold, bleak November morning, when the sky, the air, and all nature wore that sullen and desponding look so peculiar to our climate at that season, a lady, who for the first time had risen from a bed of sickness, went into an adjoining apartment, where she perceived a gay and beautiful butterfly in the window. Astonished at finding this creature of flowers and sunshine in so uncongenial a situation, she watched its movements and operations. As the sun came out for a bright, brief space, it fluttered joyously about the window, and imparted to the sick room an air of cheerfulness and hope. Towards evening, however, the tiny creature dropped its wings; the lady then placed it in a glass tumbler on the mantel-piece. During the night hard frost came on, and the room was in consequence very cold. In the morning, the butterfly lay in the bottom of the tumbler, apparently dead. The invalid, grieved that her gentle companion of the previous day should so soon perish, made some effort to restore its fragile existence. She put it on her own warm hand, and, breathing upon it, perceived it gave signs of returning animation; she then once more placed it in its glass house on the rug before the fire. Soon the elegant little insect spread out its many-colored wings, and flew to the window, where the sun was shining brightly. By-and-by the sun retired, and the window-panes getting cold, the creature sank

TRAVELLING IN EGYPT.

The drowsy royalty of Egypt has at length waked up in the person of his highness Said Pasha, viceroy of Egypt, and with the aid of the English engineer, Stephenson, is trying to wake up his subjects by sending every day a shrieking steam-engine between Alexandria and Cairo; and as the train rushes along the rich pastures of the Delta, camels and buffaloes tethered on both sides of the road pull up the pegs and change their location in a state of great excitement. The Arabs (so they say), accustomed to the swift coursers of the desert, leap from the cars, even when the train is at full speed, and alight on their feet. From Cairo towards Suez the railroad is completed for some thirty miles, and under the direction of a French engineer will probably be finished to Suez in six months' time. But it must be understood that passengers are allowed the privilege of using these roads at a high price, only by special favor of the viceroy, who occasionally stops all passenger transit, and gives out a brief notice that "transportation is suppressed for government purposes for a day or so." But with all these uncertainties, the possibility of going by a comfortable railway carriage is very much to be preferred to the rolling pace of a camel, or to the monotonous sail by canal boat, as it drags its slow length along. And once in Cairo, the stranger enters upon a drama of Oriental fascination after he has passed the ordeal of the donkey-boys and their beasts, who in close array obstruct the passage from the station-house, and always succeed in conquering the new-comer; placing him "vi et armis" upon the smallest bit of a donkey he ever saw, he is allowed to ride to the hotel, as captain of a whole troop of vagabond Arabs, who follow shouting in the rear. An entire paragraph is not too much to devote to the Cairo donkey, for this long-eared animal is one of the most important improvements, and takes the place of rickety cabs and uneasy sedan chairs, much to the advantage of the rider. As you charge through the narrow streets at the head of this disorderly band, scattering the squads of Turks and Egyptians who seem to be sitting in council in the very middle of the way, you pass men and women dressed in all the gaudy colors of an Oriental costume; women eye the stranger from behind their veils, or shelter themselves in great alarm as if an uncircumcised gaze might of itself defile them; turbaned Arabs lead towards the gates the burdened camel, whose angry cry seems to say, "I am not so patient as the writers of natural histories suppose me to be." Cross-legged merchants sit in their shops, which are often only eight by nine feet square, and smoke and seem to care very little whether the customer comes or not, so long as he doesn't disturb their "hookah" privileges. Now and then the donkey turns aside out of respect to a pious Mussulman who is making the most profound protestations towards Mecca, and has chosen the street as the dustiest place for his devotions. There is no view in the world more peculiar and interesting than that from the marble court in front of the mosque of the citadel at Cairo. Far off on the borders of the desert, the pyramids of Gizeh rear their unique forms against the clear sky, and a long line of the lesser pyramids of Sakkarah and Dashoor stretch along the line of the desert towards the southern horizon. The broad belt of the Nile valley, with palm groves and villages, divides one desert from the other. Cairo, with its countless minarets and domes, is at your feet, and, turning about, the eye rests with peculiar delight upon the alabaster pillars and rich domes of the mosque of the citadel.

You next visit the pyramids of Egypt. On the way, perhaps you invest a shilling in a rido upon some chance camel, by way of experiment, and in a few hours find yourself under the shadow of the largest of the seven wonders of the world—the great pyramids of Cheops! After being dragged through passages in the interior of the huge pile by a gang of stalwart Bedouins, each of whom is begging in broken English for "just a little something extra," you climb to the top of the monster monument, grasping the strong hand of the same Arab, who waxes confidential by the time you reach the summit, and whispers in your ear, "Me got seven sons—three boys and four girls: give me something; you very rich." If you reply, "I'm not rich," the ingenious answer is, "What you come to pyramid for, then?" The next impertinuity of these Arabs, who have you in their power on the narrow top of the pile, is that one of their number be employed for two shillings to run down this and up to the top of the other pyramid, and this he engages to do in eight minutes. They quarrel for the job, and finally you select one whose recommendation, given by some former visitor, reads as follows: "This fellow is the longest legged rascal I ever saw run up a pyramid." Down starts the wild Arab, and winding his way up the huge side of the second pyramid, like a spider upon a house roof, he reaches the top true to time, and waves his "fez" cup in triumph.—Correspondent of Boston Transcript.

A SUMMER SHOWER.

down on the carpet again, apparently lifeless. The same means were used to restore animation, and with the same success. This alternation of life and death went on for many days, till at last the grateful little thing became quite tame, and seemed to be acquainted with its benefactress. When she went to the window and held out her finger, it would, of its own accord, hop upon it; sometimes it would settle for an hour at a time upon her hand or neck, when she was reading or writing. Its food consisted of honey, a drop of which the lady would put upon her hand, when the butterfly would uncurl its sucker, and gradually sip it up; then it usually sipped up a drop of water in the same way. The feeding took place only once in three or four days. In this manner its existence was prolonged through the whole winter, and part of the following spring. As it approached the end of its career, its wings became quite transparent, and its spirits apparently dejected. It would rest quietly in its "crystal palace," even when the sun was wooing it to come out; and at last, one morning in April, it was found quite dead.—The Naturalist.

There are few things in which address and judgment are more necessary than in the giving of advice which is showing a man that you either know more or are better than himself, which almost always creates a contest with his self-love.

CATHEDRAL ON PLUM STREET, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

CATHEDRAL, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

The Catholic Cathedral, on Plum Street, Cincinnati, of which we present an accurate view, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, is a fine stone building, with a very lofty spire, a striking feature in its architecture. It has been much admired. It stands in a pleasant and quiet location, and its steeple is a landmark, being seen from a very great distance. Cincinnati presents a fine array of churches, belonging to different denominations, and some of them are noble specimens of architecture. Great taste has been shown in the public buildings of the city, as our views in previous numbers will testify. At some future time, we shall present our readers with further specimens of the church architecture of the Queen City of the West.—In church architecture, our own taste is decidedly in favor of the pointed Gothic style, in preference to the Grecian, or any other style. The origin of Christian church architecture is full of interest. When the inhabitants of Rome first became Christians, they were so much in dread of the imperial power that they did not venture to perform their new worship openly, and they therefore sought for hiding-places. It happened that the city of Rome was to a great extent honeycombed beneath the surface by excavations, called sometimes catacombs, and sometimes colatombs. These were in fact quarries, from whence the Romans had for ages derived building-stone. These catacombs were used by the Christians as chapels, and also as burial-places for their dead. Many of those who sacrificed their lives in defence of the new faith were regarded as saints and martyrs by those who survived; and it became a custom to go and pray over and near their tombs in these subterranean retreats. It came in time to be deemed a high privilege to be buried near these holy persons; and family vaults and chapels were kept up by those who were able to defray the necessary expense. At a later period, when Christianity became less persecuted, churches were built in the open air, over these catacomb burial-places; the church being dedicated to the holy person entombed beneath. Thus arose a custom which afterwards widely influenced church architecture; for the crypt or subterranean chapel beneath the altar, or sanctuary, was deemed to represent the tomb of the saint to whom the church was dedicated; and when the saint had died at a spot different from that in which the church was built, the bones in many cases were conveyed thither, and deposited in a crypt beneath the altar. The stone-quarries of Rome were thus, incidentally, the means of establishing one of the features in Christian church-building. No Christian churches of any note were built above ground at Rome till the time of Constantine; but when the emperor embraced Christianity, he sought among the buildings of Rome for one which should present a convenient form for the new worship. Among the buildings in that city were several called Basilicas, which combined the two features of a court of justice and a commercial exchange. Each Basilica was an oblong rectangular building, with a large semicircular recess at the end opposite the entrance; three-fourths of the oblong composed a hall; the remainder was a transverse aisle which intervened between the hall and semicircular recess. The hall was divided by columns into three unequal parts, a sort of central nave and two side-aisles; and galleries sometimes covered the aisles. The galleries and the hall were open to merchants and spectators; the transverse aisle, elevated by steps above the level of the hall, was appropriated to notaries and advocates; while the semicircular end was appropriated to the praetor and judges, who occupied elevated seats. It was such a building as this that Constantine adopted as a model for Christian churches; and he furthermore planned, as far as he could, to associate each church with some martyr's tomb, and to construct stairs from the sanctuary in the upper chapel down to the tomb in the crypt or lower church. Constantine seems first to have given up to Pope Sylvester his palace of the Lateran, in which such a Basilica probably existed, and to have built near it a baptistry, where the Christian ceremony of baptism might be conducted in that open manner which was customary among the early Christians. The first church which he built, however, was one over the tomb of St. Peter, to whom it was dedicated; and after this he built others dedicated to St. Paul, St. Lawrence, and St. Agnese. All these were in the outskirts of Rome; for the central parts of the city remained essentially pagan tures of the Byzantine, modified and greatly augmented by the Mohammedans who adopted it. The collective term, Mohammedan, will conveniently designate this style. Meanwhile the Western or Roman Empire, falling first into the hands of dissipated and worthless emperors, then invaded by rude and semi-barbarous armies, and, lastly, dismembered into fragments by the absence of any sufficient or coherent power, lost by degrees all that had distinguished it in matters of taste. The churches and palaces were built up, often with materials of broken-down Roman temples, but without a knowledge of the proper use of them; arches were combined in a most incongruous manner; and everything showed that, while one uniform plan had been gradually lost, no other of definite character had yet arisen. In Italy, in France, in the Christian part of Spain, in Britain, in Germany, most of the buildings were of this semi-Roman or barbarous Roman character—not infrequently very picturesque in appearance from particular points of view, but wanting in unity of purpose and distinctness of character. It was not until the pointed arch made its appearance, in the eleventh or twelfth centuries, that this inharmonious system gave way to something better. The pointed style began to degenerate much earlier in France than in England, inasmuch that the year 1300 may be used, approximately, to indicate the period when its glories began to fade; so that from then to the introduction of modern Italian architecture, two centuries afterwards, the structures of France were not distinguished for any marked characteristic. The cause of this can be readily assigned in the wars which the English carried into the heart of France, and the divisions and factions of the French nobility, which rendered that kingdom, during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, a theatre of bloodshed and desolation; the unfortunate sovereigns, sometimes in captivity, and generally defeated, without finances, at the head of an exhausted state, had as little means of promoting as their subjects had leisure for the cultivation of the arts. The peasants were forced from their labors, districts were laid waste, and the towns impoverished by uprisings and exactions. It is only in prosperous times of peace that architecture can flourish.

ANCIENT TROJAN RELICS.

The various curious articles grouped in the accompanying engraving, were obtained by a scientific and enthusiastic antiquary, Mr. John Brunton, and are certainly among the most remarkable vestiges of far distant times that modern research has yet brought to light. Let us hope that further explorations will furnish additional proof of the existence of Troy, and also establish the date of its fall, and the long disputed era of Homeric song. The articles delineated were discovered and dug up on the plains of Troy, near the site of the ancient city, said to be founded by Dardanus, (said to be the son of Jupiter and Electra). The small vases, statuettes and ornaments, were found buried in the tombs. At the period to which they are supposed to belong—viz., about the time of Alexander the Great, in the fourth century, B. C.—the human bodies were interred in large earthenware jars, or pithos. The mouth of one of these jars, with the stone that covered it, is amongst the articles discovered. There is brought from Dardania a small sarcophagus, containing burnt bones of a human body, and a small vase, or lachrymatory, which contained the tears of the mourners for the dead. The tessellated pavement was obtained from Ilum Novum, or New Troy, and is of Roman workmanship. The water-pipe is one of those which were employed to convey the water to Troy, and displays considerable skill both in the manufacture and mode of jointing. In our illustration we have given some of the smaller vases. These are beautifully painted with figures, and the well known Eruk ornament; on the trilochem, or three-lipped jar, the figure of Pegasus is beautifully painted. The figures marked A A are terra cotta lares, or household gods. From the excessive rudeness of their manufacture, they appear to belong to a very early date, as well as the lachrymatory, marked J. H is a recumbent figure of terra cotta, with one hand resting on the knee; it is quite Etruscan in its style. C is a portion of a tile used in forming the sarcophagi. D are patera, or goblets, of various and graceful forms, on the largest of which the swan is four times repeated. E is a small portion of tessellated Roman pavement. F, a vessel of baked clay, of rare form, and the use of which it is not easy to conjecture. G, an ampulla, or jar, used in the games of the circus to anoint the limbs of the combatants with oil. H, a beautiful mask in terra cotta. K, a shell containing a vertebrae of the human spine; in several of the tombs, these vertebrae were found carefully placed in shells, with only one bone to each shell (as shown in the illustration), half surrounded by clay. L, an ornament of lead, found (with another) on the breast of a skeleton; when found, the indentations still contained horsehair in small portions, as though it had been intended for the purpose of ornamentation.—Some specimens of enamelled glass were also discovered, but these were too fragmentary to be represented in our engraving; besides a very small patera, or cup, of rock crystal, as bright and perfect in the polish as when first turned out of the hand of the workman. These were dug from the earth, where they had lain buried for ages, and are remarkable as being the first specimens of Dardanian art ever brought to light.

CUT OF ST. GEORGE.

A military correspondent of the Richmond Despatch gives the following evidence of the accomplished swordsmanship of Pulaski. The gallant Poleander, who commanded the Americans, as he always led the attack, once on a retreat brought up the rear. The sun was declining in the west, the shadows of the charging steeds and riders were stretching long over the plain; Pulaski never looked behind, but watched the flying shadows as they gained ground slowly, but steadily, over those of his own jaded horsemen. Finding that the shadow of the crest of the leading British horse lapped that of his own crupper, with the speed of a thunderbolt he gave the cut of St. George (rear cut), and his pursuer's head fell into the dusty road. The British, checked by the fall of their leader, relaxed their speed, and Pulaski, in the meantime wounded, and his party, escaped.

ANCIENT TROJAN RELICS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MARY'S DEATH.

BY F. B. F.

Far from her home, on Leghorn's sunny plain,
Washed by the stormy Tuscan's angry surge,
Sweet Mary bade adieu to life and pain,
And soft Italian breezes sighed her dirge.

Her pallid cheek, her wasted form and face,
The unearthly brightness in her sweet blue eye,
The hectic flush that took the lily's place,
All bade young Mary to prepare to die.

An anxious father watched her fading bloom,
A mother's gentle hand her pillow smoothed:
How sad they watched her journey to the tomb!
How lovingly her dying hour they soothed!

In tenderest tones she lisped her father's name,
Then peaceful heaved a last—a farewell sigh:
Whilst from the realms of bliss bright angels came
To waft her joyous spirit to the sky.

The flowers of spring shall nestle in her breast,
And loving hearts her early fate shall weep;
But since God's bosom is her place of rest,
Sweet is her pillow—calm her quiet sleep!

Rest, wearied sufferer, in thy narrow bed!
Rest, free from mortal care and bitter strife!
Rest, for thy Saviour loves the holy dead—
Rest mid the joy of never-ending life!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

KITTY AND I.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

WE had sat down to tea—our scanty household, consisting only of my father, mother and myself—when the postman's knock gave the signal for a letter. I sprang up eagerly, for I had been waiting for an invitation from our friends in the country, and as it was to be my first absence from home, without my parents, I felt rather impatient to exercise my new independence. I had not then learned how dreary it is to have no one to tell you what it is best for you to do.

My mother rather shrank from my making this experiment so soon in life; but my father insisted that it was right to teach me self-reliance; and how could I learn it while nestled so closely under the maternal wing? So it was settled that I should go; and with no other escort than a steady, sober, middle-aged bachelor, who was one of my father's clerks, and who was going to his home in Milford, three miles from Clarksville, where my uncle lived.

Our journey was on an open stage road for the first half, and through a beautiful wooded country for the next half. Mr. Pin-nock was never very lively, and the motion of the stage seemed to induce in him the most delightful indifference to his companion, for he slept through a magnificent thunder shower which lasted an hour—slept through a glorious sunset that turned the raindrops into diamonds, and did not wake up when the soft twilight had clothed all things in its sombre gray. He did just rouse himself when, at dark, we stopped before the long, low house attached to my uncle's farm, but did not seem to think it necessary to alight; so the driver got down from his perch, and taking my trunk, he bade me follow him up the dark, shaded avenue that led to the house, the outline of which I could but just discern in the dimness.

The driver was afraid, I suppose, to leave his horses, so he landed me and my trunk on the broad stone that made the step to the door, and left me. I was shy, tired and sleepy, and my feeble knock was not heard in the distant kitchen; so I sat down to wait for somebody to find me, and while waiting I fell asleep.

A loud voice awoke me, and I saw, bending over me, a youthful face, which the strong light from a lantern showed, from the family resemblance, to be that of my cousin Kitty, who led me into the house and introduced me to my uncle and aunt Dinwiddie, and also to my maiden aunt, Miss Barbara Dinwiddie. My mother having apprised them of my coming, they had expected me until it was long past the usual hour for the stage to arrive, and had given me up for the night, and had just sat down to tea, in the bright, cheerful long kitchen, lighted up by a blazing fire of pine knots, although it was midsummer.

To a hungry child of twelve years a good supper is not without its attractions; and I did ample justice to Aunt Barbara's tea, cream toast and preserves, while Kitty sat beside me, but just in the shadow where I could not see her face. I had at first thought her large and coarse; but I corrected the latter impression while she spoke, for her voice was remarkably sweet and beautifully modulated. I turned round in my chair and studied her face. It was rather large, but the forehead was finely formed, the nose beautifully straight, and the mouth small, with bright red lips and white teeth. Her eyes were of that chameleon hue that defies one to call it by any color, but they were large and full, and the brows very strongly marked, while her skin had the fresh, clear, and ruddy tint, born of country air and exercise, but perhaps a little darker from the sun and mountain wind, to suit city tastes. On the whole, Kitty pleased me, and I told her so; and she owned to a mutual liking. She was but two years my senior, but I, city bred, was much smaller and more feeble. Beside me, she looked of a most noble presence. I saw all this with the dull, sleepy eyes of a weary traveller, and I was glad when thoughtful Uncle Dinwiddie suggested an early bedtime for me.

Kitty lighted me to my room. I felt a shuddering fear come over me as I surveyed the large, old-fashioned chamber, unpapered and uncarpeted, with its high bed in one corner, a chest of drawers opposite, and an easy chair by the window. Kitty lighted me up, as I said; but who was to sleep with me in this great castle-chamber? She thought of it too, and asked if I would like any one to stay with me. I said, hesitatingly, for I did not know as she would like to do so:

"I would be glad to have you stay—no one else."

Her face lighted up with pleasure. The great, handsome, healthful-looking country girl had taken a liking to her pale, thin, dark skinned cousin. I felt comfort and protection in her presence; but there was a shadow over me which seemed almost like a presentiment of evil, owing, as I believed, to being away from my home for the first time in my life.

I slept, by Kitty's side, the sleep of weariness—heavy and deep—and awoke to such glory as I had never dreamed of when sleeping in my closely-curtained room at home. The windows here were without any drapery, and had been left wide open.

I opened my eyes just before the sun rose. Kitty had disappeared, and I ran to the window. A flood of golden light was spreading upward in the eastern sky, and the mists were rolling off from the green hills and the red tops of the clover meadows. Far as the eye could reach, were rich pastures and cultivated fields, and orchards laden with the ripening fruit—wooded forests, silver brooks whose flow mingled softly with the musical waving and whispering of the corn, and the rustling of leaves—and then, over and beyond all, this glory of the sunlight gilding and beautifying all things. I look back to that morning and feel that my mind was then first drawn towards nature. I had only known it before in the few straggling trees that grew in city squares; and this appearance of country beauty opened my heart at once to the love of the aesthetic.

I dressed, ran down stairs, and went out into the midst of all this beauty. The fine red cows were just going out of the yard to their pasture. The sturdy cart-horses were dripping at the large trough. A great black dog came to meet me, and a hundred fowls were flocking towards Kitty, who stood, in her neat morning dress, with a pail of corn in her hand. A flock of doves wheeled overhead, and settled down among the hens, while four kittens were lapping milk from a bowl. Silken-eared rabbits ran in and out of their little house for a bit of the fresh green leaf of the cabbage, and bees were humming pleasantly in the hives which stood thickly on a little grassy slope, shaded by three or four immense chestnut trees.

Uncle Dinwiddie was preparing to cut hay, and Josh and Ned, the two hired men, were awaiting his orders. My two aunts were in the kitchen, from whence they could see me, and they beckoned me to come to breakfast. I was mortified to find that the early meal was long since over, and that I had kept the table standing, while Kitty, too, had waited to take her breakfast with me. We sat down, Kitty and I, and I drank the fresh, sweet milk, and ate the rich corn cakes with a relish that no breakfast ever gave me before. I began to feel at home before I had been there three days. They were so kind to me that I could not help loving them. Josh and Ned were not behind the others. They put up an enormous swing, let me ride the horses to water, and gave me two rabbits for my own.

Uncle Dinwiddie got out his wagon and took me out to ride with him to see the country; and Kitty and I absolutely went over every foot of the whole estate. I was delighted with this sort of animal life, of which there was such abundance. I milked, made hay, rode the horses to plough, had a hand in the butter and cheese; in the carding, spinning, weaving—all had a touch of my little busy self in them. Even Aunt Barbara was pleased with my interest in all the farm doings, and Kitty delighted to tell me of her praises.

I remember this first week so perfectly. The next was a great blank. I was prostrated, stunned, heart broken. The small pox had broken out at home, and my father and mother were taken down with it. I was not allowed to go back, and before the third week was over I was an orphan. Not even the comfort of seeing them was granted me. When the last news came, they had both been carried to the last resting place of the dead. When my uncle passed his hand caressingly over my head and called me his daughter, the floodgates of my tears opened at his tenderness.

"Stay with us always, poor lamb!" said the good, fatherly man; and our silent compact to be father and child was as binding on each as though written on parchment or graven on stone.

My father's property was settled in a slow and tedious way; and the returns came lingeringly and grudgingly from his executor, a lawyer friend of his better days. It had become somewhat reduced before his death, and now the income was small indeed. My uncle, a man of the greatest integrity and simplicity, could not compete with the crafty lawyer, and my riches all sunk into a mere pittance.

In return for the sheltering home which he kindly gave me, I tried to impart some of my superior knowledge to my cousin Kitty; for, child as I was, I could still teach her. Clarksville was rather a poor place for learning, and my uncle could not send his darling and only child away. I owed felt a secret pride that I, his little niece, could remove this source of discomfort from his kind heart. And, moreover, it had the double advantage of blessing him and healing my own violent grief, by employing my mind and heart with other thoughts and feelings. So Kitty and I studied together, living a pleasant, and after the first grief was over, a cheerful life; but at the end of that time I felt that it was right for me to do something for myself—to take off the load of my maintenance from my kind uncle, and to go out into the world which I so much dreaded to meet, and if possible to find a situation as governess to very young children, for which alone I felt qualified. My uncle—bless his kind, unsuspecting, honest heart—never thought that anything less than kindness could befall me, but supposed that every one would reverence my ability as he and his had done; and unwilling as he was to part with me, he liked the spirit which I manifested in wishing to earn my own living.

I had advertised in the newspapers of a neighboring city that I would teach as daily governess, or reside with a family; and soon had an application for the latter. I was to meet the lady at her own house on the thirteenth, at half past twelve. I was punctual to the engagement, and going to town in the Clarksville stage, I walked up the marble steps at the time appointed. Shown into a little side room, from where I could hear talking in the parlor, as if callers were present, I remained sitting until half past one, when Mrs. Elwood made her appearance. It had been tedious waiting; for not even a book was visible wherewith to beguile the time.

Such a catechising! She asked me all sorts of questions—many of them insolent ones enough, and those I refused decidedly to answer. She objected to my extreme youth, to my mourning dress, which I had never left off, and lastly to my terms. I answered that the first objection would be diminishing every day; the second would leave me more time for her children; and the last was a little below the average price which I remembered my father paid for me. She hesitated.

"Your youth, particularly, is an obstacle," she said. "I do not think Mr. Elwood would consent to place Elsie and Annie under the care of so young a person."

This was a ruse to get me to name lower terms, for I afterwards found that Mr. Elwood was a mere cypher.

"Let me see Mr. Elwood and the children, if you please, ma'am," said I, somewhat abruptly, I suppose, for she looked astonished at my brusque way of speaking.

I wonder now that I was not afraid of speaking to her thus. She was a large, portly woman, with strongly marked features, and heavy brows. Her eyes were black—not the soft, liquid black—but with a hard, merciless look, where there was nothing lovable or feminine, but all hard and cruel, seeming. She seemed rather unwilling to grant my request of seeing her husband and children; but as I rose to go, she condescended to ask me to wait a little, but whether influenced or not by my moderate terms I cannot say.

She rung, and sent a message to her husband. The door opened and a gentleman came in. "That is surely some one who has called in," said I to myself, for I was confident it could not be Mrs. Elwood's husband. It was he, however, for she turned to him, and introduced me by saying:

"The young woman who applied as governess, Mr. Elwood."

My cheek tingled at this unceremonious presentation, which was only what would have been given to the lowest servant, seeking a situation in her household.

I looked at Mr. Elwood, and my heart ached. I have never married, and perhaps an old maid's opinion is of little worth; but I never see a married lady usurping her husband's right to be master of his own family, without feeling a desire to say to her: "Woman, friend, sister! you are destroying your own happiness, teaching your children to despise their father, if he weakly yields to you, and to hate him if he resists you. O, be wise while you may, and seek only to be a loving, gentle and affectionate woman."

No such woman was this who ruled Mr. Elwood. He was a small, pale, fair-haired man, apparently modest, and retiring behind his wife's grand and imposing manner; but with a real kindly look, and a clear blue eye through which the goodness of his heart shone transparently.

At this moment Mrs. Elwood was called out, and his manner changed instantly into a more confident one, mingled with cordiality. I stated my age, qualifications and terms. He seemed perfectly satisfied, but said he gave up all such matters to Mrs. Elwood, relying on her judgment. I heard him sigh as he concluded, and he colored excessively when he thought that I observed it.

He rose and walked about the room. Mrs. Elwood came in with the children—Annie, the image of her mother, dark-haired, beetle-browed, and with an overbearing air—Elsie, soft, rather feminine looking, with her father's blue eye and flaxen hair. Elsie ran up to her father and whispered something in his ear, at which her mother frowned. Annie stood in dignified silence by Mrs. Elwood's chair. I judged their respective ages to be eight and ten. I felt that I could love Elsie dearly, and I thought that I in time could learn to love the other, but it would be when that hard look should be softened down by a few lessons which I should be apt to give her in humility. Elsie had worked her way to my side in spite of her mother's expressive shakes of the head. She looked up into my face, studied it long and earnestly, and then said in a low voice to her father:

"Let her come, pray do, father; she is not at all like that cross Madame Le Brua."

"Just as your mother says, Elsie," said her father, who had subsided into his subdued manner since his wife's entrance.

Whether that my really moderate terms influenced her or not I cannot say; probably it was her only inducement, for Elsie afterwards told me that Le Brua had charged so much that her mama would not keep her, which she was very glad of for she was very cross to her and Annie, too, although she added that Annie was not afraid of her. Be that as it may, Mrs. Elwood engaged me. I was to have a small room, scarcely more than a closet, leading from the nursery where the children slept. I sighed when I thought of the wide chamber at Clarksville, with its splendid landscape view, and the fresh morning breeze coming over the clover-scented fields. My view here was bounded by a block of brick houses opposite; but I resolved, heroically, to lay aside all those regrets and devote myself to my new life.

I saw plainly enough that I had a tyrannical spirit to deal with in Mrs. Elwood, but I had native pride enough, I believed, to parry any disagreeable manifestations. I called to mind a significant proverb which I had often heard from the lips of Aunt Barbara, "Begin as you mean to hold out." I decided in my own mind that I would resist the first attempt at oppression.

I had an opportunity before I expected it. The next day after I arrived a pile of children's clothes was laid on the sofa in the nursery, with a piece of paper pinned on, and the words, "Miss Waverton will please examine and repair." I took the slip of paper and marched boldly down stairs, rung the bell, and demanded to be shown to Mrs. Elwood's presence. She received me with a surprised look, and glanced at the paper in my hand.

"What does this mean?" said I, looking steadily in her face.

She was silent, and I repeated the question. She was evidently unprepared for any assumption of independence on the part of a poor governess, and she murmured something of "customary usage."

"You know very well that it is not customary usage," said I. "I am your children's governess, Mrs. Elwood, not their seamstress. The next time any similar indignity is offered me I shall leave your house."

The haughty lady quailed a little before my just pride, and swept her fiances out of the room without a word.

"Bravo!" said a low voice near me.

I started, for I had seen no one when I entered. It was Mr. Elwood, who, ensconced in a large chair behind the folding screen had been hitherto invisible.

"Be always as firm as you were just now, Miss Waverton, and you will do well enough. Once yield, and you are a slave in this house."

Poor man, thought I, you are a proof of it! But I did not reply except by a grateful look, for I heard the fiances rustling back, and made my escape. When I returned to the nursery the offending pile of clothes had vanished. This was my first triumph over Mrs. Elwood's meanness. I taught her many more lessons than this.

I gave the children their lessons, and exacted them without fail. Annie obeyed me through pride—Elsie through love. It is impossible for me to tell how I loved this sweet child. She reconciled me to all the disagreeables which I encountered in the family—and their name was legion. But Elsie's affection repaid me for all, and my own pride kept me from imposition. Still, it was hard battling with such a nature as Mrs. Elwood's. I could hardly sympathize with her husband, though I knew him to be unhappy. I could scarce respect a man who would give up his independence of thought and expression to such a woman. Strong-minded she was not—only strong-willed. There is a wonderful difference!

I had expressed a wish to go to Clarksville one day, as I had important business with my uncle. Mrs. Elwood seemed to be revolving my request in her mind, when her husband ventured to say, "Of course, Miss Waverton, you can go." What a look she gave him! He shrunk back into his shell, with a pitiful sort of subdued look, while she made some contemptible excuse which I pretended not to hear. I acknowledged his permission, and left the room, put on my bonnet and was off, probably before the astonished lady had got through with her curtain lecture. When I returned, I saw black and lowering looks; but I did not heed them. I had brought a beam of sunshine from the farm—had been welcomed so heartily, and urged so much to come back if everything should not be agreeable, that I felt, come what might, I was sure of a home in the hearts of these kind relatives.

Kitty had become expanded into a very lovely woman. Her noble figure made her look five years older than myself; and yet, when I told her of my triumphant battles with Mrs. Elwood, she declared that she could never get up to my height of courage. I looked wishfully at the wide chamber and the beautiful prospect it commanded, and longed to be back again to the sweet breath of the country air; but I could not live in a state of dependence, and I resolutely shut my ears to their entreaties to stay with them. It was a day to which I long looked back with regret, for it was the last time that I saw my aunt Dinwiddie. My poor cousin was motherless now, like myself.

Annie's birthday was to be the occasion of a large party, and I was required to do many things not laid down in the contract. I did not perform them all, and was gratified to find that Mrs. Elwood did not press the matter when I omitted the required service. I refused playing that evening, for my heart was heavy with the news of my aunt's death. I had been reading a letter from Kitty, and my eyes were heavy and swollen with weeping. I said I would go down and take care of the children, but that I could not play.

I went down with Elsie, who had run up to see me. She led me to a quiet corner, where I was concealed by the window curtain. I heard Mrs. Elwood near me, relating to another haughty-looking woman, a Mrs. Barry, my refusal to oblige her. "Very presuming," was Mrs. Barry's answer. I emerged from my recess, and stood before her, quite calm and untroubled. She moved away, and soon I heard her explaining to Mrs. Barry that the "brown girl in a black dress" was the offending subject of her anger. Mrs. Barry did me the honor of looking at me through her eye-glass, an examination which I took very quietly, and then turned my attention to the children.

Elsie kept near me all the evening, but Annie did not speak to me at all. I had been watching the latter, smiling within myself at the little airs she was practising, imitative of her mother, when, as she was leaning against a table where there were wax candles standing, I saw a bright flame rising above her head. No one saw her but myself, for all were watching a new fancy dance, which a little foreign girl was performing alone. I sprang towards Annie, wound my arms around her and laid her on the floor, wrapping the large rug about her, before any one turned round. She was a very brave and self-possessed child, and did not scream at all, but the anguish of my own burns was such that I cried aloud. They crowded around me when they found that she had not sustained any injury except the destruction of her beautiful hair. Mr. Elwood himself went for a physician, unknown to his wife, who would have perhaps thought it an unnecessary attention.

My burns were indeed terrible. I was scorched deeply from wrist to shoulder. It was worth while to witness the frantic gratitude of the father, while Mrs. Elwood only coldly remarked, as they were leading me from the room, "What a pity that she could not have been in season to save Annie's hair!"

The next day I insisted on being carried to the farm. Mr. Elwood was roused into spirit by his wife's apathy, and declared his intention of accompanying me himself. She remonstrated, but he was firm, and taking Elsie with him, he bade the coachman drive carefully so as not to shake the injured limb, and we departed with a cold good-bye from Mrs. Elwood. Annie was up stairs mourning the lost splendor of her hair. Aunt Barbara's skill in healing burns was worth that of twenty physicians; and I soon recovered. The scars I bear about with me still.

As soon as I got well I was solicited to return to my former place in Mrs. Elwood's family. She wrote several times, and finally condescended to employ the influence which she believed Mr. Elwood possessed over me. I resisted it all; for although I had never come to the point of leaving, yet, having left, I would not return. It was hard parting with Elsie, but I told Mr. Elwood that I would never voluntarily encounter his wife's humeur again. He sighed, and said he could not blame me—that he had seen it all, and that he made a great many sacrifices for peace.

"True," said I, "but do you get peace?"

He acknowledged that he did not.

"Then," said I, "be master of your own house at once."

"That is impossible, Miss Waverton," he answered, very sadly.

"Well," I said, "at any rate, I shall not be one of the sacrificed."

Elsie cried bitterly. How I would like to have taken that child and worked for her support! I have never seen one like her since. I never saw her again. Heaven takes such when it needs more angels.

I found myself afterwards in a pleasant family at the South, where the genuine aristocracy was so hidden by a veil of real kindness that one could not quarrel with its existence. It was only the spurious coin that I found fault with in Mrs. Elwood. I remained here ten years, until the pupils were transferred to a school in Paris to finish their education. From thence I went to give lessons at a large and flourishing seminary, where I was not required to board if I did not see fit. Here I staid eleven years.

My mind wanders back to this time with all the regretful tenderness of a mother over its lost darling. Here was the only bit of romance that can be traced on the map of my life. If I do not disclose it, it is because its memory is too sacred and too solemn to be lightly mentioned. Over its remembrance I have shed tears of unmitigated bitterness; and yet—I would not recall it if I could! Love came to me late, and it lingers yet!

There was a period of several months in which I was nursed at the farm with all the tenderness of the most devoted friendship. Mind and body had alike given way, and life was a mere blank. I awoke to the consciousness that I was wicked and selfish in my grief, and I roused up my slumbering energies. Kitty was my good angel here in encouraging my feeble exertions.

"This life is not good for you, Emma," she would say, in her strong, resolute voice; "you must rouse yourself from this indolence, and act!"

It was a bitter pill to swallow; but I told her one day that I would open a school in Clarksville if she would become a partner in the undertaking. There were all the inducements there, in the shape of air, retirement, beautiful scenery, and healthful location. Kitty had gone even far beyond me in the graceful acquirements we should be called to teach. She, a farmer's daughter, with no education except what I had given her when we were mere children, had so improved herself by her own exertions in the spare hours she could command, that now she was fitted to take the entire charge of young ladies from the neighboring towns, and finish what their fashionable schools had only begun. We opened under favorable auspices. I was languid and feeble still, but Kitty was strong, in unbroken health, calm and sound mind, and a heart which no trouble save her mother's death had ever touched.

Uncle Dinwiddie thought it unnecessary for us to do this, when he should so soon die and leave us all his wealth; but Kitty was firm and decided. She devoted her mornings and evenings wholly to him, and told him that he must spare her the six hours which her school demanded; and he consented with a cheerful smile, when he saw how much her heart was in her work. He did not know that her chief object was to save her cousin from a worthless and unprofitable life.

Among our pupils are the orphan children of my little Elsie. She was married when very young, and died when her youngest was born. Her mother did not long survive her, and Mr. Elwood exercised his new-born power in selecting a school for his little granddaughters. He saw our advertisement and brought them immediately. He looks like one who is released from a great thralldom, and I have no doubt that he feels thus.

The youngest, little Elsie, is the very counterpart of her mother, although not half as old as her mother was when under my care. The other is more like Annie, but softer and sweeter. My existence is passing away among these sweet young lives. I watch over them with something, I believe, of a mother's fondness.

Waking or sleeping, they are seldom absent from my mind. As I watch them, sitting studiously in the school-room, wandering among the quiet shades that surround our beautiful retreat, or sinking to their innocent slumbers at night, I long to say to each, in the sweet words of the Quaker poet:

"Now in thy youth, beneath of Him,
Who giveth, upbraidest not,
That His light to thy heart become not dim,
And His love be outward,
And thy soul in the darkest of days will be Greenness and beauty and strength to them."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MRS. BIRD'S BABY.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

I CALL little Lizzy Bird a baby, although her mother says she is a lady, and tells her that she is old enough to be a woman (three years and six months), and sits her up in a high chair by the window just like a stick, making her fold her little polished hands as stiffly as an orthodox grandmother's.

I believe some folks come into the world with their hands clasped and their mouths puckered to the word "prim," and their heads put upon their shoulders as straight as a ruler, and their ideas as prim as an old maid's looking-glass. This being the case, I mustn't blame Mrs. Bird for spitting and plastering little Lizzy's brown hair down upon her head, and forbidding it to shake out into rings and curls as it wants to. I mustn't scold because she takes her away from the sunshine and clear air, and tells her in the same hour how to use her little thimble, and how she must love God who is great and good and terrible,—tells her if she thinks wicked thoughts and litters up the sitting-room, tracks up the floor, or is naughty any way, this same great and good God will punish her when she comes to die! Ugh!

I scraped acquaintance with Mrs. Bird the other day, and so borrowed Lizzy for an hour, and didn't we have a time! How her big blue eyes stared as I put her into a pile of pictures, and let her turn over the leaves of my big Bible! How she screamed with delight as I robbed my winter rosebush and verbenas of their blossoms and tossed them into her lap! What a frolic we had—Lizzy, puss and I—on the great, wide carpet! Her cheeks glowed with the new pleasure, her eyes danced, and her voice sang out sweet and clear; and didn't I wish—well, no matter what, I know you would laugh if I should tell you.

Pleasures cannot last always, and Lizzy's hour soon expired. She went back to that great, orderly (how I hate that word!) room, and her mother sat her up plump in her chair, and smoothed her hair down again, till it looked as slick as the shell of a pumpkin, and called her "Eliza-beth." I suppose she will always stay there, where the sunlight cannot find its way, and where the dreary pavements and dull blocks look up at her all day,—where she must listen to the shouts of children, and still keep all the music of her young life penned up within her. It is too bad!

LISTENING TO EVIL REPORT.

The longer I live the more I feel the importance of adhering to the rules which I have laid down for myself in relation to such matters. 1. To hear as little as possible what is to the prejudice of others. 2. To believe nothing of the kind till I am absolutely forced to it. 3. Never to drink into the spirit of one who circulates an ill report. 4. Always to moderate, as far as I can, the unkindness which is expressed towards others. 5. Always to believe, that if the other side were heard, a very different account would be given of the matter. I consider love as wealth; and as I would resist a man who should come to rob my house, so would I a man who would weaken my regard for any human being. I consider, too, that persons are cast into different moulds, and that to ask myself—What should I do in that person's situation? is not a just mode of judging. I must not expect a man that is naturally cold and reserved to act as one that is naturally warm and affectionate; and I think it a great evil that people do not make more allowance for each other in this particular. I think religious people are too little attentive to these considerations.—Simcox.

EYE GLASSES.

Sir David Brewster, in the North British Review, says that no opinion is more common, and certainly none is more incorrect, than that it is prudent to avoid the use of artificial helps to the eyes so long as they are not absolutely indispensable. The human eye is too delicate a structure to bear continued strain without injury; and the true rule is to commence the use of glasses as soon as we can see better with them than without them, and always to employ such as will render vision most comfortable and pleasant. The spectacles habitually used for ordinary purposes may not be adequate to certain occasional demands, such as reading very fine print, examining maps, etc. To meet these cases, a hand reading-glass, two and a half inches in diameter, to be used in conjunction with the spectacles, and never without them, is strongly recommended. A similar use of the reading-glass is also recommended to short-sighted persons in conjunction with the concave spectacles, when examining minute objects.

RIGID NOTIONS OF DUTY.

A soldier on duty at the palace of the emperor, at St. Petersburg, which was burnt a few years ago, was stationed, and had been forgotten, in one suite of apartments that was in flames. A Greek priest was the last person to rush through the burning rooms, at the imminent risk of his life to save a crucifix in a chapel, and returning he was hailed by the sentry, who must in a few minutes more have been suffocated. "What do you want?" cried the priest; "save yourself, or you will be lost." "I can't leave," replied the sentry, "because I am unrelieved; but I call to you to give me your blessing before I die." The priest blessed him, and the soldier died at his post. The late emperor, on one occasion, attempted to pass a sentinel in one of the corridors of the palace at St. Petersburg, who had orders to let no person pass; but the man resisted him, and when the emperor tried to disarm him, wrestled with and flung him back against the wall.—Seymour's Russia.

WATCH AND BELL TOWER; MOBILE, ALABAMA.

MOBILE, ALABAMA.

We present our readers on this and the next page with several interesting and spirited sketches, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, of the city of Mobile, Alabama, which lies on the western side of Mobile River, on its entrance into Mobile Bay, thirty miles north from the Gulf of Mexico. Its location is exceedingly fine, though but little elevated from the water. The site of the city is very level, and the soil dry and sandy. The first white men who visited Alabama were De Soto and his followers, and the name of Mobile first occurs in connection with their adventures. Bancroft says:—"In the latter part of July (1540), the Spaniards were at Coosa. In the course of the season they had occasion to praise the wild grape of the country, the same, perhaps, which has since been thought worthy of culture, and to admire the luxuriant growth of maize, which was springing from the fertile plains of Alabama. A southerly direction led the train to Tuscaloosa; nor was it long before the wanderers reached a considerable town on the Alabama, above the junction of the Tombigbee, and about one hundred miles, or six days' journey, from Pensacola. The village was called Mavilla, or Mobile, a name which is still preserved, and applied, not to the bay only, but to the river, after the union of its numerous tributaries. The Spaniards, tired of lodging in the fields, desired to occupy the cabins; the Indians rose to resist the invaders, whom they distrusted and feared. A battle ensued; the terrors of their cavalry gave the victory to the Spaniards. I know not if a more bloody Indian fight ever occurred on the soil of the United States: the town was set on fire, and a witness of the scene, doubtless greatly exaggerating the loss, relates that two thousand five hundred Indians were slain, suffocated or burned. They had fought with desperate courage; and, but for the flames, which consumed their light and dense settlements, would have repulsed the invaders. 'Of the Christians, eighteen died; one hundred and fifty were wounded with arrows; twelve horses were slain, and seventy hurt. The flames had not spared the baggage of the Spaniards; it was within the town, and was entirely consumed.' The French founded Mobile about the year 1700, and in 1763 it was ceded by France to England. In 1780, England surrendered it to Spain, and on the 5th of April, 1813, it became a portion of the United States. It was incorporated as a city in 1819. It is a place of great commercial importance, and as a cotton mart, ranks next to New Orleans. New Orleans and Charleston vessels having a draught of more than eight feet cannot come directly up to the city, but pass up Spanish River six miles around a marshy island to the Mobile River, and drop down to the city. Mobile has daily communication with New Orleans, and also with Montgomery, the capital of the State, by boats, on the Alabama River. The city is very regularly laid out, and not compactly built, except in the business portions. The suburbs are very pleasant, and beautifully shaded with foliage. The beautiful magnolia and majestic live oak everywhere abound, and with the sweet bay, dogwood, gum, iron-wood, etc., make a very pleasing landscape. The climate and soil are favorable to the growth of fruit. Peaches, figs, oranges, etc., are extensively cultivated. The climate here as well as in other portions of the South appears to be growing colder, the winters here being much more severe formerly, causing great injury to the fruit trees. The houses being invariably built with reference to the tropical heats of summer, ill protect the inhabitants against the unwonted cold. The past winter some very severe weather was experienced at the South, and ice and snow were seen in places where they are the greatest rarities. Mobile contains many fine public and private buildings, and a few of its objects of interest are represented in the present number of our paper. Their accuracy may be depended upon, as Mr. Kilburn made very detailed drawings of each scene on the spot. Our first view represents the city lock-up, clock and an alarm-bell tower on Conti Street. A part of the building represented contains the post-office. The next view is the Lighthouse on Choctaw Point. The locality is quite picturesque. Our view is taken from the extreme end of the point looking towards the city, which is hidden by the foliage at the left of the lighthouse. The tide flows over the point at times, and an immense amount of drift wood of every sort, from the rough tree torn from its native home by inundation, or the caving in of the river bank, down to finished lumber swept away by some mighty freshet, has collected on the point, and indeed on all parts of the coast around Mobile. At times, indeed, the water rushes on with great force, and in 1852 came near demolishing the lighthouse, quite a breach being made in the walls, signs of which are still visible. This point is the resort of great quantities of birds, and in the hot season, of alligators. It is about two miles distant from the city. The lantern of the lighthouse is fifty-five feet above the water. The next engraving represents Grant's Pass, between Mobile and New Orleans. It is an artificial channel, cut to shorten the distance traversed by the boats. In the foreground is seen one of the Mobile and New Orleans mail-boats. The remaining view shows the City Hall and Market House, a new building, commenced in 1855, and recently finished. It covers a large area, and is in many respects one of the finest buildings in the South. It extends 275 feet on Church Street, 243 feet on Royal Street, 225 feet on Water Street, and 300 feet on Hitecock's Alley. It contains the mayor's court-room, watch-rooms, mayor's office, city treasurer's office, city clerk's office, tax collector's office, surveyor's office, etc., and the armory of eight volunteer military companies, with parade-room 140 by 40 feet. Below it is fitted up as a market for meats and vegetables, in a style that can hardly be surpassed. Our view shows the Royal Street front.

At some future period we may continue our illustrations of the city, having on hand a large number of sketches made by our artist during his recent visit.—Mobile exhibits a steady and healthy growth, and her progress and prosperity will be accelerated by the development of the railway system connecting her with the interior. Its prosperity may be said to date, like that of many other places, from the moment it came under the American flag. The French, who are poor colonists, accomplished little for it, and, under the Spanish regime, it could not be expected to advance. Mobile has suffered severely at various times from devastating fires, but the damages of the devouring element have on every occasion been repaired with alacrity and with improvement to the city. In 1827, 170 buildings were consumed, and in 1839, a yet more remarkable fire destroyed no fewer than 600 houses. It is quite an attractive city, and visitors become easily attached to it. Elevated above the highest tides, from the city there is a fine view of the bay extending thirty miles, with an average width of twelve miles, to the Gulf of Mexico. The city is supplied with fine water by means of an aqueduct two miles in length. Though the tourist sees nothing in Mobile to remind him of the furious activity which prevails in the business marts of colder latitudes, and which would be impracticable so far south, yet there is nothing like stagnation or decay. He sees the elements of prosperity quietly and effectively worked out; he is surrounded by evidences of wealth and of business transactions resting on a solid basis. The shipping is numerous and noteworthy. There are many steamers running between Mobile and the important places above it on the Mobile, Tombigbee and Alabama Rivers. There are also a great many packet schooners running between Mobile and New Orleans.

LIGHT HOUSE, CHOCTAW POINT, MOBILE, ALABAMA.

GRANT'S PASS, NEAR MOBILE, ALABAMA.

EAST INDIA JUSTICE.

"From Compton," wrote Sir John Malcolm to Lady Clive, "I marched to Panwell, a distance of twenty-four miles. When I had proceeded two or three miles, I came up with a small guard of armed men belonging to the Pannah Government, who were carrying a young man with his hands bound, along the road. I asked them who the prisoner was, and where they were going. The commander of the guard said that they were going about a mile further, to a spot where a robbery and murder had been recently committed. 'And when there,' he added, 'I shall cut this man's head off.' 'Is he the murderer?' I asked. 'No,' said the man, 'nor does he, I believe, know anything about it. But he belongs to the country of the Siddee (pointing to a province in the vicinity which is still held by the descendants of the former Admirals of the Mogul emperor), from which the murderers, we well know, come, and we have orders, whenever an occurrence of this nature happens, to proceed into that country, and to seize and put to death the first male, who has arrived at years of maturity, that we meet. This youth,' he concluded, 'was taken yesterday, and must suffer to-day.' On my expressing my astonishment and horror at a proceeding in which the innocent was doomed to suffer for the guilty, he said that that was not his business; he only obeyed orders. 'But,' he continued, 'I believe it is a very good plan. First, because it was adopted by Nanah Fumayese, who was a wise man; and secondly, because I am old enough to recollect when no year ever passed without twenty or thirty murders and robberies on this road; and all by gangs from the Siddees country. Now they are quite rare; not above four or five within these twelve or fifteen years, which is the period this custom has been established.' As we were conversing, we reached the spot fixed for the execution. The guards halted and began to smoke their hubble-bubbles, or pipes. The prisoner's hands were untied, and he took a pipe along with them, with much apparent unconcern. Indeed, his whole conduct marked indifference to his fate.

After he had smoked, his hands were tied behind his back as before; he was taken a few yards from the road and desired to kneel. The executioner, who stood beside him, grasping a straight, two-edged sword with both hands, called out to him, 'Bend your head.' The man did as desired, and by a most dexterous blow it was severed from his body. The trunk sprang upward and fell backwards. A rope was then tied round the heels of the dead body, and it was hung up, on a low tree, for the terror of others. After this was done, the guard sat down, smoked another hubble-bubble, and then returned to the ghaut."

THE EMPEROR OF CHINA.

Under existing circumstances, the following details, relative to the court of Peking, and the organization of the Celestial Empire, may not be without interest: The reigning emperor, Hein-Foung, ascended the throne in the year 1851, at 40 years of age. Hein-Foung is the seventh emperor of the reigning dynasty, or Tartar-Mantchoo dynasty, whose chief, Tchou-Tchi, was proclaimed in 1644. According to the Chinese historians, the organization of the Celestial Empire dates from 3000 years before our Saviour. The family of the reigning emperor is composed of four sons and a daughter. The elder, Yih Wei, heir to the throne, is now 19 years of age. His mother died in giving him birth. The young prince is said to be well educated, but he professes, like his father, a profound hatred for foreigners. The second son is named Yih-Chun; he is 15 years of age; the third is Yih-Tehou, and is seven years of age; the fourth is Yih-Tsung. The emperor's daughter, who is said to be an accomplished princess, is 15 years of age. She was married last year to a nephew of the emperor, Prince Ting-Tain-Wang, who has the reputation of being highly educated. The emperor has three brothers—Yung-Trum, Mein-Wang, and Mein-Hin; the latter was degraded during the preceding reign, deprived of his dignities, and banished from the court. He was accused of having been affiliated with a secret society for the purpose of seizing the crown. Twenty of his accomplices in the capital were tortured and put to death, and six hundred in the provinces. The ministers of the emperor form a distinct category, and possess enormous power. They are fourteen in number, and are divided into two distinct classes. The first and most important are the cabinet ministers; they are four in number. The other ten are charged with the government of the provinces. They transmit to those at Peking all documents which interest the emperor, and they become in some measure his masters. It may be easily understood that with such ministers the emperor can know nothing, and that no fact is ever communicated to him in its true light. It is thus that the late events at Canton have been concealed from him, or misrepresented. The hatred he bears to foreigners is forcibly excited by his ministers, who never regard his interests, but their own advantage. They very well comprehend that if foreign powers had representatives accredited to the emperor, they would tell him the truth, and weaken the influence of the ministers. The Emperor of China, confined to his capital, is the object of respect which amounts to terror, and is surrounded by people with whose character he is unacquainted. He lives in the midst of serious events to which he is a perfect stranger.—Friend of China.

KNOWING WHAT ONE IS ABOUT.

"Half the evil in this world," says Ruskin, in his "Stones of Venice," "comes from people not knowing what they do like—not deliberately settling themselves to find out what they really enjoy. All people enjoy giving away money, for instance; they don't know that—they rather think they like keeping it; and they do keep it, under this false impression, often to their great discomfort. Everybody likes to do good; but not one in a hundred finds this out. Multitudes think they like to do evil; yet no man ever really enjoyed doing evil since God made the world."—New Orleans Picayune.

CITY HALL AND NEW MARKET, MOBILE, ALABAMA.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A REQUIEM.

BY ANDREW DOWNING.

Rest, warrior, rest!
The dark and vengeful day of strife is o'er,
The crimson field of blood is won;
But thou shalt hear the din of war no more—
The musket's fatal shot, the cannon's roar.
Bright banners waving in the sun
No more thou'lt see, for life, to thee, is done—
Rest thee in peace.

Rest, statesman, rest!
Thou who didst guide and keep from every ill
And hidden rock the ship of state:
Whose magic tones did listening senators thrill,
And foes of right with awe and silence fill—
Thy tomb shall e'er be consecrate,
And men will ever call thee good and great:
Rest thee in peace.

Rest, poet, rest!
Far from all fading, sublimity things,
Thou tunest now thy golden lyre,
And sweep'st, with swifter hands, the deep-toned strings.
Fanned by the breath of bright seraphic wings,
Thou climb'st the mount of song still higher,
To where before thou never didst aspire.
Rest thee in peace.

Rest, pilgrim, rest!
Where'er thou art, may naught disturb thy sleep:
No crimes e'er goad thy pulseless breast;
But in that sphere, where love's pure fount is deep,
And dry the eyes that oft were wont to weep:
Where all are guileless, good and blest,
May thy free, deathless spirit ever rest.
Rest, rest in peace.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE STRAWBERRIES.

BY NED ANDERTON.

"At last," cried Alexowitz, "I have found means to induce the beautiful Kathinka to accept a present! One which, notwithstanding its cost, will not offend her haughty delicacy. Cupid himself has conducted me to this garden, where these scarlet strawberries, her favorite fruit, are ripening in the midst of January. To be sure, one might offer her jewels, instead of this delicious fruit; but those she would disdain, as she has already done so many times; these will be touched by her lovely lips! O, happy Alexowitz, and happy, happy strawberries!"

It was in one of the imperial palaces in the vicinity of St. Petersburg that the admirer of the beautiful Kathinka made this fortunate discovery. Cultivated by the gardener's skillful hand, a number of strawberries had actually ripened amid all the ice and cold of that frozen climate, in the severest days of winter. The enthusiastic lover had compared them, in point of value, to jewels; but costly also was the price which the magic gardener required for his fruit. That the eighty rubles which he demanded for a small measure of them, was paid without hesitation, will be easily credited by those who are at all conversant with the ritual of love.

Possessing natural delicacy of feeling, and already experienced in the art of insinuating himself into the good graces of the fair sex, Alexowitz was not the man to make his offerings, beautiful and attractive of themselves, in a vulgar or obtrusive mode. The gardener's boy, deputed by him to deliver the costly present, seemed created for the messenger of love, so skillful was he in betraying, with unconsciousness, not only the name of the donor, but also the value of the precious gift.

What Alexowitz had said of the lady, was strictly true; though her fortune was not equal to her birth, a noble pride withheld her from ever accepting a present from any of her numerous admirers. The first impression which this delicately tendered offering from the generous Alexowitz made on her mind, could not be otherwise than extremely grateful and flattering. A moment's reflection, however, caused a feeling of regret that so large a sum of money should be squandered on nothing, and sighing, she gazed upon the tempting fruit without touching it.

The mother of the young lady, more accustomed to care and economy, suspected what was passing in her mind, and hastened to turn the thought to some profit. Accordingly, in a strain of matronly eloquence, she represented to Kathinka, that for the money thus uselessly expended, she might have procured numberless articles of dress that she could with difficulty dispense with, and many minor comforts which they both needed.

At length they resolved to sell the costly, and to them, superfluous present. In pursuance of this prudent resolve, their waiting-maid, being cautiously instructed, hastened to seek one of her friends, who occupied herself in little dealings of this nature, and who gave great hopes of selling the strawberries to advantage.

Mother and daughter were still talking over the matter, which was nevertheless a little painful to their feelings, when Kosinsky entered; a young Gallician nobleman, perhaps the only one of Kathinka's admirers who really loved her, but who, less wealthy than Alexowitz, had never been able to present her with a token of affection so costly, rich and beautiful. Kathinka had appeared to favor the handsome Kosinsky, but whether her heart was too vain to reject the influence of external splendor, or whether the coolness with which she now received the noble Pole arose from the advantage gained by his more fortunate rival, it would be hard to say.

Who can pretend to understand the mysteries of a lady's heart?

It might be vexation at having received such a mark of attention from the one she loved least. But whatever the cause, in vain did the chagrined lover introduce twenty different topics of conversation; every attempt to dispel the ill-humor of his mistress failed most signally. Uneasy, he at times threw back his raven hair, his dark eyes sparkled, and his flushed cheeks glowed still brighter from his painful embarrassment. Finally, a subject was started which interested the proud beauty, namely, the seasons.

That this should lead the discourse from winter to summer, from summer to spring, and from spring to strawberries, was quite natural; and the lady spoke so enthusiastically of strawberries, that it appeared as if she were dying to possess some.

"And yet," interrupted Kosinsky, not exactly knowing what to say, "even if it were possible to obtain this delicious fruit in the depth of winter, the lovely Kathinka would not condescend to accept them from the hand of affection."

"O, such a present," replied Kathinka, with a look of cold indifference, "a gift snatched, as it may be said, from the regions of enchantment, would be received with great pleasure, even by the greatest princess."

The words of his beautiful mistress, the manner in which they were spoken, and more than all, the apparent impossibility of accomplishing her wish, united to grieve the devoted and sensitive heart of the lover. He left her in deep but silent distress, and wandered heedlessly in the bitter cold, about the magnificent streets of the imperial city. Deepening to obtain this prodigy of spring, except by magic, he absolutely thought himself enchanted when he suddenly heard some one quite close to him talking of strawberries!

It was the person who had the charge of selling the well known dish of fruit, and a steward of a foreign prince, who was endeavoring to bargain for them. The prince was to give a splendid dinner the next day, at which every possible rarity was to be forthcoming. The difficulty of purchase now was only a trifle; without a moment's reflection, Kosinsky joined the haggling party, offering to pay the price demanded, and entreated of the steward, with so much earnestness, to relinquish the fruit, that, partly guessing his object, he consented to waive his pretensions.

Kosinsky concluded the bargain; but a stranger in this expensive capital, in a country distant from home, and with a purse not remarkably well filled, the sum required for them fell heavier on him than the eighty rubles had fallen on his rich and munificent rival. It was nevertheless paid, and the faithful Iris of the young lady hastened with delight to carry her the money she had obtained for the fruit.

The greatness of the sum occasioned at the first moment a painful sensation in the breast of the haughty Kathinka, which might have arisen from a sentiment of shame; but her feelings were still more painfully aroused when she heard the name of the purchaser, and furthermore, the gratuitous conjecture of the servant, that Kosinsky intended giving a supper the next evening in honor of a beautiful country-woman lately arrived. She combined this supposition with several little corroborating circumstances, and Kathinka could not help feeling how dear he was to her.

"This, then, was the cause of his abstracted manner, of his abrupt departure? Another, then, occupied his thoughts? And I must be the person to throw the present in his way, with which he intends to surprise another!"

Thus she mused to herself, and no doubt her conscience reproached her for frightening away so decided a lover by her ill-nature.

She was still absorbed in these unpleasant thoughts, when the servant of her supposed lost admirer entered, and—O joy!—the scarlet-colored strawberries which had caused her so much uneasiness, presented themselves a second time to her sight. Less inventive in the refined arts of gallantry than Alexowitz, the honest-hearted Kosinsky had no idea but that of sending the present in a straightforward manner; but, with a sense of genuine tenderness, he had, with his own hands, adorned the basket with flowers and bows of colored ribbon.

Never did a present cause a more pleasing surprise in the heart of a young girl, than these eventful strawberries, whose adventures were even now far from being at an end. The mother was delighted at the singular chance which had thrown the strawberries again into her hands, and now regarded them as a happy means of delicately discharging a heavy obligation; she had been much indebted to the exertions of an eminent lawyer for her success in a suit, and thought she could not more agreeably evince her gratitude, than by this unimportant yet expensive rarity. Accordingly, the basket, with all its tender ornaments of flowers and ribbons, was sent to its new destination. Kathinka was too much overjoyed at receiving the present, to allow her to dispute with her mother about the use she might wish to make of it.

That these strawberries should also afford pleasure to their new possessor was very natural, though the pleasure might not be of so deep a nature. They came very acceptably, for he had long been thinking how he should pay some little mark of attention to the ambassador of —, who had conferred on him a favor of importance. The little wanderers were therefore sent off without delay, notwithstanding the unwillingness of the lawyer's lady, who would gladly have retained them for a treat with her friends.

It was on the elegant table of the ambassador—the young and handsome ambassador, renowned for his gallantry—that these little mischievous traitors were soon seen peeping forth amongst the ribbons and flowers, when, as if led thither by his civil genius, Kosinsky was announced. It seems he had some inquiries to make of the ambassador.

What these inquiries were, however, he no longer recollected, when a few moments after his entrance, his eyes fell on the well known basket; and it was truly fortunate for him that Alexowitz, an intimate friend of the ambassador, at the very moment entered. He also recognized his present, and the easy gaiety which always distinguished him, was now suddenly overcast. Like Kosinsky, he was convinced that the ambassador, as a favored lover, had received the present from the hands of the faithless Kathinka; but, possessing more refinement than deep feeling, more esprit than passion, this conviction produced a much less painful impression on him than on the other.

He was too handsome—he had been too fortunate during the course of his triumphant life, to be discountenanced by one little proof of ingratitude. With a gay carelessness he concealed his offended self-love, and would merely explain to his friend the oddity and singularity of the occurrence. Reproaches he would not offer to the ungrateful beauty, but to make her feel how indelicate, how contrary it was to the dignity of her sex to send such a present to a man who must be nearly a stranger to her—this he thought a very allowable revenge. But the presence of a third person prevented his speaking his mind freely with the ambassador; and he left him to obtain from Kathinka herself a nearer explanation of the business.

While the two friends were exchanging a few words, Kosinsky had fixed his eyes, sparkling with indignation, on the basket, his face alternately changing color, from a deadly pale to a deep red. He saw before him the fruit which he had not bought without a great sacrifice, those ribbons, those flowers, the pledges of his affection, given to his rival, and himself the victim of the blackest, the most insulting treachery.

He was yet undecided whether he should first go and call Kathinka to account for her conduct, or require immediate satisfaction of his rival, when the entrance of several strangers determined him to the former. He transacted his business with the ambassador in a few confused sentences, then hurried away, and rushed, his heart bursting with rage, into the presence of the terrified Kathinka, where Alexowitz had arrived only a few minutes previously. He stepped back with a shudder when he saw Alexowitz. The presence of the two irritated lovers perhaps saved the lady from a disagreeable scene, for the enactment of which both were in a state of high excitement.

In the interim, the ambassador meditated the best use he could make of this wonderful fruit which he had received. Of course he was much too gallant not to wish that it should be consumed by some fair and lovely mouth, in preference to his own. He carefully went through the list of beauties to whom he was then paying court, and his choice fell on Kathinka, who, independent of her exquisite loveliness, possessed a still more attractive charm than the others; she was the newest of his acquaintances! He had been introduced to her at the last ball.

It was high time that an occurrence so fortunate should come to the aid of oppressed innocence. Alexowitz had already, by concealed reproaches and insinuations, given play to his resentment; soon would Kosinsky, no longer able to restrain himself, have burst out into open reproof. The trembling Kathinka found herself in a most distressing predicament, when once more the door opened, and the blushing wanderers presented themselves to her sight for the third and last time!

It was now evident, at least by the message from the ambassador which accompanied them, that it was not from her he had received the sweet offering.

A mutual explanation took place; and the mother, to remove all suspicion, candidly related the whole affair. Kosinsky and Kathinka, by this circumstance, first discovered the situation of their own hearts; and Alexowitz, who had a certain horror of all serious love affairs, willingly yielded his pretensions to his much more serious rival.

All was thus unravelled in harmony; each of the gentlemen made a solemn vow against rash judgments for the future. Kathinka, cured effectually of coquetry, dried her tears, and like a rose after an April shower, bloomed all the fresher for the pearly drops, while the mother concluded Cupid did not approve of an economical use of gifts offered up at his shrine.

As for the strawberries, they found the same day their object and end at a gay little supper in honor of the betrothal of Kosinsky with the pretty Kathinka.

THE DISCOVERER OF ZINC.

It was first discovered in 1530, by no less a personage than Theophrastus Aureolus Bombastes Paracelsus, the wild, fantastic hero of Browning's celebrated dramatic poem. It will, perhaps, be new to most people to be informed that the very word "bombast" took its original meaning in the "great and swelling words of vanity" uttered by this singular genius. With all his insane pretensions, there was true metal in Bombastes. He it was who gave the death-blow to alchemy, and was the first to show the utter hollowness of the then prevailing scholasticism, as respected physical investigations. Being appointed to the first professorship of chemistry, at Bale, in 1529—the earliest chair of chemistry ever established—he played such mad pranks, and kept up such a storm in poor little Bale, that the magistrates had to banish him from his chair. After undergoing many alternations of fortune, it irks us to say that poor Bombastes, to parody a modern phrase, "went on the zinc," and died miserably, in an obscure tavern in Salisbury, in the forty-eighth year of his age.—Engineer.

HOW TO DO GOOD.

Dr. Johnson wisely said, he who waits to do a great deal of good at once, he will never do anything. Life is made up of all things. It is but once in an age that occasions offered for doing a great deed. True greatness consists in being great in little things. How are railroads built? By one shovel-full of dirt after another, one shovel-full at a time. Thus drops make the ocean. Hence we should be willing to do a little good at a time, and never wait to do a great deal of good at once. If we would do much good in the world, we must be willing to do good in little things, little acts, one after another, speaking a word here and a word there, and setting a good example all the time.—N. Y. Independent.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE DESERTED MANSION.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Where the poplars rear their lofty heads
Far above the scene below,
Now the auspicious dance on the ruined manse,
And the shadows come and go,
The red deer roams through the park at will,
And the rabbit burrows free;
But silence reigns o'er the wide domains,
Save the wild bird's minstrelsy.

A strange old nook is the ruined manse,
A place for day-born dreams;
Soft shadows pass o'er the tangled grass
When the sun in brightness gleams.
While the swinging doors reveal the halls,
Deserted now and drear;
For the mansion's lord lies beneath the sword
Where the poplar trees uprear.

I could tell a tale of this noble lord,
In the days of "old bang aye,"
When at duty's call, from his peaceful hall,
He went to Palestine;
How he left his child with a faithful friend,
Who should smooth his youthful way,
And with spear and shield on the battle-field
He mingled in the fray.

But he laughed long in the prison dark
Of the hostile Saracens,
Till his frame was weak and pale his cheek,
For his thoughts were elsewhere then;
Till his ransom came and he turned his steps
Again to his native shore,
And with strange unrest in his troubled breast,
Resolved to roam no more.

Yes, he reached his home, but ne'er again
Came a smile to his furrowed face;
For his friend of old, for the love of gold,
Had thought to end his race;
And his child was slain by the murderer's steel
Ere he knew his father's name,
While the traitor foul with the perjured soul
Had died a death of shame.

When the blasts of autumn whirled the leaves
From the lofty poplars' crests,
They strewed the mound and laid them round
The turf on the sleepers' breasts;
For the lord of the manse had sunk to sleep
With his child at the poplar's base,
And the shadows fall from the mansion tall
O'er the lonely burial-place.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A TRICK OF THE TRADE.

BY LEST LISTON.

AMONGST the middle classes of society, in consequence, frequently, of the accumulation of wealth, in business or otherwise, is what is very significantly termed a "taste for pictures." With his horse, his buggy, and his new house, the well-to-do tradesman or professional man, if he be ambitious to acquire among his friends the reputation of a person of elegant mind, or has been inoculated (by some peculiar circumstance) with a love of the fine arts, commonly sets up some fine old paintings, choice productions of the pencil of Claude, Rubens, Rembrandt, Titian, Correggio and others (all great names, be it remembered), expending sometimes in the purchase of the same, a sum of money sufficient to purchase a substantial house, or have been a handsome portion for one of his children. Supposing he has not had the sense to confess his ignorance, and keep an experienced friend at his elbow, but trusting blindly to his own sagacity and taste, has purchased all that was offered (provided it had a name), what are the pictorial gems which adorn his rooms? the peerless pearls of which he is so proud? the prodigies of art in which he has attempted to build up his reputation as a connoisseur and a man of elegant mind? Glaring and vile copies not worth a cent; worn-out duns, rubbed and scrubbed to the very canvass, which if they were entire, would be dear at ten cents per wagon-load; things called studies, splashy and coarse, with a vast deal more smoke than fire about them; things which libel the fair fame of Rubens, Vanduyke, Da Vinci, Titian, Claude; and which if these men of genius could rise from their graves to behold, would make their very hair stand erect.

Many an inexperienced collector, with no guide but his own taste and slender knowledge of pictures, has been victimized, and after expending a considerable sum and hanging up a quantity of rubbish, has had finally the sagacity to discover that he has been taken in and done for. We distinctly remember a trick that was played off on—ahem!—a friend of ours, (of course he was, or how should we have remembered it?)—a gentleman who was just then beginning to form a collection of pictures; and entirely ignorant of the many sharp practices of dealers, and the cunning tricks frequently resorted to, for entrapping novices, by persons who have "fine old paintings which they wish to dispose of," and ever keep a sharp look-out for those whom they can dupe.

One drizzly, unpleasant morning in November, he was sitting quietly by himself in his little office parlor, when a stranger was announced, who wished to speak with him on a matter of much importance. This person was a shabby-gentle man of middle age, with a profusion of curly brown hair, having red beard and a decidedly John Bull cast of countenance—and seemingly, from his decayed dress and subdued, melancholy manner, suffering deeply.

The purpose of his visit was not to consult my friend professionally, but he had taken the liberty, he said, of calling on our friend, to acquaint him with some few particulars in his private history.

Some two years before, the stranger went on to say, he was a merchant, residing in New York, moving in a highly respectable sphere and in affluent circumstances, but in consequence of some ruinous speculations, his affairs became involved and himself ruined. While in prosperity, he continued, he was a liberal patron of the fine arts, and not one of the merchant princes of that city was more of an enthusiast in art, or had expended a larger sum in the purchase of the productions of the old masters, than himself. His gallery was the topic of conversation in all artistic circles.

He had resolved to bequeath his gallery to the nation, with the hope that a school of art might be erected in this country, that, adopting the name of its benefactor, should perpetuate his name, the name of Stubbs, forever! 'Twas all a dream—a rapturous dream! The postman came with intelligence of losses; the banker's clerk with protested notes embellished by his name on their back; the sheriff with summons, and his officer with executions; and last of all, the auctioneer came with his hammer, and knocked down everything he possessed, even to his treasures of art.

"Woe is to me!" ejaculated the stranger. "Shall I ever forget the horrors of that day—the day of sale—when I parted forever with all that was to perpetuate my memory! The loss was nothing to the shock I endured when I learned that my Sebastian del Piombo, for which I gave—no matter how much—was knocked down to one Anderson, a coal-man, who keeps a coal and lumber yard—a man that knows nothing beyond his black diamonds and boards—for only $255 50."

He went on to observe, that when he stated the whole of his choice and valuable collection was sold under the auctioneer's hammer, he omitted to make an exception of two pictures which, by a lucky accident, were preserved to him. These pictures—a very fine "Halt of Cavalry," by Philip Wouvermans, and a landscape, equally fine, by Jacob Ruysdael—were considered by him two of his choicest gems, and only obtained for him, by paying an enormous price, from the descendants of the painters themselves (so they must have been original and genuine gems). At the time when his misfortune occurred, they were fortunately in the hands of the framer, and by some accident had been overlooked and forgotten; so that, when through chance, and he had been discharged, they were handed to him again, and he must say that their possession did much towards alleviating his anguish.

After his misfortune, he staid but a short time in New York; he could not bear to hold up his head, and leaving the city, he came at once to the modern Athens, hoping that he there should soon be able to meet with some congenial employment, whereby to earn a subsistence; but the tide of fortune, he was sorry to say, had been against him. Never since he came to Boston, had he been able to obtain employment; and for several months he had been in the greatest distress; his wife, children and himself, frequently on the borders of starvation.

They had been compelled to part with every little article of any value which they possessed, to procure food. Even the two pictures he esteemed so highly, the gems he had cherished as fondly as the wife of his bosom—even they, his beautiful Wouvermans and Ruysdael, were now in the hands of a pawnbroker. It was this that harrowed up his feelings; the idea that an ignorant fellow, a pawnbroker, should become the proprietor of two such invaluable pictures, and at such a price,—for he declared he had only received $50 for both of them.

"My necessities compelled me to do it, much against my will. This very day the time expires, and if the interest is not paid to-night, I lose them forever. But it is not in my power to pay even that. Will you do me a kindness? Will you be my friend? Twenty-five dollars would preserve me, my wife and innocent children from starvation. For that sum, then, I will place you in possession of these pictures, these beautiful pictures. See, here are the tickets! Give me the money and they are yours—yours, to be coveted by every friend you have."

Our friend was moved. He was thrown completely off his guard by the manner of the man—the earnestness, the grief, the passionate appeal to his benevolent feelings, and without hesitation he flung down the sum required. The stranger was overwhelmed with gratitude; he could not express his feelings. The tears started into his eyes as he pocketed the money, and he shook the hand of our friend with a grateful pressure, that spoke louder than words. Then taking up his hat to depart, he lamely requested to be allowed to see his pictures once more when gracing his benefactor's walls; and grasping our friend again by the hand, he looked unutterable thanks, and bowed himself out.

In a very few minutes after he had left, our worthy collector began to entertain some doubts whether, after all, he had not been duped by this "child of misfortune." But on examining the pawnbroker's tickets for a moment, he consoled himself with the idea that no pawnbroker would lend fifty dollars on pictures that were not worth twice the money. He therefore made his mind up on that score; and as there was no time to be lost, he prepared to go in quest of the broker's dwelling.

The night was as unpleasant a one as can well be imagined. It was windy, and the rain poured down in torrents, filling every alley and street with a sloppy puddle. Having secured the company of a friend (for the broker's abode was situated in a low street, and nearly a mile off), they started, and after half an hour's tramp, discovered to their great satisfaction, the three golden dumplings glistening in the rays of a lamp, while the name of Solomon Levi, in black letters upon a white board, seemed weeping for their malmortation through the drizzling rain.

"This is the place," said our friend, and entered at once.

Mr. Solomon himself sat writing at a tall desk, while Moses, his clerk, was trying to convince Mrs. Nokes, a ragged woman with a squalling child, that it was impossible to lend more than twenty-five cents on an old rusty tea-kettle she had brought. Directly as our collector and his friend entered the shop, Moses looked at his master and smiled, which smile was immediately pitched back by Solomon; but whether there something ludicrous in the wet and disordered appearance of the gentlemen, or whether the pawnbroker and his clerk had any suspicions of the business about which they had come, did not appear.

"You have two paintings in your possession, pledged by Mr. Stubbs!" said the collector, explaining the object of his visit.

"John Stubbs!" rejoined Solomon; "yesh, shur, two var fine pictures."

"Could I see them?" inquired our friend.

"Shertainly," said Solomon; "but I believe de pictures be forfeited; de interest haf not been paid."

"You are certainly mistaken," returned our friend; "here are the tickets—see, the time has not expired."

"O, I see; den you haf bought the tickets of Stubbs?" inquired the broker.

"I have," replied our friend.

"Will you take the pictures with you, or shall I make out two vresh tickets in your name. Fifty dollar de principal—ten dollar de interest. Sixty dollar you vill haf to pay me vor de pair of pictures," calculated Solomon.

"I should like to see the paintings before I do that," said our friend, who began to think that eighty-five dollars was rather too much to give for a "pig in the poke."

"Var goot," replied the pawnbroker; "den you must pay de interest first—ten dollar. Ve always makes de rule to haf de interest paid before ve brinksh down de things."

Our friend very reluctantly threw the interest down, and after subjecting it to a severe scrutiny, to see that it was good, Moses was ordered to bring the pictures down.

"And Moshesh," rejoined Solomon, "he var garval ov de vrames."

The worthy collector now became exceedingly nervous. His face was flushed, and his mind evidently much excited; he was full of anxiety to know the result of his speculation, good or bad—hoping to find a good bargain—fearing lest he had been taken in.

In a very little time, Moses again appeared, bearing in his arms the gems, the veritable Ruysdael and Wouvermans, and proceeded leisurely to untie every knot in the string that bound them.

"Cut it!—cut it!" cried the impatient collector, offering his knife.

"De shirting vill do again, Moshesh," said Solomon, giving his clerk a knowing wink.

At length every knot was untied, and the precious paintings slowly and carefully uncovered. First a wrapper of sheeting was removed; then a rusty blanket; next a huge quantity of paper was stripped away; then another bandage of sheeting; then paper again; then a padding of cotton; and at last the gems themselves appeared!

Could we but picture the looks of astonishment and horror, on that visage where indignation, scorn, pity and intense mortification were seen chasing each other in rapid succession, our readers would become convinced that our friend was sold. The first glimpse was enough for him. Such wretched pictures never defiled canvass before or since! The outside value of both frames and all was inside of five dollars! With a voice of desperate eagerness, our friend inquired where Mr. Stubbs could be found? Solomon, of course, did not know.

"Will you give my compliments to him," said the disappointed collector, "and say that when his misfortunes bring him to the gallows, I will endeavor to be present and console him in his last moments."

"Var goot," replied the fat broker, with a malicious grin; "but vill you take de pictures away now, or haf vresh tickets!"

Our friend heard no more; he could stand the banter no longer, especially as the joke was against him.

"To perdition with the pictures!" he shouted, and rushed from the room.

The fact was, the Hon. Mr. Stubbs had been employed by the pawnbroker to call on our friend, whom he had heard of as a young, inexperienced collector, to offer these choice paintings; and could he have looked in on the two knaves that night, and seen them sharing their gains, we think he would have failed in forming such well-rounded curls of smoke, as he contemplated the experience he had purchased.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

Two pages of it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 50,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

J. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

DR. CHARLES T. JACKSON.

We present on this page a portrait of Dr. Charles T. Jackson of this city, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry from a photograph by M. S. Cahill, 293 Washington Street, Boston. The labors of Dr. Jackson as a physician, a chemist, geologist and mineralogist, followed by results of the highest importance to humanity, and crowned by a world-wide reputation, have been so numerous, that an attempt to record them in the brief space at our disposal would be in vain; we can but rapidly review the principal incidents of his useful and honorable career. Charles Thomas Jackson was born in Plymouth, in this State, June 21, 1805, his father being an eminent merchant of Plymouth, and his mother, Lucy Cotton, daughter of Rev. John Cotton of Plymouth, a descendant of Rev. John Cotton of Boston, England, and the first pastor of the first church in Boston, Mass., in compliment to whom our city received its name. The subject of our sketch was destined to a mercantile career, but after a trial of business pursuits, he abandoned them as uncongenial, at a very early age, and went through a thorough course of classical study. He was graduated a Doctor of Medicine in Harvard University, January 21, 1829, receiving that year the Boylston prize for the best medical dissertation. While a medical student at the University he held the highest rank in his class, both as an anatomist and chemist. At that period, as early as 1826, he was earnestly engaged in endeavors to discover some method of rendering surgical operations painless; efforts finally crowned with success in his great discovery of etherization. In 1827, in company with his friend, Francis Alger, of this city, Dr. Jackson made his first extensive mineralogical and geological survey of Nova Scotia, a province which he subsequently re-visited for the purpose of extending and completing his explorations. He published accounts of his researches in the American Journal of Arts and Sciences, and in the Transactions of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, the latter publication being most favorably reviewed by M. Elie de Beaumont in the French Revue Encyclopédique for 1832. In 1829, Dr. Jackson went to Europe, and pursued his medical and scientific studies in Paris in the best schools and under the best instructors of the day. While abroad he made several extensive scientific tours, and the occurrence of the cholera in 1831 enabled him thoroughly to study that fearful disease. In company with Dr. Fergus and Dr. Johannes Gloisner, he dissected the bodies of about two hundred patients who had died of cholera in the Vienna Hospitals. After an extensive scientific tour in Italy, he returned to Paris, and devoted the summer months of June, July and August, 1832, to the study of surgery, especially of gun-shot wounds made in the insurrection of June 5th and 6th, and gave private instructions in the hospital St. Antoine to the pupils and internes of that hospital, repeating to a great extent the surgical lectures of M. Bérard, and illustrating them by operations on the dead subject. On his return voyage to the United States he explained and illustrated to his fellow-passenger, Mr. S. F. B. Morse, the principles and, in all its essential features, the construction of the recording electro-magnetic telegraph, subsequently patented by Mr. Morse. He had with him on board the Sully two galvanic batteries and an electro-magnet which he had procured at Paris, and with these instruments he first demonstrated, soon after his arrival in Boston, the practicability of an electro-magnetic recording telegraph. The invention, a few years afterwards, of the sustaining battery, by Prof. Daniel, together with the improvements made by others, removed the previously insurmountable difficulty in the way of economically applying the electro-magnetic telegraph to practical use. In 1833, Dr. Jackson established himself in Boston as a physician and surgeon. He was married in 1834 to Miss Susan Bridge, daughter of Nathan Bridge, a merchant of this city. Relinquishing, after a time, his medical practice, he created for himself a new learned profession, by combining chemistry, mineralogy and geology as his future pursuits. After many private geological surveys and explorations of mines, and numerous chemical analyses had given him a reputation, he was appointed by Governor Everett of Massachusetts and Governor Dunlap of

CHARLES T. JACKSON, M.D

Maine, in 1836, State Geologist to survey the State of Maine and the public lands of Massachusetts in that State, a task which he executed during the space of two years. In 1836, he prepared the plan for the geological survey of New York. In 1839, he was appointed State Geologist for Rhode Island, and published his valuable report of the geology and agriculture of that State. We next find him State Geologist of New Hampshire, and subsequently surveying the wilderness on the southern shore of Lake Superior. In company with the late David Henshaw, formerly secretary of the navy, Dr. Jackson first opened the mineral treasures of that marvellous region, so wonderful for the stupendous veins of native copper and its accompanying native silver, and for its inexhaustible mountain masses of specula and magnetic iron ores. In February, 1842, he discovered the important fact that the nerves of sensation could be temporarily paralyzed without danger and without affecting the nerves of organic life, and that this effect could be produced at pleasure by the inhalation of pure ether vapor, mingled with air. This important discovery soon made the circuit of the civilized world, and it will transmit the name of its author to the remotest time. In 1849, he received the gold medal of merit, struck expressly for him on account of his discovery of Anæsthesia by etherization, and presented to him by Oscar, King of Sweden. On the 31st of January in the same year, he was decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honor by Prince Louis Napoleon, the president of the French republic, for the great service rendered to humanity by the discovery of anæsthesia by etherization, and for scientific services. March 18, 1850, he received the Montyon prize from the Institute of France for this greatest of medical discoveries. In 1854, he was elected a member of the Medical Society of Athens in Greece for the same reason; and on the 19th of March, 1855, was decorated with the order of the Medjidieh by the Sultan of Turkey, Abdul Medjid, for the service that etherization had rendered to the wounded of the allied armies of the Crimea. We have not space to enumerate the honors he has received, or the learned societies of the old and new world of which he has been chosen a member. He is now vice-president of the Boston Society of Natural History, and is Assayer of the State of Massachusetts, an office he has filled for many years. He has made many chemical and mineralogical discoveries, and among them perhaps the discovery of chlorine in meteoric iron is not the least remarkable. He has discovered and named several new minerals, among which are chlorastelote and chlorophyllite. He has also made many valuable researches in analytic chemistry, and has done much towards the improvement of the chemistry of agriculture, especially by making more thorough analyses of soil than had heretofore been recorded, and by physiological and chemical researches on plants. He also discovered the cause of death in a person killed by chloroform by proving that the chlorine of ter-chloride of formyl united chemically with the blood, and that the oxygen of the blood went to form the ter-oxide of formyl or formic acid. Dr. Jackson is still, comparatively, young for a scientific man, and zealous and active in his pursuits; we may trust, therefore, that a long career of usefulness and distinction is still before him.

ENCAMPMENT OF THE PERSIAN ARMY.

The engraving below is a correct and striking representation of the Persian army as it lately appeared when encamped under the walls of Shiraz. The tents, the infantry and guns, the horsemen with their high caps and peculiar uniforms, all different from the figures and the equipment with which western eyes are familiar, backed by the quaint towers and domes of the ancient city, make up an oriental picture of strange interest and significance. Shiraz, the capital of that province of Persia known by the name of Fars, and formerly one of the most important in the country, was in reality the nucleus of the Persian empire, the name of which is a corruption of the word Fars. The people of Shiraz bear a warlike character, and have rendered themselves formidable, at some periods, as the most resolute antagonists of the Persian monarchs; and at others, as the most courageous supporters of the dynasty. On the occasion to which our engraving refers, the troops of the shah were encamped in the great plains of Shiraz, outside the walls of the city. Shiraz, towards the south, is only a few days' journey from the Gulf of Persia; and it was natural that the shah should have there assembled troops destined to oppose the advance of the English army. Among them might be seen the various tribes of Persia, including the celebrated Tuffekedjis, exceeding in number the tribes collected by the shah from all other parts of his empire. Unfortunately for Persia, she can boast of few troops well-drilled and disciplined; so that she could hardly hope to make any stand against the well-commanded troops of Britain. Nevertheless, the Persian soldier is not to be despised, seeing that he is sober, steady, active, and possesses great powers of endurance. The introduction of the European drill among all the troops of the East, while it has increased their effectiveness, shows conclusively that the oriental rulers have lost much of their haughty self-reliance and bigoted pride. It is a tacit acknowledgement of the superiority of the "infidels" in arms—a confession that the men of the West must be met with the weapons and warfare of the West. On the plains of Egypt, more than half a century ago, Napoleon the Great inflicted a severe lesson on the pride of the Orientals in the famous battle of the pyramids, when the cavalry of Mourad Bey, till then deemed peerless and invincible, were shattered before the inflexible bayonets and the rolling volleys of the unbroken squares of French infantry, and disappeared like water sinking into sand. Of little avail are fiery valor and individual mastery of the weapons of war, compared with that unity of action and steady endurance which make of an English or French army a huge machine of terrible momentum and overwhelming force.

ENCAMPMENT OF THE PERSIAN ARMY UNDER THE WALLS OF SHIRAZ.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD

FRANCIS A. DURIVAQUE, ASSISTANT EDITOR

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ellect a reply; but he receives hundreds of letters daily more than he can read, and cannot have time to answer all his correspondents.

A PRINCELY INCOME.—The leading surgeon in England, Sir Benjamin Brodie, has a professional income of eighty-five thousand dollars a year.

SPLINTERS.

... In Paris the ladies, at least those who can afford it, use gold dust for hair powder, the same of extravagance.

THE FOLLY OF FASHION.

In conclusion, we would exhort those who wish to enjoy themselves during the present summer, to dare to be unfashionable.

BETWEEN OURSELVES.

STARTLING THEORY.—Dr. W. Bird Powell, a well-known medical writer, in a recent work maintains that suicide is natural death, and that certain persons are as liable to it as to apoplexy or any other malady. Of the temperaments, he says:—"The sanguine man is physical perfection—the creature of folly, extravagance and dissipation; the bilious man is the only great one; the lymphatic is a disgusting sack of humors; and the melancholic is a poor, gloomy, miserable, liver-diseased wretch, whom it would be a mercy to despatch."

QUINTUPLE PUN.—If my pun-ish head was pun-ish-ed for every pun-l-shed, I should not have a pun-y-shed to hide my pun-ish'd head. Fin-ish-ed. We believe the late Henry J. Fion was the unpunished author of this complicated play on words.

THE MAN FOR THE PLACE.—Dr. Francis Lieber, late of the University of South Carolina, has been unanimously elected professor of history and political sciences in Columbia College, New York city.

A CASE.—We are always being told that "property has its rights," but surely, in the matter of gloves and boots, property has its legs as well as rights.

FLORIDA INDIANS.—It is stated that the Seminoles, in Florida, are starved out, and have agreed to surrender.

MURDERED ENGLISH.

Some of the blunders that foreigners make in attempting to write English are exceedingly amusing. One of the most atrocious attempts to assassinate the language that we ever met with, was perpetrated in the form of a circular addressed to the British residents in Naples, in 1832, and we willingly give it the benefit of our columns:—"Joseph the Cook, he offer to one illuminated public and most particular for British knowing men in general, one remarkable, pretty, famous and splendid collection of old goods, all quite new, excavated from private personal diggings. He sells corcked clays, old marble stooes, with basso-relievos, with stewing-pots, brass sacrificing-pots, and antik lamps. Here is a stocking of calves heads and feets for single ladies and amateurs travelling. Also old coppers candlesticks; with Nola Jags, Etruscan saucers, and much more intellectual minds articles; all entitling him to learned man's inspection to examine him, and apply it with illustrious protection, of which he hope full and valorous satisfaction!" "Joseph the Cook" evidently considers himself a master of the English tongue.

CLOSE OF VOLUME XII.

The present number of "Ballou's Pictorial" completes the twelfth volume of the work, and with the next number we shall commence the thirteenth volume. Those whose subscription runs out with the present number should renew at once, in order that there shall be no break in the regular receipt of the paper. The steady increase of our subscription list is the best evidence of the fact that our endeavors to please our army of readers is completely successful. The coming volume will exhibit some increased excellencies and popular improvements. An entirely new and beautiful set of type will be donned with the first number, and one of our mammoth and brilliant two-page engravings will also be given.

THE WEST POINT CADET:

—OR THE—

TURNS OF FORTUNE'S WHEEL

BY DEN: PERLEY POORE.

This is the title of a brilliant story, to be commenced in our next number, from the pen of the popular and far-famed Maj. Poore. It is a racy and captivating tale, and will exhibit the versatile powers and fine dramatic taste of the author to perfection. It is a story of military life, and home adventures and experience, and contains more truth than the general reader may surmise. Be sure to read the opening chapters next week.

NEW YORK CITY.—Dexter & Brother, 14 and 16 Ann Street, New York, and Ross & Tousey, 121 Nassau Street, New York, are general agents for all our publications. Both these houses are conducted by prompt, responsible business men, being the largest periodical jobbers in the United States.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Kallach, Mr. Joseph Norton, Jr., to Miss Mary J. Davenport; by Rev. Dr. Bigelow, Mr. John G. Ekins to Miss Hannah T. Tainter; by Rev. Mr. Bartol, Mr. Melzar Dunbar, Jr., to Miss Mary Louisa Waldron; by Rev. Mr. Dudson, Mr. James A. Gore to Miss Adeline Cogges, of Lubec, Me.; by Rev. Mr. Smitheth, Mr. Thomas Kearns to Mrs. Catherine M. Grey; by Rev. Mr. Stickney, Mr. William D. Morris to Miss Margaret Colby; by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. William H. Gilson to Miss A. Dowling; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Graeville N. Whittington to Miss "Phoebe B. Deane."—At West Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. David Kimball, of Boston, to Mrs. C. L. W. Frost.—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Dainoff, Mr. Robert Saunders to Miss Ellen O. Batchelder.—At South Danvers, by Rev. Mr. Sutherland, Mr. J. H. Barnes to Miss Matilda Proctor.—At Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Hatch, Mr. Jacob Chase to Miss Clara A. Tyre.—At Northboro', by Rev. Mr. Fur-bush, Mr. Cyrus Potter to Miss Sarah A. Burditt.—At Clinton, by Rev. Mr. H. H. Hedges, Mr. L. Wood to Miss Louisa M. Winslow, both of Hingham.—At Worcester, by Rev. Mr. Swallow, Mr. E. S. Swallow, both of Fall River, to Miss Anna G. Garrit, both of Holden.—At Fall River, by Rev. Mr. Walte, Mr. Frederick A. Davis to Miss Caroline A. Hinckley, both of Somerset.—At New Bedford, by Rev. Mr. Howson, Mr. Henry Mitchell to Miss Sarah Ann Swain.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mrs. Sarah Standish, 59; Mr. Kenneth Matheson, 68; Mrs. Huldah Fowler, 72; Mrs. Mary W. Hayward, daughter of the late Bishop Tridwell, 34; at Deer Island, Mr. William Hartwell, for many years auctioneer at Black Square, 84; at South Boston, Mrs. Mary S. Quincy, 82; at Clarks- town, Mrs. Maria Frances Howe, late of San Francisco, Cal., 29;—at Somer- ville, Miss Helen J. Martin of Chester, Vt., 19;—at Cambridgeport, Mr. Knocb H. Kenrick, 72;—at Cambridge, Mrs. Betsey S. Fisher, 73;—at Roa- bury, Mr. Isaac H. Parker, Jr., 20;—at Dorchester, Miss Mary Bussey, 69;—at Quincy, Miss Fannie Horton, 18;—at Woburn, Mrs. Martha Dunning, 74;—at Malden, Miss Anna S. Haven, 55;—at South Reading, Mr. Daniel C. Smith, 60;—at North Reading, Mr. John H. Allen, 60;—at Haverhill, Mr. Worthley, 68;—at Danvers, Mrs. Catherine A. Blodgett, 61;—at North Andover, Mr. William Bitchelder, 42;—at Haverhill, Mr. William Harmon, 53;—at Newburyport, Capt. William Tate, formerly of Salem, 62;—at Newbury, Mr. Moses Perley, 74;—at Worcester, Mrs. Phoebe Johnson, 63;—at North- brook, Mr. Stephen Jerald, 72;—at Tyngborough, Miss Anna Lawrence, 76;—at Fitchburg, Mrs. Susan Gibson, 74;—at New Bedford, Mrs. Sarah Le- land, 80;—at Weymouth, Mr. George H. Johnson, 77;—at Eastham, Mr. David Smedley, 80;—at Wells, Mr. George John Hanks, 51;—at Galena, Ill., Mrs. Adeline Butler, formerly of Ellsworth, Me.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                             |       |
|-----------------------------|-------|
| 1 subscriber, one year..... | 83 00 |
| 4 subscribers " " .....     | 10 00 |
| 10 " " " .....              | 20 00 |

Any person sending us former subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the

* One copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU.

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE WEARY SPELL.

BY MRS. J. D. BALDWIN.

I stood before the altar, Clare,
And friends were circled near,
Upon my brow the lights' full glare,
Upon my cheek a tear.
I heeded not the murmurs low
From lip to lip that passed,
Nor heard the holy marriage vow
The man of God had blessed.

For mid the crowd then pressing round
With gracious word and smile,
I saw—with eyes bent on the ground,
And lips compressed the while—
A well-known form, that sent the blood
To flush my temples red,
When, ere my lips could frame a word,
Sight, feeling, sense had fled.

'Twas strange, 'twas passing strange, they thought,
But he alone might guess;
As mine his glance reproachful caught
Ere I had answered, "Yes."
He knew why I felt sick and faint,
Ere word my lip had passed:
He knew why down my ashly cheek
The tear drop trickled fast.

O, many a long and tedious year
Since then in festive throngs,
With dark despair within my heart,
I've joined their merry songs.
But, Clare, that well-remembered night
Of anguish unsurpassed,
Upon my life its darkening blight
A weary spell has cast.

FLATTERY.

No flattery, boy! An honest man can't live by't:
It is a little speaking art, which knaves
Use to cajole and soften fools withal.
If thou hast flattery in thy nature, out with't;
Or send it to a court, for there 'twill thrive.—OTWAY.

HEART LOVE.

The best that the heart loves is nearer God
Than the best the soul imagines.—C. NEWTON.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

We are close upon July, which the Saxons called hemmonath, which probably expressed the meaning of the German word hain, signifying wood or trees—and hence hemmonath might mean, the month of foliage. They also called it heymanath, or hay month, because "therein they usually mowed and made their harvest." Leigh Hunt says of July, "There is a sense of heat and quiet all over nature. The birds are silent; the little brooks are dried up; the earth is chapped with parching; the shadows of the trees are particularly grateful, heavy and still; the cattle stand in the shade, or stand in the water; the active and air-circling swallows, now beginning to assemble for migration, seek their prey about the shady places, where the insects, though of differently compounded natures, 'fleshless and bloodless,' seem to get for coolness, as they do at other times for warmth. There are also strange humming sounds in the air as of innumerable insects, though none can be seen—" Their murning small trumpets sounden wide," as Spenser says; and in the blazing sun, by the dusty wayside, the loudest utoers his harsh note with screeching wing." Is not this, reader, a picture of a July day as truthful as it is poetical?..... Nothing is more striking in the Indians of North America than the force of their descriptive epithets. Lieutenant Hooper, of the Arctic Expedition, found a woman at Fort Simpson, whose name was "Thirty-Six Tongues."..... A midshipman, the son of a tradesman, on board a man-of-war (when Prince William Henry, afterwards King William the Fourth of England, was also a midshipman), was walking the deck, reading the Bible one day, when Prince William called out to him, "Tom, what are you reading?" Tom replied, "A book that gives me good advice."—"What does it advise you, pray?" asked the prince, sneeringly. "Put not your trust in princes in whom be no help; for wherein are they to be accounted of?" read Tom, and the prince vanished. .... At a Sunday school examination the teacher asked a boy whether, after what he had been standing and repeating, he could forgive those who had wronged him? "Could you," said the teacher, "forgive a boy, for example, who has insulted or struck you?"—"Yes, sir," replied the lad, very slowly, "I—think—I—could, if he was bigger than I am."..... Pitt, being in company with the Duchess of Gordon, who spoke the Scottish dialect in the broadest manner, she told him that some of her family had gone to France, and was asked by him why she was not of the party. She said, in answer, "That it was very awkward to be in a country and not know the language."—"Why," said Mr. Pitt, "your grace has not found any such inconvenience in England."..... Sir Walter Scott once gave an Irishman a shilling when a sixpence would have been sufficient. "Remember," said the baronet, "you owe me sixpence."—"May your honor live till I pay you," was the reply. .... "Sonny, does your father take a paper?"—"Yes, sir, two of them. One of them belongs to Mr. Smith, and the other to Mr. Thompson. I hook them off the stoop."..... The proprietors of the New York Times are taking a new step for journalists. They offer a reward of $5000 for information which shall lead to the detection and conviction of the murderer of Dr. Burdell. .... We found this good story of rustic courtship, the other day. A youth, smitten with the charms of a beautiful maid, only vented his passion by sly looks, and now and then touching his fair one's toe with his foot under the table. The girl bore with his advances a little while in silence, when she cried out, "Look here, if you love me, tell me so, but don't dirty my stockings."..... A young naval officer of the name of Moore, having presented a gold anchor to his affianced bride, a wag remarked that she was moored!..... Regrets towards the evening of life will occur nearly to all, even the happiest. We mourn the departure of the luminary, though his setting be glorious. .... Villany and ingenious rascality seem to be rife now-a-days. Aascal recently forged an order purporting to be signed by the mail contractor on the route between Cleveland and Indianapolis, by which he managed to get charge of the mails, which, as a matter of course, he ridled at the earliest possible moment and sloped for more congenial soil. .... Wisdom is generally an acquisition purchased in proportion to the disappointments which our own frailties have imposed upon us; for few are taught by the sufferings of another. .... There were late rumors from Utah that Brigham Young had incurred the indignation of his flock, and been compelled to flee. If such is the case, Mormonism will be severely shaken. .... We had a call to-day from Dr. Hayes, the companion of the lamented Kane in his Arctic voyage. Dr. Hayes is a gentleman of fine cultivation, large experience, agreeable address, and quite a young man. He has consented to sit to our artist, and we shall shortly give a portrait and biography of him in these pages. .... The life of an artist is one of thought rather than action—he has to speak of the struggles of mind rather than the conflict of circumstances. .... "Ignore" is a word that ought never to be used, but in the languages of law and of commerce. When the jury, whose province it is to find bills of indictment before justices of the peace and gaol delivery, cannot find a true bill against somebody who stands charged with an offence, the bill is said to be ignored. The word may be used also with reference to commercial bills. But now, if I happen to be short-sighted, and pass young De Robinson in the street without recognition, he tells me with a sneer, the next time he speaks to me, that I ignored his existence—can anything be more frightful? So says a correspondent of the London Athenaeum—good authority. .... Neither English Garrick, nor French Le Kain, I know, says the theatrical critic of the New York Albion, possessed many advantages of appearance—but they swelled their diminutive size to reasonable proportions, by the expansive force of their genius. Maurice tells us of a story of a provincial performer at Lyons, no less a person than the afterwards conspicuous M. Florence, who, from the altitude of six feet two, patronised Le Kain in the green-room, only to shrink into nothingness and almost faint away when the great actor strode in upon the stage and summoned his long-legged condottor to follow him, with an imperial "Suivez-moi," which instantly added many cubits to the speaker's stature. "He seemed suddenly to hit the rafters!" said the amazed Florence. .... It must be rather unpleasant for a widow lady to hear a burglar coming down her chimney. Such a man, however sooty, can't be a suitor; so when the Widow Hardwood, of Bradford, Vt., found a man stuck half way in her chimney, the old lady promptly heaped straw in the fire-place and lighted it. The robber, half-suffocated, roared. Persons were collected by his cries; he was drawn up with ropes to the top of the chimney, more dead than alive, and sent to the mercies of the law. .... The number of letters delivered in Great Britain during the year 1856, was 478,000,000, being an increase over 1855 of nearly 22,000,000; and as compared with 1839, the year previous to the introduction of the penny postage, an increase (omitting fractions) of 402,000,000. So much for cheap postage. .... Some weeks since Queen Victoria had occasion to send for a physician in a hurry, and the messenger was obliged to take a common ricketty hackney cab. So it appears that the popular opinion, that the masters of horse, equerries, grooms and other salaried hangers-on about the palace are of no earthly use, is really well founded. .... The limitation of the time of the day for marrying in England is fixed by statute. The period between eight in the morning and noon is assigned as the legal time for all marriages. The custom here and the law in England are widely different in this particular. .... The London press are discussing the singular fact of the decline of the French population in France, as shown by the last census taken in that country. .... The London Spectator draws public attention to the dangers which threaten legitimate commerce from the close alliance now existing between courtly and royal speculators and the great capitalists. .... The following story, told by the Boston Ledger, is good enough for a spare laugh. A member of the Massachusetts senate two years since, who was at that time frightfully gray, came up to the capitol this year with his hair and whiskers of a lustrous black. Meeting with one of his colleagues of 1855, he accosted him very cordially, but was coldly told that he "really had the advantage" of the person addressed. "Why, I am Mr. —, of —," said the rejuvenated senator. "O," said his colleague, "your father was in the senate with me two years ago! How do you do, sir?"..... Pearls continue to be found at the Notch, near Patterson, New Jersey. They are also found in Bergen county. The Newark Daily Advertiser says, "A friend informs us that pearls were found in Passaic county some fifty years ago. .... The emperor Napoleon has just entered his 50th year. He was born April 20, 1808. .... We met with a good anecdote of Rubini the singer, the other day, which gives us quite an insight into professional manoeuvres. He made a tour with a German artist, Rubini to pay post-horses and tavern bills, the pianist concert expenses. When they came to settle, Rubini found on his colleague's memorandum-book the following item:—"At Munich for popular enthusiasm, 200 florins." Rubini asked an explanation, from which it appeared that the men who unharnessed and dragged their carriage, who strained their lungs with bravos, serenaded and crowned them with flowers, were all paid for their services, like the Roman patriots in a stage tragedy. Rubini paid his share of the "enthusiasm" with a slight sigh, and determined to make a bold push for gratuitous glory in future. .... An Indian Croesus has, it is said, just arrived in Paris from the banks of the Ganges, and has turned many fair heads in that brilliant capital. Rumor sets down his fortune at two hundred millions—which we take to be a slight exaggeration. .... "Acorn" says he once served forty-eight hours on a jury, and found himself at the end of that time so reduced from his former weight of 153 pounds, that "it would have taken two such chaps as himself to turn a money-scale."..... An auctioneer in this vicinity was lately selling a tract of unpromising land in lots, and expatiated very poetically on the beauties and advantages of the location. There happened to be a pond hard by, and the auctioneer, after having received a few bids, paused to call attention, by way of parenthesis, to this "beautiful sheet of water." By chance about a dozen men were seen scattered over its surface in boats, busily engaged in fishing, and apparently unconscious of the five hundred pair of eyes bent upon them. They were evidently successful, for they drew up their lines almost as fast as they dropped them. In fact, the auctioneer assured us that was the "finest fish-pond in the world." We ascertained afterwards that a few unhappy horn-pout and about a dozen starving suckers constituted the entire finny population of the pond, and the fishermen were hired expressly for the occasion. However, many cockneys in green cut-aways, with dog and powder-horn, huttous brightened up after this episode, and bided came in faster than ever. .... Illuminated show-bills have become so common, lately, that the owner of a clipper ship finds it difficult to get either passengers or freight without some fine cut-to-back-her.

SLEEP.

Sleep is the gift of God, and not a man would close his eyes did not God put his fingers on his eyelids. True, there are some drugs with which men can poison themselves well nigh to death, and then call it sleep; but the sleep of the healthy body is the gift of God. He bestows it; he rocks the cradle for us every night, draws the curtain of darkness, bids the sun shut his burning eyes; then he comes and says, "Sleep, sleep, my child; I give thee sleep." You have sometimes laid your head upon your pillow and tried to go to sleep, but you could not do it; it was beyond your power. You close your eyes, but still you see, and there are sounds in your ears, and ten thousand things drive through your brain. Sleep is the best physician that we know of. It has healed more pains than the most eminent physicians on earth. It is the best medicine. There is nothing like it. And what a mercy it is that it belongs to all. God does not give it merely to the noble or the rich, so they can keep it as a special luxury for themselves, but he bestows it upon all. Yes, if there be any difference, it is in favor of the poor. "The sleep of the laboring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much."—Saturday Evening Gazette.

Choice Miscellany.

CONDITION OF ARMENIAN WOMEN.

The condition of women in Armenia partakes of European freedom and Asiatic restraint—the restraint being laid on the wife, and the freedom allowed to the maiden. To all, except Armenians, born, this appears a perilous, or at least a preposterous regulation. Yet, practically, it would seem to lead to no evil results, and at the worst renders households tranquil, though, it may be, rather dull. If marrying and wooing in Armenia were, as in more civilized climes, affairs of the heart, and not the private business of fathers and guardians, we might justly expect that the Transcaucasian young ladies would become a nation of restalors or amazons, so as to avoid the uncomfortable doom which surely awaits them in the married state. While unwed, they go where they will and converse with whom they please. But with the words pronounced at the altar female liberty is at an end. The lords of the Armenian creation are of opinion not merely that a "voice soft, gentle, and low, is an excellent thing in woman," but also that rigid Pythagorean silence is wholesome for the sex. For six years the wife is condemned to almost complete taciturnity. No more gadding about for her; no gatherings at the village fountain; no dances under the umbrageous arcades of the wood. Even in her own house she must go about veiled; if a stranger comes on the premises, she hides herself in the innermost chamber; and twice only in the year is she permitted to appear in the street, and then she is escorted to church and back again by some hearded and booted marital or fraternal dragon. She may speak to her husband when alone with him, but neither to father nor brother; and as for cousins, they are not so much as mentioned in her presence. Whatever communications are indispensable must be made by gestures, or through the alphabet of the fingers. Her first step towards enfranchisement is the birth of her first child. She may talk to her infant, and should they happen to be on good terms, to her mother-in-law. Gradually her intercourse is extended to her nearest female relatives, and the experienced matron is occasionally licensed to address her male kinsfolk. But the disease of garrulity has been tolerably reduced by this discipline of six years; and an Armenian lady has seldom the chance of becoming fluent in conversation, unless she attains the years of the sibyl or the "treble-dated crow."—Edinburgh Review.

THE STREETS OF NAPLES.

"To the Campo Santo," said I, seating myself in one of the nondescript street vehicles, drawn by impossible horses—brutes of which you would a priori pronounce that none of them could survive one mile of the many through which they gallop gaily. The driver nodded intelligence, and we entered the Strada di Toledo, that characteristic thoroughfare of Naples, which is, from dawn to dark, what Fleet Street is from four to six o'clock in the afternoon, with the slight difference that one is all business, the other all idleness; but its roar and tumult are intensified by Italian vivacity, the embroilments and blocking up of the way are aggravated by the absence of all semblance of footpath—for the Neapolitan enjoys in perfection what the Frenchman calls "la totalité de la rue"—and I defy the most absent man on earth to abstract himself from all interest in the sights and sounds of the full tide of life which whirls and eddies round him. Such contrasts, too! Now a mountebank, now a monk, now a flaunting equipage, now a flambeaued funeral, goes past; roaring laughter at Pochinella miogles with a roaring De Profundis from the confraternity of brown sandalled officials, who jostle and stumble their way through the throng, heralding some corpse to its last home, their great tapers flaring in the sunlight, and drooping melted wax on the passers-by; while attendant urchins—incipient lazaroni—creep in the wake of each burly brother, and try to catch and treasure up the droppings of their ill-held funeral lights. High above all lies the dead man; or borne aloft in full holiday attire, bouquet in bosom, his prim, pious features painted into a horrid mimicry of life, his attire ball-room like, his face heavenwards, and his way through the buzzing, swarming life about him, towards—dust and worms.—Gleanings after Grand Tourists.

THE HONEY BEE.

Bees, when they lose their queen, take a common egg, already laid, remove partitions around in order to afford it room, together with the other eggs in the cells destroyed. One egg only is suffered to remain, and the insect that is hatched from it is fed upon a peculiar substance called "royal jelly." This has the effect to stimulate the creature to an extraordinary development and growth, qualifying it for a queen. Such a transformation is unknown to take place, we believe, in the nature of any other creature. It seems to us the most remarkable trait in the honey bee, more surprising than its skill in architecture, or its administration of political government.—Newark Advertiser.

New Publications.

THE MECHANIC'S BRIDE: OR, The Autobiography of Ellwood Gordon. By W. O. CAMBRIDGE, author of "Heuri" or the Web and Woof of Life." Boston: Shepard, Clark & Brown. 1857. 12mo. pp. 302.

A domestic story, well worked up, with a good plot, a good moral, and a good ending. The leading idea is a protest against the mercenary spirit that prompts so many marriages.

PEACE: OR, The Stolen Will. An American Novel. By MARY W. JANVREN. Boston: James French & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 507.

Miss Janvren is a vigorous and original writer, and has already taken a firm hold on the popular mind. Her present story is very dramatic in construction, crowded with incidents, and artistically managed, for the first page to the last. It will make a sensation.

NEW MUSIC.—From Oliver Ditson we have received the Drawing-Room Collections, Racconto, from Il Trovatore, Ocean Burial, by Charles Grobe, and Conversation Waltz, by F. W. Smith; "Rossini's Stabat Mater," two numbers of the "Opera," containing trios, quartets and choruses from favorite operas, "I am weary with rowing," the "Rock beside the Sea," "Sweet Mary Gray," (songs) and Thalberg's Serenade from Don Pasquale.—From Russell & Richardson, 291 Washington Street, the following piano forte music, "The Finest Eyes," by J. C. Metzger, Grand March, by C. F. Shuster, "Mi manca la voce," from Moses in Egypt, "Les Concert des Bois," "Sweet Memory's Isle," and "Forest Birds"—the two latter, songs.

SISTERS OF CHARITY, CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT, AND THE COMMUNION OF LABOR. By MRS. JAMESON. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 302.

This essay, originally delivered as a private lecture, contains the spirit of Mrs. Jameson's experience, observation and reading on the education and employment of women for many years past. It is full of original thoughts and valuable suggestions, and will be nearly as useful on this as on the other side of the Atlantic.

RECOGNITION OF FRIENDS IN HEAVEN. By DANIEL SHARP, D. D. Boston: James French & Co.

This elegant little volume contains a discourse which created a deep interest when first pronounced by its venerable author. It is now accompanied by a memorial written by Rev. John Wayland, D. D., rector of St. James's Church, Roxbury, and a most beautiful portrait on steel of Dr. Sharp.

USEFUL DONE.—There is not a village or town in the country so small, but that a club of twelve subscribers might be easily obtained for "Ballou's Pictorial," and the work be thus procured for each at two dollars a year, besides a gratis copy to the person who sends the names and money. Any person desiring to form a club, can have sample copies sent free of charge, by sending us a line to that effect.

Editorial Melange.

Edmund Pixley, of Great Harrington, was killed by his plough striking a stone. The handle hit him so violently in the abdomen that he died after suffering intense pain for several days. — All the best Holland gin is made of rye and malted barley, and in being distilled it is flavored with the juniper berry, and the Italian berry is only used by those who distill a common article, which can be sold at cheaper rates. The three principal places where gin is made in Holland are Schiedam, Delft Haven and Rotterdam. — An agent of a New England manufactory was recently tried in Cincinnati for selling goods by sample, it being charged as a breach of the license laws. He was acquitted, however. — The London Times says: "Persons in America directing letters for London should be careful to put the initial letters of the metropolitan district intended above the word 'London,' and not under it. A leading house in New York having transmitted bills for £70,000 in a letter directed 'London, W. C.,' it was carried to London, Western Canada." — The grain merchants of New York have resolved to adhere to the custom of estimating a bushel of corn to weigh fifty-six pounds, thus practically nullifying the recent act of the legislature requiring fifty-eight pounds to the bushel. — The steamship Circassian, which recently arrived at Portland, made the passage from Liverpool to St. Johns, N. F., in 8 1/2 days. The Portland Advertiser says that but for the interruption of the telegraph line, we should have had the quickest communication from England ever yet received. — The Montreal Pilot notices the narrow escape of a young lady in that city, from being blown into the canal, in consequence of wearing a hooped dress, which became inflated with the wind. — Specimens of iron ship-bolts, screws and similar articles, and wooden models of vessels, are on exhibition in New York, which have been copied by means of electro-magnetism. The copper deposit is formed directly on the wood or the metal, in an entire sheet, and it is conjectured that full-sized ships may be copied in the same manner. — The city of St. Louis, though one of the most prosperous in the Union, is burdened with a large debt. From the recent message of Mayor Wimer, we find the bonded debt of St. Louis to be $4,856,966, of which nearly two millions are stock in railroads. — The Collinsville Company, of Collinsville, have recently hung a cast steel bell in the tower of one of their buildings, which is perhaps the only one made of similar metal in this country. It weighs some 700 pounds, and though possibly not hung to the best advantage, it gives forth a heavy, very musical and well sustained tone. It is thought superior to most bells of ordinary manufacture. — A post-mortem examination of the body of the late Mr. Petriken, of Harrisburg, a victim of the National Hotel epidemic, shows not the slightest trace of any mineral poison whatever. — Gen. Shields writes to the New York committee that if it were left to him to determine, from his own observation, he would give Gen. Jackson's gold snuff-box to Col. Ward Burnett as the bravest New Yorker. Col. Burnett served in Gen. Shields's brigade in Mexico. — In Philadelphia, lately, an intoxicated woman lay on a child of Margaret Gallagher, which had been left in her charge, and smothered it to death. The woman was arrested. — The order of Jesuits have resolved to establish a church, college and free school in Chicago, on a scale of magnitude equal to any of the same character in the United States. The church will be one of the handsomest in the West, and will cost about $100,000. The church buildings will probably cost $150,000. — Henry Stoll, who for twenty-five years has been in the employ of Wiggan & Snowden, surgical instrument makers, at Philadelphia, with a liberal salary, has been arrested for a long series of robberies of his employers, and committed in want of $5000 bail. — A gentleman in New York recently celebrated the sixth anniversary of his marriage by sending his wife a beautiful basket of flowers, and a deed for a $60,000 house on the Fifth Avenue. — The number of lobsters boiled in Boston in the months of March, April, May and June, is estimated at 1,200,000. About 200 men are employed in catching them.

RAILROADS AHEAD.—On the European continent, it is now becoming a rule in railway management, that travellers may purchase tickets which will enable them to stop at any place they choose on the route, and resume the cars again in any passing train they please, without additional charge, for the space of one month. This is a great convenience, and if introduced on our railways, the practice would largely increase the amount of pleasure travel.

REVOLUTIONS.—A French writer has been compiling a history of revolutions, and traces them all to dear bread. This must make Louis Napoleon feel particularly comfortable, now that bread is scarce and high in Paris. "Bread or blood" is an unmeaning threat in England, but when it is uttered in France it is generally followed by the mitraille.

CORONER CONNERY, OF NEW YORK.—Gov. King has refused to remove Coroner Connery. We are glad of it; it will certainly prevent suicides in his jurisdiction.

FAMINE IN AMERICA.—Many persons have actually perished of starvation in the northern counties of Michigan, this year.

Wayside Gatherings.

The Pawnee Indians are said to be in a starving condition. The word girl was at one time applied indiscriminately to young persons of either sex. A pickered has been caught in Lake Champlain weighing ten pounds. The Cheyenne Indians are becoming troublesome to the California traders. A severe hail storm has occurred in the vicinity of Mazon, Texas. Stones fell of the size of an egg. The corner stone of Christ Church Cathedral at Montreal, was laid with solemn and interesting ceremonies lately. It is said that no fort ever suffered so much from a single battle as has the piano forte from the battle of Prague. Alexander Duncan of Providence, R. I., has made a donation of $1000 to the Dudley Observatory at Albany. A movement is on foot among the native and adopted citizens of New Haven for the organization of an independent military corps. On the occasion of the benefit of Mme. Bourgeoise, the prima donna, at New Orleans, diamonds valued at $1500 were thrown on the stage to her. The gardener of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum at Hartford, furnished cucumbers of this spring's growth for the table on the 4th of May. The London Morning Herald pronounced recently in a leading article that by his recent letter, "Lord Malmesbury has earned for himself a temporary immortality."

Ellen Kelly, a domestic at New York, dropped a bottle of cologne upon the fire, when the fluid ignited and set fire to her clothes, and she was so badly burned that she lived but an hour thereafter.

The California papers say that there has been another group of large trees discovered in Mariposa county. They exceed a thousand in number, and vary in diameter from eighty-two feet to twenty-five.

An omnibus driver in Buffalo, New York, saw a man hanging to a limb of a tree in an orchard. He was hanging by a red sash or curtain cord, with his feet on the ground and a pipe in his hand.

Mr. Dallas has transmitted to the Earl of Clarendon from our government, twenty one silver medals, and the sum of £270 to be distributed among the brave Margate boatmen who rescued the crew of the American ship Northern Belle.

A fast young man in Rochester, N. Y., recently ran his wagon against that of a Dutch lady, damaging the latter somewhat, whereupon the valiant fellow leaped out, collared the fellow, and made him fork over fifty cents to pay expenses.

A woman in one of the towns of New Hampshire, who had been ill used by her husband, on finding him asleep one day, quietly sewed him up in the bed-clothes and then gave him a tremendous thrashing.

The oldest veteran in the Prussian service, named Karnasch, was hurried lately at Pilsnitz, a small village near Breslau. He entered the army in the reign of Frederick the Great, and was at the time of his death 112 years of age.

A letter from Havana says: "The slave trade continues, and I am sorry to see that American vessels are engaged in it to an extent never before known. Several vessels have left this port quite recently, against which strong suspicions existed of their being intended for the slave trade."

The Portland Advertiser says the steamer Circassian brought to that port a company of about two hundred persons from Wales, bound to the State of Tennessee, where they have purchased lands and intend to locate themselves. They are accompanied by their pastor, Rev. Mr. Roberts, who is the chief of the party.

There is one haunted house in Ohio! A law case recently came off in Marion county, which established the fact. A rented house of B for one year. He left it in a few weeks, stating that it was haunted, and unfit to live in. B sued for the year's rent, but A proved that the house was haunted, and beat him.

In Washington city, lately, an immense Sabbath School gathering took place. The procession was little less than two miles in length, which will not be thought surprising when it is stated that about forty-five hundred children, and more than two thirds of a thousand teachers composed it.

It is calculated that ten thousand new townships and villages have been laid out, on paper, recently, in the new hands of the Western States and Territories, and it is supposed that at least ten million dollars cash and twenty millions credit have gone out within two years to be invested there.

The ashes of Torquato Tasso were solemnly transferred on the 25th of April to the tomb prepared for their reception, in Rome. The event was celebrated by the Accademia del Quirito in the amphitheatre situated near Tasso's oak, in the presence of a numerous and distinguished body of spectators.

Recently the question has arisen before the post-master general whether a deputy post-master can be compelled to obey a summons to appear in court with a valuable or other letter that rests in his office addressed to another party. The post-master general, under a decision of the attorney general's office, decided that he cannot legally do so.

A Mrs. Botto, who lives in Louisville, attempted self-destruction recently, by jumping from a second story window, in a fit of delirium. An Italian caught her in his arms before she touched the pavement, or the leap would in all probability have proved fatal. As it was, she was but little injured, while her rescuer was severely hurt.

The Northern Bee of St. Petersburg, is advocating the immediate construction of a railroad from Nishni-Novgorod to Irkutsk, and thence along the river Amoor to the Pacific Ocean. Such a road, the Bee thinks, would soon draw the Chinese trade of all Europe and America to Russia, and would effectually counter-balance the English operations in the south of China.

Brilliant thoughts are often slow in their formation, like the diamond. Tom Moore was frequently occupied three weeks in writing a song. Theodore Hook often took about the same time to perpetrate an "improvisation," and Sheridan was frequently employed all day in getting up a joke, which was supposed by some to be an inspiration of the moment.

Daniel Pratt, the wandering lunatic, advertises for a wife in the Buffalo papers. His proclamation commences thus: "To the ladies of the city of Buffalo, greeting. This is to certify that I, Daniel Pratt, of Boston, the great American traveller, editor and author, and candidate for the presidency of the United States in 1861, is in want of a lady to take by the hand in mutual matrimony, to divide the honor of the White House with."

Foreign Items.

William Cobbett, the son of the celebrated author and politician, is an inmate of the Queen's Bench prison.

A mile race has just been run in Manchester, England, by two men named Saville and John Bydall, in four minutes and thirty six seconds. Saville was the winner by ten yards.

The total expenses of the London police for the year 1856, amounted to upwards of two millions of dollars. The police force constitutes an army of 5447 men—in superintendents.

A novel punishment has been introduced in Bucharest: the shaving of whiskers and mustaches of all persons who meddle with the politics of the principalities during the session of the re-organization committee.

The portion of China north of the Yellow River produces no tea, but much silk. There is a coarse but excellent kind of silk produced, which is much esteemed for men's garments. The worms are fed on a species of oak, peculiar to the country. This silk is produced in large quantities, and a dress or robe of it, such as is worn by the priests, will last ten years.

Prince Albert was present at the recent inauguration of a statue of Queen Victoria, erected in Peel Park, Salford, in commemoration of a visit by the queen to that place in 1851, on which occasion she saw 80,000 children assembled from the Manchester and Salford free schools. A large portion of the expense of the statue was met by the penny subscriptions of the children.

Sands of Gold.

.... Every great poem is in itself limited by necessity—but in its suggestions unlimited and indefinite.—Longfellow.

.... The protection of God cannot, without sacrilege, be invoked, but in behalf of justice and right.—Kosuth.

.... Innocence is a flower which withers when watched, but blooms not again, though watered by tears.—Barrow.

.... Passion gets less and less powerful after every defeat. Husband energy for the real demand which the dangers of life make upon it.—Sidney Smith.

.... The bold defiance of a woman is the certain sign of her shame—when she has once ceased to blush, it is because she has too much to blush for.—Talleyrand.

.... Sin first is pleasing, then it grows easy, then delightful, then frequent, then habitual, then confirmed; then the man is impatient, then he is obstinate, then he is resolved never to repent, and then he is ruined.—Lightfoot.

.... Remember that every person, however low, has rights and feelings. In all contentions, let peace be rather your object, than triumph; value triumph only as the means of peace.—Sidney Smith.

.... I feel a kind of reverence for the first books of young authors. There is so much aspiration in them, so much audacious hope and trembling fear, so much of the heart's history, that all errors and short-comings are for a while lost sight of in the amiable self-assertions of the youth.—Longfellow.

Joker's Budget.

Soft soap, in some shape, pleases us all, and generally the more "lye" you put in the better.

When you raise money by getting a note "shaved," do you consider yourself the raiser (razor)?

The Sacramento Age tells us of a man in a political procession whose motto was so large that an Englishman threatened to "go in and live in it if he didn't shut it."

"When a feller has reached a certain pint in drinkin'," said an old soaker, "I think he order stop." "Well, I think," said a wag, "he had better stop before he reaches a pint."

An exchange tells of an editor who went a soldiering and was chosen captain. One day at parade, instead of giving the orders, "Front face, three paces forward," he exclaimed—"Cash, two dollars a year, in advance."

"Yes, sir," said an obtuse alderman, who had been conversing with a wonderful professor on education, "it's perfectly true memory may make a learned pig; but to my mind, sir, you can't stuff him better than with onions."

"You haven't opened your mouth during the whole session," complained a member of the legislature to a representative from the same town. "O, yes, I have," was the reply; "I yawned through the whole of your speech."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.

DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, cladding the circle of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE

1 subscriber, one year, $2 00

4 subscribers, " " 7 00

10 " " 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the Illustrated Copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, No. 22 Winter Street, Boston

CHURCH AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

We present on this page an accurate representation of the new Christian church now being erected in Constantinople, hitherto the stronghold of Islamism, where a few years before, Christians, unless sustained by powerful protection, were treated with every indignity, and where those who entertained the idea of establishing a Christian house of worship would have been looked upon as madmen. But Constantinople, formerly the imperial stronghold of the Greek Church, is again so far under the influence of Christian powers that it is obliged to proclaim religious liberty to its inhabitants, to whatsoever creed they may belong. It seems strange, however, that the English communion should have been hitherto unrepresented at the head quarters of Islam, except by the British ambassador's chapel at Pera. During the late war, the attention of Englishmen had been called to this fact, and, after the treaty of peace was ratified, a public meeting was held, on the 28th of April, 1856, at Willis's rooms, under the presidency of his royal highness the Duke of Cambridge, when resolutions were moved by the Duke of Newcastle, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Lord Lyons, and others, having for their object the erection of a church, of noble design and magnificent decorations, befitting the dignity of the English nation, as a memorial of those who had fallen in the war. In the month of June following, the work was thrown open to competition from all nations of the world. The principal conditions to be complied with were, that the style of architecture should be pointed, or Gothic, and in no way approximating to the Byzantine, or Mahometan style, for obvious reasons; that it must be designed to contain seven hundred persons, at a cost of not more than £20,000. The first premium was awarded to Mr. Burgess, and the second to Mr. Street. It is not a little curious that the second prize, both for the Lille Cathedral and the Constantinople Church, should have been awarded to Mr. Street, as the first in each has been to Mr. Burgess. In Mr. Burgess's design the northern Gothic has been kept in view, regard being had, of course, to the modifications rendered necessary by the difference of climate. The model which he has chosen is the noble Church of St. Andrea, at Vercelli, in Italy, built, as is said, though probably not correctly, "by English workmen, with English money, in the thirteenth century." For the purpose of containing monuments to those of the English who fell victims in the late struggle, the aisles have been carried round the apse, an idea novel, and adding greatly to the effect of the interior, by giving it open pier arches for sustaining the apse. Over the altar there is a ciborium or baldachino, supported by four columns of great artistic beauty; but the judges have recommended that this should be replaced by a reredos, to avoid all cause of offence to strict Protestants. The British "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," deserves great credit for its activity in the preliminary movements which led to the foundation of this church. In exterior design this monumental church reminds us strongly of many of the French churches of the thirteenth century. This was the golden period of the pointed style in France, during which most of the great specimens were produced.

Mr. Whittington (Ecclesiastical Antiquities of France), in allusion to this period, says, "Everything seemed to conspire, in the circumstances of the nation and of the world, to produce an interval favorable for the cultivation of the arts; and genius and talents were not wanting to make use of the happy opportunity.

knot of the oak, the lower surface of which is exquisitely polished, on which, in Mr. Stuart's own handwriting, are two appropriate verses from Mrs. Sigourney's lines upon the fall of the famous tree. Various parts of the cradle are inlaid with amethyst, smoked topaz, and other precious stones, purchased by Col. Colt at Novgorod.

MONUMENTAL CHURCH, CONSTANTINOPLE.

The thirteenth century found the French artists a numerous and protected body, in possession of a new and beautiful style of building; the religious enthusiasm of the times, formed by the spirit of the Crusades, was at its height, and the throne of France was filled by monarchs equally distinguished by their piety and magnificence. The dissensions between the barons and their sovereign, which agitated England during the greater part of this century, increased the power and ensured the tranquillity of France. Thus were external circumstances no less favorable to the prevailing taste, and its triumph was proportionately brilliant. The most sumptuous churches which now adorn the French cities are the work of this age; and while their extraordinary beauty renders them interesting objects of curiosity, the accurate knowledge we are able to acquire of their dates, and the names of their architects, is singularly important to the illustration of our own antiquities, and the general history of Gothic architecture." We have offered this representation not so much on account of beauty or design in the building, but because it serves as a landmark to an important point in history—the restoration of Christian worship to the city of Constantinople in an imposing form. It remains to be seen whether the tolerance of the Turks is transitory or permanent. There is little doubt, however, that the days of oppression on the part of the sultans have gone by, with the waning of that power which once sanctioned and enforced the outpouring of relentless bigotry.

CHARTER OAK CRADLE.

A most elegant and costly article has been made from the wood of the Charter Oak—a swing cradle—lately presented by Hon. I. W. Stuart to Mrs. Sam Colt. It would be impossible to give an adequate description of it—nothing less than its actual inspection will convey an idea of the richness of its design, the grace of the carving, and the beauty of the whole as a work of art. It is canoe-shaped, the base being a natural limb of the oak; from the bottom a beautifully carved acorn depends, to which are attached two silken cords which are used to swing it. The sides are carved in open work, in the highest style of art, representing branches, leaves and acorns of the oak; in the centre on one side is Col. Colt's coat of arms, and on the other a tablet for an inscription. The inside of the cradle is lined with blue cloth of the finest texture, with a beautiful fringe running around the edge. The posts which support the cradle are finely carved from a solid piece of the oak. The centre and longest portion of the supports, is cut to imitate branches of the oak intertwining, the whole surmounted by two colts rampant, facing inward, which produce a most spirited effect. On the lower portion of each of the supports are carved four colts' heads. The platform on which it stands is lined upon its sides throughout with the bark of the Charter Oak. Upon the middle of it is a massive END VOL. 12.

